THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, with respect to the Question of my noble and learned Friend, I do not think there will be any difficulty in laying on the Table the despatches which have passed since the last Papers were presented; and when my noble and learned Friend sees them he will be able to form a more competent judgment than at present as to the position of Her Majesty’s Government in regard to this subject. In the course of his speech my noble and learned Friend referred to the action taken by Her Majesty’s Government in the case of Brazil. That reference appears to be singularly opportune; because it reminds your Lordships that in dealing with engagements, whatever their character, whatever binding force you may attribute to them, which concern the internal government of a country, it is always necessary to ask yourselves which of two lines of conduct you contemplate pursuing. It is, perhaps, an inconvenience, resulting from our national habit of discussing foreign affairs in the open forum of debate, that in regard to questions which we ask ourselves we also inform foreign nations of the answers. But, nevertheless, we shall never come to a clear idea of our policy on such a question as this, unless we draw in our own minds the distinction between those matters which we can push to the ultima ratio, and those other questions where we should employ the moral influence of England, but not think of going beyond it. My noble and learned Friend will forgive me for saying that I do not think it is my business in this place to interpret Treaties. Any interpretation which my noble and learned Friend may give from the Bench opposite he is at liberty to modify if he were to migrate to the Wool-sack; but I can hardly repudiate the interpretation of a Treaty given by me in this place, and I might inadvertently make use of some inaccurate word or phrase, which did not express my real meaning, but which might be construed afterwards as binding Her Majesty’s Government to a particular interpretation. Therefore, I shall avoid the snare which the noble and learned Lord seems to have laid for me, of speaking too confidently and distinctly of the precise character of the obligations which bind Spain to us in respect of this question of Slavery. Whatever their extent may be, it seems clear that it is by moral influence only that they can be enforced. I ask my noble and learned Friend to place himself in the position of a Spanish statesman before he determines the precise vigour and rapidity which the English Government should use in putting these obligations into action. There is no matter upon which all nations are so sensitive as any interference with their internal government; but if you may distinguish between nations, those which are ruled by popular Assemblies are infinitely more sensitive than those ruled by a despotic Power. There is no action of diplomacy that is so difficult as urging upon a nation governed by a popular Assembly, or in which a popular Assembly bears a large share of the government, any change in its internal laws. The slightest appearance of undue concession on the part of the Ministry of the country is at once seized upon by the Opposition as truckling to the foreigner. In Spain the Opposition has a characteristic which distinguishes it from Oppositions in other countries—they are singularly sensitive of the honour of their country. There is no charge likely to be more fatal to a Government—no charge against which it feels itself bound to provide with greater care—than that of submitting its internal legislation to the requirements, or even to the importunate advice, of any foreign critic or Ally. These considerations must be well borne in mind by anyone who forms an opinion on the action of the Spanish or of the British Government in pressing this matter upon them. I will venture to

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That further Consideration of the Bill, as amended, be now adjourned."—(Mr. Parnell.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought the general feeling of the Committee was in favour of going on. He was not at all disposed to complain of the conduct which the hon. Member for Meath had pursued in the discussion of this Bill upon Report; but he thought the feeling of the House was decidedly in favour of proceeding until it was finished. Then he hoped they would be allowed to read it a third time, so as finally to conclude their labours upon it. If the House were disposed to do that, it would not be necessary to have a Saturday Sitting. The Commencement Bill would have to be taken on Monday. He thought it would not be so very great an inconvenience to give another hour or two.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT hoped the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) would not press the Motion. He must feel it was impossible that the feeling of the House could be changed upon the question of flogging now, even by an adjournment of the debate till Saturday morning.

MR. BIGGAR reminded the House that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had promised that due opportunity would be given for the discussion of Amendments, and he would ask him whether there could be a proper discussion after the present hour? No Motion for adjournment had been made till after 2.30, and he did appeal to the right hon. Gentleman not to give them the trouble of going to the Division Lobby at such a time.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER would urge his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) not to proceed with his Motion. There could be no doubt that his hon. Friend had been animated by a sincere desire to improve this Bill. He must confess, however, that in the present temper of the House, and after the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he could not expect to add to the very important victories he had already achieved. He, therefore, thought that no end could be gained by protracting this debate any longer. The hon. Member for Meath was going to Ireland to pursue his patriotic labours there, having achieved victories of which any man in the House might be proud. Whatever might be the representations of hon. Members, or the misconceptions of his conduct, these were victories on which he could look back with pride. They had discussed this question of flogging over and over again—they had debated it under almost every conceivable circumstance. Although he was far from saying it would be unreasonable to ask the House to adjourn, and to continue the discussion on another day, he thought they would be wise to be satisfied with the substantial victory achieved, and he would, therefore, appeal to his hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. DILLWYN also appealed to the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) to withdraw his Motion, as the consequence was, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated, it was now, if the Bill were finished that night, unnecessary to have a Morning Sitting next day. He would, therefore, suggest that the Motion should not be pressed to a Division.

MR. CALLAN also appealed to the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) to withdraw his Motion. If he read the intention of line 21 of the 128th clause aright, he found that the corporal punishment of 25 lashes was an addition to the general power given in military prisons; and they were told, also, that it was necessary for commanders in the field to have this power. ["Order, Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Is the hon. Member referring to Clause 128?

MR. CALLAN replied, that this was a Motion for continuing the debate. He knew from whom these interruptions came, and he was conscious that the spirit which animated the flogging Gentlemen below the Gangway, who were in favour—

MR. SPEAKER: I must invite the hon. Member to address the Chair.

MR. CALLAN said, he was addressing himself to the Chairman, in calling his attention to the spirit which animated a portion of the House, in interrupting him whilst he was making an appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to facilitate the progress of Public Business. He would not condescend to appeal personally, directly or indirectly, to hon. Members who were in favour of flogging; but he would appeal directly to his hon.

tions to us with regard to capital punishment in this country? But the fallacy in that argument was that on the subject of capital punishment a foreign country would have no Treaty engagements with us. That appeared to him (Earl Granville) to make the whole difference in the matter. The noble Marquess deprecated remonstrances which might excite the feelings of the Spanish people; but the fact was that at this very moment there was a debate going on in the Spanish Chambers, in which the Opposition were pressing the Government to do exactly that which his noble and learned Friend beside him desired to see done. He accepted the assurances of the Foreign Secretary that Her Majesty's Government were in earnest in this matter; and he hoped that the Papers to be produced would show that the Members of the present Administration had done a little more than the speech of the noble Marquess indicated.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, I feel convinced, from long experience now on this question of Slavery and on communications with foreign Powers, that it is not wise to rest too literally upon the terms of a Treaty; but rather that we must begin upon friendly and, comparatively speaking, private representations to foreign Courts. What my noble Friend has said is perfectly true—that there is in every State, and especially where there are free and representative institutions, a great deal of jealousy as to any interference with what are called “domestic institutions.” The noble Earl who has just spoken has reminded your Lordships—and I believe there is not the slightest doubt as to the accuracy of his statement—that at this very time the Government of Spain are pressed by the Opposition in favour of the very view which both the Government of England and the noble and learned Lord are anxious to support; but would the Opposition in Spain have been pressing the Government of that country for a suppression of Slavery in Cuba if there had been that systematic pressure from a foreign Government on the Spanish Government? I venture to say that had we taken any extreme step upon the subject with the Government of Spain the Opposition at Madrid would not have advocated, as they do at present, the views which they now hold. I do not mean to say that they are advocating them now with insincerity; but they must have felt that they were not appealing with success to their own Government if they were merely echoing and supporting the claims of any foreign Power on the same question. I feel that the course which the Government in this country have taken at all times—by the noble Lords now in Opposition, and by those sitting at present upon this Bench—has been almost identical on the particular matter before us. There has been, I think, perfect consistency in the conduct which this country has pursued for the suppression of Slavery. It has taken every opportunity of binding foreign Powers by Treaties; but it has never, in entering into those Treaties, contemplated that they were, as a matter of course, to be enforced in the particular manner to which the noble and learned Lord has referred if there were any apparent reluctance on the part of a foreign Power to fulfil its engagements. Her Majesty's Government have trusted as much as they can to moral influence, and they must continue to trust to moral influence in order to gain the desired end. At the same time they are always in favour, if an opportunity is given them, of binding by Treaties foreign Governments to the completion of an object which is not only dear to this country, but which, it must be satisfactory to feel, is one that interests almost every civilized State.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL.—(No. 156.)

(The Viscount Cranbrook.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that for a long time there had been a pretty general opinion that the old Mutiny Act, which was an accretion of various enactments since 1689, was a somewhat inefficient instrument for the government of the Army; and in recent years those who had charge of passing it through the other House of Parliament were well aware that many parts of it were difficult to defend, and ultimately it was agreed that the subject should be referred to a Committee. Our Army had hostile occupation. For instance, supposing they were in occupation of Eastern Roumelia, in time of peace, would they allow a death-penalty to be enforced under such circumstances?

The House divided:—Ayes 10; Noes 92: Majority 82.—(Div. List, No. 185.)

MR. H. SAMUELSON said, he had already explained that he would not move any of his Amendments, if the Government would accept one of them; and if he knew the Government were about to accept this one, he certainly would not have put the Committee to the trouble of division.

Other Amendments made.

Question, "That the Bill, as amended, be reported to the House," put, and agreed to.

COLONEL STANLEY hoped he might appeal to the House, for reasons of Public Business, to read the Bill a third time at once.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Colonel Stanley.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT would take that opportunity of hoping that his right hon. and gallant Friend would further consider an Amendment which they were not able to discuss fully—the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Frome (Mr. H. Samuelson). He (Sir William Harcourt) hoped in "another place" the difference between a military and a hostile occupation would be fully considered. He thought, if his right hon. and gallant Friend would carefully consider the matter, he would come to the same conclusion.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT hoped, if time would allow, that the matter to which he had already called attention twice would also be borne in mind on another occasion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

this power ceased to exist. Then, with respect to the amount of punishment to be inflicted in the Army, when the Bill, was first introduced it was limited to 50 lashes; but, by an Amendment which was made in the other House, 50 lashes was reduced to 25. For his own part, he did not think that the question of degree was the question of importance in this matter. The question of the necessity of punishment could be decided only by those who had the charge of exercising it; and until the country came to a more satisfactory state of things in the Army he believed, in the interest of the soldier himself, it was better that this sharp and decisive punishment should be inflicted at the moment and on the spot than that an attempt should be made to drag a number of prisoners, soldiers, or camp-followers in custody with the Army. The question was now brought to this point. The power to give corporal punishment was no longer vested in the provost marshal of his own will; but the provost marshal had power to take immediately into custody an offender and summon a regularly constituted court martial, composed of officers on the spot, who would order the infliction of the punishment which they might adjudge. That seemed to him a protection to the soldier and the camp-follower, and he hoped that it would not too much weaken the power of the provost marshal. The punishment of flogging was in future to be inflicted only for offences which rendered the man liable to sentence of death, and those offences were limited to the breach of the laws of the Army in the field on active service. Having begun with no corporal punishment in time of peace except on board ship, they had done away with it in that case, because on board ship they had the power of custody; but in the field in time of active service, the Bill still left the power in the hands of the courts martial that where the maximum punishment was death they would be able to inflict the lesser punishment of the lash. For his own part, he quite admitted that corporal punishment had an unpleasant and disagreeable sound when applied to adults; but when it came to a question of the bullet or the lash, how much better was it that, under strict regulation, and under the care which would now be exercised, the lash should be used instead of putting a man to death for an offence which, perhaps, it was felt did not deserve that penalty? They had always a certain number of men of bad character in the Army, and the camp-followers were certainly not of the highest type, and it was essential that they should have the power of keeping such persons in order. In time of war, in the case of passing through a country where it was most necessary to respect the feelings of the population, the stealing of an egg from a hen's nest might be a most serious offence; and camp-followers or others who would take an egg would not stop there—they would more likely take anything they could lay their hands on if they had the opportunity. It was thus essential to the discipline of Armies that there should exist a power to inflict punishment upon offenders with the utmost promptitude. He had heard it suggested that persons offending should be handcuffed and taken on with the Army; but he would venture to suggest that no Army which carried with it an indefinite number of handcuffed soldiers and camp-followers could possibly perform those strategic movements which were from time to time necessary to success. Having looked carefully through the Bill, he was unable to admit that, as far as the punitive portions of it were concerned, there was much difference between it and the Mutiny Act, which it was intended to supersede; but such differences as there were between the two sets of provisions would not tend to the disadvantage of the soldier. Several of the provisions would be strongly in favour of the soldier—as, for instance, as regarded arrest, it was provided that the trial of a man must take place within eight days after his arrest, unless sufficient reasons were given for delaying it—the power of commanding officers to inflict imprisonment for absence without leave was extended to 21 days, but power of appeal was given to the soldier. Again, formerly, when a man was acquitted by court martial, the decision was not made known for some time; but, under this Bill, it was necessary at once to announce the acquittal and order the discharge from custody of a soldier who had been charged with offences against military law and declared not to have been guilty of the offences imputed to him. The only other remark which he felt called upon to make, as far as this branch of the Bill was concerned, was that ample power of appeal was given, alike to officers and soldiers who thought they had been wrongfully accused of offence. The part of the Bill which related to "Enlistment" would make some slight alterations, principally in reference to the transference of men from the Army to the Reserve. The 3rd Part, which related to "Billeting and Impressment of Carriages," required no special notice. The 4th Part consisted of "General Provisions," in which he might refer to the clauses which related to Military Prisons. In dealing with military prisons, care would be taken that soldiers should not be associated with bad characters. That was really the whole Bill; and their Lordships would be surprised, as he had himself been, when he went through the Bill in connection with the old Mutiny Act, to find how slight were the changes effected, and yet, at the same time, upon how different and how firm a basis military discipline and military law generally were established. It would be a great advantage to have this measure, instead of being obliged to go every year through clause by clause of the Mutiny Act. Everything concerning the discipline of the Army was now brought into definite shape, and so clearly set forth, that every man must understand his duties and obligations. In passing this Bill hastily, which he asked their Lordships to do, he thought he might promise that their Lordships would find that, in making great haste, they had also made good speed.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I may be permitted to say a few words in reference to this Bill, speaking entirely from a professional point of view, and without reference to any other observations which may be made from either side of the House. I wish to say, in the first place, that we—the military authorities—are in entire accordance with the views of Her Majesty's Government on the subject-matter of this Bill, and the mode in which it is dealt with. It is to be deplored that it should have been stated, as I have sometimes seen, that a difference of opinion exists between Her Majesty's Government and the military authorities with regard to certain points in this Bill. I can only say that I earnestly hope that the time will never arrive at which the deliberately formed opinions of Her Majesty's Government on military questions, no matter to which Party in politics it may belong, will receive any other than full and due support from the military authorities in this country. There may be difference of opinion at first when important points are raised; but when they have been decided, the decisions are accepted by the military authorities with that loyalty and determination which they are bound to show, whatever Party may be in power. As regards the question of discipline, with which I am principally concerned, I agree with the noble Viscount who has moved the second reading that there is very little to be found in the present Bill different from the old Mutiny Act and the Articles of War, which the measure is intended to supersede. The principal difference is that the law is put down in such a shape that it will be much more simple and much more easily understood. All changes of this kind must take a little time to be appreciated by those who have to deal with them. This is a large and comprehensive measure; but I firmly believe that in the long run it will be a much more simple piece of legislation than the old Mutiny Act. As regards the maintenance of discipline, the Bill, I believe, contains provisions under which we shall be able to maintain discipline as thoroughly and as efficiently as it ought to be, and as it has been in the past. With regard to the question of corporal punishment, about which there has been so much discussion, I am fully persuaded that every officer in the Army would desire, if possible, to get rid of all severe and disgraceful punishments; but we are called upon to carry out the discipline of the Army, and the first consideration is, how is that discipline to be maintained? My conviction is—and I believe that it is the conviction of every officer in the Army—that unless corporal punishment be retained in the Service it will be impossible to maintain discipline—unless the officers have power to deal with cases as they arise, and unless an Army is kept in a state of discipline, it is a rabble and a mob—it is useless—it is worse than useless—it is dangerous. You must maintain discipline at all costs, and I do not believe that any outrage or injustice will arise under the provisions of this Act. It is said that flogging is a disgraceful punishment. My Lords, all punishments are degrading—it is in the commission of the offence, and not in the nature of the punishment, that degradation consists. What you want to find in a punishment is that it should deter from crime. If the effect of this punishment is to deter men from committing crime, that is the best defence that can be offered for it. The alternative, as regards certain offences, lies between flogging and shooting, and surely flogging is much less severe than the punishment of death. Very serious offences may be committed while the Army is in the field. For instance, an outbreak of mutiny might occur in face of the enemy, or some serious crime of that sort might be committed which must be dealt with instantly and effectively. We are told that foreign Armies have a variety of other punishments. In some, it is said, men are tied up by their thumbs, while in others men are bound hand-and-foot to the wheel of a gun-carriage. I do not know whether such punishments are inflicted or not, but I have seen it stated that they are:—Would it be judicious or wise, however, for us to leave it to the discretion of an officer to resort to punishments of that kind? I am informed that these punishments are inflicted incidentally, as it were, by the officers in command of troops. In my opinion, it would not be at all justifiable for us to leave to an individual officer the responsibility of any punishment to which he might resort in difficult circumstances, because we have not the courage to put what we think right into law. It would be unjust to officers to place them in this false position, and Parliament would be acting with a great want of moral courage if it did not state that, in certain circumstances, corporal punishment may be inflicted. I sincerely hope the necessity for such punishment may never—or, certainly, very rarely—arise; but the effect of having the punishment on the Statute Book is the very thing which will deter men from committing crimes for which corporal punishment can be awarded. Although most anxious to have no punishments which are not justly meted out to men, I am prepared to say that, under existing circumstances, it is necessary and essential to maintain this punishment. With regard to the reduction in the number of lashes, it will, I believe, be found that 25 lashes will produce as great a deterrent as 50; and, therefore, I think it is perfectly justifiable to accept this modification. My Lords, I consider that the condition of a soldier, under this new law, will be very much better than it was under the old. With regard to the subject of enlistment, the Bill makes an important change. Formerly, if a man took the shilling, he was from that moment considered to be a soldier, although he might have been in a state of drunkenness at the time; but under the proposed new law, the shilling test is done away with; if the man does not choose to appear before the magistrate, he may remain away; and he may, if he likes, claim his discharge within three months. This and other points in the Bill are of considerable importance. I am convinced that when the Army comes to understand this measure they will admit that they are in no respect in a worse condition, or under worse treatment, than they were under the old Mutiny Act and Articles of War, and that the officers will be able to maintain the discipline of the Army, which is, after all, the first object we have at heart, and the necessity for which I am bound to press most earnestly on the attention of your Lordships.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, he should give the Bill his most sincere and hearty support. His noble Friend the Secretary of State had introduced it in terms which left him nothing whatever to complain of, and the illustrious Duke had also made a most satisfactory statement. The provisions of the Bill would, he believed, effect a very great change for the better in the law relating to military service. Ten years ago a Royal Commission, over which his noble Friend opposite (Lord Winmarleigh) presided, made its Report to the Queen, and the first and chief of its recommendations was that the Mutiny Act and the Articles of War should be carefully re-drawn. In 1871, he (Viscount Cardwell) had the assistance of Mr. Davison, one of the most able men who ever filled the Office of Judge Advocate General. He had expectations that in a very short time—probably in 1872—Mr. Davison would have been able to present to the House of Commons the result of his labours; but, unfortunately, that gentleman's career was cut short by an untimely death. Afterwards came the time when he had the assistance of his right hon. Friend Mr. Ayrton—and he might here remark that he was glad to hear his noble Friend opposite speak in such well-merited terms of Mr. Ayrton's services. He might say that there was no Judge Advocate General of modern times who had earned to a greater extent the confidence and approval of the illustrious Duke, and of the military men by whom he was surrounded, than Mr. Ayrton did when he held that Office. At the beginning of 1874 he confidently expected to see Mr. Ayrton lay his Bill on the Table of the House of Commons; but their Lordships knew very well what happened in that year. It had, therefore, fallen to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the present Secretary of State for War to introduce this Bill, which had been sent up to their Lordships on the responsibility of the Crown with the concurrence of the other House of Parliament. With regard to the vexed question of corporal punishment, he might say that he was very much struck on referring to what passed in 1867, when an important step was taken in mitigation of that kind of punishment in the Army. No less sagacious a person than the late General Peel was recorded to have said that if they reduced corporal punishment in time of peace to the dimensions then spoken of, or something to that effect, they would never be able to recur to it in time of war. What he wished to found upon that remark was this—that they did not know what they would be able to do in the way of reducing that punishment if they proceeded tentatively, and so as always to have the results of experience to fall back upon. They might be able to do, in the course of years, things which they now hardly expected to be able to do at all. They had, during the 12 years which had elapsed since General Peel's prediction, gone on improving the condition of the soldier; and, according to the testimony of the Inspector General of Recruiting, the popularity of the Army was rapidly increasing, and there was a much greater disposition to enlist than formerly existed. If they went on perpetually improving the position of the Army in the manner done by the present Bill, and by other ways, they would still further encourage that disposition. He rejoiced that the first step had been taken in fulfilling the recommendations of his noble Friend's Commission; and they might depend upon it that this measure was a very great step towards the simplification of the law and putting it in a form which would reach the comprehension of the soldier. If they went on for the next 12 years, or for a shorter time than that, in their course of continually ameliorating the condition of the soldier, he did not at all despair of their arriving at the point at which they might go even beyond the limit contemplated by this Bill in doing away with corporal punishment. They might have the opportunity, in the next few years, of considering whether any amendment in this measure would be necessary, and he was sure its practical working would be carefully examined by those who were responsible for the administration of the Army.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he had no intention of disturbing the harmony with which the Bill had been received by their Lordships. The former Mutiny Act provided sufficiently for the government of the Army, it protected the rights of officers and of soldiers, and of the public; however, if Parliament insisted upon a Bill more symmetrical in arrangement, and more precise in language, he should make no objection; but he rose to express his hope that the Bill, or some other measure which might hereafter be introduced, might have the effect of inducing a superior class of recruits to enlist. He was afraid that that point had not yet been reached. Although he was aware that no Amendments in the present measure could be carried, there were one or two points in it which it was especially desirable should be amended in a future year. The 72nd clause unduly limited the power of the provost marshal. Any one who had seen the legion of devils who followed an Army would know that a more summary power of dealing with them was necessary than that provided in the Bill. He also thought that the Secretary of State would require greater powers than he now possessed for utilizing the services of the Reserve.

LORD TRURO held it to be a mistake to suppose that men of the respectability which was desired in the British Army were for one moment deterred from enlisting by the fear of being flogged.

That punishment was feared only by men of the most unfortunate habits and who were looked upon as belonging to the lowest class of our population. He had heard of the case of a soldier in a very distinguished regiment who had been five or six times flogged, and it made no impression whatever on the man, who was now a Scripture reader at Liverpool. Corporal punishment, under the safeguards interposed by this Bill ought, he thought, to be maintained.

EARL GRANVILLE concurred in regretting that circumstances made it impossible for their Lordships to discuss the details of this very important measure. He could not, however, say that he regretted that fact on his own account; because he remembered the rule once laid down by a noble Lord—that one should only speak in that House on subjects on which he not only knew something, but on which he was known to know something. He was afraid, therefore, that any remarks which he might have made on the details of the Bill, which had been handled professionally by the illustrious Duke on the Cross Benches, would have had no weight whatever. But, on the other hand, he protested against this measure being considered as necessarily perfect on some of the subjects which had been in controversy. The illustrious Duke had said the Bill contained everything which he thought essential for the discipline of the Army. But the Government had introduced the Bill, after a great deal of consideration, in a certain form with regard to flogging; and all knew that in “another place,” under considerable pressure, they had made three distinct concessions in that matter. Either, therefore, they had not considered the subject in time, or the concessions they had now made were against their judgment. This being so, he begged to say that, as far as he was concerned, he could not accept the present limitations as being necessarily perfect of their kind.

LORD DENMAN said, that the Government might quote from Horace—

“Adsit

*Regula peccatis quæ poenas inroget æquas
Nec sentia dignum horribili sectere flagello.”*

And the measure was one which could be altered next Session. He hoped that it would pass without alteration immediately.

NOTICES OF QUESTIONS.

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE JEWS IN EASTERN ROUMELIA.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON gave Notice that on Tuesday he would ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any and what accounts of the outrages committed in Eastern Roumelia upon Jewish refugees returning to their homes at Carlovo; and, if so, what steps have been taken for their protection and for their security in the future?

RUSSIA—TREATMENT OF POLITICAL OFFENDERS—ALLEGED RUSSIAN ATROCITIES.

MR. J. COWEN gave Notice that on this day week he would ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the Government have received any information as to the manner in which

Russian subjects, on mere suspicion of political offences, are being driven by thousands into slavery in Siberia; if they have been informed that 700 persons, mostly men and women of education, have been packed in the hold of a small ship bound for Saghalien, without light or sufficient food or air, that 250 of them died on board, and 150 were landed in a dying state; further, whether it is true that large bodies of Cossacks are being forcibly ejected from their houses and homes, and compelled to settle in Colonies from the mouth of the Usuri river to Vladivostock, for the purpose of establishing a chain of military posts against the Chinese; and, whether, since remonstrances were addressed by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of Naples against the treatment of Poerio and his colleagues in 1855, and to Russia against her treatment of the Poles after the insurrection of 1861, to Turkey in 1876 against the action of Cheket Pasha and others in Bulgaria, these cases do not furnish precedents for remonstrating with Russia against such treatment of alleged political offenders?

QUESTIONS.

ARMY—ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT— CLAIMS OF MR. PADWICK.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any person other than Mr. W. F. Padwick has claimed to be the inventor of the system of fitting elongated projectiles with studs of soft metal; and, if so, if he would give the name of such claimant, or claimants if there be more than one?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Experiments were conducted in France, in 1850, with elongated projectiles with soft metal studs—four years before Mr. Padwick made his proposition. These experiments having proved successful, the Select Ordnance Committee, after trial, recommended their adoption into the British Service in the year 1863. Subsequently, they recommended that Mr. Padwick should receive £100 for having drawn attention to the subject in 1854. The reason that this invention was not adopted sooner into the English Service, between 1854 and 1863, was that Sir William Armstrong's breech-loading system with lead-coated projectiles had been adopted. There is no trace of any claim having been made previous to the one put forward by Mr. Padwick.

INDIA—FINANCE ACCOUNTS.

QUESTION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the authorities in India have yet supplied the figured Statements which will enable Members to compare the figures in the latest Finance Accounts with those figures in the Accounts of prior years; whether the Debt Statements have yet been obtained from India; and, when will the Second Part of the Finance Accounts be delivered, and the distribution Statement of the Capital spent in different parts of India on productive Public Works in the two last years be ready?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The second part of the Finance Accounts will be delivered to Members in the course of a few days. The distributive Statement of Capital expended on Public Works has been received, and a copy shall be sent to the hon. and gallant Member. As regards all the other statements to which the hon. and gallant Member's Question refers, I am sorry to say that they have not yet been received from India. The recent changes in the forms of account have caused some delay; but I will do my best to obtain them quickly.

CHARITY (EXPENSES AND ACCOUNTS) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he can state what course the Government propose to take with respect to the Charity (Expenses and Accounts) (No. 2) Bill; and whether, if he proposes to abandon the Bill, he will consent to refer the subject to which it relates to a Select Committee?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the subject was complicated, and, therefore, they proposed to withdraw the Bill for the present Session, and introduce next Session another Bill, which, if necessary, would be referred to a Select Committee.

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE RUSSIANS IN EASTERN ROUMELIA.

QUESTIONS.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked, Whether at the beginning of June, and since the transfer of the province to the Turkish Government, the Russian military authorities in Eastern Roumelia have condemned some Mussulmans, subjects of the Sultan, to transportation to Siberia; whether General Stolepine has levied a fine of 35,000 piastres on the district of Kazan (Kotel), in the neighbourhood of Slivno, for having applied for the appointment of a Mussulman Bailli; whether the Russian authorities have hitherto declined to hand over to the authorities of Eastern Roumelia the district of Ichtiman; and, whether any remonstrances have been addressed by Her Majesty's Government to the Imperial Government of Russia in respect of such violations of the Treaty of Berlin?

MR. BOURKE: In regard to the first Question of my hon. Friend, what we have learned on that subject is this—that the Governor General of Eastern Roumelia has requested General Stolepine to send certain persons who had been tried at Philippopolis for punishment to Siberia; but we have not yet heard whether that request has been complied with. As to the second Question of my hon. Friend, we have heard that a fine of 35,000 piastres was levied by the Governor General, and that the Russian Government had disapproved of the conduct of the Governor General, and ordered that no fines should be levied in future. As to the third Question, that really involves a boundary dispute, which is now under the consideration of Boundary Commissioners; and as to the last part of the Question, the House, I think, will see that at the present moment we do not understand that there is any cause for remonstrance, and, therefore, none has been made.

MR. J. R. YORKE: The hon. Member has not stated whether the fine of 35,000 piastres has been restored?

MR. BOURKE: No notification has been sent us on that point. Our Consul General, from whom we get the information, has not mentioned it.

JUDICATURE ACT (IRELAND), 1877—
RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE HIGH COURT OF JUDICATURE.

QUESTION.

MR. MACARTNEY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Why no steps have as yet been taken to carry into effect the reorganisation of the offices of the High Court of Judicature in Ireland, contemplated by the Judicature Act, Ireland, which Act became law in August 1877, and came into operation on the 1st day of January 1878; and, who is responsible for the delay which has occurred?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. GIBSON): Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I beg to state that it is a mistake to say that no steps have been taken to carry into effect the reorganization of the Offices. When we were about to initiate this important work, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland expressed an opinion that the charges should be carefully considered; and that work is now so far advanced that I hope it will be completed by the 1st of January, when the time limited by the Judicature Act (Ireland) will have expired.

NAVY—H. M. GUNBOAT “TYRIAN.”

QUESTION.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether Her Majesty's transport “Tyrian,” about to proceed to the West Indies, is to take out a crew of sixty men for service in another vessel, she having only accommodation for thirty; and, whether the medical authorities have made any representations on the subject?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Her Majesty's gunboat Tyrian is about to proceed to Jamaica to be stationed there; the navigating party will be transferred to another vessel (Contest) on arrival. No report has been received from medical authorities as to the crowded condition of the crew; but the Commander-in-Chief represented that there was a difficulty in finding accommodation for the number under orders to embark. In consequence, he was instructed to withdraw 10 men, and he is perfectly satisfied that there is now no overcrowding. The numbers on board are seven officers and 45 men. The established complement of a gunboat like the Tyrian is 40 men; but it is usual to embark a few supernumeraries for the passage.

NAVY—THE WHAMPOA DOCK COMPANY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Where the dock is situated for which a loan of £12,000 was made to the Whampoa Dock Company; what was the date of the above loan; when was the dock completed for which the loan was made; what are the dimensions of the dock; and, whether it has been used by any, and, if so, by how many vessels of war?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The dock is in Aberdeen Bay, Hong Kong. The first loan of £6,000 was made on the 11th of February, 1864, and the second loan of the same amount on the 29th of March, 1866. The loans were confirmed under the 15th Clause of the Colonial Docks (Loans) Act of 1865. The dock was completed early in 1867; the exact date is not known. The extreme length on blocks is 433 feet, the breadth at the entrance is 84 feet, the depth over the sill at ordinary spring tide is 24 feet. The exact number of vessels entering the dock cannot be given; but the dock has been extensively used, and the largest iron-clad—The Iron Duke—has been docked. The Kowloon Docks—the only other docks at Hong Kong—were not built until after the Aberdeen Docks, and even now can only take in vessels of small draught of water.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION — ESTABLISHMENT OF TRAINING SHIPS. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, under the Industrial Schools Bill which passed through Committee on Monday last, it is competent for a School Board, or a combination of School Boards, to undertake the establishment of a training ship; and, if a School Board or combination of School Boards can do so, whether he will be good enough to mention the legal authority under which such School Board could take this step?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: Under Sections 5 and 12 of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, 29 & 30 Vict.

Mr. W. H. Smith

c. 118, and Section 28 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, 33 & 34 Vict. c. 75, it is competent for a School Board to undertake the establishment of a training ship. Under the Industrial Schools Bill, which passed through Committee on Monday last, it will be competent for School Boards to combine for a like undertaking.

CORONERS (IRELAND)—LEGISLATION. QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether any resolution was come to by the Select Committee on the Coroners Bill as to extending the operation of that measure to Ireland; and, if not, whether he intends to introduce a Bill for dealing with the question as regards Ireland?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. GIBSON): In answer to the hon. Member for Longford, I may say that the Select Committee to which he refers did not come to any resolution with regard to the Coroners Bill. The Grand Juries (Ireland) Bill dealt with a certain portion of the question; and as the Order for the Second Reading of that Bill has been discharged, I do not think it would be desirable now to introduce a fresh Bill dealing with the other parts of the subject.

CRIMINAL LAW—SEARCHING PRISONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether information has reached him that, at Derby, in consequence of the searching or mode of searching certain persons taken to the police station charged with furious driving, a conflict ensued which ended in loss of life; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will cause some inquiry to be made as to the necessity of stripping and searching persons, male and female, not charged with actual crime?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, some disturbance of the character indicated by the first part of the Question had taken place; but as the matter would become the subject of a trial for murder he would refrain from expressing any opinion upon it. He had instructed the Inspectors of Constabulary to inquire into and report upon the latter part of the Question.

GREAT BRITAIN AND EGYPT.
QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (for Sir JULIAN GOLDSMID) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When he will give the House the promised opportunity of discussing the recent interference of the Government in Egyptian affairs?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am afraid I cannot at present name a day, there is so much Business before us.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE EXPENDITURE.—QUESTIONS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he can be so good as to explain whence the money came to supply the Military Chest from which the Zulu War is being carried on?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It may be convenient, as this Question is sometimes asked, that I should explain what the Treasury Chest and the Military Chest are. There is a certain fund, a banking account of the Treasury Chest, which is credited with £1,000,000. Out of that fund advances are made for carrying on the Army and Navy Services abroad. Of course, these advances have to be replaced out of the Votes taken for the Army and Navy. That fund is a fund which is primarily applicable to Services such as the war in South Africa. Well, then, the question is, how the money is there raised? It is partly raised by remittance of specie sent from this country to the Treasury Chest fund, and partly by bills drawn by the Treasury Chest officer of the Colony upon the Treasury in England at long dates. These, of course, are cashed in the Colony and remitted Home, and the money has to be replaced out of the Votes of Parliament. Of course, all the expenses of the war are expenses incurred under some head or another of the Army and Navy Votes, though the ordinary Army and Navy Estimates are not sufficient to meet them. It therefore becomes necessary, in course of time, to vote Supplemental Estimates for Army and Navy Services, to make good the advances which have been made in respect of them out of the Treasury Chest. I may just mention that since the beginning of the financial year on the 1st of April £260,000 in specie has been consigned to South Africa, while £880,000 has been drawn on this country in bills. Most of these are at long dates, so that only £365,000 have been paid, and the rest are in course of payment.

MR. RYLANDS asked, Whether it was the practice to leave any balance in the Treasury Chest on the 31st of March, and not to surrender it to the Exchequer, as in the case of other accounts?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Of course. The Treasury Chest consists of £1,000,000, which ought to be always in its possession. The accounts are carried on in the name of the Service for which the money has been advanced, and, of course, the repayments to the Chest can only be made when the proper accounts have been dealt with. There ought always to be a balance of £1,000,000 in the Treasury Chest.

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND) — CASE OF ANN BRADLEY.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he would state to the House why the release of Ann Bradley, convicted of an attempt to murder Miss Geoghagan, was not upon the terms of a ticket of leave; who is responsible for exempting her from the precautions or conditions of a ticket of leave; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House Copies of all Papers relating to the release of this convict?

MR. J. LOWTHER: It is evident, I am afraid, that a miscarriage of justice has occurred in this case. It appears that the prisoner, who had, in 1875, been sentenced to 14 years' penal servitude, was released in 1876, in consequence of the report of the prison medical authority to the effect that she was suffering from consumption, and that her life would be endangered by further imprisonment. Unfortunately, it seems to have been a practice, under similar circumstances, to grant releases without a ticket-of-leave. This, however, has for some time ceased to be the case in Ireland, as strict directions have been given that a ticket-of-leave should be enforced in such instances, as well as in others. The general question, moreover, of the treatment of invalid prisoners has been under the consideration of the Irish Government, and we are now constructing a prison sanatorium, to which invalids can be removed from ordinary gaols and convict establishments. It will, therefore, be no longer necessary, except in exceptional cases, to let criminals loose again upon society upon medical certificates, as has been done in the case of Ann Bradley and others, and which I confess has, in many instances, whether a ticket-of-leave has been granted or not, constituted a serious evil. As to Papers, though in this case I should have been very glad if I could have given them, I am sorry to find there are none which could be laid upon the Table without establishing an inconvenient precedent, as it has always been the rule to treat such documents as confidential.

MR. SULLIVAN: The right hon. Gentleman has forgotten to answer the second portion of my Question. Who is responsible for exempting this woman from the precautions or conditions of a ticket-of-leave?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The responsibility rests on the system which has been in force, and, as I have explained, that system has since been altered.

MR. SULLIVAN: I beg to give Notice that I shall call attention to the subject on the Estimates.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY.

QUESTION.

MR. ROWLEY HILL asked the First Commissioner of Works, What progress is being made with the Ordnance Survey of England and Wales on the 25-inch scale; and, when the survey of the county of Worcester is likely to be commenced?

MR. GERARD NOEL: Satisfactory progress is being made with the Ordnance Survey of England and Wales on the 25-inch scale. Eighteen counties have been surveyed, rapid progress is being made with 13 others, and six counties have been partially surveyed. With regard to the county of Worcester, I fear some little time must elapse before the survey of that county can be commenced.

SCIENCE AND ART—THE INDIAN MUSEUM.—QUESTION.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer. If he would undertake that the contents of the Indian Museum should not be dispersed until the House had an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the Motion of the Member for the Elgin Burghs; and, whether he would consider the alternative of charging the Estimates with such a sum as may be found sufficient, upon consideration of the matter, to keep the collection intact?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I hope that the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) will have an opportunity before the close of the Session of bringing on his Motion in reference to the Indian Museum. Before that time, no definite steps will have been taken for the removal of the collections. I am aware that my hon. Friend takes a special interest in the Art collection, and we should be very glad to have the advantage of hearing his opinions on the subject before the final decision is come to. Perhaps, therefore, he will be kind enough to communicate with me. The question of a contribution from Imperial funds towards the support of an Indian Museum has been more than once considered between the India Office and the Treasury, but without any result.

RAILWAY RATES FOR AMERICAN PRODUCE.—QUESTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is aware that the Railway Companies of this Country have been in the habit of giving preferential rates in favour of American over home produce; that the charge of conveying American meat was 25s. per ton, and that of English meat 50s.; and, whether the Railway Companies have any legal right to encourage foreign imports by this preference and advantage, over home-grown meat and cereals?

MR. J. G. TALBOT: The Board of Trade have no official knowledge or means of ascertaining what are the actual rates charged by Railway Companies for American produce, or, indeed, any other goods they may carry over their lines. With regard to the last part of the Question, the hon. Baronet will, I am sure, see that, important as it is, it is not a matter upon which we can give an authoritative opinion. The hon. Baronet is aware that there are statutory provisions on the subject of undue preference and unequal treatment with regard to any description of traffic to be found in the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, 8 Vict. c. 20, the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, and the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, 36 & 37 Vict. c. 48, and that parties aggrieved have their remedy before the Railway Commissioners, who were specially appointed to carry the two last-mentioned Acts into effect.

CUSTOMS BILL OF ENTRY OFFICE.

QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will state to the House the decision at which the Government have arrived with reference to the Customs Bill of Entry Office, the patent of which expires in the course of the present month?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: It has been decided to adopt the recommendation of the Committee on Official Statistics and not to renew the patent; but in order to allow time to make arrangements for the future, the present system will be allowed to continue until the end of this year.

THE HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY'S GARDENS, SOUTH KENSINGTON.

QUESTION.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Her Majesty's Commissioners of 1851 have any plans for the utilization of the ground now occupied by the gardens of the Horticultural Society at South Kensington as soon as they obtain legal possession of it; and, if so, whether such plans will be in accordance with the original design of employing the estate for the promotion of science and art; and, whether the said plans will be placed in the Library for the inspection of Members?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the Commissioners had had several plans under consideration, and these had been referred to and explained in their Reports which had been presented to Parliament every year. The particular plan suggested was not agreed to by Her Majesty's Government; and the Commissioners, on application being made to them, were willing to come to some arrangement, which would, of course, be in accordance with the original design of the Commissioners, for utilizing the ground in question for purposes of science and art.

GERMANY—THE ISLANDS OF THE PACIFIC.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House any documents the Government may have received from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin relative to the Treaties entered into by the German Government with Samoa and other islands of the Pacific?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, documents on the subject would by-and-bye be laid upon the Table. At present, however, this could not be done, as negotiations were still pending.

THE METROPOLITAN POLICE FORCE—REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENTAL COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Commission appointed some time since to inquire into the organization and working of the Metropolitan Police Force, have made any Report; and, if so, whether he proposes in consequence to make any alteration in the existing regulations, with the view of improving the condition and efficiency of the force?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the Commission alluded to was not a public, but a private Departmental Commission. It had made a Report, and some alterations had been made in consequence, while others were under consideration.

RIVERS CONSERVANCY BILL—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. E. W. HARCOURT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Rivers Conservancy Bill which has just been withdrawn has been altogether abandoned, or whether he can give any assurance that the Government, having regard to the agricultural interests involved, and to the great losses which have been inflicted by the repeated floods of the present season, will take an early opportunity of re-introducing the measure with such amendment as the further examination of its provisions may have shown to be necessary?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that it was with regret the Government found themselves unable to proceed with the Bill this Session. They had every intention of introducing a similar Bill next Session?

POOR LAW AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. GRANT asked the Lord Advocate, If it is his intention, in the Poor Law Amendment Bill for Scotland, which he is about to introduce, to provide for extending to members of Friendly Societies in Scotland the same privilege in regard to benefit money due to paupers which has been secured to members of Friendly Societies in England by the Poor Law Act Amendment Act of the present Session?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON), in reply, said, that the clauses in the old Act dealing with the property of paupers had been withdrawn from the Bill, which now included only the clauses relative to medical relief and the superannuation of officers.

ARMY—THE NEW RETIREMENT SCHEME.—QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, since it is the intention of the Government to antedate the commissions of officers junior to the Lieutenant Colonels commanding regiments of Cavalry and Infantry who, subject to retirement after five years' command, are, under certain circumstances, retained in command beyond that period, what steps the Government proposes to take to mitigate the severity which the new Retirement Scheme and the prolongation of the Lieutenant Colonels' commands inflict on junior officers in the case of regiments where the Lieutenant Colonel was appointed before the 13th of October 1871, and can consequently remain as long as they please or till removed by death or promotion to General Officer's rank, thus blocking promotion for years, and causing the compulsory retirement of officer after officer?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, the hon. and gallant Member was under a misapprehension in assuming that he had given any definite promise with regard to the subject referred to in the Question. It was rather a complicated one; and he could not say positively at that moment what steps the Government might take to remedy defects in the present retirement scheme; but they would not lose sight of the matter.

ARMY—ARMY OFFICERS AS WAR CORRESPONDENTS.—QUESTIONS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any prohibition against officers on full pay or on active service corresponding with newspapers; whether any such rule has been relaxed during recent campaigns, either in favour of officers generally or in favour of particular officers permitted or appointed by commanding officers to act as correspondents; whether officers so permitted or appointed are relieved from any military duties, and are permitted to receive pay as correspondents; and, whether officers so acting are free to say what they think fit on their own responsibility, or their communications are subject to the control and approval of the commanding officer?

COLONEL STANLEY: With regard to the first point, I have to say that officers on full pay are prohibited from corresponding with the newspapers; but it appears, from the answer which has been given by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. E. Stanhope), that the rule had been relaxed in certain instances. Of course, officers in India are not, so far as I am informed, directly under the control of the War Department. With regard to the third and fourth Questions, I could only answer them as a matter of opinion, and my opinion is probably not worth more than that of other persons.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Has the rule been relaxed with regard to officers serving in South Africa?

COLONEL STANLEY: Certainly not, so far as I am aware.

ARMY CLOTHING ESTABLISHMENT, PIMLICO.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has received the Report of the Committee on the Army Clothing Establishment at Pimlico; and, if so, whether he will communicate the same to this House?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that through the courtesy of the President of the Committee on the Army Clothing Establishment at Pimlico he had received the Report of the Committee. He had not, however, received the evidence, which was still in the printer's hands. The Report and the evidence would, as soon as possible, be laid on the Table of the House. He wished to take that opportunity of publicly tendering his thanks and those of the Government, and he might say of the public service, to his hon. Friend the Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) and his Colleagues, who had carried out the investigation with such care and ability.

UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR SCOTLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government has definitely abandoned the proposal submitted last Session for the appointment of an Under Secretary of State for Scotland?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: No, Sir. We have not definitely abandoned that proposal; but there are difficulties in the way at the present moment which we have not overcome.

POST OFFICE MAIL CONTRACTS — MAILS TO INDIA AND CHINA. QUESTION.

MR. ISAAC asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When the Contracts provisionally entered into for the conveyance of Mails to India and China will be submitted to the House for confirmation?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, he could not yet fix a time for bringing the subject of the Contracts referred to by the hon. Member under the consideration of the House; he would put it down for Tuesday week, in the hope of being able to bring it forward on that day.

BANKRUPTCY LAW AMENDMENT BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. RATHBONE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, if the Government carry a short amending Bill on Bankruptcy this Session, they will engage to bring in a Consolidation Bill at the beginning of the next Session in the House of Commons, and refer it at once to a Select Committee, so as to give ample time for the due and careful consideration of this important question?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have been in communication with my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General on the subject, and he is of opinion that it will be possible to greatly reduce the length of the Bill by adopting the suggestion made the other day by the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson); and he is now occupied in considering what alteration should be made in it. My hon. and learned Friend will, therefore, propose to re-commit the Bill pro forma, in order to make the necessary alterations; and I hope it will be possible to pass the Bill through the House during the present Session. If it should be necessary—as very probably it will be—to introduce a Consolidation Bill next Session, it will be very convenient to take the course recommended by my hon. Friend. I think it will be best to see the Bill in the form in which it will be presented; and I believe that, in all probability, the Government will introduce a Consolidation Bill.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE POLICE STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATE.—QUESTION.

In reply to Sir CHARLES FORSTER,

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had taken steps for the immediate filling up of the office of police stipendiary magistrate for South Staffordshire. The appointment had only been vacant a short time, and some delay had been caused by the requirement of an old Statute that the person appointed should be a Justice of the Peace for the county.

ARMY—DEATH OF THE PRINCE IMPERIAL—COURT MARTIAL ON LIEUTENANT CAREY.—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is now in a position to answer the Question I put to him last week—namely, whether Colonel Harrison, Assistant Quarter Master General, who sat upon the court martial, the Papers of which are now in hand, is the same

Colonel Harrison who directly sanctioned and personally superintended the reconnoitring party placed under the command of the late Prince Imperial on the occasion the Prince lost his life, and for which Lieutenant Carey alone has been tried by court martial?

COLONEL STANLEY: Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to give me Notice of his Question?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I asked the same Question last week.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTIONS.

In reply to Mr. HANKEY and Mr. FAWCETT,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the second reading of the Bankruptcy Law Amendment Bill would be proposed that night, and it was intended to at once go into Committee pro forma, in order that the Bill might be re-printed with the alterations. The University Education (Ireland) Bill would be taken as the first Order on Thursday. The Public Works Loans Bill would be proceeded with as the first Order on Wednesday next. Tomorrow, after the question of Privilege had been disposed of, a stage of the Army Discipline and Regulation (Commencement) Bill would be taken, and then they proposed to take the Banking and Joint Stock Companies Bill. The East Indian Loans Bill would be proceeded with on Friday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. O'CONNOR POWER wished to intimate, at this stage of the proceedings, that if the Vote, dealing with the salary of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, came on for consideration this evening at a reasonable hour, he should take the opportunity of calling attention to the Office which the right hon. Gentleman held, and of suggesting some alteration. At the present moment, however, they were called upon to deal with a large Vote for the Constabulary of Ireland. Only quite recently they had had great cause for complaint as to the disposition of that force; and as the county which he had the honour to represent (Mayo) was a county which had been visited by a large extra police force, he was anxious to direct the attention of the Chief Secretary to the abuses which appeared to have taken place by the employment of the police—abuses which might be repeated. His hon. Friend the Member for the County of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had had some painful experience in his own county of the unnecessary employment of a police force; and he (Mr. O'Connor Power) remembered that when the inhabitants of Clifton announced their intention of holding a public meeting, the Deputy Inspector of Constabulary drafted a large force into the district. The services of that force were not required, for everything in that part of Ireland was found to be most peaceable and tranquil, and the county was put to a great deal of unnecessary expense by the attempt, on the part of the Executive, to tyrannize the people, and to harass them in the right of public meetings. An extra police force had been drafted into Mayo, and some of the performances of the force, in reference to the land agitation in Ireland, had been of a most extraordinary character. He found, in a recent number of The Tuam Herald, an account of a midnight visit paid by the police to Hollymount, in the County of Mayo. The police produced a paper, which they pretended was a legal document, authorizing the man's arrest. It was discovered on the following day that this was not a legal document, but a mere pretence on the part of the police to drag the man away from his home and subject him to great annoyance. These things were constantly happening in connection with the employment of the police force in Ireland; and before the Committee assented to this Vote, he trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would give some satisfactory assurances that inquiries would be made into the disposition of the police force in Ireland, and that steps would be taken to prevent a repetition of the abuses to which he had called attention.

MR. J. LOWTHER understood that the hon. Gentleman called attention to the employment of extra police in the county he represented, and in that adjoining. The hon. Member spoke about certain cases of police abuse, and said that the services of the force were not required in what he termed that peaceable and tranquil part of the country. He must confess his inability to agree with the hon. Gentleman, to whose recollection he must also recall the decided opinion upon this subject, placed upon record by a high ecclesiastical functionary of the Roman Catholic Church, possessing considerable local knowledge, and whose views of the state of the district in question were in direct contradiction to those just enunciated by the hon. Member. He had received reports from the districts in question, and therein he found opinions expressed which were so directly opposed to those the hon. Member had given vent to, with regard to the peaceable and tranquil state of that part of Ireland, that he was inclined to assume that the hon. Gentleman was not serious when he questioned the propriety of the steps taken by the Government to preserve peace and order. He thought that the Government would have been held culpable if, under the circumstances, they had not taken such steps. The manner in which the police were employed had also been called into question, and the hon. Member had referred to an allegation that the police had been used for the purpose of causing annoyance to the inhabitants. That was not the case, for the police had been sent into the district with the special and only object of preserving peace.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY directed the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that, in many parts of Ireland, the police stations were exceedingly few in number. Around the West Coast of Ireland the permanent stations of the police were sometimes 20, and 30, and 40 miles apart; and then when, as had recently happened, a disturbance occurred, it was extremely hard to send the police there, and specially charge the unfortunate inhabitants for the services of the force. He imagined that the proper rule was this—that the whole of the country should have an adequate force of police stationed permanently in barracks for occasions when their services would be required for what he might call the normal protection of the peaceable inhabitants of the country. In the West of Ireland the people were so exceedingly quiet and orderly, as a general rule, that the authorities had taken advantage of the peaceable character of the inhabitants, and had deprived them of their real and fair share of the police force. Therefore, when a disturbance had taken place, owing to the distribution of inflammatory tracts by Protestant Societies—tracts written in a spirit opposed to the religious belief of the great mass of the people—the Government sent a body of police down there, and charged the inhabitants with the cost. Now, that was unjust and unfair, and it was high time a remedy should be provided. There was another point to which he wanted to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, and also that of the Secretary to the Treasury—namely, the employment of the police to do Revenue duty. Of late years, the Revenue police had been discontinued, and their duties had been placed upon the ordinary Constabulary. The police were thus made searchers for illicit distillation, and compelled to do duties which were formerly performed by a separate body of men. The consequence was, that the duties were now inadequately performed; that there was great irritation caused; and that there was a great temptation, to which the police themselves ought not to be exposed. He had no hesitation in saying that there was a great deal of illicit distillation in the West of Ireland, and that might be checked, and ought to be checked, by the Government, if they were desirous of really preventing it. Further than that, the police did not perform another duty which ought to be put upon them, and which the late Chief Secretary for Ireland promised should be placed upon them—namely, the surveillance of the drinking booths at fairs and markets in Ireland. It was the habit of persons to go about with booths for the supply of whisky of so bad and valueless a nature that when the fair or market was closed they did not care to carry that away with them which they had not succeeded in selling. To the sale of this deleterious compound, enjoying the name of whisky, was to be attributed half the rows and broken heads in Ireland. Surely this was a matter which the police ought to attend to; and the police ought to be set to work to discover where this horrible fluid was sold, with the view of prosecuting the people under the Public Health Act. These were little things; but if they were properly attended to the peace of the country would, in a great measure, be preserved, and the stigma removed which very unfairly rested upon the peaceable people of Ireland.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the hon. Gentleman had complained of the want of permanent police stations in the West of Ireland, which, if it really existed, was a very proper subject for inquiry wholly apart from any of the other questions to which the hon. Member had alluded, and from which it should be kept quite distinct. If the hon. Member would specify to him in what districts this want occurred, he should be glad to give the matter consideration. If the additional duties, such as the hon. Gentleman had referred to, constituted too great a strain on the force at the disposal of the authorities, that would be a very fair reason for increasing the force.

COLONEL COLTHURST remarked, that the other evening the Chief Secretary, in reply to a question concerning the manner in which the charge for the extra police was made upon the people, said that it was quite natural that exemptions should be made of the properties of certain people who were not supposed to be in any way concerned in the disturbances. The principle of exemption was a fair one as regarded agrarian outrages; for it would be manifestly unjust to impose the charge for the extra police upon a landlord or farmer who had been the victim, or sufferer from such an outrage. The disturbances, however, which had recently taken place near Clifton were not of an agrarian character, but had been provoked by the circulation of offensive tracts and pamphlets, at the instance of certain clergy and Church Bishops, who ought, in consequence, to be held responsible. It would certainly be most unfair if the property of these persons were exempt from taxation. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to assure the Committee that in their case the exemption would not be made.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

MAJOR NOLAN said, that when the Coercion Act was going through the House it was stated by the Government that the extra police would only be employed for the suppression of agrarian outrage. But the extra police had been employed in Connemara when the disturbances had no connection whatever with agrarianism. They were crimes which might happen in any district of England; but, in the event of their occurrence in England, he was not aware that any extra police were quartered upon the people. The disturbances in Clifton were not accompanied by any acts of physical violence, nor were they accompanied by any of these occurrences connected with the burning of Colonel Jackson's house in the North of England. He believed that in that case there was no tax for extra police; but in Connemara, where the disturbances were of a much milder character than those which happened in the North of England, a tax for extra police has been imposed upon the people. There had been in the West of Ireland an application of the police which was never intended by the Government when the Coercion Act was introduced four years ago. He objected to the inhabitants having to pay for the extra police; and wished to point out that no one pretended to say that the disturbances in Connemara were at all connected with agrarianism. If, however, the tax were to be imposed they ought to be levied fairly and reasonably. He expected some explanation from the Government about some of the circumstances connected with the tax. He was informed that there were two parishes in Connemara in which the tax had been levied. In Ballydoon, for instance, the tax amounted to 9½d. in the pound, a very considerable sum for poor tenants to pay, in addition to 9½d. in the pound on the Government valuation. In England 9½d. in the pound would be considered a very high Income Tax, especially if it were added to 9½d. in the pound on local taxation. It ought to be remembered, too, that the disturbances in the parish of Ballydoon were of the most trifling description, amounting only to the breaking of a few panes of glass. There was really no damage done except that which could very properly be paid for in the ordinary way. A tax of 9½d. in the pound, under these circumstances, seemed to be a very heavy one. In addition to that, the tax was very unfairly distributed amongst individuals. The Chief Secretary acknowledged, the other night, that certain exemptions had been made at the instance of the local authorities. His (Major Nolan's) impression was, that at the time they were passing the Coercion Act it was understood that it was the Grand Juries who were able to make exemptions, and no one else. He should like to know from the Chief Secretary if the police authorities, or resident magistrates, had the power of exempting certain individuals from the tax? Further than that, the Chief Secretary stated, in answer to him (Major Nolan), that it was the policy of the Government to exempt those people upon whom the outrages had been committed. He had received a letter, which had every appearance of accuracy, and from which he learned that certain people had been exempted from the tax who were not subject to any attack whatsoever. It was clear, therefore, that they must have been exempted for some other reason. The Chief Secretary ought to state why these particular properties had been exempted from the tax. He (Major Nolan) also quarrelled with the principle of exemption altogether. Where taxes had been laid on property in a certain district, it was a very doubtful policy to make exemptions at all. The people who were exempted were apt to exult over those who were paying the tax, and to consider that they were scoring a victory. This occasioned a great deal of ill-feeling between the parties; whereas, if all the parties had to pay the tax, they would all get tired of paying it, and they would be more apt to prove themselves a happy family, and thus cause the imposition to be removed. It was, unquestionably, very injurious to the good-will of the locality if there were any exemptions. He protested against taxing people according to sympathies. He should like to know if all the people who had been exempted had been the subject of outrages; and he should also like to know if the Government had definitely made up their minds to apply the tax even in cases where the outrages had not been of an agrarian character?

MR. GRAY said, the hon. Gentlemen who had spoken had referred to particular phases of this question; but he wished to direct attention to the general system of extra police, and to show that what had always been an abuse was growing worse year by year. There was what was supposed to be the normal number of the police, on which number the Estimates were based, on which the House voted their supply. But that normal number was not the real number, for the full number for a district was never on the rolls, while an extra number was always on the rolls; and whenever the Government supposed that a supplementary supply was required for any town or district, that town or district was charged as for an extra supply, when, as a matter of fact, the normal supply was not reached even with the extra force. The receipts under this head were no less than £25,000 for the present year. That was a tax which was levied in various proportions in various districts in Ireland really to supply the cost of a blunder made by the Government themselves some time ago, when they estimated the cost of the superannuation of the police at a very much lower sum than the cost really amounted to. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would explain to the House if he intended to perpetuate the system or not. The amount required and voted for the superannuation of the Constabulary amounted to a very much larger sum annually than the Irish authorities had anticipated, and it was growing year by year in a rather alarming fashion, so that the Treasury were putting pressure on the Constabulary authorities to keep down the Votes. One of the means adopted was the keeping down the normal number of men to be given to the various districts. He found that that system had been in favour for a considerable number of years, and that this year there were 123 men fewer estimated for altogether than last year. The result would be the Votes for extra police; for as the real number of the men was lessened, so in proportion, whenever an extra force was called for, more men would have to be paid for by the district, no matter whether the normal strength had been reached or not. Therefore, the £25,000 received for extra police this year might become £30,000 next year. This was really a serious question; and it was nothing less than trifling with Parliament to estimate for one number of men and really keep a lesser number of men on the rolls. No doubt, it was a fact that the amount for the superannuation of the police was very large; but let this be faced in an open, manly way, and not by trying to avoid a financial difficulty by devices of this kind. Another device, to which he would take the liberty of directing the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, was this. He put to the right hon. Gentleman, the other day, a Question with respect to the men called non-effectives being kept on the effective force of the Constabulary long after they had ceased to be able to do any work. There were 73 of these men in the force for three months past—men who were entitled to retire on their pensions. When he found men who had served for a long number of years—and many of them were in the hospital—he was justified in assuming that most of them would never again be effective; but by keeping them on the list the superannuation list, which had grown too large, was kept down by the amount of these pensions, while the effective force was nominally, not really, filled up, and an excuse offered for charging districts with an extra police force. This was not straightforward, and the right hon. Gentleman would not care to take the responsibility of it. He would say that he found it in force, and had continued it. He (Mr. Gray) did not bring a charge against the present Administration of having originated this system; but it was growing worse under their administration, and in proof of that statement he would again refer to the fact that they had estimated for 123 men less than last year. No doubt, there were names in abundance on the application list, for it was a great favour to get into the Constabulary force—picked men could be had in abundance; applications were continually coming in, for the salary was large, and the advantages of the position considerable. Therefore, it was of deliberate and set purpose that the force was kept down under its nominal strength, and it was kept down in order to keep down the Estimates, and to satisfy, in some way, the grumblings of the Treasury, because of the enormous and unexpected increase in the superannuation charges.

MR. BRUEN added his testimony to the correctness of the statement. It was perfectly true, and his attention had been often drawn to the fact, that the proper quota of police had never been reached until the county authorities found it necessary to send more men for the preservation of the peace, and, thereupon, the district was charged for the extra men. It was not a fair thing to make the extra charge before the full quota of the force allotted to the district had been reached. The reductions in the number of the police had often been effected by the withdrawal of the police from stations altogether against the representations of the inhabitants; but if economy was to be effected in that way, against the opinion of those who were charged with the preservation of the peace of a district, that economy should not be effected at the expense of the county which was now called upon to pay.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray) had struck a real blot in the system. Nothing could be more unfair, more unjust, than the system of charging a locality for the expenses of a force when the force had not been maintained in the proportion assigned by Parliament. It was a monstrous system that gave a premium to the Executive in the shape of local charges, when there was a riotous or bad condition among the population. This state of things, which it ought to be the interest of the Government to avert, seemed to be no disadvantage to the Imperial Treasury, but came as a relief to it. This had been so strongly pointed out by the hon. Members for Tipperary (Mr. Gray) and County Carlow (Mr. Bruen), that he was not justified in occupying time with the subject, beyond saying that the attention of Irish Members had been called to the subject, which had in it sufficient to make it a burning question, if something were not done to deal with the evil very shortly. Upon the subject of the extra duties for the Constabulary, the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had recommended the employment of a separate force for Revenue purposes, but with that he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) could not agree; it would be a great mistake—a retrograde movement—to re-establish a Revenue police. There had been enough experience of those "potheen hunters," as the country people used to call them; and he thought the duty was infinitely better discharged by the rural police. They knew the districts, and the habits and ways of the people, and they had largely promoted the discouragement of illicit distillation. His hon. Friend said there was a good deal of potheen distilling in the West of Ireland; but he could scarcely credit this—in fact, friends of his, who had a partiality for this kind of spirit, had told him it was cheaper to get a bottle of the best duty-paid whisky than to get the same quantity of potheen. But, personally, he had not been in the West of Ireland for years. On the subject of police, he advised the Government to take steps to keep the force up to its full strength, and make no special charge to a district, except the levy was applicable to the relief of the local taxation of the district from which the relief was drafted. Thus, if 20 men were required from Carlow to coerce Mayo, then let Carlow have the benefit of the charge for supplying the force, and not merely Mayo be subjected to a special tax.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY, in reference to the illicit distillation, asked the attention of his hon. Friend to the last Report of the Inland Revenue Department, and he would find there were 700 prosecutions for that offence in Ireland last year. He did not speak without knowledge, when he said the amount of distillation carried on in some parts of Ireland was exceedingly detrimental to the people; and on this point he believed the police did not do their duty. Further, he did not believe the Sunday Closing Act was properly carried out, owing to the removal of the police because of the desire to lessen expenses, and relieve the difficulty the Treasury had got into from not framing the Estimates correctly.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, this was a question that must come before the House fully before long, for the force was in such a state as to resemble a standing Army more than a police force. But, owing to the hurried manner in which the Vote had been brought on, the subject could not now be fully discussed. However, he was not making any objection to proceed, or to discuss the organization of the force. The attempt to keep down the quota of the county beyond what the county was entitled to, and then to send fresh men into the county and charge them on the rates, was simply a fraud on the ratepayers. The Constabulary was, in theory, maintained by the Imperial Parliament. The authority under the Act of Parliament which was to enforce the burden for the maintenance of these forces put down 300 men in a certain county, saying that that was the proper number to be allotted to that district. They would assume that the force kept up in the county was 250 men, and immediately a disturbance arose 50 men more were sent for, whom the ratepayers were obliged to pay, although the proper number of men to be maintained in that county was 300. That was what it came to; and he trusted that this state of things would not go without remedy in Parliament. But he thought the ratepayers who were called upon to make those payments would do well to resist them, and employ every legal means to sustain them in the adoption of that course. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray) spoke of the number of non-effective men kept upon the lists of this force; but, for his own part, so long as the force continued what it was, he had no objection to see any amount of non-effective men kept upon it. It was a military force, it was armed and drilled like an Army, and it was imbued with the spirit of an Army, instead of that of a civil force. If these men were not drilled as they were, if they were not required to pass their noviciate in the Dublin barracks, they would be far more useful, better able to discharge the duties they had to perform, and far more popular. They were a well-conducted body of men; there were few complaints of violence or of spying usually made against a force; and they bore a good contrast to the Dublin Metropolitan Police, for their colours were not stained with civil blood: but it was a great pity a force like this, such good material, should be turned into a military force. This was not all. There had been during the last few years, amongst the officers, an amount of small and large scandals utterly disproportionate to the number of officers, and which, in a well-regulated force, would not have occurred. In one part of Ireland there was an instance of a county Inspector in receipt of Government money and putting it into his own pocket, and the amount of his defalcations the ratepayers were required to make good. There had been painful scenes in the North, and scandals between one officer and another. He did not mean to say anything against the great body of the officers, and, perhaps, scandals was not quite the proper word to use; but according to the small number of officers in the force, as compared with the English Army, there was not that harmony and discipline maintained in the superior ranks of this Constabulary force that there was in the Army. The hon. Member for Galway and the hon. Member for Tipperary spoke a good deal about the employment of these men in particular districts for the purpose of preserving the peace, but where very often it had been disturbed by the responsible individuals of the localities. But what were they to say of the cases—and they were not few—where these men were taken away from their ordinary duties and brought down substantially to maintain the civil claims of the individual, and not to maintain the peace at all. Whether the money was to be paid for the hire-services out of the Imperial taxes or out of the ratepayers' pockets, he equally protested against it. He had that afternoon presented a Petition, signed by a large number of the inhabitants and electors of the county of Dublin, complaining that a large body of police were sent to support the claim of a landlord to the Skerries foreshore. This claim was resisted by persons along the foreshore, and became the subject of litigation, the claimant being unsuccessful in one Court and successful in another. Finally, the matter being still open, he proceeded before a magistrate to obtain redress for trespass upon what he conceived to be his property, and as many as 100 policemen were sent to preserve, sacred and inviolate, a wall with which the landlord had sought to make good his claim. The police marched off the men, who were about to exercise their right to pull down the wall, in handcuffs; and after the police had been kept there some time the decision of the Court in Dublin was against the landlord's claim. The police, therefore, had been employed to maintain claims not sustainable. He wanted to know who was to pay for these 100 policemen who were kept on the foreshore? Was it the Imperial taxes, or was it the poor tenants of the county Dublin? This was a very serious question. He thought neither party ought to pay, as these were services which it was never intended should be rendered by the police. They ought to be confined simply to the maintenance of the peace when it was threatened by unruly mobs, and should not be employed to uphold the civil rights of individuals.

MR. O'DONNELL remarked that, as at present constituted and used, the Constabulary force was simply a ready weapon and means for gratifying the local, personal, and sectarian spites of the governing class in many portions of Ireland. If for a long space of time an acrimonious religious controversy had been kept up by the paid agents of a so-called evangelizing society, and if at length that society succeeded in provoking disturbances, thereupon its efforts were forthwith encouraged and its venomous propaganda promoted by means of the Irish Constabulary. The property of promoters of disturbance was carefully exempted, and the cost of the extra police was thrown upon the ratepayers of the poor and harassed district which had been chosen for years past as the select centre of the operations of this society. But it was not only in regard to the operations of so-called missionary societies that the Constabulary were misused. Throughout the North of Ireland, again and again, it appeared that the Constabulary were called in in order to promote the objects of the party in ascendancy. Complaints had been addressed to the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the subject, which, if he were at all acquainted with the importance of the Department which he had been sent from England to administer, he would listen to with a great deal more care and attention. He was sure that it was his ignorance, and not his will, which was usually at fault in these matters. Complaints had been made to him with regard to interference with meetings of most legitimate character in the North of Ireland, promoted by Catholics. For instance, in the county of Tyrone a perfectly legitimate meeting was called in order to support the University Education Bill brought in by the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don). The local sectarianism and religious prejudice took alarm at such a demonstration of their undoubted civil rights on the part of the long-oppressed Catholics of the county Tyrone; and on the impudent pretext that this meeting would afford an opportunity for an attack being made by Protestant rioters, the local authorities took the step of prohibiting the meeting being held. He was sorry to say their conduct was defended in that House by the Chief Secretary for Ireland as a magnificent specimen of what he was pleased to call impartiality. He would point out that in the recent celebrations of the July anniversaries, which were attended with every circumstance of offensive display, the Constabulary were not sent down by the authorities to interfere and prevent those demonstrations coming off. This was not merely a police force—it was a branch of the Army, maintained by the Government, without putting them into the military Votes, and one which gave the Government the opportunity of occasionally displaying their military authority, in its most offensive form, to the people of Ireland. It might be better, perhaps, to challenge their action in this matter on some of the Votes, such as those for musketry instruction, and the supply of ammunition. He did, however, wish to direct the attention of the Committee to the fact that they were now maintaining in Ireland a military force aggressive and provocative in its character, and one which was not at all of the character of a civil police; one which continually brought home the idea of irresponsible despotism to the Irish people. He would ask hon. Members how an English public meeting would like to find that amongst those present were armed minions of the Government who, leaning on their loaded rifles, employed themselves in taking notes of the speeches delivered? A right of that kind would be intolerable in England, and would raise a rebellion if it were ever attempted. Yet it was a right which must meet the eye of every traveller who took a real interest in the study of Irish life and Irish agitation. At the recent meeting of the agricultural labourers, at which every institution dear to the heart of the Conservative landlord was attacked in terms not likely to satisfy English landlords, the Government did not send down detectives to take down the words of Mr. George Mitchell or Mr. Joseph Arch; but, in Ireland, they could not even hold a tenant-right meeting without its approach being heralded by the arrival of long car-loads of armed spies, who occupied their positions in prominent places, and in provocative attitudes, taking notes, in the hope that their superiors might be able to twist something out of the language used, to serve the purposes of a coercive prosecution. Such a thing in England would tend to trouble, and to the destruction of all Governments; and yet it was the course adopted at every Irish meeting, and it was the way in which the Irish people were recommended and encouraged to pursue the paths of peaceful demonstration.

Mr. CALLAN was sorry to spoil the graphic picture drawn by the hon. Member for Dungarvan, but the muskets of the Constabulary, he believed, were always unloaded. He bore testimony to the way in which the Constabulary discharged their duties, and regretted that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) had drawn an unfavourable comparison between them and the Dublin and the Metropolitan Police. Having known the force for 10 years, he believed it presented a most favourable contrast to the City Police in London. He was glad that in this matter they had come to the discussion of a real grievance. Formerly, that House used to fix the number of men for each county in Ireland; but, unfortunately, during a period of coldness on the part of Irish Members, power and authority was given to the Lord Lieutenant in Council to do so under certain provisions. Recently, in Louth, they found that the force was one-fifth less than they were charged for. The Grand Jury refused to pass the presentment—first, on the ground that they had not been stationed in the county; and, secondly, that the requirements of the Lord Lieutenant had not been complied with. One of the most prominent of the Castle Judges held that they could not go behind the Treasury Warrant, no matter what number of men had been in the county during the previous year. He complained that his county was often over-charged for men, and trusted the Government would give some explanation of the matter which he had just mentioned. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had stated that the police, as illicit-still hunters, were an inefficient force; but the fact that in the county of Galway there had been in one year 700 prosecutions for keeping illicit stills showed that the charge was not well-founded.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN did not wish to join in a cry against the Irish Constabulary. He believed they were a very fine force, well worthy of the country. He could, however, bear full testimony to what had been said by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan). In the four counties with which he (Colonel King-Harman) was connected there were repeated complaints against the charge made for extra police when the numbers were not kept up to their normal strength.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE complained of the way in which fines were imposed. It was ridiculous that a soldier, if he were simply fined 1s. a day, should have the power to go to a court martial; while a constable in the Constabulary might be punished most unjustly by an ill-tempered commander, or prejudiced county inspector, and yet have no power of making his voice heard. He pointed out, also, that there had been certain irregularities in connection with the inspectors, who had made a practice of borrowing money from their men. He should move the reduction of the Vote by the amount of these officials' salaries, and whether he persisted in that would depend on the answer the Chief Secretary gave.

MR. O'DONNELL observed, that the hon. Member (Mr. Callan) had rather misrepresented him. He did not raise any objection to the character of the Irish Constabulary, whom he knew to be a very fine and able force. He was only speaking of the use made of them by the Government.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, while he was disposed to agree, to a considerable extent, with what had been stated by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray), these were not the days in which the Government would feel themselves justified in allowing the Irish Constabulary to fall below their proper strength. That was a subject now engaging the anxious attention of the Government, and he thought the result of that would be to remove many objections urged. As regarded non-effectives, he considered their numbers remarkably small—something like 60 in the whole force—and he did not think it would be desirable to dismiss men from the force for temporary indisposition. He would remind the Committee that this Vote had been under consideration for some hours, and he hoped it would now be agreed to. He must observe that if every one of the 60 or 70 Votes was to be subjected to the same criticism, they would never get to the end of their work. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) had referred to the exemption from the charge imposed on a district for the maintenance of an extra police force. As he understood the law of the case, it was not individuals, but areas, that were exempted. When the inhabitants of any particular area appeared to be in no way connected with the facts leading to the despatch of the force, then that part of the population had a claim to be exempt from the charge; but that would not be the case if it could be shown any of them were instigators by the distribution of placards or bills. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) had referred to the force as a military one; and he (Mr. J. Lowther) would rejoice if they could turn the bayonet into the walking-stick, and he would be glad if they could see the Constabulary walking about with a cane, in the old-fashioned dress of guardians of the peace in the country years ago. But the hon. and learned Gentleman must recollect that the duty of the force often found them opposed to large gatherings of people, sometimes between two parties, and they must have the means of preserving themselves and the public order. He hoped the Committee might now be allowed to take the Vote.

MR. BIGGAR expressed his satisfaction at that part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech in which he stated that the police force was to be kept up to its full strength. He referred to the case of Mr. Buckley, as one in which the charges levied on the population were such as they could not possibly pay. In that case, where the people were already unable to pay the rents levied, a higher rent was demanded, and then the Government made the people pay for the police to put down the disturbances which resulted. He thought a very unjust use was often made of the police; while the way in which certain persons were exempted from the tax was ridiculous and monstrous. He condemned the conduct of the Government in sending an extra police force to Connemara, and complained that the Attorney General for Ireland had not done his duty by prosecuting the people who created disturbances in the district by circulating insulting tracts among the Catholic people.

MR. MACARTNEY said, the hon. Member (Mr. Biggar) had treated them to one of his usual dissertations on law, politics, and religion. In that House those hon. Members represented a minority—a decided minority. They were constantly crying out because they could not control the House, and yet they had the assurance to ask the House not to protect the minority in Ireland, who were merely acting in accordance with the dictates of their religion. The hon. Member (Mr. Biggar) had observed that his opinion of the law in regard to these matters was opposed to that of the Judges of Ireland. He had no doubt that was the case; but the hon. Member spoke strongly against the Government for having sent a strong force of Constabulary into Conema. Well, his opinion was that no proof could be produced of any excess or outrage having been committed by any of the poor people of the district who had suffered so much from the disturbances referred to. Those people had been attacked with stones; women and children were subjected to ill-treatment and insult. That the force sent to preserve order was not too strong was clearly shown from the manner in which they had been treated. They were attacked. Their arms were taken from them in some instances, and in one case serious injuries had been inflicted. Some of the hon. Members opposite had expressed an opinion that there were too many police in Ireland, but he could not follow their reasoning on that point. Some of them declared that there were not enough policemen, while others held that there were too many, the former arguing that the people paid for more police than were supplied to the respective districts. To show the inconsistency of these claims, it had been asserted by some that the Constabulary amounted to a military force. On one point he was assured, that the Constabulary could not perform their duties unless they were armed. A proposal had been made some time ago to establish a Volunteer Force in Ireland; but he asked whether, under the circumstances, a population such as had been guilty of the excesses to which he referred could be trusted with military arms? Let them think for a moment of the serious consequences which might result from a conflict between a population armed with military weapons, and trained to the use of them, with the police. Such an event would require not only a military force, but would imply a large increase of the present Constabulary force in Ireland. The county to which he belonged had been spoken of as one of the most disorderly in Ireland. On the occasion of the last Orange anniversary a number of Orangemen had assembled in a town which had been referred to, but their meeting was of the most peaceful character. They were, however, followed to the suburbs by a crowd of the opposite party, who kept ostentatiously firing off guns during the day. Several shots were aimed at the Orangemen, and the result was that several of the party were wounded, more or less seriously. A small body of the Constabulary made an attempt to disperse the Roman Catholics, but they failed, and were obliged to call for reinforcements before they could succeed in protecting the Orangemen. In another place a large body of Orangemen were attacked while going peacefully to their homes. There, again, the police interfered to preserve order. The Orangemen, irritated by the treatment they had received, showed a desire to retaliate, but were fortunately prevented by the Constabulary, who arrived in strong force. He thought it right to mention these facts, as an illustration of how the Orangemen were sometimes excited and provoked to violent acts by the conduct of the opposite party.

MR. CALLAN said, the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) was inaccurate in his statement relating to the disturbances which occurred in connection with the Orange celebrations at Omagh. The last riot happened at that town on Sunday the 13th of July, when the Orangemen of the surrounding district, who had on the previous day indulged in drunken orgies, came into the town under pretence of attending Divine Service, and then marched out of church, firing guns and playing party tunes. Catholics were assaulted and injured; and he had received letters from some respectable inhabitants of the town of Omagh, constituents of the hon. Member for Tyrone, asking him to bring tl matter before the House of Commons. He regretted that the Chief Secretary for Ireland had so completely evaded the substantial grievance which had that evening been brought forward by the hon. Members for Tipperary (Mr. Gray), Carlow (Mr. Bruen), and Sligo (Colonel King-Harman), as well as by himself. He referred to the charge on the counties for the extra police force. It appeared by the Estimates that last year—1878-9—when the Constabulary were admittedly below the number allowed, the Treasury received upwards of £25,000 from these extra rates; but the counties from which the police were drafted were not credited with any amount. The right hon. Gentleman had not replied upon this point at all, and he (Mr. Callan) would call his attention to another fact. In the year 1873 a charge was imposed on the county of Louth for a number of extra men, and the Grand Jury threw out the presentment, on the ground that the county had not the number of police allowed by the Order in Council, and also on the ground that the requirements of the Act had not been complied with. At the Spring Assizes, ending the 27th of February, 1874, the Grand Jury again threw out the presentment, and the matter was then brought before Mr. Justice Lawson, who said that he could not go into the questions as to whether the police in the county were up to the proper number, or whether or not the requirements of the Act had been complied with. He simply said—"I order and direct that you pass this presentment," and the Grand Jury were obliged to do so. Since that time he believed no Grand Jury had appealed, for the reason that Mr. Justice Lawson had held the Treasury Warrant to be imperative, and that he could not go behind it. Under these circumstances, he asked the Attorney General for Ireland to say whether he was prepared to grant an inquiry into the facts, and whether Ireland was to be mulcted in this sum of £25,000?

MR. MACARTNEY said, that the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) had stated correctly that the disturbances at Omagh took place on the 13th of July, but the facts were different from those related by the hon. Member. On the occasion in question, four or five bands had attended a large meeting, and one of these accompanied another on its return to the station, when they were attacked by a large body of men, and the Constabulary placed themselves between the two parties. He denied that party tunes were played. Protestant bands never played on Sunday, while Roman Catholic bands did so frequently.

MR. GABBETT said, this was his first appearance in public during the five weeks he had had the honour of sitting in the House. He had listened to the brilliant flashes of oratory which had come from his hon. Friends around him, and he supposed that out of the abundance of the heart the mouth spoke. He would only say a few words with regard to the reference of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), who had spoken of the Royal Irish Constabulary walking about bristling with arms. He lived in a place called Cherconlish—not, perhaps, a very euphonious appellation, and one, perhaps, which was almost as bad as the name of Geoghegan, which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland fell foul of the other day. During the time he had lived there he had some opportunities of seeing the Constabulary, and he must say that they lived in all peace and quietness with the villagers, and consorted with them in the most friendly manner possible. He had been called in to see their skeleton battalion drilling, and had seen the country people looking on with interest, and in the most ordinary manner. The members of the Constabulary were sought after as acquaintances by the people, and as eligible bachelors by the marriageable of the district. He had met them frequently, and he must say that a more orderly, respectable, and sober body of men he never saw; and he had the greatest pleasure in thus bearing testimony to their personal character. He had never seen any of the Orange demonstrations referred to by the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney); no such things happened in his part of the country, where the Protestants lived with their Catholic neighbours upon the most affectionate terms. And lately, when he had stood for the county which he had the honour to represent, although he was a Protestant and was opposed by a Catholic, he had never been taunted with his religious tenets. With regard to those Orange demonstrations, he thought the sooner those silly exhibitions in the North of Ireland came to an end the better; and that the time had come when the people of Ireland should join hands and, laying aside these ridiculous customs, should co-operate for the good of the country; in which case there would be no necessity for the Irish Constabulary to march and counter-march throughout the country in all the panoply of war.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, that the Constabulary force was not unpopular in Ireland, nor had any hon. Member from Ireland said anything which personally reflected upon it. Among the various suggestions made in the course of the discussion, it was asked that he should say something off-hand upon one or two points. The hon. and gallant Member for the county of Galway (Major Nolan) had requested him to indicate what were the functions of the Grand Jury and the Executive. The difference between these might, he thought, be precisely stated. The Grand Jury had power to award compensation for loss of life and property under certain conditions, while the Executive had the onerous duty to perform of apportioning the extra police tax. With regard to the question initiated by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray), as to the difference between the nominal and real strength of the police, he believed the condition of affairs in that respect was not entirely satisfactory, and stood thus:—Each five years there was a revision of the quotas, the last of which, he believed, took place shortly before the present Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) left his Office in Ireland, about two years ago; and the result of that revision was to reduce the discrepancy between the real and nominal figures of the force. The hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) had presented this question in a very ingenious and novel way, in making this point—that whenever the Constabulary were withdrawn from the county of Louth, for instance, Louth should be credited with a proportion of the extra tax received from the district to which they were sent. There were, in his opinion, two sides to that question. For if Louth had to pay for something which it did not get, he could not see that Louth ought to make any money out of the transaction. The other side of the question was a different matter entirely—whether the counties to which the police were sent ought to pay the extra expense so incurred? Upon that subject the question put to him was, whether or not the decision of the Judge at the Spring Assizes of 1874 was sound? It was not for him to disparage the Office which he held; but he did not think himself entitled to sit as a Court of Appeal on the decisions of any of the Judges in Ireland: nevertheless, he was disposed to think the decision in question was perfectly accurate. His right hon. Friend had stated that he recognized that this question, as to how the extra charge was to be borne, was a subject that demanded inquiry, and that he would look closely as to whether the Constabulary force was kept up to a proper and reasonable strength; whether there was sufficient barrack accommodation of a permanent character scattered over the country; and whether it would be reasonable to charge a county if it fell very far short, indeed, of its proper quota? The Secretary of State for the Colonies, when in Office in Ireland, had tried to meet the difficulty in this way:—It was found at that time that there was a very substantial number of men under the quota in several counties, and he, pending the revision which had since been made, struck an average for the whole of Ireland, and only debited those counties which had not their proper average.

MR. CALLAN said, he did not want the county of Louth to make money out of the drafting of the Constabulary. It had been ascertained, beyond all doubt, that the number of men allowed to the county—he believed it was 159—was less by 15 than the quota during the year; but the county had, nevertheless, been charged for some 11 or 12 men extra. Since, therefore, the force was so much under the number allowed by the Act, he was not aware that the county was liable to pay the amount which had been paid to the Treasury. The best way, he thought, to cause inquiry to be made would be to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £25,000, being the amount paid into the Treasury under the head of “Augmentation.”

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he had given Notice of a Motion to reduce this Vote by the sum of £500. He presumed, therefore, he should have precedence.

MR. CALLAN was willing to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum named by him, after the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy).

MR. SULLIVAN said, the Attorney General for Ireland had said the matter should be taken into consideration. It was exactly five Sessions ago since he brought the same matter before the House. In 1874 he was requested by his constituents to do so, and he had done it. It was then taken into consideration, and had been kept there ever since, and there it would probably remain for the next five or six years. The Attorney General for Ireland had stated that the county should not be allowed to make money out of the drafting of the Constabulary, to which he (Mr. Sullivan) replied neither ought the State to make money by the transaction; and it was his contention that the State had done so. The matter stood thus:—A certain amount, not more than requisite, was voted for the Constabulary in Ireland; the force was distributed all over the country, according to the requirements of the counties; but if Louth required 500 men, and the State took away 400 for certain purposes in Belfast, what recompense was it proposed to make to the county for the loss of four-fifths of its Constabulary? If these men were not wanted in Louth they ought not to be there; and if the State had a right to charge them elsewhere, surely the county should be compensated. As the system now stood, suppose the county of Mayo to be in an extremely peaceable condition, while there was a disturbance in Galway; the State would draft the Mayo police into Galway, and charge for them; if, then, a disturbance occurred in the next county, the Mayo police might be drafted into that county, and again charged for. He would put the matter to any English gentleman accustomed to commercial book-keeping in this way. You engage to deliver to a certain public institution in this Metropolis 1,000 sacks of flour in the year; you send them only 800, and charge for the 200 which you have not delivered. The State had acted in this way precisely, by not giving the county of Louth its proper quota of police, and then charging as extra for the number of men sent to make up the quota. He wanted to know where was the defence or excuse for such a transaction on any commercially honest grounds whatever? He wanted to know whether it was commercial honesty at all? He disputed and denied the right to make this extra charge, unless the extra men were sent from England into Ireland. He regretted that the debate had wandered into a disputation upon the Orange celebrations. The police in the North of Ireland, he admitted, had a very difficult duty to perform during one week in the year, when good, honest men, who had been the kindest neighbours for 51 weeks previously, were seized with a sort of madness, and went about maligning those who differed from them in religious opinions; and, on the whole, with some exceptions, he thought that they discharged their painful and difficult task with wonderful tact and forbearance. He recommended hon. Members from the North of Ireland to save the great expenditure in their districts for police, by disabusing the minds of their constituents of the idea that they stood in need of those parades with fifes and drums for any purposes of defence. If they came down to Limerick they would learn that while the Protestants there were only 5 per cent of the community, they were safe in the midst of 95 per cent of the rest of the community, which was Catholic. Let them contrast the duties of the police in Connemara with what they had to do in the county of Cork. The Protestants in Cork were as few as the Protestants, real or pretended, in Connemara; and neither in Limerick nor Kerry did they need any protection from the police, because they were non-aggressive, and because they did not insult and attack their Catholic neighbours. They knew what the secret was in Connemara; and when the Protestants in Connemara began to behave as did the Protestants in this county, they would no longer need the protection of the police. In place of the fife and the drum, let them try what efficacy there was in a little kindness and in trusting one another. For his own part, he would say, that if he were in his own native country—Ireland—and he saw that an outrage was attempted to be committed upon the humblest Protestant meeting-house, he would defend that house with his own hand, and, if necessary, with his life. If their Protestant fellow-countrymen were only friendly with them in Ireland, they neither would have cause to say that they needed the protection of the police for their security.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY begged to move to reduce that portion of the Vote under Sub-head A by the sum of £500 for the salary of the Inspector General. He believed that the Constabulary were charged with the duty of carrying out the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act in Ireland. The circumstances of the case to which he would briefly refer were these:—At the commencement of the year a certain number of cattle were ordered to be slaughtered on account of a certain disease in Limerick, but there was a suspicion that, instead of their all having been slaughtered, some of the cattle were exported to England. A number of members of the Board of Guardians saw two constables, whom they requested to inquire whether the cattle had been slaughtered or not. The constables undertook the duty, and recognised the necessity for carrying it out quietly. A few days afterwards, however, they came before the Board of Guardians and stated the entire case, declaring that they had no duty to perform in the matter. They not only declined to do their duty, but made public the steps which were being taken by the Board of Guardians to discover whether the circumstances had happened or not. That brought him to the conduct of the Inspector General, who, when applied to on the matter, said he could see no ground for instituting an inquiry into the conduct of the police, and that he had himself made a private inquiry into the circumstances. The end of it was that the matter came before the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who said that he saw little reason to interfere with the Inspector General of the force, and pointed to the very remarkable remedy which the local authorities would have by summoning the two constables and the Inspector before Petty Sessions. It had turned out that the police had duties with regard to the Act; that they had not performed them, and that the Inspector General had been guilty of strange and gross neglect in the discharge of his duty. He, therefore, moved that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item for the Salary of the Inspector General be reduced by £500."—(Mr. O'Shaughnessy.)

MR. VERNER said, there was a good deal of point in what the hon. and learned Member for Louth had brought forward on the subject of the charges for extra police in the various counties. He (Mr. Verner) agreed in the complaint which had been clearly and forcibly made by the hon. and learned Member, and believed that charges for extra police were made against districts where the rightful numbers were never kept up, although they were regularly paid for. He regretted, however, that the hon. and learned Member had not confined his attention to that subject, but had made remarks, joined in by the hon. Member for Dunkalk, with reference to the Orangemen of the North of Ireland, which required that he should say a few words, not in defence of that body, to which he belonged, for it needed no defence, but in order to show the Committee that the state of things was not that given by hon. Members opposite, and that; while a large part of the country was not in that peaceful and happy state depicted by hon. Members, the North of Ireland was not so peculiarly turbulent and troublesome to the police as they wished it to be supposed. What were called by hon. Members Orange disturbances, arose from the intolerance and rowdy spirit of the opposite party, who attacked the Orangemen, even when not beating their drums or in processions. It was quite possible that if the Orangemen were left alone the processions might die out, as opposition had something to do with keeping these things alive. He lived in a county which was very largely Roman Catholic, and bands, dressed in the most absurd and grotesque uniforms, used to march up and down past his gate every Sunday, beating drums and playing disloyal tunes; but as he, and those of his way of thinking, took no notice, the nuisance would probably come to an end, if it had not already. The hon. and learned Member for Louth said that party displays only took place in the North, and, of all places in Ireland, quoted Cork City and County as models of quietness and order. But the Committee would remember that Cork was the head-centre of Fenianism, and that proceedings were constantly taking place there of the most disloyal character. Further, it was well known that in the West of Ireland they were in the habit of giving cheers for the Zulus. Who ever heard of the Orangemen of the North of Ireland giving cheers for the Zulus?

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that while there had been a tendency through the discussion to depart from the Vote before the Committee, he had not considered it necessary to check that discussion so long as it had relation to the conduct of the Constabulary; but he thought it would be seen that the present discussion, dealing with meetings of one or other political party, was outside the question before the Committee.

MR. VERNER had understood the hon. Members to whom he had referred, in making their attacks upon a loyal body in the North of Ireland, to accuse that body of being the cause of an extra force of Constabulary being sent down, at a great expense, to that part of the country. He wished to say that the Orangemen of the North of Ireland were not the sole cause of the movement of the police, nor was the North of Ireland the sole part where extra Constabulary were sent; for it was well known that extra forces had to be sent down, but a short time ago, to the West of Ireland, in one case on account of what had taken place at a not-too-respectable meeting, and in the other owing to a persecution which had been set on foot for the purpose of hunting certain people, who happened to be Protestants, out of that part of the country. He hoped that when the hon. and learned Member for Louth next spoke upon the subject of the Constabulary, he would not be so kind as to lay all the sins of Ireland on the shoulders of his (Mr. Verner's) co-religionists in Ulster, who, in sending to the House Members not so full of a peculiar zeal, had, at all events, sent Members who were far less troublesome than those from the other parts of the Island.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that the hon. Member who had just sat down must have confounded his observations with those of some other Member, for not one word had fallen from him of an offensive or hurtful kind with reference to the co-religionists of the hon. Gentleman in the North of Ireland.

Mr. Verner

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he hoped that the discussion would now be allowed to close. The subject had been very properly brought forward by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy); but he did not suppose that although the Inspector General was expected to stamp out cattle disease, he could be expected to stamp out sectarian animosities. The point raised by the hon. and learned Member was a very fair one. The attention of the Government had been called to the matter in "another place," and the Government had given an assurance that the police would be called upon to perform certain duties which, in the opinion of the Government, the Act of Parliament imposed upon them.

MR. A. MOORE said, that the Government who repealed the Act relating to processions in Ireland had thereby done a very cowardly thing, and acted in opposition to the opinion of the Roman Catholic Bishops, who had given it against the repeal of that Act. He was quite sure that it was the view of every sensible man—and especially of the Roman Catholic Clergy—that those processions which had been referred to, and which only served to continue angry feuds, should cease.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he must call the attention of the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) to the fact that the question now before the Committee was the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, and that it would be much more in Order to discuss the Vote generally after that Motion had been disposed of.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY feared that he must persevere with his Amendment, and divide the Committee, in order to record a protest against an authority, like the Inspector General of Constabulary, admitting that he was ignorant of the duties imposed upon the force by the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act.

MR. BRUEN hoped the hon. and learned Member for Limerick would not trouble the Committee by dividing, after the statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE protested against the system of drafting constables, and objected to giving any protection to missionaries in Ireland, with whose religious views he did not agree.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. and gallant Member that the Motion before the Committee was that of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, relating to the Inspector General of Constabulary.

MR. BIGGAR wished to give shortly the experience of the Guardians of the Cavan Union, where the Act had been brought into operation. The Guardians of that Union appointed a veterinary surgeon, whose duty it was to investigate the complaints made by all parties with reference to the disease. The veterinary surgeon had to visit all places in which it was complained that cattle disease existed. His invariable experience was that there was hardly a case to which he was called where the cattle disease was found to exist, and thus to entitle the parties to compensation under the Act. He would like the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to take care that the local rates were not burdened with the expense of these police, who had nothing to do a great part of their time. The Poor Law Guardians had adopted all sanitary precautions, and looked after the disease; and it seemed to him that if this Act were good for nothing, it would be most desirable to repeal it. He was very much surprised to see the right hon. Gentleman agree in the policy of these Cattle Disease Acts, thus leaving the ratepayers to be burdened by greatly increased rates.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. CALLAN begged to move to reduce the Vote under sub-head D by the sum of £110, being the sum for medicines and compounding at the Royal Irish Constabulary depôt, Dublin. The medical allowance amounted to £1,829, and that included the amount by which he moved to reduce the Vote. His object in making the Motion was to draw attention to the manner in which the Royal Irish Constabulary were attended to when sick in Dublin. He had no complaint to make with regard to the way in which they were attended in the counties, for that was considered generally satisfactory by the men; but complaint was made with reference to the way in which the men at the depôt in Dublin were attended to when ill. So defective was the system under which they were at present treated, that last year a Court of Inquiry was held into a case which occurred. When a policeman at the depôt in the Phoenix Park became ill, he was sent to St. Stephen's Hospital, and 10s. 6d. per week was deducted from his pay to defray the cost of his treatment. The men complained very much of the character and condition of the persons with whom they were bound to associate with in the yard of that hospital. They were, probably, the worst characters in Dublin, the hospital being notoriously used for treating venereal cases. His attention had been drawn to this matter by the inquiry held last year on the body of a constable who had died while in the hospital. The inquiry lasted five days, and resulted virtually in a verdict of manslaughter against the hospital authorities. The delinquents, however, could not be brought to justice. It was proved that when men were first sent to this hospital they were placed upon a very low and insufficient diet. The officers having charge of the Constabulary wards had fixed a scale of payment for what they were pleased to term luxuries. Thus, a fresh 1d. roll was sold for 2d., and a fresh egg for 2d., while a glass of whisky was strictly prohibited, both by the Constabulary and hospital regulations. Men were thus kept upon a very lowering diet; and it was recognized, as a part of the instructions of the hospital, that anything extra they required should be sold to them at most exorbitant rates. Some little time ago the hospital changed the nurses and officials. In consequence of that, the Lord Lieutenant directed an inquiry to be held by the central Medical Board in Dublin. A Court of Inquiry was held, and four or five days were spent in the consideration of the matter. But he believed the inquiry was a very imperfect one, as none of the witnesses who could really have given information were called before the Court. The inquiry was, moreover, held with closed doors, and under peculiar circumstances. There was no doubt that if any policeman had given evidence before the Court that he had bought extra food he would have been fined, and reduced to the ranks for breach of the regulations. The City of Dublin

Police were treated differently. When any of them were ill they were sent to certain hospitals, and 7s. per week was deducted from their pay on account of their treatment. If Catholics expressed any wish on the subject, they could be sent to the hospital of Mater Misericordiæ, or to St. Vincent's Hospital; while the Protestants, if they pleased, could go to the Adelaide Hospital. That arrangement gave great satisfaction to the men; but the Royal Irish Constabulary were compelled to go to St. Stephen's Hospital, and were charged 10s. 6d. per week for their treatment there. Moreover, St. Stephen's Hospital was regarded as a sectarian institution. Protestant policemen were allowed to attend the services of their own church attached to the hospital; but Catholic policemen were invariably refused permission to attend the religious ministrations of their own religion. Some years ago some Catholic policemen asked leave to attend the services of their own Church; but the surgeon told them that if they were well enough to attend mass they were well enough to leave the hospital altogether; and they were thus refused permission. Very naturally the policemen complained of that treatment. They said that it was very hard to charge them 10s. 6d. per week for going to an hospital, in the yards of which they were obliged to associate with the worst characters—not with the absolutely criminal class, but with the low type known as corner boys. They asked—"Was it a fair thing that they should not have the same privileges as the Metropolitan Police, in being allowed to go to one or two selected hospitals—such as the St. Vincent's, or the Mater Misericordiæ in the case of Catholics, and the Adelaide Hospital in the case of Protestants?" He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would cause instructions to be issued, to the effect that the same facilities were to be given to the Royal Irish Constabulary as to the Dublin Metropolitan Police in these matters. If the right hon. Gentleman would give him that assurance, he would not enter into many painful matters connected with this subject, for he should be glad of an opportunity of avoiding doing so. He begged to move that the Vote be reduced by £110, under sub-head D, for medicines and compounding.

Mr. Callan

Motion made, and Question proposed.
 "That the Item of £12,829, be reduced by the sum of £110."—(Mr. Callan.)

MR. GRAY hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to give the assurance asked for by the hon. Member for Dundalk. The inquiries that had been held disclosed circumstances in the management of the St. Stephen's Hospital of a most discreditable character. Without going into details, which would be of a very painful character, he might say that he could see no reason why the system which had been found to work satisfactorily for the Dublin police should not be adopted and made to work to the satisfaction of the members of the Constabulary. There was very fair ground for allowing the men to go to other hospitals besides the St. Stephen's. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary could do a great deal of good by using his influence in this matter.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he certainly would inquire into this case; and if the statements which had been made by the hon. Member for Dundalk proved to be founded on fact, he would take steps to remedy the grievance complained of.

MR. CALLAN said, that after the assurance given by the Chief Secretary, he did not wish to proceed with his Motion. He should think it his duty to place a Motion on the Paper asking for Returns of the depositions taken at the inquiry before the Coroner when the whole mismanagement with respect to the hospital was disclosed. He thought that, after the Chief Secretary had seen those documents, he would be able to act in the manner he had promised.

MR. MELDON said, that there was an assurance that might be given to the Committee without the safeguards with which the Chief Secretary had surrounded the promise he had already given. Could he not assure them that the Royal Irish Constabulary should be treated equally well with the Metropolitan Police of Dublin? At present, there was a very serious difference in the treatment of the two corps when sick. He did not see why a Constabulary man should be called upon to pay 10s. 6d. per week for his treatment in hospital, while a member of the Dublin Metropolitan Police was only charged 7s.

He thought that they ought to have an assurance that the Royal Irish Constabulary, living at the dépôt, should be as well treated as the Metropolitan Police.

MR. CALLAN expected the assurance to which the hon. Member alluded, simply because the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had stated that, if the facts bore out what had been stated, then the grievance would be remedied. He was very unwilling to bring before the House the painful evidence he possessed with reference to this hospital; his only object was to insure that the Royal Irish Constabulary were to be treated properly. He could see no reason whatever why 10s. 6d. per week should be charged to the men by the regulations of the Constabulary, and that they should be allowed no option but to go to St. Stephen's Hospital. They were, no doubt, charged 10s. 6d., because the authorities of the St. Stephen's Hospital demanded that sum for their maintenance; but with the other hospitals there was competition, and the authorities were anxious to pay all attention to the force.

MR. SULLIVAN wished to bring to the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland a cause of serious complaint against certain police officers in Ireland, to which he would further call attention by putting a Question. He had given Notice of the Question that evening for Thursday next with reference to the subject, and he had occasion to question the Chief Secretary some time ago with regard to a very similar occurrence. The matter to which he now wished to refer occurred at a town in the county of Armagh. From more than one correspondent he had received most serious impeachments of the conduct of the police with reference to these lamentable transactions. He hoped that the Irish Chief Secretary would grant an inquiry into the conduct of the police authorities in this particular district, when he had heard the facts of the case. A young man, named Edward Carberry, was proceeding along a road not very far from the town with his brother, who was somewhat behind him.

It was dark, and suddenly the brother, walking behind, heard Edward Carberry call out that he had been stabbed. There was no affray, and there was no noise; but two or three men rushed away, and the brother found Edward Carberry weltering in his blood. The wounded man was taken home, and the police sergeant came to his bedside. That young man, mortally wounded, survived for 20 hours; but the police sergeant neglected to receive his dying deposition, although four or five magistrates were within two miles of the spot where the victim lay. Owing to that neglect of the police sergeant the young man died without having made any deposition, although it was said he was able to name the person by the stroke of whose dagger or knife he had been assassinated. The deposition of the unfortunate man was not taken, solely owing to the culpable neglect of the sergeant of police. He had brought the matter to the attention of the Irish Executive, and some arrests were made; but, owing to the neglect to take the dying deposition, there was not sufficient evidence against the criminals. He did not know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland recollected the circumstance that, owing to the neglect to which he had called attention, the trial of the supposed murderer was abortive. No one could be brought to justice for the murder of this young man in cold blood, owing solely to the neglect of the police. The persons who had been acquitted he was bound to assume were innocent; but he mentioned, as a circumstance causing the gravest dissatisfaction in the neighbourhood, that when these men were returned for trial, a sort of triumphant procession received them on the way from the Court-house. But he was asked to bring a complaint before the Attorney General for Ireland of this fact, on the part of the Crown prosecutor, that these men were admitted to bail, the charge being then put, not as wilful murder, but as manslaughter. The reply he made was that he could not believe that these proceedings were taken unless under the authority of the Attorney General, and that his conviction was that that learned Gentleman would act in such a case bond fide, and with the highest sense of honour. He was not complaining; but he would only mention that there was complaint made in the district that a man charged with murder was admitted to bail on grounds of party feeling. But although admitted to bail on the assumption that he was to be tried for manslaughter, yet he was actually arraigned for murder. It was an unfortunate coincidence that, in order to enable the accused to be admitted to bail, when before the legal tribunals, he was only charged with manslaughter, while he had been arrested for murder. He thought that there ought to be an inquiry into the whole circumstances of this case, particularly as it was proved at the trial that Sergeant Duart neglected to search for sufficient information to convict the accused. Sergeant Duart, instead of appearing as a witness for the Crown, appeared against it, and asserted certain circumstances which could be completely contradicted by witnesses who could be brought before a Court of Inquiry. It was stated by Sergeant Duart that young Carberry had told him that he did not know who stabbed him; but he (Mr. Sullivan) had letters which showed most distinctly that that young man knew who murdered him, and was ready to name him. It was a grievous thing that that young man of exemplary character going home should be encountered by some evilly-disposed persons and stabbed to death in the presence of his brother. In the same district, a little boy of 13 or 14 years of age met parties who called upon him to curse the Pope. He refused, and they drew a knife and stabbed him, leaving him weltering on the ground in blood. He was now, while he spoke, lingering between life and death in his father's home in Armagh, and no one had been brought to justice for the shocking occurrence any more than for the last. A large part of the district in which these occurrences took place was under the charge of the same police officer, and inquiry ought certainly to be made into the matter. He would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman to promise him, on behalf of the Irish Executive, that there should be an inquiry into the conduct of the police in this district. He might mention that there had been one or two other instances of inefficiency of the police of the same district. He could only assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, that when application was made to him (Mr. Sullivan) to complain of the conduct pursued in this case, he declined to do so, because he considered that action in the matter had been taken by the Attorney General. He trusted that the inquiry would be granted.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, that it was a little inconvenient that a case which had been tried before the Assizes should be brought to the attention of the House without Notice. It was impossible for an Attorney General to bear in mind the numbers of cases that were continually occurring. He could not recall the circumstances of this particular case; but, so far as he could understand the matter, his impression was that the unfortunate man who had been stabbed died a very short time afterwards. He must point out to the hon. and learned Member that the taking of a dying declaration was rather a question for a medical man than for a policeman. He knew no matter in which nicer distinctions had been taken than in the matter of dying declarations. A man died shortly after receiving a wound who did not think that he was going to die. It was absolutely necessary to the validity of the declaration that it should have been made by the wounded man, in the belief that he was going to die immediately afterwards. Unless that were the case, it would fail in cross-examination. It might be that the young man in question did not have it present to his mind that he was in any danger; or it might be that the magistrates did not know it; or it might be that the police-sergeant did not know that the man was going to die so soon. It appeared also, from the statement of the hon. and learned Member, that the brother of the young man was present all through, and watching well every circumstance of the transaction. If the brother had thought that the unfortunate man, Edward Carberry, would die, and that with him would die the evidence necessary to bring his murderers to justice, then he could have gone to one of the four or five magistrates in the neighbourhood. Why did not the brother go to them? He did not know how the facts were; but he could only say how the matter occurred to him from what he had heard. It was not at all such a simple matter as the hon. and learned

Member seemed to suppose. Then, with respect to what had been said about admitting the supposed murderer to bail, he supposed the case was before the magistrates, and they were responsible for what was done; or it was before the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin, and probably the Crown was there represented. [Mr. SULLIVAN: By Mr. Monro.] He had no doubt that the case was clearly presented to the Bench, and that the Bench decided to admit the prisoner to bail. With regard to the indictment which the hon. and learned Member had framed against the police, he could hardly think that it raised a very serious question. The distinction between manslaughter and murder was often very fine. Under ordinary circumstances, there was a complete investigation, and the usual practice was to indict for murder, in order that the man might be tried for the full crime; but, at the same time, counts were inserted to provide that, if acquitted of murder, the prisoner might be tried for manslaughter. In the ordinary course, he received Returns of the Crown cases occurring in the County Armagh. He had not yet had the Returns relating to the prosecution in question; but when they came before him he would look into them carefully, in order to see how far the complaint made by the hon. and learned Member was justified.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. MELDON moved to omit from the Vote the item of £5,215 in respect of the pensions of the Inspector General and Assistant Inspectors General. He was sorry that that was the only opportunity he had had of raising the question, which he regarded as one of very great importance. So far as the pensions of the members of the Constabulary force since 1874 were concerned, there was no cause for complaint; but with regard to the pensions of those who retired previous to that year, the grievance under which they laboured was of a very serious character. He regretted there were so few Members present; because he was sure that he had only to lay one or two facts before the Committee to convince them that many of the superannuated members of the force had serious cause of complaint. The Metropolitan Police and the Royal Irish Constabulary became entitled to pensions under precisely the same Act—namely, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 100—and shortly after it came into force the pay of both forces was increased. When the Metropolitan Police came to retire under the Act, their pensions were calculated upon the standard of the pay they were receiving at the time of their discharge; but the same principle was not applied when the men of the Constabulary came up to claim their pensions. Their pay was not fixed according to the rate of their pay at the time of their discharge, but at the rate of pay which existed in 1846, when the Act to which he had referred was passed. Both bodies of police were pensioned under the same Act, and under identical terms; yet this most extraordinary occurrence happened—namely, that the officers of the Royal Irish Constabulary, who were pensioned under the same Act as the men, had their pensions calculated at the rate of pay in existence when their pensions were granted; whereas the men, though pensioned under precisely the same terms, were pensioned at the rate of pay received in 1846. That statement clearly showed that, for some reason or other, the men forming the force were dealt with in an entirely different manner from their own officers, and also from the members of the Metropolitan Police. He had often endeavoured to find out the reason for this peculiar distinction; and the only one he could conceive—and it was not a satisfactory one—was that two different lawyers were consulted in regard to the interpretation of the Act, one on behalf of the Metropolitan Police, who put the proper construction upon it, and another on the part of the Constabulary, who put another construction upon the Act. An explanation of that kind was given in 1875. He brought the question before the House by a Motion, and the answer he received on that and on previous occasions was that the Executive, when they awarded the pensions to the Constabulary, gave the full amount which the law entitled the men of the Constabulary to get. The conduct of the Constabulary was admitted to have been most excellent; and the Secretary of State for the Colonies stated that the Government gave the utmost penny that the law permitted them to give; and that any discretion they possessed had been given in favour of the Constabulary. Now, he differed on a point of law from the Government at the time; and he proposed that a case should be taken for the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, and he stated that if they decided against him he would abandon the position he had taken up; but that if the decision was in his favour the pensions of the Constabulary men should be raised to the amount to which they were entitled. His view of the law was that the Government had the power to give the men of the Constabulary exactly the same pension which was given to the Metropolitan force—namely, a sum calculated upon the rate of pay at the time of their dismissal, and not upon the rate in existence in 1846. The case was put before the Law Officers of the Crown, and their opinion was in favour of his view; and it was then clearly stated that the Government had a discretion, and that they might have awarded the men pensions calculated upon the rate of pay they received at the time of their discharge. The Government, then, in the most extraordinary manner, changed their attitude in regard to the matter. They ceased to say that they had no discretion, and said instead—"You were right in saying we had a discretionary power to give you a larger sum; we had the discretionary power, but we exercised it in giving you a smaller sum." Now, that answer was quite irreconcilable with the first one which was advanced. The fact was, that the position he was advocating admitted of no answer. There was no justice in the position which the Government took up. It was, indeed, as great an act of injustice that could well be perpetrated. It was a case of might against right; and he challenged the Government to give any reasonable explanation why the men of the Constabulary had been robbed of their proper pension. There was another point of great importance to which he wished to draw the attention of the Committee. When the Act of 10 & 11 Vict. was passed, a certain sum was deducted from the pay of each of the Constabulary force, with the view of forming a pension fund. The sum so obtained accumulated until it amounted to between £50,000 and £60,000; but, instead of being applied to the purpose for which it was instituted, it was employed by the Treasury for some other purpose. Now, the superannuated members of the force did not want anything to be given them from the public funds. They simply wanted their pensions to be increased out of monies which they had themselves paid into the fund during a long series of years. They simply asked to be dealt with fairly, and to be paid that of which they had been most unjustifiably deprived; and a stronger case than they had he did not think had ever been brought before the notice of the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £5,215, for Pensions of the Inspector General and the Assistant Inspector General, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Meldon.)

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, the grievance had assumed such proportions that it would be creditable to the Government and to the Committee if it were speedily redressed. What had occurred? The first case made by the Government was that they had no discretion to grant additional pensions, and they expressed regret that they had not, remarking that if they had they would have met the demands which had been made. The Law Officers decided that the Government had the discretion. They then turned round, and said—"Notwithstanding all our magnanimous feelings towards the Constabulary, we decline to exercise it; the law enables us to pay the sum you demand, but we will exercise our discretion, notwithstanding all you have said." Now, was that a worthy attitude for the Government to take towards the poor men who had deserved so well of the Treasury? Why should those men be treated worse than the members of the Metropolitan force? Was it an encouragement for men to enter the force in the future? It was a pitiable grievance to be obliged to bring before the notice of the House from time to time; but it was so gross an act of injustice that there was no help for it but to continue to bring it forward till it was redressed, and the men received their just rights.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN was of opinion that many of the men who were superannuated had a fair claim upon the Government for an increase of their pensions. It was true that a great many men were put forward as entitled to extra pensions who had no such claim; and that a large number of men who were entitled to an increase had been merged in the crowd of claimants, and their claims had, accordingly, been ignored. But a great many men, who left the force about the time the new Act came into force, were, in common honesty and justice, entitled to have their claims considered. It did seem extremely hard that those men, who had spent the best years of their lives in the Service, should find themselves worse off than men who were discharged a few months after them; and his own opinion was that the Government had not treated them with that liberality which was due to men who had stood by the Government in times of difficulty with a fidelity and courage rarely equalled.

MR. GRAY said, the real secret of the continued refusal of the Government to give full pensions to the men was not to be found in any explanation which had been given, but rather in the same cause that had induced the Government to keep the Constabulary force below their proper strength, and to retain on the roll men who were not effective—namely, because the cost of the superannuation of the force had been under-estimated, and that the authorities were endeavouring to keep the Vote down, in order to make up for the deficiency occasioned by the blunder in the beginning. He found that the Estimate for pensions had increased by £20,000; but he contended that it was far from right to meet that increase by depriving men of their just rights on retirement after long and honourable service. He thought the fairer and more straightforward way would be for the Government to estimate for a smaller number of men, and pay what was due to the superannuated men, who now so justly complained. The Government at one time said that if they had the power they would have placed the men of the Constabulary on an equality with their brethren of the Metropolitan force; and yet, now that they admitted they had the power, they declined to do for the men what was a simple act of justice, and what they had virtually promised to do if they had the power. He did not think that that was conduct worthy of the English Government. It was a most discreditable state of things, and ought to receive at once the most serious attention of the Government, with a view to the injured men receiving redress without further undue delay.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was sorry he had not foreseen that that Vote would have come on that night, as he had no source of reference in regard to the point at issue beyond his memory. So far as he could trust his recollection, he could assure the hon. Member who had just sat down that it was not at all with the view of keeping the Constabulary or Pension Vote within a certain sum that the Government had declined to grant the extra pensions. On the contrary, they had been guided by what they considered to be the real merits of the case. Speaking generally, what he recollected was this—that a movement was made for raising the salaries of the Constabulary. There was also a movement for increasing the scale on which superannuation was to be awarded. The objects of both of those movements were carried out. But in the Preamble of one of the clauses of the Statute it was stated that it was not intended to give the Constabulary the double advantage. That was to say, they were to have the option of retiring either on the scale of the old rate of pay, under the new regulations for superannuation, or at the old rate of superannuation upon the higher scale of pay. That was his impression of the circumstances, as far as he could recollect them. There was no doubt at all, from the Preamble of the Act, as to what the intention of the Government was in agreeing to the alterations which were contemplated by that measure. He believed that after that Act was passed a certain number of men in the Constabulary were told by their superior officers, by mistake, as the Government believed, that they would be entitled to pensions calculated upon the higher scale, and that upon that statement a number of them retired. There was a doubt as to whether or not that was a legal construction of the Act. The matter was laid before the Law Officers of the Crown, and their opinion was that it was competent for the Government to grant what had been granted. He thought it could only be concluded, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government had a perfect right to raise the rate of superannuation if they chose to do so; because it was clearly und stood that soldiers were not to be entitled to take advantage of provisions contained in an Act of Parliament in two ways. As far as he was able to judge of what had been done, he was bound to say that, in his opinion, the views of the Legislature had been carried into effect.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he desired to object to the item in the Estimates which referred to musketry instruction, in order to raise the question of the military character of the Irish Constabulary. He knew he could only do so in an imperfect form, because it was only a very small portion of the military aspect of the force which was covered by the item to which he took exception; but the question was one of great importance, and therefore he now raised it. In the course of a good many of the speeches which had been already delivered that evening references had been made to some supposed utterances of his own against the Irish Constabulary force, and he would hardly express any sorrow for being misunderstood, seeing that the misconception had led to the very interesting and able remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy). While he quite agreed with those of his hon. Colleagues who had spoken of the admirable character of the Irish Constabulary in its character as a police force, it was quite otherwise when they came to look at it in its character as a disguised military force, which was being continually employed to coerce the country. In Ireland they had long since pierced through the disguise; but here in England the matter was very different.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. Member that after the Division which had been taken it was not competent for him to enter upon a special discussion of the item relating to the arming and discipline of the Irish Constabulary.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that in that case he would move to reduce the whole Vote, which would give him a larger licence of objection. Instead of making a Motion with reference to £105 as to musketry, or another Motion with reference to some hundreds of pounds for ammunition, he now moved to reduce the entire Vote by £50,000. That, he dared say, would cover the expenses of musketry instruction, the expenses of ammunition, and many other expenses of a similar nature. The Irish Constabulary force was excellent as a police force; but as a disguised military force it was an institution which would not be tolerated in England, and which would not be tolerated if it were known what it really meant in the latter country. They were all pleased to hear of the high character of the individual members of the Irish Constabulary, and to know that the encomia which had been passed on them was well deserved. Their feelings must be different when they looked from the other point of view which he had indicated. He might refer, for instance, to the amount of mischief which had been done by the disguised military character of the force in connection with some of the most important Irish problems. If it were reported in English newspapers that whenever an eviction had to be carried out under peculiarly heart-rending circumstances the military were called into requisition, homesteads were levelled, and families were driven out actually in presence of British soldiers drawn up in line, the people would get something like a true idea of the war which was being waged against the homes and hearths of the population of Ireland. But because it was simply said, in regard to such cases in that country—"The sheriff was assisted by the police," it was imagined that what took place was some quite ordinary matter of legal execution, with no tragic details about it. He saw beside him the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), whose county had been specially agitated of late by the consideration of questions arising out of the inordinate use of landlord's so-called rights. He believed he was within the mark in saying that, in the course of a few months, some 800 evictions had been carried out in that county, and similar records could be produced from numerous other Irish counties. Under the Irish land system populations were driven out in such circumstances that the presence of companies of soldiers was required, in order to protect the officers of the law in the execution of their barbarous duty. People here had no idea of the extremities of the struggle which was proceeding in Ireland—a struggle, cruel even in ordinary times, but which the recurrence of every period of distress and the approach of every period of famine intensified in a deep degree. If Ireland was to be dragooned and coerced, let her, at least, be dragooned and coerced honestly, and then they could understand—and England and Europe would be able to understand—that there was a system of war being carried on on behalf of so-called landlord rights against the just rights of the Irish peasantry.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. O'CONNOR POWER objected to the attempt which had been made to raise objection to the opposition to the proposal on the ground that the personal character of the Constabulary was impugned. No objection of the kind had been raised; and, as far as he knew, the only reason which had been stated as against the Vote was that the Constabulary were, to all intents and purposes, a military force, used on many occasions for the purpose of terrorizing over the Irish people. There was a vast distinction between the character of the individual policeman, who went simply to a given place in order to fulfil the orders which had been sent to him, and the character of the official by whom he was so sent. It frequently happened complaints were made in the House of outrages committed by the police in Ireland, and outrages had often been committed. Cases had occurred in which the police had used their rifles and their bayonets when public tranquillity would have been served by the exercise of a little self-restraint; but they were unable to lay their hands upon the real offenders, and this ought not to be the case. There had been throughout all these various proceedings too much encouragement given by the Executive in Ireland, and under every Chief Secretary whom he had known, to the movements of the police at times, and under circumstances, when it would have been far better for the public peace if the Constabulary had remained at home. The hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had very properly drawn attention to the odious work which the police were called upon to discharge in connection with evictions. Of course, so long as the law of the land empowered landlords to drive the people from their homes by charging exorbitant rents, the officers of the law must, in some form or other, be called upon to do their work. But surely it was not necessary to go with loaded revolvers and drawn swords in order to evict some tenant farmer from his humble cottage home. The effect of all this was that the people were excited by an attempt at dictation and intimidation on the part of the police, and a more serious effect on the population—a hatred of the law and of everybody engaged in its administration. Patriotism, then, actually became a contest with the law of constituted authority. This point had been, over and over again, pooh-poohed by the Irish Executive; but it might be relied upon that until reforms were effected the effectiveness of the police and the security of the public at large were in peril.

MR. SULLIVAN held that a vast expenditure of money was incurred in maintaining the Constabulary as a semi-military force—one which, with the addition of a few pieces of Artillery and Gatling guns, would be able to take its place in the field, alongside the Regular Army of the country. What the Irish Members wanted was that economy should be practised in Ireland; and that while an efficient police force should be maintained the country should not be called upon to maintain what was, practically, a branch of the Imperial Army.

MR. GRAY said, he had no doubt whatever that the Irish Constabulary was a force which possessed far too much of an exclusively military character. Its chief officers were almost invariably selected from the Army, and its members were drilled in large numbers at the dépôt in the Phoenix Park. This caused a large and unnecessary expense to be kept up from year to year. The men were not only drilled in the Park, but they were trained to throw up entrenchments, and to go through other purely military work. Surely Ireland was now sufficiently peaceful to endeavour by degrees to make the force less military than at present.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that no one would rejoice more heartily than he should to place a walking-stick in the hands of each member of the Irish Constabulary, if that would suffice for the protection of life and property; and he hoped the Irish Members would co-operate with the Government in endeavouring to bring about such a happy condition of affairs. But they had not yet attained so desirable a state of things; and, in the meanwhile, they could not reduce the means which now existed for enabling the Constabulary to preserve order.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, they had heard several times in the course of the debate that the police must be armed, because there were mobs going about Ireland with firearms. Now, he was sure that in many parts of Ireland—and particularly in the West—there were hardly any arms at all; but if a policeman's promotion depended on the reports he made to the authorities, they would not want statements of the formidable weapons to be found everywhere in the country. The fact was, this was simply the effect of that centralized government which was being imposed on the people. It was known that there was no part of Europe where a man, woman, or child, could travel with greater safety than in Ireland. Nobody thought it necessary to go armed in Ireland. Yet it was a prominent fact—and one which struck foreigners particularly—that in such a country there was to be seen at every station two or three policemen armed with bayonets peering into the carriages, as though they were looking for some assassin or revolutionist who was about to raise the country around in insurrection or blow up the neighbourhood. This was a state of things which was absurd, and which could not exist if the Irish people had the management of their own affairs. At present, the police were trained to the use of firearms and bayonets. He spoke with the greatest confidence in the truth of what he said, when he affirmed that if the people who governed Ireland could only take the bold step of disarming their police, and put into their hands the baton used by the police of London, they would at once produce a material effect on the minds of the Irish people, and gradually get rid of the military force which they felt it necessary to preserve in the country now. Then he believed the Irish police force was maintained in its present condition because it was thought that the Government could make a draft on them in time of war. It was really a military force kept up without the consent of Parliament, and it was well known that there was an intention to send out a contingent of them to the Crimea. The whole system was absurd on the face of it; and it would not be got rid of until the Irish Government really understood the Irish problem, which they would not do so long as they took their information from those who understood nothing of the people. The right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken was not easily alarmed; yet he would arrive at that conclusion, if he went to Dublin Castle and allowed himself to be influenced by the reports, beginning with the familiar "we have information," &c. When a Judge tried a case at the Assizes, he said—"I am sorry to say it is reported to me by the Constabulary that there is a great deal of undetected crime," and so on. He thought this was a legitimate opportunity of raising the question; and, unless they had some distinct assurance from the Government for the future, he hoped they would succeed in preventing the passing of the Estimates next year.

MR. O'DONNELL would certainly take a Division, though he regretted he was obliged to divide on the whole Vote, instead of on one item. He hoped they would not be charged with obstruction, for this was a definite objection against the unnecessarily martial character of the Irish police. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, feeling that he had no case, had dismissed the subject with a couple of jestive and sportive remarks, saying that there must be a police force. If it was necessary to coerce the people, let the Government call in their horse and foot Dragoons, in order that the real problem before the country might be thoroughly understood. But, as it was, the people of England did not know that, by means of the Constabulary, the English Government was continually dragging Ireland.

MR. BIGGAR believed the right hon. Gentleman was thoroughly misinformed in talking about armed bands. There might be religious processions, and such a thing, perhaps, as a little stone-throwing; but there was nothing else of the sort.

MAJOR O'GORMAN cordially agreed in the observations of his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry). It was perfectly true that the police in Ireland were unnecessarily armed. The excuse for arming them was the stories continually told by the Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, Protestant Archbishops, and others—especially the two last—to the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary for Ireland. These people were invariably Englishmen, who knew nothing whatever of the people of Ireland, and could not even pronounce the word "Geoghegan." The Irish officials were, in fact, led by the nose by these men who came to talk to them, simply because they had handles to their names. They had had, however, one Lord Lieutenant who was an Englishman; but he was an enlightened Englishman. He never got up till 4 or 5 o'clock in the day. One day the Archbishop of Dublin rushed into his room, exclaiming—"Oh, my Lord! my Lord! the country is up! The country is up!" "Well," said the Lord Lieutenant, "what time is it?" "Four o'clock, my Lord," said the Archbishop. "Well," said his Lordship, "it is time for everyone to be up now;" and he got up. He did not believe the Archbishop. He did not send down the coercive force which the Archbishop demanded. This reminded him of an occurrence in South Africa. He remembered, when he was there, that a clergyman belonging to the people sent out to convert the Natives—[An hon. MEMBER: A missionary.]—Yes, that was it—a missionary—sent out to convert the people, who had a very decent religion of their own, if they were allowed to keep it. These people came to South Africa for no other purpose, to his own certain knowledge, than that of plunder. One of them rode into the camp where he was, one day, and said to his colonel—"I want a commando." "What," said his colonel, "is a commando?" The missionary replied that it was a force of armed men. "For what purpose do you want it?" asked his colonel. "For the purpose of punishing a chief," he replied. "For what reason?" asked his colonel. "There is a flag of truce now flying." "Oh," said the missionary, "a chief has stolen my horse." "Indeed," replied the colonel. "Well, I shall not give you a commando, but I shall make inquiries." He did make full inquiries, and he found that the missionary had stolen the chief's horse, and that the chief was only getting back what was his own. That was precisely the case in Ireland. These people from England were sent over entirely ignorant, utterly unacquainted with the circumstances of the country. They left a country which was guarded by, perhaps, one policeman in a whole town, and they arrived in a country which was more quiet than this, with less violence and much less crime. But the moment they arrived in Dublin they received information of all these things from these people whom he had described as Dukes, Marquesses, and Earls, who had been from all time the enemies of the people of Ireland.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. GRAY, in moving the reduction of the Vote by £500, said, earlier in the evening attention had been drawn to the Petition in which certain inhabitants of Dublin called attention to the employment of an extra number of police at the Skerries. There was a dispute between the lord of the manor and certain of the inhabitants with reference to the right to the fore-shore, and the inhabitants—acting within their rights—demolished a wall which the landlord had built. Then, instead of taking his legal remedy, a number of police were employed to guard the spot. Since then, it had been decided that the inhabitants were entitled to this property, and that the landlord had acted illegally; and he wished to know who was to pay for the employment of these police? He submitted that the public, in this case, should not be called upon to pay a heavy police tax, nor should the Imperial Exchequer be burdened. In another case, where the employés of a railway refused to work, a large force of the Constabulary were posted along the line to guard it, and to preserve the peace. But they also acted as signal men. In that case, where the need for the preservation of public peace was much greater, the Railway Company were compelled to pay for the use of these forces. If that was the case, then he certainly thought that the landlord should pay for the police he used in this case. He had no desire to unnecessarily occupy the time of the Committee; but, unless the Government would give some assurance that neither the public funds nor the locality would be taxed to pay the cost of these police, he should certainly take the opinion of the Committee upon the question.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. GRAY asked, if the Amendment he had proposed would interfere with a subsequent Vote; and whether, if a reduction by a larger sum were proposed, he would be prevented moving his Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that in the event of the Amendments being proposed at the same time, it was the duty of the Chair to put first the Amendment which proposed the largest reduction, and subsequently, and in order, the other Amendments proposed, in the event of the first not being accepted by the Committee.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that, as far as he could recollect the case, it was this. A question of law was raised by certain persons, and when the decision was given they set themselves against it, and asserted their claim by force. But the hon. Member asked what right the Constabulary had to interfere? Well, if any persons were to pull the hon. Member's house down on the strength of some party laying claim to it, he thought the Constabulary would interfere. A sufficient force of police was sent, for it would have been of no use to send one or two men, and a resident magistrate went to see that the public peace was preserved. The people proceeded to pull down a wall, and so long as a Court of Law had pronounced a decision in support of the right to erect it, it was a breach of order to run off—

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he wished to set the right hon. Gentleman right on some matters of fact. It was not correct that there had been a decision according to law, giving the plaintiff in the case alluded to by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray) a right to the fore-shore. There had been a verdict, but it was set aside; and, so far as the ultimate decision of the superior Court went, he was informed, by a Petition presented that evening, that it was against the right of the plaintiff to the fore-shore claimed. Proceedings had taken place before the local magistrates; but they declined to entertain them, on the ground that they raised a substantial question of title with which they had no right to deal. The plaintiff completed the wall, and police were sent down to sustain it, while a resident magistrate was also sent to keep the people in order. The people asked leave to exercise their rights, without prejudice to the rights of the plaintiff, pending litigation, and some of them were taken, handcuffed, and marched off to prison. That was different from a man being protected in his right to build on a site to which his right was established. This was only an alleged right, which was not sustained in Courts of Law.

MR. J. LOWTHER: If the parties accepted the decision of the superior Courts—

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that was what they did do, and the decision of the resident magistrate was quashed.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he thought the authorities were justified in preventing the battle on the fore-shore being fought out by physical force. The legal tribunals of the country were open to everyone, and the proper course for any persons to adopt who wished to establish any private or public rights or claims of any kind was to apply to those tribunals and to abide by the result, not to go to the place under dispute and to assert their real or imaginary rights by violent and illegal measures endangering the public peace.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked, if the County of Dublin or the Imperial Revenue was to pay this charge?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The Imperial Revenue.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, that the question before the Committee being as to whether a certain sum of money should be voted to maintain the Constabulary in Ireland, hon. Members appeared to him to be playing with the House in discussing the building and knocking down of walls in Dublin, and in disputing whether they belonged to the county or the town. It was not very creditable to Irish Members to talk in this way, and something would have to be done to preserve Order in the House. Years ago, all the distinguished men in the City of Dublin asked the State to pay for the Dublin police, because they could not pay for them themselves.

MR. CALLAN rose to Order. The Vote referred to the Constabulary force for Ireland. The hon. Member was referring to the Metropolitan Police force.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk) appeared to be referring to a Vote other than that before the Committee, and which related to the Dublin Metropolitan Police.

SIR ANDREW LUSK regretted that he had strayed a little from the point in his last remarks. It was very noticeable that Irish Members could go on speaking about everything but the Constabulary Vote before the Committee, while he was called to Order for inadvertently saying one word upon another Vote. He trusted hon. Members would allow the Committee to get on with Business, for the course then being followed was simply trifling with the House of Commons.

MR. GRAY said, if the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury did not understand the question raised by hon. Members upon this Vote, he protested against his describing it as wasting the time of the House. The expression might not be Parliamentary, and he would therefore not apply it to the harangue of the hon. Baronet, who, if there had been any waste of time at all, was the real cause of it. The hon. Baronet had told the Committee, 20 times over, that the Vote was for Constabulary; and if he could not see that the question now raised by him (Mr. Gray) was properly raised on that Vote, all he could say was that he pitied the constituents which the hon. Baronet represented. The hon. Baronet charged him with playing with the House, when on this very question an influential and numerous signed Petition had been presented; and when he (Mr. Gray) was discussing it, in obedience to many letters which he had received from Dublin, the hon. Baronet was certainly presuming on his representative character, and it would be better for him to confine himself to representing his constituency in Finsbury.

MAJOR NOLAN said, the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury had introduced a very delicate question into the discussion upon this Vote. The hon. Baronet was a valuable Member of the House, especially on questions of economy; but he could not help thinking that upon this occasion his love of economy had rather outrun the equity of the case as between Great Britain and Ireland. He (Major Nolan) feared, from the answer given by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that he had not well stated the case to which he had directed attention. In Connemara there was an extra tax levied in certain districts on account of disturbances, the existence of which was acknowledged to a certain extent, but which had been very much exaggerated. But these disturbances had no connection with agrarian disturbance; and he asked the Government to distinctly state that they levied heavy taxes on certain districts as a punishment for offences which were not agrarian. Did the law allow this, and were the Government willing to take the responsibility? His own opinion was that the ordinary forces ought to be sufficient to maintain order, when there was not any question of agrarian disturbance. He wanted to know why an extra rate of 9½d. in the pound had been imposed in the parish of Ballyhoon, when only a few windows were broken? His next question related to the exemption from this extra tax of certain persons by some authority other than that of the Grand Jury; and in this case he wanted to know whether these exemptions were legal? To these three questions he desired to receive from the Attorney General for Ireland specific answers.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) thought the hon. and gallant Gentleman could not have been in the House when he gave his former answer. He had to say, in reply to the questions, that the imposing an extra tax on a district was a matter for the Executive. He was not aware of the special circumstances that had been mentioned; but no doubt the Chief Secretary would answer any question that was put to him. He did not think that the power was confined in the Act to cases of agrarian disturbance. As to the case of Skerries, there was one decision which had been omitted, and that was a decision on more than one occasion by Mr. Sullivan, the Irish Master of the Rolls, that when there was a determination on the part of a number of people to assert a right without regard to the law, he thought it was the duty of the authorities to see that there was a sufficient body of police present to preserve the peace.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the Attorney General for Ireland had told the Committee what was the law with regard to a proclaimed district; but the district in question was not a proclaimed district. It was the custom—but he doubted whether by law—that the Government could send police into a district, and then charge them upon the inhabitants. But was it possible that any Government could have the power of raising this tax upon a district, and of saying that particular individuals should be exempted? The Government had not only located a few policemen in a small district for a limited period, and charged 9½d. in the pound on the assessment of the inhabitants there, but had made communications to three or four Protestant gentlemen living in the neighbourhood to the effect that they were to be exempt from the tax. He believed these proceedings to be totally illegal; and he would appeal to the Committee not to pass the Vote until they had a distinct assurance from the Law Officers of the Crown and the Chief Secretary for Ireland that it was not illegal. He ventured to suggest that the Attorney General for Ireland, who was not quite sure on this point, should look into the Acts of Parliament, with the object of seeing whether the view taken by his right hon. Colleague was correct.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he was perfectly convinced that no change had been made at present which was not in absolute accordance with law. The Act of Parliament gave power to make exemptions.

MR. SULLIVAN: Which Act?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The Peace Preservation Act, and many other Acts.

MR. SULLIVAN doubted whether the right hon. Gentleman could be serious in saying that this district was under the Peace Preservation Act. He denounced, as un-Constitutional, the action of the Government in exempting certain dwellers in the district from the payment of the tax. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the Peace Preservation Act, but that did not apply to the case at all; and then he spoke of the law of the land, which was a very wide phrase. He challenged the statements of the right hon. Gentleman as to the authority for what had been done. The Under Secretary, or the servant of the Under Secretary, might exempt anyone he chose—a friend from whom he had some shooting, or a lady at whose house he visited. The English people might think it useful to lay on an Irish county or barony a punishment tax when it was disturbed with crime, and tell us it was nothing else than a fine old Anglo-Saxon law, which it was not, but one introduced by a Danish King long ago to punish the inhabitants of this country who killed his followers. English gentlemen would find, from the present debate, an illustration of the approved way in which Ireland was governed. The hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk) had complained of the time of the House being wasted; but it should be remembered that in voting this money they were dealing with the whole system of government in Ireland. The Irish people complained, through their Representatives, of this system, and said that the levying of this vengeance, or punishment, tax upon districts in Ireland was only intended to meet an exceptional state of things—that was to say, the result of outrage presumed to rest upon a system of agrarian conspiracy. But it was illegal to exempt favoured individuals or their tenants from the operation of the tax. He remembered that in 1875 the boundaries of a particular district were extended in the most capricious way, in order that political vengeance might be taken upon the family of George Henry Moore; and he challenged the right hon. Gentleman to name the particular Act of Parliament under which the proceedings complained of were authorized.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, a good deal of energy had been spent unnecessarily on the matter. Assuming that the contention of the hon. and learned Gentleman was correct, that the exemption was contrary to law, it was scarcely necessary for him (Mr. Lowther) to give an assurance to the Committee that it would not be carried out, and that no course would be followed which was in any shape or form contrary to law. He, however, ventured to assert that it was strictly legal, and that those hon. Members who stated contrary opinions were labouring under a total misapprehension. The hon. and learned Gentleman had asked him for the Acts of Parliament which authorized what had been done. Their name was Legion. There were the Constabulary Acts, the Peace Preservation Acts, and also the general law of the land, under which the Irish Executive had to act; but to read every section of these Acts bearing on the case, although edifying to hon. Members, would, no doubt, be trifling with the time of the Committee.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the right hon. Gentleman had enumerated the Constabulary Acts and others. Why did he not include amongst them the Vaccination Act? The power of levying the police tax was, he thought, acquired under the Peace Preservation Act; but, then, the Attorney General for Ireland had admitted that a district must be proclaimed before it could be levied therein, and the county or district in question had not been proclaimed, because there had been no agrarian outrage there. He also challenged the right hon. Gentleman to show the authority which the Government had for levying this tax, and for exempting certain persons from its operation; and, unless he could do that, he thought the matter ought not to be considered at an end. It was not sufficient to say that nothing illegal should be done. He and his hon. Friends had shown that something illegal had been done. It was certainly illegal if these Acts had been done under the Peace Preservation Act, because the county had not been proclaimed. If the right hon. Gentleman would assure the Committee that the tax should not be levied until he had ascertained whether the facts were as he had stated, and that if the acts done or contemplated were not according to law he would make reparation, he thought the matter might be allowed to drop.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) begged to inform the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) that the fact was, as he found on looking at the last Return presented to the House, that the County of Galway was proclaimed. [Mr. SULLIVAN asked the date of the Proclamation?] The date was the 25th of February, 1866. No doubt, the Proclamation might have been qualified since then. He was only dealing with the statement before him. The Notice was dated the 25th of February, 1879, and it was not probable that there was anything later. Assuming that the principal reason for this discussion arose on the question of exemptions, if he found that exemptions were not thoroughly in accordance with the Act of Parliament, he should be prepared to advise his right hon. Friend accordingly.

MAJOR NOLAN said, it was very impolitic to apply these taxes otherwise than in cases of agrarian disturbances, and the case in question was clearly not of that character. The question of exemptions could not be too much dwelt upon. The district was one very difficult to get at; and, in consequence of that, it required great watching on the part of the Government. He believed it to be the district in which, of all others in Ireland, injustice might be done from any carelessness of supervision on the part of the authorities, and it was, therefore, most necessary that attention should be directed to it. He had given the names of four or five proprietors who had been exempted; and not only were proprietors, but their tenants, exempted from the tax by the influence with the Government which the proprietors laid claim to. The Government, he thought, should have been prepared to give the Committee full and specific details of everything done in the district, and ought to have been able to deal with this matter at once, after the Question put by him a few days ago, instead of displaying complete ignorance upon the subject, and relying upon others for information.

MR. SULLIVAN felt confident that inquiry would be made as to the Peace Preservation Acts being applicable to the present case. But the point was the power, policy, or justice of the Government exempting individuals in a proclaimed district from the tax. Did Parliament ever believe, when it gave power to exempt certain districts, that such returns would be presented as

“District of Mrs. W——; District of Mr. ——?” The idea was absurd. A remark in a letter which he held in his hand illustrated the way in which the matter was worked by the Government officials, it ran thus—

“I am just informed that the small patch of property purchased by Mr. Jones has been also left out.”

That showed the way the cat jumped.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, after the explanation of the Government, recommended his hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER wished to say, before the Amendment was withdrawn, that a great many of the mistakes that had occurred in Irish legislation arose from the readiness of English gentlemen sent over to Ireland occasionally to take charge of that country to rely too much upon the information sent in to the authorities. They generally lifted up their hands with horror, and cried for police protection at the slightest rumour, and the police being sent out into a district generally produced discontent. It was now suggested that the Motion should be withdrawn, because of the explanation that had been given; but the House had so often listened to those statements from the Treasury Bench that he thought they might be excused if they showed any want of confidence in them. So far as he was concerned, he would endeavour, so far as the Forms of the House would permit him, on every Motion to impress upon the Chief Secretary, and everybody connected with Ireland, the necessity of watching these police forces very carefully, and of allowing no excuse whatever to be urged as a reason for allowing the perpetration of illegal acts.

MR. GRAY said, as the Chief Secretary had promised that these costs should be charged on the Imperial Exchequer, and not on the district, he certainly should not divide. At the same time, another and a more important question had now been raised—that of raising special rates in a district, and of creating one little district in the centre which was to be exempted. He trusted the Irish County Members would bring this subject forward, and divide on it. They had now the fact brought up that the County of Galway had been proclaimed 14 years ago. Everybody had forgotten about it; but it was allowed to lie in abeyance. It was not known even to the Attorney General for Ireland, or to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, until they went to a Return and discovered it. Such taxes as these would create a rebellion if they were attempted to be levied in England; and he hoped, therefore, that some explanation would be speedily given of this special exemption of certain persons from the operation of the taxes. If the electors would understand how these taxes were levied in Ireland, they would know how it was that the Irish people were discontented, while the English people were contented. He begged to withdraw his Amendment.

Original Question again proposed.

MAJOR NOLAN did not think they had had at all a satisfactory explanation from the Chief Secretary, and that, therefore, he was justified in moving a reduction of the whole Vote. He contended that where there were no cases of agrarianism the expense of extra police ought not to be borne by a particular district, and ought to be charged on the Imperial Exchequer. The Government ought to be content with punishing the people in the ordinary way, and ought not to put on these special taxes. This was a very poor district, and the taxes would be levied almost exclusively on the tenants, who were certainly not extremely well off. Not only was the tax objected to, but they had had no satisfactory answer from the Government, and he certainly thought he was justified in moving to reduce this Vote by £500. The first reason was, that he did not think that this Act was intended to apply to cases of this kind; and, secondly, because he thought it most unfair that one parish should be taxed higher than another, and that certain individuals should be exempted. If there were disturbances, he did not much object to sending police into the district; but he knew that in this particular district the Government encountered very trifling difficulties, and that, as a general rule, there was very little difficulty in maintaining law and order. Although it was a very rocky and indented coast, and there might be trouble with smugglers, there was no difficulty in the collection of the Revenue, and the prevention of smuggling. If, therefore, occasionally—once in 10 or 15 years—they were put to a little extra trouble, therefore he thought they might charge the extra cost on the Imperial Exchequer, and not on two poor parishes. As a rule, they maintained very few police, as the first time they were called upon to go to some pains they had immediately charged the district. It seemed to him there was very great favouritism at work; and as this district, from the bad laws, was very poorly represented, and as, further, he had the honour of sitting for the county, he thought he must stand up for them, and press this to a Division. He moved the reduction of the Vote by £400.

Mr. Sullivan

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £821,792, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Constabulary Force in Ireland."—(Major Nolan.)

MR. SULLIVAN hoped the Government would extend the satisfactory promise they had already given in regard to the Skerries case. If the Chief Secretary would look into this matter, and give it his personal and individual attention, and ascertain how it was that certain persons were thus unfairly exempted, he thought they need not divide.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he certainly would attend to the matter; and, of course, if he found that the complaints of the hon. and gallant Member were justified, he would attend to them.

MR. BIGGAR complained that the law was not carried out in the spirit as well as in the letter. It was exceedingly unfair that the Government should have power to make a district—not larger than that Table—and to exempt it from the operation of a general tax. He thought particular individuals had been very unfairly treated, and that substantial justice should be done.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 27; Noes 162: Majority 135.—(Div. List, No. 189.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. CALLAN moved to reduce the Vote by £25,350, complaining that the extra charge for the extra police force was levied on the county cess; and as the county cess was levied exclusively on the occupiers and tenants in the county the expenditure fell on one class. He objected to this on principle, and, therefore, he moved to reduce the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. BIGGAR supported the Motion, and declared the principle on which the expenses were paid for extra police was ridiculous. He hoped, unless some promise was given that an attempt would be made to remedy the grievance, his hon. Friend would divide the Committee.

MR. GRAY said, that what was complained of was that the nominal force was not kept up to the number for which taxes were levied. For instance, a county was assessed for 100 men, but only 80 were sent. On coming to examine the Estimates, it was found that there was a reduction of 230 men as compared with last year. The Attorney General for Ireland had explained to them that the quota for each district was fixed once in five years, and that it had been fixed two and a-half years ago; therefore, they found, although £25,000 were now levied on the districts in aid of the Imperial Exchequer, according to the present Estimates, the number of men had been reduced by 250. If that reduction were allowed for, there would be a reduction of £23,000, or more. They had been told that this system was indefensible, and that the Government would re-consider it, with a view to re-adjustment; but when they came to look into the Estimates they found, though the number of men was reduced, there was no reduction in the Vote—that, on the contrary, the Government asked for a larger sum. That was not a satisfactory state of things. It was acknowledged, at the end of four years, that the system was indefensible; and now they were asked to pass Estimates which would render the system worse than it was before. They reduced the number of men by 230, while the quota for each district would remain unchanged. He thought they must divide against so extraordinary a state of things.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he had endeavoured, early in the evening, to reply to statements very much the same as those made by the hon. Member. He stated then that it was his opinion that the numbers ought to be made up. It must be borne in mind that the cost of the maintenance of the force fell upon Imperial sources of taxation, and not in any way upon local rates. The allocation of men to each county was a matter of administrative detail, and it was wholly immaterial to the case. He really hoped hon. Gentlemen would not divide the Committee on the question at that hour. He would look into the matter.

MR. GRAY said, it was a matter of very great importance, and he should like it put straight. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland said the quota was arranged once in every five years, and that it had been arranged two and a-half years ago; therefore, that it was not about to be changed at present. Now, however, he found the number of men reduced by 230; and he said they could not bring them up in the face of these Estimates. The right hon. Gentleman must know that it was not in his (Mr. Gray's) power to propose an increase in a Vote; but the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary could.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON thought the objection of the hon. Member was that each county should have its proper number of men, and that the county should not be subject to additional charge for the extra men brought into it. The Chief Secretary had admitted the force of the objection; and he was prepared to look into the question, and set it right. The question of the quota being arranged in five years had nothing to do with the point. The Chief Secretary might, if necessary, bring in a Supplementary Estimate; but it would not be proper that the right hon. Gentleman, at that moment, should enter into any undertaking. If he saw that it was right to increase the cost, he would, naturally, come to the House for a Supplementary Estimate for the additional pay of these additional constables.

MR. GRAY hoped the hon. Member for Dundalk would not divide the Committee after the statement of the Chief Secretary, supplemented by the statement of the Financial Secretary, who had promised that, if necessary, a Supplementary Vote would be introduced.

MR. CALLAN said, in consequence of the statements which had been made, he should not proceed. He did not use the word in an offensive sense; but his impression was that this was a Treasury fraud on the ratepayers. He would withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. O'DONNELL wished to draw the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to the strange manner in which the Constabulary proceeded to perform their duties in connection with displays and recent outrages in Derry. He asked a Question before in the House on the subject; and, through no fault of the right hon. Gentleman, he presumed, he received a most unsatisfactory answer. He would now ask the attention of the Committee for a few minutes while he referred to the facts. The facts were of a most unpleasant nature, and cast a most disagreeable light on the justice, and on the method of detecting crime, in Ireland under certain circumstances. He was afraid he could only bring the matter forward when the Constabulary Vote was under discussion. Here, in a few words, were the outlines of the case. When, on the 17th or 18th of March, 1878, a procession, almost exclusively composed of Catholics, was going round the walls of Derry, celebrating the national anniversary, some miscreants opposed to this procession had recourse to the diabolical device of placing an infernal machine close to the route of the procession—in the grave-yard by which the procession had to pass—and only for the fact that the infernal machine was discovered the most terrible consequences might have resulted. [The hon. Member then related the circumstances attending a similar outrage in 1879; but the details did not reach the Gallery.] He confessed, looking at the events of 1878 and 1879, he did not know the feelings with which Catholics looked forward in that part of Ireland to the 17th of March, 1880. For the discovery of the perpetrators of the horrible outrages in Derry, which might have scattered death broadcast, the paltry reward of £50 was offered. No special plea would persuade the Committee that the offer of a reward of £50 was commensurate with the gravity of the offence. This infernal machine might, as he had said, have scattered death in its most horrible forms in the ranks of peaceable citizens. Just imagine an infernal machine thrown into a soirée in an English town, and fancy this being done for two succeeding years! Would the English local authorities act in the same way as the authorities acted in the case of the Derry outrages? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had already called attention to the case in County Armagh. The conviction was forced upon them that the police and the Government authorities did not show the same zeal in the prosecution of crime or in its detection when committed against Catholics that they showed when it was committed against Protestants. He did not join the vulgar cry against Orange celebrations. He believed that Orangemen had a perfect right to those celebrations. Indeed, there were many points in them which he considered most laudable. As far as they recalled the facts of the great Constitutional struggle of 1688 he was with them; and he should always be happy to join his Orange fellow-countrymen in celebrating the expulsion of James II., and the placing of William III. upon the Throne of these Islands. But, apart from this aspect of these celebrations, there was a murderous sectarian element which—he did not care whether it emanated from Catholic or Protestant—ought to be suppressed with the whole force of the law. The throwing of infernal machines into peaceable assemblies, among innocent women and children, was a proceeding which ought to be rigorously and strenuously followed up by the law, no matter whether Catholics or Protestants were the subjects of such an outrage. In Derry there was a feeling very nearly akin to terrorism. It was perfectly notorious that in Derry there were complaints, year after year, of murderous outrages, and that the people who were subjected to them walked about the place undetected, and without any serious concern on the part of the authorities, while the miserable rewards of £50 which were offered did not show that the police authorities were at all alive to the enormity of such outrages.

He felt, even at that late hour, that he was justified in asking for some assurance from the Representatives of the Irish Government that some measures should be taken to find out who were the murderous assassins in Derry. He had received private letters, while others had been published in such papers as The Freeman's Journal, expressing the belief that if only the police authorities chose to exert themselves they could lay their hands on those from whom these murderous outrages had proceeded. But to inquire into these matters might, perhaps, involve more exposure than was agreeable. These were the considerations which bound the hands of a conscientious Executive. The Catholics of the North of Ireland would not—could not—be persuaded that the detective agencies of the law were being used with impartiality and fairness so long as outrages like those in Armagh, which resulted in the assassination of poor Carberry and the stabbing of the little boy who refused to curse the Pope, went unpunished. He was informed that the suspicions as to who were the authors of these outrages were very definite; but, of course, so long as there was no reward greater than the trifling sum of £50 offered, so long would the detection of these horrible criminals remain a dead letter. Not only the Catholics of Derry, but the Catholics all over Ireland, would feel that they were not fairly treated, so long as these criminals were allowed to walk about without anything like concern on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. GRAY said, this matter was one of very considerable importance; and he did not think, even at this advanced period of the Session, the Irish Members would have been doing their duty had they not called their attention to it. The real and serious portion of this question was, that the perpetrators of this terrible outrage would, undoubtedly, have been discovered, if only proper exertions had been made. The person who was suspected had been mentioned to him by name, and he had letters showing that he was well known in the locality where the offence was committed. Had such an outrage occurred in England, the Government would certainly not have been content with what had been done in this case. A similar outrage was perpetrated two or three years since, and it spoke tails of this question, which would involve a certain amount of calculation as to the connection between their infirmary and their prison duties; but he thought anyone who considered the question fairly would see that the proposal made was perfectly extraordinary. The salaries were fixed at an altogether different figure to what they were at before. The duties originally were of an exceedingly light and unimportant character. He was quite sure it was to the advantage of the Public Service, as well as to the gaols, that these should be performed in a more complete and efficient manner. The duty of the prison surgeon under the old system did not exceed a single visit a-day; but now his time was almost entirely occupied, and for this he was offered only from £60 to £80 a-year—even in first-class counties an offer had been made of not more than £60. Under these circumstances, he ventured to say that he could not help hoping that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be able to give the Committee some statement that the matter would be considered by the Government. It would be a most unfortunate thing if this new régime was to be inaugurated by an attempt to re-model the Public Service in a manner which could only produce discontent and dissatisfaction.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(Mr. Errington.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, he thought the statement of a few facts would enable the Committee to arrive at a conclusion on this matter. The Chairman of the Prisons Board had only fairly and reasonably administered an Act of Parliament. The position of the prison doctors before the Act was passed certainly could not be stated very clearly, neither could it be regarded as very satisfactory. They did not get one farthing for the work they did in the prisons. They were, in reality, the infirmary surgeons of the district, and, as such, they were compelled, without fee or reward, to do duty at the neighbouring prison. When, however, the new Prison Act came into operation, what was said was—"We are going now to establish a new system, and we offer you the position of attending the prisons, and we leave you in possession of the salary which you had before as infirmary doctor." Thus they were left with the same salary as infirmary doctors; but they were relieved from the obligation of attending the prisons. So far, then, it might be said it might be said it was a decided gain to the doctors. There was a provision in the Act that the officers of the prisons were to continue to discharge their duties till the 1st of April, 1878; and after that date these doctors, who were also infirmary officers, were permitted to continue the duty in the gaols after the day fixed by the Act of Parliament. The first Circular which was issued, and which had been referred to by his hon. Friend the Member for Longford, dealt only with the legal aspect of these infirmary surgeons. Reference had been made to his view of the case; but his view was only one as to the construction of the law. He thought that as the infirmary doctors had been allowed to continue in office after the day fixed by the Act of Parliament it was reasonable to regard them, technically, as prison officers, and that they should not be subjected to the necessity of a fresh appointment, especially as they had continued to fulfil the duties without complaint. No complaint, that he could see, could be urged against the Prisons Board. The second Circular was then issued; and, so far as the position of these officers was concerned, they were, he ventured to think, even after the statement of his hon. Friend, without any substantial grievance, for they were by it considered to be prison officials, and so that they could not have been subjected to any fresh selection and the consequent risk of rejection. That, however, was a point which he believed had been conceded by the hon. Member for Longford. Then it was stated that the medical officers considered as a grievance the duty which had been put upon them of compounding the medicines. He did not think, however, that that part of the case had been fairly stated. The alternative was given them of doing the work themselves, and of making other arrangements in regard to it; and he could not see that that was not a perfectly reasonable way of dealing with them. What, then, was the position of these gentlemen? To the position of infirmary surgeons they were now given the status of prison officials, with all the rights and privileges which he supposed they valued, of being surgeons to these gaols. In regard, however, to this duty of compounding medicines, the practice was somewhat different in Ireland to that in England and elsewhere, and that the rule had hitherto been that they did not compound their own medicines. He believed, however, that the vast majority of the prison doctors had now agreed to compound their medicines; but in the case of those who did not desire to do so the Commissioners were willing to make an arrangement on a different scale. As to the question of salary, they had been fixed at various sums, ranging from £40 to £150 a-year; and in considering this they must, of course, take the work done and the average of the prisoners in the different gaols. This was only 77 in all; and, of course, in many of them it was much less. Therefore, he thought it was quite reasonable that these should be fixed on a running scale, which could be adjusted according to circumstances. He hoped it would be seen that the Prisons Board had not dealt with this deserving class of public officials in at all a harsh or high-handed way, and that the Board had only dealt justly and fairly between them and the public. He hoped his hon. Friend would not consider it necessary to press his Motion to a Division.

MR. MELDON was of opinion that the Prisons Board had dealt with the medical officers in Ireland in an exceedingly high-handed manner. Taking the very first Circular issued by the Chairman of the Prisons Board, he thought that the animus with which the medical officers were treated was apparent. The Circular was dated the 23rd of April, 1878, and was addressed, not to the medical men, but to the Governors of the gaols, many of whom had risen from the position of warders, and none of whom were in a better social position than the medical men themselves. The Circular said—

“Sir,—I have to request that you will call the special attention of the medical officers of your gaol to the 43rd clause of the Prisons Act, and direct their attention to its requirements.”

That was the Circular which ought to have been addressed to the medical officers themselves, but which was addressed to the Governors of the gaols. The Circular then said—

From that the Committee could judge of the insulting way in which the surgeons of the gaols in Ireland had been treated. By the provisions of the Prisons Act of 1877, there were two classes of surgeons—namely, the surgeons of gaols and the surgeons of county infirmaries. But in case the gaols were within two miles of the county infirmaries, then the surgeons of the infirmaries were obliged to give their services to the gaols. If there were no infirmaries within two miles of the gaols, then he supposed that separate medical officers would be appointed to the gaols, and the duties which the surgeons of county infirmaries would have to discharge would be merely nominal. Formerly, the duties of the prison surgeons were exceedingly small; and he would call particular attention to the change that had been made in that respect. The medical officers, at the present time, were required to inspect every prisoner within 24 hours of his arrival at the gaol; they were also required to inspect every prisoner once a-week, and to examine into all sanitary details connected with the prison. Medical officers were further required to make a periodical inspection of the whole gaol, whether occupied or not; they had also to see whether any prisoner sentenced to punishment was fit to undergo it; and, in addition to these duties, they had recently had thrown upon them duties formerly carried out by the chaplains of the gaols. In point of fact, nearly constant attendance was required now from the surgeons of the gaols. If their duties were to be properly discharged, the medical men ought to do nothing else but attend to the work of the gaol. By a Circular of the 3rd of May, 1879, addressed to the surgeons of the county infirmaries, it was stated that the Lord Lieutenant had directed that all the surgeons should be superseded, and that their positions should become vacant. The Circular went on to say that the present occupants of the offices might submit applications for

tails of this question, which would involve a certain amount of calculation as to the connection between their infirmary and their prison duties; but he thought anyone who considered the question fairly would see that the proposal made was perfectly extraordinary. The salaries were fixed at an altogether different figure to what they were at before. The duties originally were of an exceedingly light and unimportant character. MR. MELDON was of opinion that the Prisons Board had dealt with the medical officers in Ireland in an exceedingly high-handed manner. Taking the very first Circular issued by the Chairman of the Prisons Board, he thought that the animus with which the medical officers were treated was apparent. The Circular was dated the 23rd of April, 1878, and was addressed, not to the medical men, but to the Governors of the gaols, many of whom had risen from the position of warders, and none of whom were in a better social position than the medical men themselves. have been addressed to the medical officers themselves, but which was addressed to the Governors of the gaols. The Circular then said—

From that the Committee could judge of the insulting way in which the surgeons of the gaols in Ireland had been treated. By the provisions of the Prisons Act of 1877, there were two classes of surgeons—namely, the surgeons of gaols and the surgeons of county infirmaries. But in case the gaols were within two miles of the county infirmaries, then the surgeons of the infirmaries were obliged to give their services to the gaols. Medical officers were further required to make a periodical inspection of the whole gaol, whether occupied or not; they had also to see whether any prisoner sentenced to punishment was fit to undergo it; and, in addition to these duties, they had recently had thrown upon them duties formerly carried out by the chaplains of the gaols. In point of fact, nearly constant attendance was required now from the surgeons of the gaols. If their duties were to be properly discharged, the medical men ought to do nothing else but attend to the work of the gaol. By a Circular of the 3rd of May, 1879, addressed to the surgeons of the county infirmaries, it was stated that the Lord Lieutenant had directed that all the surgeons should be superseded, and that their positions should become vacant. The Circular went on to say that the present occupants of the offices might submit applications for cers in Ireland. It was said that if, in the Public Service, they could obtain doctors for low salaries, why should the public not be benefited by that reduction of expense? He did not think that that was a fair principle to go upon in the management of prisons; and he thought that the prisoners were entitled to have the medical attendance of well-qualified and skilful officers, and not of men of the lowest class in their Profession. If the Prisons Board wished to drive away the present holders of the office, and to throw the appointments open to all comers, then he did not think that they would get proper men at such salaries as they now offered. He trusted that the Government would take these circumstances into their consideration, and that it would issue directions to the Prisons Board to prevent the practices complained of.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY remarked, that the present medical officers of gaols in Ireland were not young men; and there could be no doubt that the fees which were paid to them by the Prisons Board were utterly inadequate. With regard to the question as to compelling the surgeons to compound medicines, he understood the case to be that the State must supply the prisons with medicines. It seemed to him that it would be easy to make a contract with an apothecary in the town who would supply the prisons at a much lower rate than was done under the present system. He thought that all the salaries paid in Irish gaols were inadequate. The governors received, most of them, from £100 to £150 a-year; but some were to rise to £300. He trusted that the whole question would be looked into by the Government, and that the salaries paid would be increased.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY wished to bear his testimony to the high character and efficiency of the medical officers of gaols in Ireland. Their duties had recently been much increased; but they were still paid by salaries which were insufficient, even under the former arrangements. He did hope that the Government would take the matter into consideration, and would fix the salaries of these gentlemen upon a basis more fair and just to such deserving members of the Public Service.

MR. MACARTNEY also trusted that the Government would do justice to the medical officers.

Mr. Bruen

MR. ERRINGTON said, that he would be willing to withdraw his Amendment, if an assurance were given by the Government. He thought that the assurance of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland would hardly satisfy the medical officers of the gaols.

MR. GRAY moved that Progress be reported. They had already been discussing the Estimates for eight hours and a-half, and he thought it was now time to adjourn. The Votes upon which they were engaged were of importance to the Irish people, and they ought not to be decided hastily.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Gray.)

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that as regarded the general question of the position of the surgeons of the gaols in Ireland, he might say that he was at that moment in communication with the Prisons Board on the subject. With regard to the proposal to report Progress, it was true that the Committee had been eight or nine hours in Supply; but he must remind hon. Members that they had only passed one single Vote. They were then at a period of the Session when it must be manifest to the Committee that the deliberations of the House would have to be protracted to a much longer period than usual if they made no greater progress than they had already done. He must, therefore, ask the assistance of the Committee in disposing of the work before them; for unless the work was done it would be utterly idle for the Government to attempt to carry on the affairs of the country.

MR. SULLIVAN thought that they had made considerable progress that night. They had already disposed of £1,000,000 on account of the Irish Constabulary. No one who knew anything of Irish affairs could doubt that that Vote covered the whole government of Ireland. It might seem strange to English Gentlemen, unacquainted with the system in Ireland, that a Vote of that kind was so important a matter. But Irish Members had really been discussing practical topics connected with all kinds of subjects affecting the government of Ireland. The Committee had voted £1,000,000 that night, and he hoped that the Government would see that it would be a reasonable thing now to report Progress. Hon. Members who had made no contributions to the debate, and had rendered no assistance to Public Business, except in the Smoke-Room and Tea-Room, might not see the desirability of now reporting Progress. He cast no reproach upon such hon. Members; but he appealed to them to consider those who had been engaged in the work of the Committee.

MR. PLUNKET said, that the case of the prison surgeons was one in which he had taken considerable interest, and he quite agreed with all that had been said as to their position and character. He also agreed, to a great extent, with the claims put forward on their behalf. A great many of their grievances, however, were in a fair way of redress. Tomorrow, a deputation would wait upon the Chief Secretary, in order to discuss those grievances, and the Chief Secretary had told them that he was in communication with the Prisons Board on the subject. If the answer of the Chief Secretary to the complaints of the medical officers was unsatisfactory, then he should be inclined to support his hon. Friend in again urging the claims of this useful body of public servants; if the result was unsatisfactory, he would support not only his hon. Friend, but anyone else who might take up their case. He should not, however, advise his hon. Friend, and those who advocated the case of the prison surgeons, to allow their case to be mixed up with the Motion for reporting Progress that evening. Nothing could more damage the case of the prison surgeons than to allow it to be mixed up in that Motion. They had been eight hours and a-half—he must say, deliberately—wasting the public time. Nothing could be more unfortunate, in the interest of those for whom he was sure his hon. Friend intended to do his best, than in any way to mix up their case in attempt to delay the progress of Public Business. He had not been in the House all the evening, although he had been there a considerable time; but he had only heard the same arguments repeated over and over again, in a manner the only object of which could be to waste public time.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that they had been reproached again that evening by an Irish Member. He would not have paid much attention to English Members; but he must draw attention to the fact that the Government had put forward a University Member, who did not represent the views of Ireland. The Universities did not represent the life of Ireland, nor did they represent Irishmen, or Irish opinion. Yet the Government had put forward to reproach them a Gentleman like the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University.

MR. GRAY said, that the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University had reproached them with obstructing the Business of the House. He remembered that for a considerable period of the evening there was not a single Member sitting on the Benches where the hon. and learned Gentleman now sat. He had had no intention of pressing the Motion to report Progress, if the Chief Secretary for Ireland had not acceded to it; but after the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University he should persevere in the Motion. It now remained for the Members of Her Majesty's Government who had been present during the discussion either to adopt or repudiate the charge which had been made against Irish Members.

MR. VERNER had understood the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University to say that he deprecated the case of the doctors being mixed up with, and prejudiced by, any question of reporting Progress. He would join with his hon. and learned Friend in saying that it would be a very great mistake, and very damaging to the case brought before them, to allow it in any way to be mixed up in the proceedings for delaying the Business of the Committee. The hon. and learned Member had condemned the excessive amount of talk and waste of time throughout the Sitting, and it had been said that these remarks came from a Member who did not represent any section of the Irish people. It could not, however, be said that he (Mr. Verner) did not represent any section; and he begged, as an Irish Member representing an important constituency, to express his concurrence in the observations which had been made, for he had been present during nearly the whole evening, and at one part of it when the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray) himself was not present.

MR. SULLIVAN understood the hon. Member for County Armagh, who had just sat down, to join in the accusation that had been made against them of wasting public time. He might point out to the hon. Member that he was the only Member of the Committee who had been called to Order that evening. Therefore, according to the ruling of the Chair, he was the only Member who had wasted public time. He granted that he had been rivalled by the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk); but they were the only two Members who had taken up public time by wandering from the subject before the Committee. During the evening the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University had not made a single useful contribution to the discussion. Perhaps that was because the constituency he represented took an infinitesimal interest in the subjects under debate. He would point out that hon. Members who had been all the night in the House had taken great interest in the various points raised by the Vote for the Constabulary.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. and learned Member that he would not be in Order, upon a Motion to report Progress, in reverting to the discussion of the preceding Vote.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University had referred to the discussions which had taken place, and he could not see how he could be out of Order if the hon. and learned Member had not been out of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he would point out the distinction between the two cases. If one hon. Member said that, in the course of Business, time had been wasted, that observation did not exceed the limits of discussion; but for another hon. Member to propose to resume the discussion that had been already disposed of by the Committee was out of Order.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that he complained of the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University charging them with delaying the conduct of Public Business, for what they had done had been under the deepest sense of duty to their constituents. In his opinion, every hon. Member from Ireland who had taken part in the discussion had some substantial case behind him in the matter which he had brought forward. It seemed to him that the discussion had been eminently practical, and perfectly germane to the Vote under discussion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought that if they wished to be practical they had better come to some decision as to the course they should take. The time of the Committee had been occupied for a long time that evening, and they had only passed one Vote, while they had, to a considerable extent, discussed a second. If the second Vote required more discussion, he was sure the Committee would be willing to make exertions to continue it and pass it. The Government would not attempt to press for any more Votes if the one before the Committee were passed. He thought, considering the time of the Session, and considering the amount of Business before them, that they should at least pass the second Vote. It would be well not to waste further time in deciding upon what they should do.

MR. CALLAN said, that there had been one satisfactory result of the discussion they had had that evening. The hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) had given Notice of a Motion upon the question of the appointment to the Office of Chief Secretary of raw and inexperienced politicians. He thought that that evening they had received every courtesy and every attention that could be paid them by the right hon. Gentleman who now held the Office of Chief Secretary. His conduct had been a marked contrast to the placeman and eager partizan who formerly occupied the Office of Chief Secretary.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER thought that the Business of the Committee should not be measured by length, and that it was not a fair criterion of what they had done to say that they had only passed one Vote. The Vote they had passed had been of a considerable amount, and was of most vital interest to the people of Ireland. He did not think that a single moment of time had been wasted. If there was to be no further discussion, he trusted that the hon. Member for Tipperary would take a Division upon his Motion.

MR. ERRINGTON wished to say that he did not see any reason why the question which he had raised should be mixed up with that of the adjournment of the Committee. He only wished to obtain an assurance from the Chief Secretary that the claims of the medical officers of the prisons in Ireland should be attended to. A deputation would wait upon the Chief Secretary to-morrow; and he thought it would be in the interests of the medical men themselves that he should ask permission of the Committee to withdraw his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member could not withdraw his Motion, until the Motion to report Progress had been disposed of.

MR. GRAY said, he intended to take a Division upon his Motion, as a most unjustifiable charge had been made by an hon. and learned Member upon the Government side of the House, and the Government, by their silence, had endorsed it.

MR. MELDON, having taken part in the proceedings of the Committee that evening, supposed that he was one of those charged with wasting time. He was not in the habit of wasting time, and he was deeply pained by hearing the observations made by his hon. and learned Friend. He could say that, during the whole of his Parliamentary experience, he had never heard a more interesting discussion than that which had taken place that evening. If he were allowed to refer to the proceedings of the Committee, he thought he could show that no time had been wasted.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the Irish Members who had taken part in the discussion that evening represented the great majority of the people of Ireland. It was not the fault of the Irish Members that their small numbers were voted down; but he would point out that there was one infallible method of shortening the discussion. If the Government were to redress the grievances of the people of Ireland, as they might do, then they would at once be doing an act of justice and facilitating Public Business.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY thought that there had been no intention to protract the discussion that evening; and he did not think that it could be shown that more time had been spent in discussing the Votes than was absolutely necessary. The Vote which they were now discussing was a very important one, and he did not think that it would be possible to get through it that evening. It would be of no use to take Division after Division upon the question of reporting Progress.

MR. BIGGAR remarked, that they had only discussed one grievance upon the Vote now under consideration. When the subject of the prison surgeons had been finished there were several others to be gone into, and he did not see any chance of bringing the matter to an end that evening.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER thought that they had arrived at an hour at which it would be reasonable to report Progress. He, for one, would exert to the utmost all the privileges which he possessed for preventing the discussion of questions of immense importance to Ireland at an hour when they would practically have to be discussed in camera.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 20; Noes 99: Majority 79.—(Div. List, No. 190.)

MR. ERRINGTON begged to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MAJOR O'GORMAN moved that the Chairman do now leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Major O'Gorman.)

MR. O'CONNOR POWER supported very cordially the Motion that the Chairman do now leave the Chair. The longer time the matter was protracted the stronger would be the opposition to it. It was felt by those who had really taken part in Public Business that it was now time when their proceedings should come to an end.

MR. GRAY said, that a charge of a most offensive character had been made against some hon. Members. They now invited Her Majesty's Government to say whether they supported that charge.

MR. PLUNKET said, that his observations were made without the slightest reference to anyone else, and the opinion which he expressed was entirely his own.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University had certainly expressed his views without reference to the Government; but he did not understand his hon. and learned Friend to make any personal charge, but only to express his opinion that their proceedings had been somewhat unduly protracted. He confessed that his own opinion was that if all the Votes were discussed at the same length as they had discussed the first one, it would be quite impossible to get through them all before the end of the Session. They had 60 Votes altogether to get through in the Civil Estimates, in addition to those remaining over from the Army and Navy. He wished, therefore, to put it to the Committee that they should allow the Prisons Vote to be passed, it having been already discussed for over two hours. Several important Irish Votes remained to be discussed, and the time at the disposal of the House might, at that period of the Session, be counted by minutes. The Government would not be justified in holding out to the Committee that they could provide time for the discussion of these Votes unless some progress was made. He trusted that the Committee would dispose of the Vote now under consideration.

MR. MELDON said, that the Prisons Vote was really an important one. He would suggest that one or two Votes of minor importance should be taken, and that the discussion of the Prisons Vote should be postponed.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY agreed with the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Kildare. He was satisfied that there was no foundation for the charge made against Irish Members of wasting time.

MR. CALLAN did not think it became the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University, who had not been in the House a great part of the evening, to lecture Irish Members who had been there and had raised discussions on important subjects.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT really thought that enough had been said with regard to the observations of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dublin University. Whether those observations were judicious or not he was not prepared to say; but some hon. Members were naturally somewhat aggrieved by them. The object of all hon. Members ought to be to get through the Business upon which they were engaged.

He did not profess to understand the prisons of Ireland, although hon. Members below the Gangway might do so. There were a great many other important subjects to be discussed, and it would leave very little time at their disposal if they were, at that period of the Session, to cease work at half-past 2 in the morning. He, therefore, hoped that they would pass another Vote that evening.

MR. SULLIVAN asked, whether they could not go on with the other Orders of the Day, instead of continuing the discussion upon the Estimates? If there was any one part of their proceedings as to which the Government should insure the fullest and freest discussion, it was upon the Votes for public money. Some of the observations which had been made were the more to be regretted, as two right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Treasury Bench—the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the Attorney General for Ireland—had met them in the best temper and spirit, and had been ready to listen attentively to all that had been advanced. During the Session they received from their constituents various communications, in which the necessity was shown for calling the attention of Parliament to various matters. In place of putting down those subjects as Motions, he had hitherto reserved those matters for discussion upon the Estimates. Thus, in discussing the Votes, they had felt that they had been discussing a dozen questions, which otherwise would have occupied a whole evening. He might say that, speaking from his own knowledge and for several of his hon. Friends, the time of Parliament had been greatly economized in that manner.

MR. O'DONNELL thought that the charges which had been made against the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University were really somewhat unfair, for he had only given utterance to the prejudices of his Party, as was evident by the manner in which his sentiments were cheered by his Colleagues. He would not discriminate the hon. and learned Member from his Party, for not only in that House, but outside of it, a Cabinet Minister could not open his mouth without uttering something unfavourable with reference to the Irish Party. Except in that point of view, he did not see any reason for animadverting upon what had been said by the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that the Government felt that, having devoted the whole evening to the discussion of Irish Estimates, some substantial progress ought to be made. If hon. Members thought that any special Votes could not receive attention at that time, there was no desire to force them on. All that the Government desired was to make some substantial progress; and if it was understood that the Committee was to be allowed to make substantial progress, then he would not press for a decision upon the Vote under discussion.

MR. A. MOORE suggested that there were other Votes which had been omitted, and which could be taken.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Motion that he should leave the Chair must be withdrawn before any other Motion could be put.

MR. BIGGAR did not think that the proposition of the hon. Member would meet with the acceptance of the whole Irish Party. He would suggest that they should then report Progress, and should get through the Votes another time.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he would ask the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford (Major O'Gorman) to withdraw his Motion. He cordially agreed with the suggestion that they should make progress with other Votes.

MR. A. MOORE remarked, that the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) seemed to think that he wished some important Votes to be brought on. That was not so.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER thought that it would simplify matters if they understood exactly what was the proposal of the Chief Secretary.

MR. J. LOWTHER suggested that they should take the remaining Votes in Class 3.

MR. CALLAN objected to Vote 36 being taken.

MR. GRAY asked what Votes the Government suggested should be taken?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he proposed to take the remaining Votes in Class 3—namely, Votes 35, 36, 37, 23, 24, 25, 26, 30, 31, 32, and 33.

MR. BIGGAR supposed that these Votes were not very important; but, still, it was necessary for them to look over them and see whether there was anything in them to which they ought to object.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that an important discussion would arise upon the Vote with respect to the Law Charges for Criminal Prosecutions.

MAJOR NOLAN hoped that the Government would be met in a reasonable spirit. He thought that they had made a reasonable compromise with hon. Gentlemen, who thought that the Vote under discussion required further consideration.

MR. SULLIVAN agreed that the Vote for the Law Charges for the Criminal Prosecution of Prisoners would require considerable discussion. He did not think that it should be taken then.

MR. CALLAN objected to Vote 25 being taken, as he considered that it would raise a discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN asked if the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford proposed to withdraw his Motion?

MAJOR O'GORMAN: No, Sir; I certainly do not. I consider it a perfect monstrosity that we should go on with the discussion at this time. We are accused of obstruction; but I heard no charge of obstruction made when the noble Marquess, the head of the Whig Party, got up and wasted, in the most abominable obstruction, a whole day long, finishing up by being defeated by a majority of 106—which he richly deserved. No one found fault with him; but numbers of Members find fault with us Irishmen. We are not obstructing—we are doing the Business of the country by arguing every question that comes before us; but when we are asked to enter into a question at 3 o'clock in the morning, I think it is perfectly monstrous.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that it had been the wish of the Government to go on with the Vote; but there seemed to be a feeling amongst some hon. Members that the Vote under discussion ought to be postponed, and another taken. Then, the Government had offered to defer going on with that Vote, and to take others. A long discussion had now been going on as to the course they should adopt; and he thought that they ought to arrive at some decision. The Government were ready to postpone the Prisons Vote, provided they were allowed to go on with the Votes which had been already alluded to under the head of Class 3. If hon. Members continued the present discussion, they would get to 5 o'clock before doing anything. If the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford would consent to withdraw his Motion, or allow them to divide upon it, he hoped that some Votes might be passed. The Government had already done what it could to meet the wishes of hon. Members by agreeing to postpone the Queen's Colleges and Queen's University Votes, which were intended to be taken. He thought they should be met in the same spirit.

MR. GRAY hoped that the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford would agree to the suggestion which had been made.

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, that as it was the unanimous desire of the Committee he begged to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(2.) £41,906, to complete the sum for Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Ireland.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he might mention that his attention had been drawn to the case of the Milltown School, in Belfast. He had received a Report with reference to the conduct of an Inspector, and the matter was under the consideration of the Government.

MR. CALLAN had understood that the Chief Secretary had no objection to postpone Vote 36. A very important question arose upon it as to the conduct of one of the Inspectors connected with those schools. It was his intention to bring before the notice of the House some very grave charges of partizanship on the part of that person. The Inspector in question was a Liberal, and the correspondence which had been furnished showed that he had refused, for four years, to grant a certificate to Milltown School at Belfast.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he thought the statement he had made would meet the views of the hon. Member. The hon. Member had called his attention to the case of this school in Belfast, and he had told him that he was not at the moment able to make a satisfactory inquiry. He had since considered the matter, and received a Report with regard to the conduct of the school Inspector. If the hon. Member wished to call attention to the Inspector's conduct, he could bring the matter forward.

MR. A. MOORE would press upon his hon. Friend not to press his opposition, since Her Majesty's Government had taken up the matter.

MR. CALLAN said, that, in deference to the manner in which the Chief Secretary had met them in the course of that evening, he begged to withdraw his opposition. He might say that he did it solely and simply to mark his appreciation of the manner in which they had been met by the Chief Secretary.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £4,824, to complete the sum for Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum, agreed to.

(4.) £8,441, to complete the sum for the Land Judge's Offices, Ireland, agreed to.

(5.) £14,444, to complete the sum for the Registry of Deeds (Ireland).

MR. MELDON wished to call attention to a question which arose in connection with this Vote. Owing to the action of the Treasury, the efficiency of this particular public Office in Ireland had been considerably diminished. In 1873 two vacancies occurred in the Registry of Deeds, and the Registrar did everything necessary to fill them up; but the Treasury refused to make the appointments, because they said that some Committee was sitting which might make some change in the arrangements. Those appointments remained unfilled, and the thing went on until there were no less than eight vacancies in the Office. Those positions had been temporarily filled by the Treasury by the appointment of writers, who were unable to do the work, or supply the place, of the trained clerks who had formerly occupied the positions. About the beginning of the year the Treasury filled up two or three appointments; but the persons appointed, after having been in possession of their offices for a little while, had had their appointments cancelled by an order of the Treasury. By those means the efficiency of the Office had been much endangered; and he should like to know whether the Treasury intended to fill up the vacancies that now existed?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, that a Royal Commission was at present considering the whole question with reference to this Office, and he had no doubt whatever that the fact of the delay in filling up the appointments was due to the subject having been under consideration. He might say that the Report of that Royal Commission would be very soon presented, and that some satisfactory arrangement would be made.

MR. MELDON said, that if it were the intention of the Treasury to postpone its decision until the Report of the Royal Commission was received, and then to fill up the appointments, he thought the arrangement would be perfectly satisfactory.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £2,070, to complete the sum for the Registry of Judgments, Ireland, agreed to.

(7.) £56,245, to complete the sum for County Court Officers, &c., Ireland, agreed to.

(8.) £103,017, to complete the sum for the Dublin Metropolitan Police.

MR. GRAY said, that he had received some 50 or 60 letters complaining of the way in which fines were inflicted if convictions were not secured. He wished also to draw attention to the manner in which the Metropolitan police were treated in the matter of pensions. Up to a very recent period, if a member of the Dublin Metropolitan Police Force found himself dying, either by injuries received in the discharge of his duty, or otherwise, he was given great facilities by the authorities to commute his pension into a lump sum. Under ordinary circumstances, he might either make a commutation or receive a lump sum in lieu of pension. Members of the Police Force thus dying had been permitted to commute their pensions from a feeling that an indirect provision was thus made for their wives and families. In every case that occurred in which men were unable to complete the necessary papers, but had verbally agreed to commute their pensions, it was held to be sufficient, and the commutation was granted to their wives and families. But within the last few months technical objections had been raised to defects in the papers, and the commutation had been refused. Many men had thus died under the impression that they were securing for their wives and families some provision; and it was the feeling of the Chief Commissioner that those cases were worthy of consideration. He himself had seen men in articula mortis agree to commute their pensions for the benefit of their widows, and that commutation had been recognized by the authorities. He would ask the Chief Secretary if he would do something by which the injustice inflicted upon members of the force, by taking technical objections to the commutations made in articula mortis, should be remedied?

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that the hon. Member had complained of fines being inflicted upon the Police Force for not obtaining convictions. That was a form of payment by results which he was not prepared to endorse. With regard to the subject of the commutation of pensions, he could give no answer at that time, but would look into it.

MR. MELDON said, that with regard to the infliction of fines, he could inform the right hon. Gentleman that there was great dissatisfaction among the police. The fines that were inflicted were enormous; and he did not think that the members of the force were to blame in the matter. It was only on occasions like the discussion of the Votes that the complaints of the members of the Police Force could be brought forward.

MR. WHITWELL observed, that the Chief Secretary had said he would consider this matter; but, doubtless, the Treasury would have something to say to it. Where a constable commuted his pension it ought to be done before he died.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

BANKRUPTCY LAW AMENDMENT BILL [Lords—[BILL 114.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [16th July], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Debate resumed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER): I wish to make one or two observations with reference to this Bill, and I hope that the House will now allow it to be read a second time. I then propose to move that it be committed pro forma. I think that course will meet with the approval of the House, and I may say that I make the proposal in consequence of the recommendation of the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson). I have only this further remark to make—that the Government will be quite willing, next Session, to introduce into the House a Bill for the consideration of the Law of Bankruptcy—that has been suggested, and the Government are quite willing to do so. I have to move that the Bill be now read a second time.

MR. WHITWELL thought there could be no doubt that the only plan for remedying the present defects of the law was to adopt the course suggested by the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. DILLWYN complained that a Bill of an important character like the present had been left to that period of the Session. He only hoped that Her Majesty's Government would not attempt to force the amended Bill through the House at that late period of the Session, for it seemed to him that it would be very likely to give rise to considerable discussion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed; considered in Committee, and reported; to be printed, as amended [Bill 254]; re-committed for Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter

BRENTFORD AND ISLEWORTH TRAMWAYS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^d."

LORD TRURO moved an Amendment that the Bill be read a third time that day three months. The noble Lord said, that the proposed tramway would begin nowhere and end nowhere, and, in fact, the two ends had no other purpose than to continue the central section. The opponents of the Bill were the inhabitants of the district, and, as far as he knew, no Petition had been presented in its favour. He did not know who the promoters were. In fact, all that was required in starting a project of the kind was an engineer and a solicitor. The South-Western Railway afforded accommodation to the travelling public of the locality. The market gardeners of the district and the waggoners who used the road on which the proposed tramway would be laid down were strong in their opposition to the scheme, and there was not the least prospect of such a passenger traffic on the road as would make the tramway desirable.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months").—(The Lord Truro.)

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, he did not feel justified in opposing the Bill, which had come up from the Commons.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 44; Not-Contents 5: Majority 39.

Resolved in the Affirmative; Bill read 3^a accordingly, with the Amendments; further Amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

METROPOLITAN AND METROPOLITAN DISTRICT RAILWAY COMPANIES BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

The Queen's consent signified; Bill read 3^a, with the Amendments.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD: As a Member of the Select Committee of your Lordships' House to which this Bill was referred, I may be allowed to state that it was after a long inquiry that they arrived at their decision, and they would now prefer to see the Bill passed without amendment. It will, however, be for the House, after hearing the Amendments which are about to be proposed, to take whatever course they may be advised.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES): I may for a moment be permitted to state that since Friday last I have seen the parties; and although there is great objection in general to amending Bills which have passed Select Committees of both Houses of Parliament, there seems to be no reasonable objection to make some alteration in the direction suggested by the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown), who has placed Amendments on the Paper. The noble Earl, in the first place, objected to sub-section 2 of Clause 42, which is as follows:—

"The two companies, or either of them, may hold and let the hereditaments or premises and may grant building and repairing leases of the same for any term they may think fit."

Since placing that Amendment on the Paper, however, the noble Earl has objected to the entire clause. I do not feel myself to be in a position to accede to that Amendment, and what I propose is that the clause shall be retained, omitting from it the words "by virtue of any Act or Acts heretofore passed." The effect of these words is to extend the action of the Bill in certain cases over lands acquired by the two Companies under former Acts as well as under this Bill, so that the omission of the words will have the effect of confining the operation of the clause to lands vested in the two Companies under this Act.

Amendment made.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES): The next Amendment which the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown) has placed on the Paper is to leave out the following words at the end of Clause 91:—

"Nor to sell or appropriate any part of the property purchased by them, or to set back any frontages for improving or widening street."

It seems that the Corporation of London, the Metropolitan Commissioners, and the Board of Works, objected to these words as putting them in an unfair position for dealing with the land. I therefore think that the words can be struck out, but that the following Proviso should be inserted:—

"Provided, That in the event of any part of the lands acquired by the two companies under this Act being hereafter taken from them by the Corporation, Commissioners, or Board, for improving or widening the adjoining streets, regard shall be had in the settling of compensation to the monies and other considerations given by the two companies for acquiring such lands."

Amendment made.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

COMMONS ACT (1876) AMENDMENT
BILL—(No. 152.)

(The Lord Henniker.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD HENNIKER, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the Bill was a very simple one; it had passed the other House unopposed, and was approved by those most conversant with the subject. The facts of the case were that the Act of 1876 provided that funds derived from the letting or the sale of the herbage of recreation grounds should be applied to certain limited purposes; these funds had accumulated in the hands of parish officers, and they had discovered, in many instances, that it was not within their power to apply them as laid down by the Act; while in the same parish field gardens remained undrained and unimproved for want of funds. The object of the Bill was to release these funds, which could not at present be usefully applied, or, in fact, employed at all, and to enlarge the provisions of the Act of 1876 in the direction indicated by the one really enacting clause of this measure.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION
BILL—(No. 156.)

(The Viscount Cranbrook.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."
—(The Viscount Cranbrook.)

LORD WAVENEY said, he had not had time to examine the Bill as closely as he would have wished to do. The country was not satisfied with the condition of the Army. We must not have an Army which after all the pains which had been taken with it was disorganized by a little war.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3^a accordingly, and passed.

(COMMENCEMENT) BILL—(No. 157.)

(The Viscount Bury.)

FIRST READING.

Bill read 1^a.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, he would have to ask their Lordships to meet at 2 o'clock to-morrow, in order to advance this Bill.

Bill to be read 2^a To-morrow; and Standing Orders Nos. XXXVII. and XXXVIII. to be considered in order to their being dispensed with.

METROPOLIS — DANGERS OF THE STREETS.—MOTION.

VISCOUNT TEMPLETOWN moved, pursuant to Notice—

"That in view of the enormous increase in the number of persons injured by the passage of vehicles in the streets during the year 1878 as compared notably with that of 1877 and the years preceding it, Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department be instructed to move the vestries of the several parishes of the Metropolis to erect central refuges in all such places as in the opinion of the superintendent of the police such shall be required for the protection of those passing on foot."

EARL BEAUCHAMP thought that their Lordships would hardly be disposed to accede to the Motion. He thought the noble Viscount was mistaken in thinking that there had been that enormous increase in the number of persons injured by the passage of vehicles in the streets of the Metropolis as was indicated in his Motion. On the contrary, the Returns presented to Parliament showed a considerable improvement in this respect. In respect of fatal accidents since 1869 down to the present time, the number had remained very much the same. In 1869, when the population of the Metropolis was 3,500,000, the number of fatal accidents was 182; and in 1877, when the population had increased to 4,500,000, it was 124. This was a great improvement when the great increase in the number of passengers was taken into consideration. The ordinary street accidents also had decreased within the specified period. The House would scarcely arrogate to itself the function proposed by the noble Viscount. The erection of those refuges was a matter for the Vestries, and it would be for the Secretary of State for the Home Department to interfere if the Vestries did not discharge their duty in that respect.

LORD ABERDARE said, he wished to say a few words on the matter, because there was a mistaken idea abroad that preventable accidents in the streets were increasing. The fact was, that they had considerably decreased, because the number of those accidents had for several years remained about the same concurrently with a very large increase in the population. He wished their Lordships also to notice that the greater number of them did not happen in the most crowded and dangerous streets. The reason of this was that in such streets a larger force of police were employed to watch the vehicular traffic, and people were more careful. In Lambeth, in 1877, the number of fatal accidents was 1; in Whitehall, 1; in the district of St. James, 2; and in Westminster, 3; while in Stepney it was 15, and in Islington 10.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL—COURT MARTIAL ON LIEUTENANT CAREY.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD TRURO, in asking Her Majesty's Government, Whether the Colonel Harrison, who was appointed to sit on the court martial to inquire into the circumstances attending the death of the late Prince Imperial, was the Assistant or Deputy Assistant Quartermaster General of that name—said, it would be well that the noble Lord (Viscount Bury) should give a distinct answer, and such as would satisfy the country and the Army; for, it had been stated in the papers, upon the best authority, that Colonel Harrison, whose name appeared as one of the court martial appointed to try Lieutenant Carey was the same Colonel Harrison who was the Assistant or Deputy Assistant Quartermaster General in South Africa; and, from what they had heard, he was the officer who was supposed to be responsible for the course which was taken by the late Prince Imperial. It was almost inconceivable, therefore, that the military authorities would place on the court martial an officer who was most responsible—he (Lord Truro) would not say for the disaster—but for the course which was pursued on that occasion. It would be unbecoming in him to make any further comments upon the matter, until they had heard from the Under Secretary of State for War whether the Colonel Harrison on the court martial was the Assistant or Deputy Assistant Quartermaster General of that name.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he had made inquiries respecting the information received at the War Office, and he had reason to believe that Colonel Harrison was not a member of the court martial.

QUESTIONS.

ARTIZANS' DWELLINGS ACT, 1875.

QUESTIONS.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, in reference to his statement that a Committee of the Board has been appointed to consider what amendments should be introduced into the "The Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act, 1875," with the view of diminishing the cost of carrying out that Act in the Metropolis. If he can inform the House when the Report of that Committee will be presented to the Home Secretary; and, whether, as the cost to the Metropolitan Ratepayers of clearing six sites will be £562,061, he can undertake that the other sites which have been cleared shall not be disposed of until the Report of the Committee has been laid before the Home Secretary, and it has been ascertained whether it is his intention to propose to amend the Act of 1875?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: Sir, I trust that the Metropolitan Board of Works will be in a position to make a representation to the Secretary of State on the subject of amendments of the Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act in the course of a week or two. With regard to the further disposal of sites, I may remind the hon. Member that of the six sites referred to by him only part of one has up to this time been actually cleared, and the Board are only now acquiring the interest in the remainder of the 14 which I alluded to in my reply on the 14th instant. The Home Secretary, therefore, will have full opportunity of considering the representations of the Board.

MR. FAWCETT asked, Whether the hon. Gentleman would give an undertaking that none of the other sites which had been cleared should be disposed of until the Report of the Committee had been laid before the Home Secretary, and it had been ascertained whether it was his intention to amend the Act of 1875?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG said, he would rather consult his Board before pledging them on the matter.

MR. FAWCETT said, he would on that day week put the Question to the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board, after he had had an opportunity of consulting his Colleagues.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, perhaps he might be allowed to state that it had been under his consideration for some time whether anything could be done to lessen the expense of carrying out the Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act. With respect to the machinery of that Act, he hoped even in this Session to produce a short Bill to lessen the expense.

FISHERIES—SALMON DISEASE—COMMISSION OF INQUIRY.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Commission to inquire into the causes of disease among the salmon of certain English and Scotch rivers will be appointed; and if he will state the names of the Commissioners selected by the Government?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, we are still in communication with the Treasury on the subject, and, therefore, I cannot make any definite statement at present as to the constitution of the Commission, though I hope that Mr. Walpole, Mr. Buckland, and one of the Scotch Fishery Commissioners will be members of it. No inquiry can take place until the spring. During the autumn the Commissioners can go on taking evidence; but if the disease should unfortunately occur again, they will not be able to make a personal inquiry into its causes until the spring.

TURKEY—THE JEWS IN EASTERN ROUMELIA.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any and what accounts of the outrages committed in Eastern Roumelia upon Jewish refugees returning to their homes at Carlovo; and, if so, what steps have been taken for their protection and for their security in the future?

MR. BOURKE: Yes, Sir, Her Majesty's Government have heard from the Consul General at Philippopolis that 80 Jewish families who had been invited to return to their homes at Carlovo were met near that town by a mob of 200 persons and stoned. When our Consul General heard of the outrage, he immediately made a strong representation to the Governor General, Aleko Pasha, who, upon the remonstrances of the Consul General, appointed a Commission to inquire into the circumstance. That Commission consisted of five persons, and they made a Report to the Governor General. When my noble Friend the

Mr. Fawcett

Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs heard of the matter, he desired Mr. Mitchell to address another strong remonstrance to Aleko Pasha, and tell him that it was his duty to prevent any outrage of this kind occurring. We have since heard that the result of the Commission has been that the officer—the head of the police—whose duty it was to prevent these outrages at Carlovo, has been removed by Aleko Pasha, and has been declared by the Governor General to be unfit to hold in future any appointment in Eastern Roumelia.

FISHERIES (SCOTLAND)—THE FIRTH OF FORTH.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME (for Lord Elcho) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to the losses the fishermen in Firth of Forth are suffering through injury to their lines and the destruction of the chlam and mussel beds by the action of steam trawling vessels, he will take steps for their protection?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, Sir, great injury has certainly been done in the way pointed out in the Question, and I will see that whatever is possible will be done to prevent anything of the kind in future. The injury referred to was of a purely wanton character, and could do no good. The Fishery Commissioners have made inquiries into the matter, and have agreed to make certain recommendations, which will be embodied in their Report. They have also met persons interested in the matter, as well as the persons who were responsible for the injury, and have urged on them to do all they can to prevent such occurrences in future. No efforts on my part shall be wanting towards that end. Whatever power I have will be put in force; but I think it exceedingly likely that I shall have to come to Parliament to ask for further powers.

SOUTH AFRICA — WAR WITH SIKUKUNI.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he has noticed, at page 150 in the South African Blue Book just issued, that the High Commissioner (Sir Bartle Frere), addressing the special meeting of the inhabitants of the Transvaal, held at Pretoria on April 23rd last, and, speaking for the British Government, said: "Our first business will be to attack Sikukuni;" adding—

"I have written to Lord Chelmsford that the favourable season is at hand, and is short, and that we should, therefore, as soon as possible, whenever he can spare them, send up troops in that direction;"

and, whether the Government, in compliance with that assurance of the High Commissioner, has authorised the departure of troops for the attack on Sikukuni?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: No, Sir, I have not authorized such an expedition. In writing to Sir Bartle Frere on the 10th of April, I expressed the hope that the troubles then existing or anticipated by him in various parts of South Africa, including Sikukuni's country, might disappear, either independently or in consequence of that complete settlement of the Zulu difficulty which I trusted to see speedily effected; and I requested him carefully to bear in mind that any wider or larger action of the kind apparently suggested by him, beyond that which might be necessary for the termination of the Zulu question, should be submitted to Her Majesty's Government for their consideration and approval before any steps were taken to carry it into effect. I believe that Lord Chelmsford declined to comply with the request that troops should be sent to the Transvaal for an attack on Sikukuni; but I subsequently called Sir Garnet Wolseley's attention to the views on this subject which I had expressed in my despatch of April 10; and the hon. Member may, perhaps, have noticed, in the telegram from Sir Garnet Wolseley which I read on Friday, that he states that there was no news of importance from the Transvaal, that he had ordered Colonel Lanyon to undertake no offensive operations, to restrict his operations to protection of life and property, and to curtail expenses in every possible way.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE PAPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, before the Supplementary Vote for the Zulu War, &c., is asked for, any Correspondence will be laid upon the Table of the House showing the history and present state of discussion between the Home Government and that of the Cape Colony, or with the Transvaal, as to their money claims on the English Government?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, some Papers are being prepared, and will be laid on the Table very shortly, with regard to communications between the Home Government and the Government of the Cape as to financial questions between them.

SOUTH AFRICA—GRIQUALAND WEST —ALLEGED MASSACRE NEAR KOEKAS.—QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he has observed in the South African Papers just issued (C. 2367), page 78, a Report from Field Commandant Van Niekerk admitting that in an attack upon a party of Natives at Luisdraai, near Koegas, he had killed forty-six, including ten women and children, and captured the rest, being five men and twenty-seven women and children; whether it is a fact that in the same Papers, pages 157 and 158, Mr. Jackson, the Special Commissioner appointed by the Government of Cape Colony to inquire into atrocities alleged to have been perpetrated on the occasion, reports—

"That a terrible and unjustifiable massacre of a party of bushmen, with their wives and children, had taken place at the hands of burghers under command of Commandant Van Niekerk;"

"Nothing could justify the shooting at Luisdraai, and subsequently on the march to Koegas, of the wounded, among whom were women and little children;"

and recommending that a preparatory examination should be instituted against Commandant Van Niekerk with the view of bringing the guilty parties to justice; and how he reconciles with these statements a despatch from Colonel Lanyon, published at page 120 of the same Papers, which is apparently fairly enough summarized in the index of the Papers, as "Showing that the alleged massacre of Natives at Koegas, as referred to by Dr. Cameron in the House of Commons, never occurred?"

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, Colonel Lanyon's despatch is perfectly consistent with the statements quoted by the hon. Member, because in that despatch he merely denies that the occurrence took place in Griqualand West, or that the massacre was perpetrated by Volunteers from his Province. Of course, Colonel Lanyon could not say what had or what had not taken place beyond the limits of his own government; and the mistake is in the index to the Papers, in which Colonel Lanyon's despatch certainly is not fairly summarized as showing that this event "never occurred." I regret that the index was not more carefully compiled.

DR. CAMERON: Is Koegas not in Griqualand West?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The massacre certainly took place within the jurisdiction of the Cape Colony, because the Government instituted an inquiry into the facts of the case, and intend to prosecute those who took part in the massacre.

NAVY—SENTENCE ON A SEAMAN AT SHEERNES.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If his attention has been drawn to a paragraph headed "Naval Discipline," in "Capital and Labour," dated the 16th instant, on page 431 of that journal, which reads as follows:—

"NAVAL DISCIPLINE.—A court martial was held at Sheerness on Monday, on board the Admiral's ship, to try a seaman for disobeying orders and for striking a petty officer. As the plea was 'guilty' no evidence was needed, and after an hour's deliberation the Court adjudged the prisoner to the astounding punishment of two years' imprisonment, the first week in each month to be passed in solitary confinement, and the remainder of the time in hard labour;"

whether the persons who composed the court martial were naval officers; and, whether he will cause an inquiry to be made into the whole circumstances of the case; and, in the meantime, if he will take steps to stay the carrying out of any part of a sentence apparently so severe?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, my attention has been drawn to the paragraph to which the hon. Gentleman alludes. The court martial was composed, as the Rules of the Service require, of Naval officers. The circumstances have already been reported to the Admiralty, and they show that the offences for which the prisoner was tried were of the most grave character—being deliberate and repeated disobedience of lawful and reasonable commands of his superior officer, followed up by an assault. I admit that the sentence is a severe one; but I am not prepared to say that it was excessive, if regard is had to the absolute necessity of maintaining discipline in the Service. As I only received Notice of the Question yesterday, I have had no opportunity of getting a Report from the officers who composed the court martial, and, therefore, it is impossible for me to say whether any portion of the sentence can be remitted.

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. RATHBONE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in case the reduced Bankruptcy Bill passed this Session, the Government would bring in a Consolidation Bill next Session, and refer the same to a Select Committee as had been suggested?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I regret that the hour at which the Bankruptcy Bill came on this morning was so late that the proceedings could not be reported in the newspapers. But the Attorney General stated, in moving the second reading of the Bill, that his object was to reduce it to an amending Bill of a much shorter description; and he, at the same time, gave an undertaking that a Consolidation Bill should be introduced next Session at an early period. There would be no objection to refer the Consolidation Bill to a Select Committee.

SOUTH AFRICA—GRIQUALAND EAST—THE IMPRISONED GRIQUAS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is the fact that in April 1878 William Kok, son of the Chief Adam Kok, was arrested, and together with the 137 other Griquas imprisoned at Cape Town; whether during that interval they have never been brought before any judicial tribunal, and the nature of their offence kept both from them and their friends; whether these persons are British subjects; whether they have given repeated assurances of their loyalty; and whether, when they are brought to trial, any compensation will be afforded to them for their imprisonment during this lengthy period, and for the property confiscated from them at the time of their arrest?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I believe that about the number of Griquas stated by the hon. Member have been for some time imprisoned at Cape Town, and I have not heard that they have been brought before any judicial tribunal. But their offence is perfectly well known to themselves and to others, as it consisted in a movement to drive the White inhabitants and the Government authorities out of Griqualand East, culminating in the open levying of war against the Queen. I cannot say what their precise legal position may be; but they appear to have been detained and treated as prisoners of war. From the nature of their offence, expressions of loyalty must be accepted with great reserve. Nor would any compensation for their detention appear to be due to them. The length of their detention is, I presume, due to the disturbed state, at first of Pondoland and Griqualand East, and subsequently of Basutoland, which may naturally have disposed the authorities to consider that the time had not arrived when they could safely be allowed to return to their country.

MR. W. H. JAMES: Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to say why these persons have not been brought to trial?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I have already stated that they have been detained and treated as prisoners of war.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND) — BELFAST POST OFFICE.—QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Postmaster General, If it is true that during the past seven years thirteen telegraph instrument clerks in Belfast Post Office have died from consumption; and, whether the high rate of mortality is not to be attributed to improper ventilation and impure supply of water; and, if so, whether he will make arrangements to have the defects remedied?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, I have ascertained that the number of telegraph clerks at Belfast who died from consumption during the last seven years is 10. But there is no reason to suppose that their deaths are in any way attributable to want of ventilation in the instrument room or to impurity in the water supply. The Belfast Post Office was recently largely improved at a considerable expense, and the medical officer reports to me that there are no defects to call for remedy.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day appointed for this Evening be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to Unfulfilled Arrangements of the Congress of Berlin. (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PRIVILEGE — (TOWER HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE (METROPOLIS) COMMITTEE).

REPORT FROM SELECT COMMITTEE considered.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not propose to detain the House at any great length on the subject of this Report, because the Motion, with which I intend to conclude, will not be of a final character; but I shall propose to fix to-morrow for the decision of the House as to what steps it may think ought to be taken. I, therefore, would only remind the House that the Report which we have had placed before us is the Report of the Select Committee that was appointed last week for the purpose of inquiring into certain circumstances which had been reported by a Committee on a Private Bill—the Committee on the Tower High Level Bridge (Metropolis) Bill. The nature of those circumstances is, I think, pretty well known to all the Members of the House. Hon. Members are aware that in the course of the proceedings of that Private Bill Committee some communication was made to the Committee to the effect that a Mr. Charles Edmund Grissell had been making overtures to the solicitors who were engaged in the conduct of the case of one of the parties to that Bill, and had asserted, in the course of his communications, that he had the power to control the proceedings of the Committee. He further stated that he was willing to exercise his power of control on a consideration—namely, the sum of £2,000, which he expected to receive for that purpose. That communication had been made in concert with his solicitor, Mr. John Sandilands Ward. A Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the circumstances, and as their Report is now in the possession of the House, together with the evidence they have taken, it will be sufficient for my purpose to call the attention of the House to the concluding paragraphs of that Report, which, perhaps, the House will permit me to read. The Committee say—

“Your Committee, having fully considered the statements presented to them, and having regard to the character of the evidence given by, and the demeanour of, the several witnesses, and the documents produced, have come to the unanimous conclusion that the statements made by Mr. Hooker and Mr. Cockell are true, and that the counter-statements made by Mr. Ward and Mr. Grissell are false; but your Committee do not think it necessary to point out in detail the discrepancies and contradictions with which the evidence of the two last-mentioned witnesses abounds.

Your Committee are unanimously of opinion that Mr. Grissell, in asserting that he could control the decision of the Committee on the Tower High Level Bridge (Metropolis) Bill, and in the offer he made to do so, was guilty of a breach of the Privileges of the House.

And they are also unanimously of opinion that Mr. Ward was cognizant of, and assisted Mr. Grissell in, the matter of this offer, and was likewise guilty of a breach of the Privileges of the House.”

Now, the unanimous finding of that Select Committee is obviously one of very great importance. The charge they make is one of so very grave a nature that it demands the earnest attention of this House. At the same time, I think that the feeling of the House will probably be that in a matter of this kind we ought to proceed with proper deliberation, and I shall, therefore, move—when the House will decide what further course it will take.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER: I should like to say a word as to a Question which was put by me when this matter was first brought forward, but which received no answer. A Motion had been made to the effect that Mr. Charles Edmund Grissell attend at the Bar of this House; but that Motion was withdrawn, and I ventured to ask this Question—If Mr. Grissell were not then ordered to attend, what means would there subsequently be of forcing his attendance? I have no means of knowing whether Mr. Grissell will appear to-morrow, or not; but, looking at human nature as it usually is, I should say that his appearance here is exceedingly improbable. The matter having been investigated, and circumstances having been alleged that are apparently strongly condemnatory of him, I should think it is most improbable that he will appear, and I venture, therefore, to ask this Question—What means have been taken to ensure his attendance at the Bar of this House to-morrow at 12 o'clock?

MR. WHITBREAD: Sir, before any answer is made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the Question just put to him by the hon. Baronet (Sir William Fraser), I should like to say a few words on this matter. I, for one, am sorry to find that the case is to be treated in the manner proposed, and I should be glad to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has consulted the Law Officers of the Crown as to whether the case is not one that ought to be dealt with in the ordinary course of law? It seems to me, on reading the evidence that has been published, that the offence charged against the persons concerned is that of a mere vulgar attempt to obtain money, and I should have thought it raising that offence to too dignified a position to call these two persons to the Bar of this House. I should much have preferred, if it could have been so determined, that the matter should have been dealt with in the ordinary process of the law. If these persons had set themselves up as seriously questioning the Privileges of this House, I could understand that the method now proposed would be the proper way in which the House should deal with the matter; but it seems to me that they do not pretend that there was any justification for the act they committed, and, this being so, and the offence being a vulgar and common attempt to obtain money in a corrupt way, I should have been much better pleased if the case could have been dealt with by the ordinary law.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: In reply to the Question of my hon. Friend (Sir William Fraser) as to what means are to be taken for requiring the attendance of Mr. Grissell at the Bar of this House, I can only say that we must wait till we see whether the Order he will receive from Mr. Speaker, and which will be of a peremptory character, is obeyed or not, and then it will be for the House to consider what we shall otherwise do, and it would be unwise to anticipate it. With regard to what has been said by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), I may say that there is, no doubt, something in the point he has raised; but I have consulted my learned Friends the Law Advisers of the Crown in the matter, and they are distinctly of opinion that the case is one which it would be rather difficult to deal with in the ordinary Courts of Law. It having first been brought under the notice of a Committee of this House, then, having been brought by that Committee before this House, and afterwards discussed by a Select Committee appointed for the purpose, and that Committee having reported that there has been a Breach of Privilege, I think it would be difficult now to take the course which the hon. Member for Bedford has suggested. On referring to precedents in relation to such cases, I have found that in former times there have been several in which attempts to influence corruptly the proceedings of this House have been dealt with summarily as Breaches of Privilege.

MR. CALLAN: May I ask the Attorney General, whether, taking the Report of the Select Committee to be substantially that the statements of Mr. Grissell and Mr. Ward were false—that they have pledged their oaths to false statements—cannot an indictment be formed against them before an ordinary legal tribunal for the offence so committed?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER): There is no doubt that Mr. Grissell and Mr. Ward have given false evidence before the Committee, and if the fact that they have given false evidence can be substantiated by evidence, they might be convicted and punished for that offence. At the same time, I do not think that that would be a desirable course to take.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That Mr. Charles Edmund Grissell and Mr. John Sandilands Ward do attend this House To-morrow, at 'twelve of the clock.—
(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION (COMMENCEMENT) BILL—[BILL 248.]

(Colonel Stanley, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee).

COLONEL STANLEY, in moving the insertion of certain Amendments, said, he could assure the Committee they were only verbal in their nature.

MR. RYLANDS complained that these Amendments were not on the Notice Paper, and hon. Members were quite unable to follow what was being done. In the peculiar circumstances in which the Government were now placed in regard to this matter, he would not offer any opposition; but he thought it should be remembered, when these Amendments were not on the Paper, that they had recently heard a good deal from the Government about the inconvenience of moving Amendments without Notice.

COLONEL STANLEY expressed his regret that the Amendments were not on the Paper, and repeated his assurance that they were only of a verbal character to remedy defects in the drafting of the Bill.

Clauses 1 to 6, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 7 (Repeal of Enactments).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked to what extent this clause repealed the provisions of existing Statutes? None were named, and it seemed to him that if the matter were allowed to pass as it now stood, considerable confusion would arise. They had been told that the Act was passed to simplify the military law; but this clause would, it appeared to him, tend in the reverse direction, and that officers and soldiers would have need to refer to a good many other Acts of Parliament. He hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman could explain some of these matters in his reply.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he was afraid it would take up too much time at that moment to explain all the Acts kept alive by the Bill. There were several instances in which Acts of past years had been affected or modified by the Mutiny Acts, and which were finally dealt with by this Bill. The provisions of this Bill were applied by a continuance Bill; but he thought he had stated all along that it bore a somewhat different form from what the annual continuance Bill had done, because it had been necessary to take up and weave into the existing Discipline Bill the provisions of all the Acts by which the Forces had been previously governed. He quite agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman that commanding officers would have to make themselves acquainted with some existing Acts, and he was now directing his attention to the matter. He proposed drawing up, with the Regulations, some memoranda as to what would be the effect of the Act. Of course, when these were completed, there would be no objection to lay a Copy on the Table of the House.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER asked, what would be the effect of this Bill on the question of the trial of Volunteers by court martial? It was now provided that Volunteers should be triable by courts martial, composed of Volunteer officers and officers of the Regular Service; but by a Bill which had already passed its third reading in this House, and which was now awaiting decision in "another place," this rule did not prevail, and Volunteer officers were only triable by courts martial consisting of Volunteer officers alone. When the Bill was before the House, he drew attention to the subject, and the Attorney General distinctly informed him that the Army Discipline Act would govern all Volunteer Acts, including the Irish Volunteer Act then under discussion, so that Irish Volunteers would be tried by mixed courts martial. He should like to hear from his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War whether he still adhered to that decision?

COLONEL STANLEY replied in the affirmative. He said, by Clause 7 of this Bill all other Acts which were inconsistent with it were superseded, and they would be still further governed by the regulations which they proposed to introduce.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he had not received an answer to his question. What he wished to know was whether existing Acts of Parliament referring to the Army were repealed, or were they still in existence. He would mention one instance. By the Militia Act, Militiamen were not liable to the punishment of death; but, under certain circumstances, and under the new Act which they had now passed, they would be. Was the clause in the Militia Act exempting them from the punishment of death repealed by the Bill now under consideration? He should have thought the reply to such a question might have been distinct.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, he must also press for an answer to this question.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he could only once more explain that all these Acts were not repealed, except in so far as they were inconsistent with the express conditions of Acts passed at a later date.

MR. RYLANDS said, he thought every allowance ought to be made for the Government, and, therefore, he would not press them upon the point; but he thought another year they might be enabled to set forth the Acts which were repealed in a Schedule to the enacting Bill.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the whole question would be practically dealt with by the Statute Law Revision Commission.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 (Prices in respect of billeting).

MAJOR O'BEIRNE moved to increase the amount of the marching allowance of officers from 2s. to 5s. per day. The present allowance was, he said, utterly inadequate to meet the necessary expenses on the march—in fact, it was an utterly ridiculous sum. He hoped to hear from the Government that they would take the matter into consideration.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

COLONEL STANLEY, on the ground of the great urgency of the matter, appealed to the House to allow the Standing Orders to be dispensed with in order that the Bill might pass through its remaining stages. This was absolutely necessary in order that the measure might receive the Royal Assent by Friday, when the old Act expired.

Bill, as amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

BANKING AND JOINT STOCK COMPANIES BILL—[BILL 126.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

SECOND READING.

Order for the Second Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said: It is now some time since the Bill was introduced, and since it has been before the House I have received a great number of communications both from Members of the House and from other persons. I think there seems to be a very general agreement among those who are interested, so far, at all events, as the banks are concerned, that it is desirable to pass, without any further loss of time, a measure for the purpose of enabling those banks which are now unlimited to re-register themselves as limited banks. The House is aware of the nature of the inconvenience which has been found to arise in many cases from unlimited liability. One of the effects of it has been to alarm a good many persons who had hitherto been willing to take shares in banks, and who, being persons of substantial character, have, of course, been very desirable partners in those concerns, but who are alarmed at the possibility of their being mulcted of the whole or the greater part of their fortunes by failure, and are very anxious that the banks to which they belong should have the advantage of limited liability. It being perfectly well understood that those banks might originally have been registered as limited, but have been in point of fact registered as unlimited, it is now found that they cannot alter their position so as to obtain the advantages of limited liability. Therefore, the main point of this Bill was to enable banks in that position to convert their liability from unlimited to limited liability. Then it was a second point, that we thought it desirable, not merely to give such banks as might desire to avail themselves of it the power of limiting themselves on the principle of the Joint Stock Companies Act, which exactly limits the liability to the amount of the shares, but also to enable them to form themselves on the principle which would give them a certain fixed liability over and above the nominal amount of the shares. For that purpose we introduced into this Bill the system of what are called Reserve Liability Companies. Upon that question, upon the use of the word "Reserve," and upon the question as to what limitation there should be to the power of fixing the amount of reserve, and as to the means by which different kinds of banks should avail themselves of that power, there has been a certain amount of difference of opinion. I think, however, that the difference is not very serious in reality, and that by a little discussion in this House we should find that we could come to a satisfactory agreement upon the matter. Still, undoubtedly, it is a question of some interest, and not altogether free from disputable points. With regard to some of the other provisions of the Bill—as to the mode of publishing the accounts, and the auditing of the accounts, I think there has been in substance a tolerably general agreement that it was desirable to have provisions of that nature, although there have been a good many criticisms on the particular form of account in the Schedule of this Bill, and, no doubt, it is open to considerable improvement. There is one point in the Bill which has caused a considerable amount of anxiety, and even agitation, in certain parts of the United Kingdom; and I see by the Notices which are on the Paper that all the opposition which is offered to this Bill on the second reading comes, in fact, from those who are interested in the Scotch and Irish banks. The proposal in the 8th clause of the Bill, that the banks availing themselves of this Bill should be registered in that part of the United Kingdom in which they have their places of business, is one upon which there has been a good deal of feeling, and I must admit that very strong objections have been urged against it. I could not undertake, at the present time of the Session, to go into this large question of the Scotch and Irish banks. We know that, in 1844, Sir Robert Peel dealt first with the question of the English banks of issue, and in the following year brought in a measure dealing with the Scotch and Irish banks. I think, therefore, under the circumstances of the Session, and the character of the obstacles that stand in the way of the passing of a Bill of this nature, it will be better that it should be confined to England. I propose, therefore, to confine this Bill to England, leaving out everything we have proposed in the 8th clause with reference to the Scotch and Irish banks, and looking forward to next Session to be able to deal with the subject in a more comprehensive way, if it should be possible, with regard to the question of the Scotch and Irish banks. Under these circumstances, I hope that the House will agree to what I am about to propose—namely, that after the second reading, the Bill should be committed pro forma, so that it may be re-printed with certain Amendments. The principal point which has been under consideration has been with regard to this reserve liability. I said, when we introduced the Bill, that we were not wedded to that particular title, and that I was ready to consider any other proposals that might be made to me on the subject. I am bound to say that my invitation has been very freely accepted, and a very large number of suggestions have been made, some of them wholly inconsistent with the proposal of the Bill, while others seem to me to vary very little from it. I am, therefore, prepared, subject to any decision in Committee as to the actual terms to be used, still to adhere to that title. The effect of it would be that we should have three classes of banks—namely, (1), limited banks; (2), unlimited banks; and (3), the reserve liability banks. I do not myself think that it would be very convenient to dispense with that third class. If you are to have a class of banks in which the liability should be not limited to the amount of the shares, and not unlimited, but something between the two, I think it is desirable that it should be distinguished by a separate name. But if it is to be so distinguished, then we have this point urged upon us. The unlimited banks say—"We may be ready to convert ourselves into reserve liability banks;" but the limited banks say—"We are not authorized by this Bill to turn ourselves into reserve liability banks, and, therefore, we may be in a position of some disadvantage." This objection of the limited banks has a great deal of force in it; and I, therefore, propose that power should be given to all classes of banks equally to avail themselves, if they choose, of this new provision. Then—finition, or rather regulation, in Subsection 3 of the 8th clause which defines the amount of liability. At present, it states that the amount of reserve liability attaching to each share should be regulated by the amount of such share, and should be a sum equal to, or some multiple of, the nominal amount of the share in respect of which it is payable. What I should propose would be to provide simply that the reserve liability should not be less than half the nominal capital. Then, there are certain unlimited banks which are in this position, that they have a very large nominal capital and only a small proportion of it paid-up, and they say—"If we were to turn ourselves into Reserve Liability Companies, there might be some difficulty as to what the amount should be;" and a wish has been expressed, on the part of some of them, that they should have the power of reducing their nominal capital. I therefore, propose, that some such clause as this should be drawn—that, at the time at which any bank now registered, either as limited or unlimited, desires to re-register as a reserve liability bank, it should have power to reduce its nominal capital to an amount not less than twice the amount of the paid-up capital at that moment. I think that will be found to meet the case of several of these banks. I will not, however, ask the House to discuss this suggestion merely upon a statement made viva voce. In accordance with what I have said, I think it would be convenient that I should be allowed to take the second reading of the Bill now, and put it into the shape in which I propose that it should stand, and then we will give time for its consideration when it is in print, and be able to have it discussed in Committee of the Whole House. If that course were adopted, I do not believe that it would take any excessive time to pass the Bill, and I think it would be for the advantage of the banking and mercantile community that such a Bill should pass.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. ANDERSON: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad, indeed, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has enabled me to dispense with moving the particular

Amendment which I have on the Paper by his withdrawing the 8th clause of the Bill; but I am not quite sure that the mode in which he spoke of withdrawing it will enable me to withdraw all opposition to the Bill. If I understood him aright, he stated that he meant to drop Scotland out of the Bill altogether, and, in that case, I shall certainly oppose the Bill to the best of my power. I do not see why Scotland should be precluded from adopting the principle of reserve liability altogether. The proposal now made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer is altogether and completely changed from what it was in the first instance. Formerly, the proposal was that any bank in England, Ireland, or Scotland, might adopt the principle of reserved liability; and now it is to be left only to the English banks to adopt it, while neither the Scotch nor the Irish banks are to be allowed to adopt it at all. Under these circumstances, if I have understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposal aright, I think it becomes the duty of the Scotch and Irish Members entirely to oppose the passing of this Bill. There is another method in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer might very well have altered his Bill, and so have given us what we wanted—namely, he might have simply dropped out the 8th clause and nothing more. That would have been a very simple thing to do, and would not have prejudiced anybody. That is a clause which was objected to as being unjust and inexpedient, as putting upon Scotch and Irish banks a most unfair disability, as attempting to rob certain banks of a certain amount of business which they have created, and which is of great value to them, without any kind of compensation being given. The 8th clause was in every sense an unjust proposal, and all that we ask is that the 8th clause should be dropped out of the Bill. If that is done, we would not ask for any other changes. At the same time, we would not object to others, and I am bound to admit that the change which allows a limited bank to become less limited is a very good change, and one of which I quite approve; and I think it is also very likely that the change in the amount of the reserve liability, not being a multiple, is also an improvement; but, as far as it is to be a privilege which is to be given to the English unlimited banks to take advantage of, and which is to be denied both to Scotland and Ireland, I feel bound to continue my opposition to the Bill just as much as before. I suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he should adopt this means of dealing with the question, and if he does so, I believe he would find the Bill would be passed with great facility; while, if it is not adopted, I believe we should be able to baffle him and prevent its passing, and I certainly shall do my best to carry this out. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says we oppose him in the interest of banks. Well, that is all very well; but I take my action in the interest of justice, and nothing else. I have no interest in any bank at all; on the contrary, I disapprove of the action of many of them.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I did not intend to imply that the hon. Member was personally interested in any bank.

MR. ANDERSON: I simply want to say that I do not act at all in the interest or on the request of any Scotch banks; I act simply in the interests of justice, because the proposal to be made in the Bill was a thoroughly unjust one. I do not approve of the Scotch banks coming to London, nor of the Scotch banks having their monopoly almost intensified by their coming to London; but I disapprove of the principle of robbing them of the business which, under the law, they have established and created there. By coming to London, no doubt, they bring Scotch capital away from Scotland and employ it in London, and I cannot approve of their coming here to London and discounting at somewhere about $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, while in Scotland they are discounting at some 4 or 5 per cent. I do not approve of Scotch capital coming here to be employed in favouring English merchants by discounting at $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent while Scotch merchants are made to pay 4 and 5 per cent. That is a wrong principle altogether, and one which I should be glad to see put a stop to. If their coming to London was the cause of that, I might have thought they should be prevented from doing so; but, unfortunately, they did it equally before there was any attempt to prevent them from coming, and before they did come. As an instance of that, I may mention that one of the Scotch banks lost a large sum of money by discounting some of the Messrs. Collieland Co's. paper, and at that time the Scotch bank that did so had no branch in London. I disapprove of them discounting here, because it enables them to keep up their charges in Scotland. Another change which I should like to see in this Bill would be to introduce a clause which should get rid of the bank monopoly in Scotland and enable us to have free banking there. The Scotch banks always talk very largely about free banking, and boasted of it in their Memorial to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but they do not give us free banking, and we have not got it in Scotland. Therefore, I am in this position, that I want to prevent an injustice being done to the Scotch banks, while I do not approve of the Scotch monopoly which is established, and which I should be glad to see abolished. This, I am aware, cannot be done by this Bill; and, as the best that can be done, I, therefore, hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the present case, will agree to put all the banks in the United Kingdom on one footing by simply dropping out this obnoxious 8th clause, without dropping out either Scotland or Ireland.

MR. HERMON thought this Bill would be much more acceptable to the public if directors, who were paid officials, and those who signed the prospectuses, were obliged to incur a greater amount of liability than the shareholders. When they recollected that it was generally through the bad and careless management or the misconduct of the directors that misfortune ensued, he thought there was a good case for making the directors liable to the shareholders for the losses they might incur. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would introduce some clause in the Bill to provide for the liability on the part of the directors, it would give greater security to the public, and the public would have greater confidence in the undertakings; while the directors, by the stake they had in the success of a company, would pay greater attention to its affairs, and, on the whole, would conduce to the success of the undertaking. He wanted the public to have the additional security and assurance that their interests would be regarded, and to feel that by the knowledge of the fact that the directors would be mulcted in accordance with the loss sustained by a company or a bank.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, he was greatly disappointed at the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposal to exclude Scotland from the operation of the Bill. If there was one part of United Kingdom which more than another required a reform in the principles of liability it was Scotland. At the present moment, many of the holders of bank stocks, particularly trustees and executors, in consequence of recent decisions by the Law Courts, felt themselves in a very awkward position. One of the objects of the Bill was, apparently, to force the Scottish banks to give up their business in London. But, whatever might be the faults of these institutions in coming to London, if there were a fault, it was not fair that they should be compelled to withdraw, as it were, by a side-wind, especially as such a proceeding was not necessary to cure the evils complained of. A deputation of a very influential character had waited on the Chancellor of the Exchequer to represent the case of some of the Scottish banks. He wished it to be borne in mind that it was not the case of the Scottish banks alone that had to be dealt with by the House, but the case of the Scottish people also; and the Scottish banks were, in many respects, at issue with the Scottish people. The latter had suffered by the closeness of the monopoly enjoyed by the banks, as well as from the unlimited nature of their liability. They had, therefore, rejoiced to think that, in connection with this Bill, they had an opportunity of bringing their grievances fairly and distinctly before the House. The main question, however, was the giving power to change from unlimited to limited liability, and he (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) would confine himself to it; and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer, after learning the expression of feeling which was pretty general among the Scottish Members, did not withdraw his proposal for excluding Scotland from the benefits of the Bill, he (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) would be under the necessity of pressing to a Division the Amendment which he now formally moved—namely, “That this Bill be read a second time that day three months.”

DR. CAMERON, in rising to second the Motion, said, that so far as Scotland was concerned, the matter was not so easily dealt with as the Chancellor of the Exchequer appeared to imagine. It was an easy thing to drop out the 8th clause, intended to drive the Scotch Banks out of London; but the real difficulty of dealing with Scotland under these circumstances was that there were in Scotland another class of banks to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not referred, which had already their liability limited, but did not use the word limited as an appendage to their titles. There were the Chartered banks, which were already limited; but they did not require to change their name, and as long as they could dispense with the necessity of changing their name, the other banks could not afford to make a change which would lead the public to consider that they occupied an inferior position. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had dealt with the matter from a far too exclusive London point of view. When he came to deal with Ireland, he would find the same difficulty staring him in the face as that presented in Scotland. In Ireland there were also banks limited by Royal Charter, and unless the Irish banks were very different from the Scotch banks, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have to find some other means of dealing with them. In the present Bill, three subjects had been dealt with in a very fragmentary and unsatisfactory manner, and the one subject which called most urgently for the Government to grapple with it had been left untouched. With regard to the proposed method of limitation, as he had explained to the House, it was a method which might be popular, and which might be adopted by banks here, but which could not be adopted in Scotland, and could not be adopted to any great extent in Ireland. That was one unsatisfactory feature in the Bill. He did not know whether under the Bill the right hon. Gentleman proposed that the reserve liability banks should be obliged on all occasions to parade the title of reserve liability after their name. Might he ask the right hon. Gentleman if that were so? [THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes.] It seemed to him (Dr. Cameron) that a very simple way out of the difficulty was open to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He could not see why it was necessary to maintain the word limited at the end of the title of a limited liability company. It was simply misleading. The great majority of the limited liability companies at present in existence had not that word appended to their names. There were railway companies which were limited; water companies, gas companies; and there were also a large number of banking companies which were limited without the necessity of having the word limited attached to their title. That was the case of three or four Scotch banks; with the Bank of Ireland; in fact, it was so with all the Chartered banks. As to the new proposal of limitation by reserve, it was really nothing more than that proposal contained in the Act of 1862, which provided for limitation by guarantee. But he was told that an interpretation of the law had been given to the effect that limitation by guarantee was personal only, and did not extend to future shareholders. That, however, was a difficulty which could easily have been got over by a short Declaratory Clause. He did not wish to attach any great weight to this point. What he did object to in this proposal was, that it introduced another form of liability to the already too complicated form of limited companies. There were already a great number of limitations, and now it was proposed to establish a limitation by reserve. It was quite impossible for the public to thoroughly understand how the liability of any given concern stood, and this was especially the case with the Chartered banks. He had, some time ago, desired to get a Return bearing on the subject, and he was told that the Charters were public documents. He had the curiosity to go to the Record Office for the purpose of investigating them. He found that the Charters were wound up in long rolls, and were of such a great length, that they could not possibly be completely examined in any office of ordinary size. When they had found out what they wanted in a particular Charter, they might probably find themselves referred to some provision in an earlier one of, perhaps, equal length. The system was so complicated and cumbrous, that they might spend a week in finding out the precise measure of limitation of a given bank; and yet it was now proposed to add another complication to this already far too complicated system. As to the liability of the shareholders, he was at one with the right

hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He agreed with him that unlimited liability occasioned a danger of frightening good shareholders out of the proprietary of banks. But the difficulty of both Scotch and Irish banks would be met by doing away with the necessity of using the word "limited" after the title; and this proposal would equally meet the requirements of England. There was one point painfully brought out in connection with the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, and which ought to be dealt with in any Bill attempting legislation on this subject. Over and above the note issue authorized to the banks in Scotland and Ireland, the banks were allowed to issue any amount of notes on condition that they held a reserve of gold against that issue. Under the Bank Act of 1844, the Treasury were empowered to inspect the gold reserve. He did not know whether they ever had done so—["No!"]—but, at all events, when the City of Glasgow Bank came down, it was discovered that the gold was not there. Mark the effect of the system! You put a positive premium on false returns, and took no means to check it. If a bank kept half-a-million of gold against half-a-million of notes issued, they gained nothing by it; but if they did not keep it, they netted £25,000 a-year by the transaction. Any Bill in this direction should take steps to make this supposed security a real one, and not, as at present, a mere temptation to make false returns. Another important point was this. If the bank had gold in hand when it came down, it now appeared that that gold was part of the general assets, and was no more applicable to the redemption of notes than the bank building. This was a subject that ought to be handled in a banking bill, for it was of the utmost importance to the public interest. With regard to the proposed system of audit, that had been the feature in the Bill which had recommended it to the benevolent consideration of the public out-of-doors, yet, if the public out-of-doors only looked at the thing, they would see that there was not a greater fallacy, delusion—a sham, if he might say so—than the audit proposed by the Bill. Nine-tenths of the banks at present had all the audit they would have under the Bill, but no one was the wiser for it. The radical defect in the present system was that the auditors were the nominees of the directors. He did not mean to say that they would willingly pass false returns, but they did not examine fully into the accounts. Things were made pleasant, and they found their salaries paid the more willingly the less work they did, and an audit took place which was popularly known as the "sherry-and-sandwich" audit. This Bill provided for a little extension of that sherry-and-sandwich audit, and nine-tenths of the banks had that audit already. He did not mean to say that auditors were not nominally in Limited Liability Banks appointed by the shareholders; but, in almost every case, the directors held proxies and controlled the appointment of auditors. The next provision in connection with this point was the publication of accounts. There was nothing more important for the security of the public than the publication of detailed accounts. Nothing that could be devised allowed the public so good an opportunity of knowing whether a concern was rotten or sound as a detailed, a minutely-detailed, system of published accounts. But statements of the kind proposed by the Bill might have been published by every one of the banks that had come to grief within the last 12 months without anybody being much the wiser. How was the City of Glasgow Bank brought to grief? Millions of money were given to some half-a-dozen different persons. The bank held its own shares to an enormous extent, thereby increasing the liability of its outside shareholders, and bolstering up the shares to a fictitious price, which utterly misled the public. Would a form of the kind proposed by the Bill have disclosed this? Not in the least; the bank would have come out of the ordeal equal to the best in the country. What was there to prevent banks being required to show how many of their own shares they held, and why not compel them to state how many debtors they had over a certain sum—say, £100,000 or £150,000? If that had been done, there would have been few cases in which the banks which had come to grief would not have been pulled up long before they really collapsed. Another and still more important point in connection with the City of Glasgow Bank was, how did it invest its money? Why, in Government and other securities. But the "other securities" embraced wholesale investments in Australian Land Companies and American Railway mortgages, which were utterly unmarketable. Why not make it a necessity that there should be a detailed statement of these? Half-a-dozen banks already did this without any pressure. There was the Birmingham Joint Stock Bank, a perfect model in that respect, which issued details of every security held by them. The next example he would give as illustrating his position was the unfortunate Caledonian Bank, which came to grief through no fault of its own, but owing to a piece of carelessness which, but for the calamitous consequences, would have been thought venial. It held four shares of the Glasgow Bank. Now, if they had been compelled to publish a detailed list of securities, did they not think that almost to a moral certainty this would have been prevented? It held shares in most of the Scottish Banks, as well as the City of Glasgow. Its balance sheet would have been examined; anyone would have seen the risk; there would have been no inducement to leave money in such investments. The directors' attention being called to the fact that if any single Scottish bank failed, the Caledonian must be brought down, the bank would have been saved. Again, take the case of the West of England Bank. If it had been necessary to publish a statement of the number and amount of accounts of over £100,000 or £150,000, it would have speedily been known to what an extent the money in the bank was locked up. If it had been necessary to publish a detailed list of securities, shareholders and the public would have known how deeply they were bound up in the Aberdare and Plymouth Ironworks scheme. Take two other banks, both, he was happy to say, still going on, and likely to, but which had had significant warnings as to the necessity of looking into their accounts. The Oriental Bank not long ago stood in a ticklish position. Their shares suffered a severe fall, and it came out that the bank held, classed among their "other securities," a large quantity of Chilean bonds, and it further came out that not sufficient allowance had been made for the rates of exchange. Why not require banks to state the rate of exchange at which they took foreign money in their published accounts? Again, the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India suffered a severe drop in its shares shortly after the events in connection with the Ottoman Bank to which he had referred, and it then transpired that the bank had speculated extensively in silver, and held silver to an enormous value. The silver had fallen heavily; but nothing to indicate this appeared in the accounts, which were rendered still more misleading by the valuation of the rupee at much above its real price. And yet, with the Bill before them in operation, the Government balance sheet might have been filled in without the public receiving one additional ray of information as to the real state of things. For all the reasons he had given, the Bill seemed to him a very weak Bill altogether. The addition of the audit clause, and the publication of accounts, which made the Bill go down with the public, were really hardly worth the paper they were written on. Certainly, in the case of nine banks out of ten, as at present existing, they would not improve matters in the slightest; and to show the perfect absurdity of the proposition, it was only necessary to point out that this audit and publication of accounts did not extend to all banks—not to Chartered banks, not to ordinary limited banks, but only to those that might register themselves as limited by reserve, and to such banks as might be established after the passing of the Act. Other proposals in the Bill were harmless—they might have the effect of postponing effective legislation for some years to come—but probably that would be the effect under any circumstances. But, altogether, the Bill was brought in in a shape so as not to apply to that portion of the Kingdom where there was the most necessity for it. In England they had numerous limited liability banks and Chartered banks, and though they had a large number of unlimited ones—even the Bank of England was limited—in Scotland the number of unlimited banks was excessively great. But if the Chartered banks did change their title, the other banks would not. Why not adopt his suggestion that the law should stand so that every bank throughout the Kingdom should act as seemed best without consulting its neighbour? Why not do away with the necessity that existed for a fraction merely of limited banks to append limited to their name? It seemed to him that, as a matter of fact, the larger number of limited companies at the present moment did not require to use the word limited after their name. What, then, was the necessity of keeping up a false presumption that every company not so marked as limited was unlimited? It was only this that prevented the whole thing being settled in a single clause in a way that would satisfy all English banks, while it would allow Scotch and Irish banks to come under it. Under the circumstances, he was inclined to second the proposal to reject the Bill with more warmth than it was proposed by his hon. Friend.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months." — (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA admitted that much of what he was about to say would be applicable to a Motion to reject the Bill. He hesitated, however, to condemn it altogether, so long as the House had the power and disposition to make it suitable to the circumstances of the country. He would be wasting time, if he were to enter on details to prove that the Bill was simply one outcome of the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank. He apprehended that there would be no serious contention on that point, and he would rather trust to the common sense of the House to concur in that proposition—namely, that the movement of the public mind which led to this attempt at legislation was occasioned by the panic or uneasiness consequent amongst shareholders of the unlimited banks on the failure of the City of Glasgow Company. The next consideration was to inquire what would have been the effect in the case of the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank if such a measure as that before the House had been passed by Parliament four or five years ago, and had been availed of by the City of Glasgow Bank two or three years before its failure? He would repeat that question in another form, for his main argument largely turned upon it. What, he would ask, would have been the effect, what would be now the state of things, if the Glasgow Bank had, two or three years ago, availed itself of such a law as that which they were asked to pass? The answer was simple, that it would have varied and extended the area of desolation. It would have left almost scathless many wealthy men who had reaped large profits by the bank, and it would have impoverished an immensely greater number of persons who would now, as creditors, be paid in full. Who was to assess which result would be the less calamitous? No one could show that this measure could make banks more prudent than hitherto; and, as it could not do so, it could only vary the incidence of loss whenever a calamity occurred; it could only do this by shifting the burden of loss from those who were entitled to the profits, and by casting it on creditors who, as matters now stood, were tolerably safe from any such overwhelming calamity. As it happened in the present case, all this was capable of exact demonstration. What had occurred in the case of the City of Glasgow Bank might occur in the future in some other equally extensive bank after this Bill had become law. The capital of the City of Glasgow Bank was £1,000,000 sterling paid up. It failed in October last. Its constitution was one of unlimited liability. Let them now inquire what amount of reserved liability it should have provided for, in order to meet the claims and pay its creditors in full. The amount of reserved liability which should have been provided for in order to enable the liquidators of the City of Glasgow Bank to pay 20s. in the pound to their creditors should have been £27,500,000, and this notwithstanding that the total deficiency of assets to meet liabilities was £7,000,000 only. Let hon. Members reflect on what actually occurred in the Glasgow Bank case. The first call made by the liquidators was £500 for each £100 share. That call would have exhausted a reserve liability of a multiple of five times the actual capital—that was to say, a reserve liability of £5,000,000; but that call, though quite sufficient to impoverish a great number of the shareholders, fell lamentably short of what the circumstances demanded; so a second call had to be made of £2,250 in respect of each £100 share; and even when this was done an appeal to the creditors had to be made to accept something short of 20s. in the pound. The next question was, what would have been the consequences to the creditors of the City of Glasgow Bank if it had been a reserve liability bank, with a reserve capital equal by computation to a multiple of five times its actual capital? Would they not have been disastrous? Had the right hon. Gentleman made up his mind that it would have been better, on the occasion of the failure which occurred, that the calamity should have fallen broadcast over Scotland, rather than that it should have fallen in the pitiable manner they knew of on the unfortunate shareholders? For his own part, he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) believed that the greater evil had been averted; for if the thousands of creditors—a body immensely more numerous than the shareholders—had to suffer, distrust would have spread to all other credit institutions, and the evil effects would have been felt in this country, and in Ireland, perhaps, as much as in Scotland. There was another consideration which weighed on his mind, to which he would ask attention. No attempt was made in this Bill, either to limit the amount of indebtedness a bank might incur or the amount of dividend it might declare. But the solvency of a bank, and of banks generally, could only be maintained by continuous attention to the amount of actual indebtedness, and its ratio to the paid-up capital, and by taking care that the dividends did not exceed actual profits, which could only be done by accumulating a fund out of apparent profits sufficient to cover the risk on current business in the worst of seasons. The Bill before the House touched none of these points, and yet he ventured to say they were as pressing and as important to the community at large as were those interests which the framers of the Bill desired to safeguard. Why should a trader, whether an individual or a Company, be allowed the privilege of contracting an unlimited amount of debt, and of dividing an unlimited amount of profit on the basis that he or it was unlimitedly liable; and then suddenly, when the business was in full swing, be allowed to restrict his liability for the future, without having placed upon him or on the Company any restriction whatever as to the extent of his or their future indebtedness, or as to the degree to which they might year by year deplete their estates by inordinate distribution of apparent rather than of real profits? He was prepared for a certain species of answer to this question. He would be told that the present Bill proposed to leave all present creditors in the position which they now occupied of having their recourse as against shareholders of an unlimited Company; and that if they, the creditors, were to be placed in a different position with respect to future deposits, they must be presumed to know the law, and to take knowingly, with the inferior security—to take the consequences. But was this really so? Well, all of them knew what had been done. Was it not of the very essence of this legislation that it was intended to enable banks to limit the liability of their shareholders, and yet avoid being classed as limited liability banks? The existing creditors of the bank undergoing transformation were to have no formal notice of what was being done. It was to be inserted in The Gazette and in a newspaper; and the creditors would be told, probably at the same time, by the same newspapers, that they were all quite safe, for the Act did not limit the liability of the bank to existing creditors. He would now explain how all that would work. The period of vigilance being once passed, the depositor would come in at the end of the half-year to get the interest on his deposit. The old deposit and interest would be paid him in the usual pro forma way, and he would get a new receipt for his principal money, possibly of the same amount, possibly for more or less than the old receipt. Whereupon the protection of the 5th section—sub-section 5—of the Bill was wholly gone, and the depositor would stand henceforth as a creditor, with inferior security, but without any consciousness of the change. He did not object to the limitation of the liability of the shareholders, if those concerned as creditors were made to understand exactly what was being done, and expressly consented that the nature of the obligation of the shareholders should be radically altered. There was nothing in the Bill to provide that such notice should be given. He had explained how the thing would actually work. There were numerous deposits in all the large unlimited liability banks, which were, in an equitable sense, unchanged for years. Nevertheless, there were scarcely any which were, in a strictly legal sense, more than a year old; and for this reason they were, for technical convenience, continually being paid off and re-lodged, sometimes re-lodged with additions, sometimes only partly re-deposited. He wanted to know what provision was made that the creditor, who would pursue in the future the system he had been accustomed to do in the past, should know that a radical, and possibly a fatal, change had been effected in the character of the security on which he had relied? There was no such provision in the Bill. Quite the contrary. The 7th section of the Bill was that which prescribed the process whereby an unlimited bank might be transformed into a reserve liability company. It dispensed altogether with that species of intelligible notice which a Court of Equity would prescribe before it permitted any individual debtor to divest himself of liability to his creditor in whole or in part. All that was required in the way of notice was an advertisement in The Gazette, which few ever read, and the publishing an advertisement for four weeks in a local newspaper, in which it might so happen that there would appear contemporaneously an article to inform its readers that the change in question was a formal matter, which did not affect existing depositors, no matter how long they might keep their money on deposit. He wished the House to bear in mind that the local paper which published such an assurance would be only stating what was literally true, and yet essentially misleading; for, as he had already explained, the 5th sub-section of Clause 5 provided that the limitation of liability should not apply to any debts or liability of the Company contracted prior to its registration. This was the dangerous sedative which would be made use of to lull all apprehensions until the transition had been accomplished. Custom and routine of business would do the rest, and no one—perhaps he should rather say very few—would appreciate what had been done, or forecast the results, until a bad season produced a crash entailing a far more numerous set of victims than even the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank produced amongst its shareholders. He could not see any sufficient reason for all this. Either the banks were safe, or they were not. If they were safe—that was to say, if the paid-up capital and the general assets of a bank were sufficient to enable it to pay its way—no harm could be done by allowing the shareholder to remain in the position he elected to occupy until he removed himself in the ordinary way. But if the banks were not safe, that was the very opposite to a valid reason for allowing the shareholders to divest themselves of their liability in a new and abnormal fashion. There were, however, some who said that the shareholders generally of a bank could not know for certain whether the banks were safe or not, and they—or so many of them as were good for anything—would sell out their shares if they could not limit their liability, and thus a less solvent class of shareholders would replace the present, and they would have a class of shareholders in future from whom, in case of emergency, less could be recovered than might be obtainable on the plan now proposed. He (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) doubted this altogether, and was quite convinced that it was wholly erroneous. There was no evidence—literally none whatever—to lead to any such conclusion. But, under the present system, let this be borne in mind—they had the security, such as it was, that the directors, who must be shareholders, were unlimitedly liable. Every director of an unlimited bank now knew that he was liable to his last farthing in the world, not merely for his own default, but for the misdeeds of his colleagues, if he trusted too much to them, and if they, from ignorance or otherwise, brought about a catastrophe. Were they about, also, to diminish the responsibility of directors? The present Bill, unless his (Sir Joseph M'Kenna's) Amendment to continue the unlimited liability of directors were accepted, would utterly sweep away the main source of such security as they had at present. If the present Bill were passed into law as it stood, they would have in the future directors of banks which had millions and scores of millions of money divesting themselves of all but the merest fraction of liability for the obligations which they had contracted. The directors of a bank ought to remain unlimitedly liable. They had the best means of knowing whether the Company was in a sound or a dangerous condition. If they did not really know, they were unfit for their position—they were blind guides, and worse than blind guides, if they assumed to discharge the duties of an office in which vigilance was as indispensable as honesty. If some such condition as this did not apply to directors, he would regard the Bill as creating a new danger.

MR. HEYGATE said, he had heard with considerable regret the remarks of the hon. Member who had just sat down; because he was sure that the Bill, in the modified form proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would meet a grievance which had been very generally felt, and that it would be very gratefully received by a large portion of the commercial community of the country. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer had done a very wise thing, after the last discussion, in eliminating that portion of the Bill which related to Scotland and Ireland. Let him remind hon. Members from Scotland and Ireland that no injustice whatever was done to them by the Bill being passed in reference to England alone. It would leave them in just the same position as they were before, and they would not be damaged in the slightest degree. Next year, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to attack the issuing power of Scotch and Irish banks as had been suggested, it would be found that English Members would be quite ready to come down and lend their assistance in opposing such a proposal; and he thought that Scotch Members would do very unwisely in attempting, at the present moment, to prevent England from obtaining what she wanted, merely because their own desires could not be quite satisfied. Such conduct would be a “dog in the manger” policy, and would do no good to either party. In the form the Bill would assume when it came to be amended in Committee, it would confer upon the shareholders of English banks a simple act of justice. Those shareholders did not ask for any special privilege or favour. What they did ask for was that an unintended disability should be removed. A law was now in existence which enabled all banks to adopt limited liability; but by one provision of that law those banks, which had been registered under it for some minor purposes, were unable to be re-registered so as obtain the benefit of limited liability. It was not a matter of favour or of generosity that was sought. What was asked for was, that that which was the result of accident and which occasioned what he had called an unintended liability should be removed. He would not follow hon. Members who had spoken through the details of the Bill; but was willing to admit that what had been said as to the auditing of accounts and the liability of directors was well worthy of consideration when they reached the Committee stage. He was no great believer in the safeguards which had been suggested, or in the possibility of the Bill providing against all danger of loss. He quite agreed that it was necessary, as had been argued, that "the public should be kept safe;" but what was required for true security was a solvent set of shareholders and a solvent and honest set of directors. The public would be much safer in having to deal with a substantial proprietary and directorate of a bank of limited liability than they would in the case of a bank of unlimited liability, the shareholders of which would, perhaps, be nowhere when calls were wanted. After the fearful disclosures that had lately been made and the panic which resulted from them, he did not think they would be able to retain or secure the substantial and solvent class of shareholders and directors which was desired if unlimited liability banks were not allowed to be registered, so as to limit the liability of their shareholders under the Joint Stock Companies Act, pursuant to the provisions of the Bill. He hoped that hon. Members from Scotland would not interpose in the way of a measure which was very much desired in this country, which would be simply an act of justice, and which certainly would not be in favour of any particular class, but for the general advantage of the community.

MR. RATHBONE considered it very desirable that the Bill should apply to the three countries alike; but those who had listened to the able speech of the junior Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) must have perceived the difficulties there were in the way of carrying out legislation on the subject in Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had promised to bring in a Bill to deal with the banks of Scotland, and he hoped the Scotch Members would not prevent the Bill being passed, but would give the measure under consideration the best support they could. He must say that any Committees he had sat upon for England had impressed him with the opinion that if they could bring the practical mind of Scotland to bear upon any one question a practical solution of it would be worked out of much benefit to England. When they heard from the junior Member for Glasgow how many difficulties there were as affecting the Scotch banks, one could not but think that the Scotch banking classes, if they would devote some time to the consideration of the whole subject, and give the Government the benefit of their deliberations, would work out an example which would be of the greatest advantage to the whole country; but, supposing this were not practicable, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer saw a chance of dealing with the Scotch system at present, then he had a suggestion to make which would facilitate dealing with the question in Scotland, and make their banking system much sounder. By Clause 9, those banks which were banks of issue as well as of deposit, were allowed to adopt a limited liability on reserving an unlimited liability for notes of issue. That did not appear to be the right way of dealing with the question. He was quite sure that anyone who had been watching banks must have felt that there was a great danger in the present system of issue by private banks. When the power of issue was given to those banks a great many of them were very different from what they were now. A bank might go on, wealthy partners might retire from it, and the talent which previously carried it on might disappear; but still the bank might go on with its peculiar privilege of issuing notes not possessed by other banks. Now, supposing some of these banks, becoming weaker, and less well managed, and hanging by a thread, were to stop in such a time of crisis as last autumn? What would be the effect? There would be a crisis of the general banking system. Now, it seemed to him, when any of these banks desired to possess a new privilege, they had a right to ask that they be put upon a safer footing; and he contended that no bank should be allowed to possess this especial privilege (except the Bank of England, which gave security) without depositing with the Government, as in some other countries, Consols for the amount of the entire issue. Look what a great danger that would remove. If everybody who held notes—and those who held notes were the least informed part of the community, and most liable to make a rush on the bank—if they knew that there was Government security for every note they held, the danger of a run upon issue banks for payment of notes would be absolutely done away with. That great danger would be avoided. He believed a measure of this kind would be popular, being a security both to the banks and the people, and the 3 per cent that the banks would get on their Consols would pay them. This he ventured to throw out as a suggestion to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as a sounder and safer mode of dealing with the banks of issue which desired to become limited. There was only another point to which he wished to advert—the question of the balance-sheets. Now, he confessed he did not place unlimited confidence in the issue of a balance-sheet; but, surely, the system ought to be one under which sound information should be afforded. If they were to issue a balance-sheet, they ought to make it thoroughly good; and he ventured to suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as a model, though it might not be perfect, the balance-sheet recently issued by the Union Bank. It gave an amount of detail not at unreasonable length. Such balance-sheets ought to issue at least every time the dividends were paid, and if the accounts were obliged to be verified by a certain number of directors—if they were verified by the signatures of a certain number of directors that they themselves had examined the securities, and that they were as stated, there would be some security as to the genuineness of the information, especially if such a statement were in the form of a statutory declaration, so that in case of intentional concealment, or culpable negligence, an indictable offence would be committed. He had no desire to detain the House on this important subject; but he thought the suggestions he had made were such as might be taken into consideration by the Government.

Mr. GARFIT said, that he apprehended the main object of the Bill was to enable unlimited Joint Stock Companies to carry on their business with a degree of limited liability, and it appeared to him to be a matter for regret that so many other questions which had nothing to do with the subject had been imported into the debate. It seemed to him that the House would have done better to confine itself to the object of seeing whether unlimited banks ought to be enabled to carry on their business as limited banks. He confessed that to him the Bill would not be a simple or a complete Bill unless Ireland and Scotland were included in it. With regard to that particular point as to Scotch banks coming to London, he thought they might be left in the same legal position as they were at present. If they had a legal right to be in London, let them remain there, always taking care that they did not issue in England, and that other banks were not allowed to come.

MR. M'LAREN said, that in the expectation that the Bill would come on as originally proposed, he had given Notice of the following Motion:—

“That the compulsory exclusion of Scotch Banking Corporations from the right to carry on certain departments of their business in London by means of branches established there, would be a violation of the fundamental articles of union between the two kingdoms.”

The Chancellor of the Exchequer had, however, proposed very important alterations, especially with regard to the position of Scotland. He had listened with great attention to the speech of the hon. Member for Boston who had just sat down, and he believed that he would be able to approve of every word that that hon. Member had uttered. He had pointed out what was the right way to legislate in regard to joint-stock banks—namely, that the principle to be pursued was that what was good for England was good for Scotland and Ireland, and that what was bad for England was also bad for Scotland and Ireland. The hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Heygate) seemed to think that Scotch Members were asking for special privileges for Scotland. Nothing could be more erroneous. No Member for Scotland had asked for any special privilege. They only asked that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in leaving out many clauses, should also leave out the 8th clause. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would leave out the 8th clause, and let the Bill apply to Scotland, then they would be perfectly contented. They would then offer no opposition to the Bill, but would endeavour to arrange all the clauses, and to come to terms in an amicable spirit, dealing equally with every portion of the United Kingdom. He held that the plan which had been proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was altogether opposed to the spirit of the Act of Union between England and Scotland. When they were brought together to negotiate the Treaty of Union as a United Kingdom, Scotland demanded and was given the right of trading equally with England abroad, in London, or in the Colonies. They insisted upon that as a fundamental principle, and that fundamental principle the Chancellor of the Exchequer's plan now proposed to do away with. When Commissioners were appointed to negotiate the Union of the two Kingdoms, it was first of all agreed that all proposals were to be put in writing, and the Minutes were to be found in the Library of the House. The Scotch Commissioners commenced by laying down three propositions—one with respect to the Crown, the second preserving the Church, and the third requiring equal rights of trading to all parts of the United Kingdom and the Colonies of England. The English Commissioners wished to keep these principles apart, and would have left out the third for future consideration; but the Scotch Commissioners objected to this, and would have the three principles conceded together, first of all, and they were thus agreed to. Now, here was a Bill which did not acknowledge that great principle of entire freedom of trade. The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed, as regarded England, that he would, during this Session, allow all the banks to do certain things; but that, as to all the banks of Scotland and Ireland, they were not to be allowed to do the same things. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that he would, next Session, bring in a Bill for Scotland and Ireland, and he had not the slightest doubt of the sincerity of the right hon. Gentleman; but it was one thing to bring in a Bill, and another thing to pass it, as they knew by sad experience. Well, this Bill for England would be passed; but the Bill next year for Scotland and Ireland might not be passed. The question would come up, why should this be? They asked for no special privileges whatever for Scotland; they asked for Scotch joint-stock banks to be allowed to do whatever English joint-stock banks were allowed to do, and with that they would be quite satisfied. That was so reasonable that if it were the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to bring in another Bill, he must put the Scotch banks on the same lines as the English banks would be put by this Bill. But, in doing so, he would be incurring an enormous amount of labour, and wasting a deal of time, by discussing another Bill on the subject, when he could accomplish all by simply leaving out the 8th clause, and making this Bill to apply to all parts of the United Kingdom. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not said that he would bring in a Bill on exactly the same lines—for anything they knew, he might bring in a Bill saying that the Scotch and Irish banks might have all the advantages which the English banks had, provided they would agree not to carry on their business in London. Where would they be then? England would have advantages which Scotland would not have. He held that that would be most unfair. Many Bills, it was true, were passed specially for Scotland, relating to feudal rights, questions of Scotch law, sheriffs, and all sorts of things; and in some matters the phraseology of an English Bill would not necessarily apply to Scotland. But in this Bill they were dealing with modern legislation, and the clauses would apply as well in Edinburgh as in London, and there was no apology whatever for not having the Three Kingdoms dealt with in one Bill if the Government really intended to introduce a similar Bill next Session applying to Scotland and Ireland. Some home hon. Members seemed to think that the speeches against the Bill were necessarily intended to bring about the insertion of clauses to remedy the effects of the recent failure; but no hon. Member had asked this. All they asked for was uniformity of legislation, and with whatever that might be they would be content. But still it was quite proper that the evils of the present system should be pointed out, and he would just mention one or two of them. He did not speak for the Scotch banks, but for the Scotch people. He spoke against monopoly, for the Scotch banks were the greatest trades unions in existence. A committee of three managers of banks in Edinburgh met, and decided what the rates of interest and for discounts should be, and all the banks, though not represented at the meeting, were bound by that small junta. The 11 banks of Scotland were practically one bank—not for the people of Scotland, but against them. He said that to show that he had no sympathy with anything done merely in the interests of the banks; but he had great sympathy with the people of Scotland. The state of matters was this. No new bank could possibly establish itself, and hence the monopoly. One reason of this was that the Bank of England had established no branches in Scotland. It had gone to Newcastle; but it had not gone to Edinburgh. It should have gone to Edinburgh, Glasgow, and other large towns, and then new banks would have been established issuing Bank of England notes. New banks were not allowed to issue bank notes of their own, and they had no means of carrying on their business, because they had not the Bank of England to fall back upon. They could only depend on other banks, and issue their notes, and this was to place themselves in a secondary and a humiliating position. He hoped that some day the Chancellor of the Exchequer would see his way to bring in a Bill, and carry it through, to abolish the monopoly which now existed to the great injury of the people of Scotland. He would now say a word about reserved liability. He spoke with diffidence; but his impression was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made a mistake in agreeing that a reserved liability would be obtained by increasing the liability by one-half of the paid-up capital. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that if a bank of unlimited liability had a capital of £1,000,000, it might secure a reserved liability by increasing its capital to £1,500,000. If he were right in that understanding, he thought the £500,000 was far too small a sum. In the case of the unfortunate City of Glasgow Bank, its capital was £1,000,000; the shareholders numbered 1,200; but it had 50,000 depositors. Sympathy was felt for the 1,200 shareholders; but no sympathy was shown in the Bill for the 50,000 depositors. If that had been a Limited Liability Bank, the result would have been that the other property of the shareholders would have been saved; but the 50,000 depositors would not have got a penny. No doubt, it was a very great hardship that the liquidators had called up $27\frac{1}{2}$ times the amount of the shares of the bank, so that every man who had £1,000 worth of shares was called upon to pay £27,500 to meet the liability. The failure of the Glasgow Bank was a very great calamity—the greatest of the kind that had ever occurred in the United Kingdom. But what might have been the case? Suppose the gentlemen who, it was believed, were able to pay, had not been liable to calls, what would have become of the 50,000 depositors and other creditors? Would not the hardship have been still greater for them? With the directors and shareholders it was practically a system of gambling, and if the gambling succeeded they got the profits; but if it failed they would, under the Chancellor of the Exchequer's suggestion, lose nothing but the capital. He pressed upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer that when a bank had a paid-up capital of, say, £1,000,000, and an enormous number of depositors, the bank should not be entitled to a reserved liability freeing them from all consequences if they merely became bound for an additional capital of £500,000. It was an unjust proposal—unjust to the people—and it ought not to pass. A good deal had been said about the chartered banks, and that their liability was restricted. He knew that the opinion of Scotch lawyers was that the liability of chartered banks was a restricted one, and that they were free from all liability beyond their capital; but that question had never yet been decided in a Court of Law, either in England or Scotland. The Courts of Law in Scotland had held, by eight Judges against four, that trustees were not liable as shareholders, and one of the eight was one of the most distinguished men who ever sat on the Scotch Bench—Lord Colonsay; but the Lord Chancellor, on an appeal to the House of Lords, threw the opinion of eight Scotch Judges to the winds, and so it might be with respect to the assumed non-liability of the chartered banks, if the question ever came to the House of Lords. He cordially approved of the Motion that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, unless the Chancellor of the Exchequer would modify his proposals, and agree, in addition, to leave out all the clauses he had mentioned; also to leave out the 8th clause, and make the Bill apply to the whole of the United Kingdom.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought the discussion had mainly turned on the point to which it was likely to be drawn, according to the Amendments placed on the Paper; but it had taken a somewhat different range from that which it would have taken had it not been for the announcement which he made at the beginning of the debate. The point which had been urged both by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) and others who had spoken on the subject seemed to be this—that it would be desirable, and in some degree necessary, that they should deal with the United Kingdom as a whole in the matter of banking. He was quite prepared to say that, in the abstract, that was a very sound proposition, and there was nothing he should like better than to be able to deal with the United Kingdom as a whole; but hon. Members from Scotland and Ireland should consider what that implied. It implied a great deal more than the mere passing of a Bill of the character of that before the House. There were great differences between the banking systems of England and Scotland. Scotland and Ireland were very nearly on the same footing. England and Scotland were more prominently brought into comparison; and there were some points on which they must legislate if there was to be one united system. First of all, were they to have the same system of note issues? Were they to allow notes below £5 to be issued in England, or were they to curtail the issues of small notes in Scotland? That question, on both sides of which a good deal might be said, would have to be dealt with if both countries were to be placed on the same footing; but that was a small point in comparison with the question on what basis were they to allow banks to conduct their issues at all? In England banks were entitled to issue notes to a fixed amount, ascertained by a calculation made of their circulation in the year 1844, and they could issue no more than the sum thus set down to their credit; in Scotland they had not only a fixed amount they could issue, but an indefinite amount over that, against which they were supposed to hold a certain amount of gold;

but that holding of gold as against notes, as the hon. Member for Glasgow had pointed out, was a very imperfect security, and one which required very careful consideration. If they meant to extend that power to England, it might lead to considerable difficulty. Were they to extend that system to England, or do away with it in Scotland? That was a difficulty they must deal with, if both systems were to be placed on the same footing. Then, as to the privileges of the banks. In England banks of issue were not allowed to have establishments in London, whereas Scotch banks claimed that right, and had it. This would be another difficulty in putting the United Kingdom on a common footing. But if there was not the same footing altogether, it was by no means an easy thing to pass any single Act which was to apply to them all. He did endeavour in this Bill to deal with the whole of the United Kingdom, guarding himself by the introduction of the 8th clause in the Bill; but he quite admitted that that mode of proceeding was one open to comment, and he was not at all surprised at some of the objections urged against it. He had, therefore, thought that it would be wiser and more prudent that they should deal with the English banks alone, and leave the Scotch and Irish banks to be considered by themselves. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), in his very able speech, pointed out one thing which showed how very difficult it would be to apply this Bill to Scotland, because he had said that if the Bill were law the Scotch banks would not come under it. He thought that had reference not to the 8th clause only, but to the general effect of the Bill, and the difference that would exist between the chartered banks, which already claimed to have limited liability, without the use of the name, and the other banks which were distinctly unlimited, and which had, according to the Bill, to take the title of limited. He understood one of the objections urged by the Scotch banks was that they would be obliged to take a title that would create uneasiness, and seem to place them in a position of inferiority to other banks that did not require to make a change of name, though claiming the privilege of limited liability. That was a difficulty which did not occur in the same way in England. If, then, the Bill was, as he hoped, fairly suited to the wants of the English banks, and was not suited to the wants of the Scotch banks, was it not wiser to proceed in the way which had been followed hitherto, and to legislate for England according to English wants, and for Scotland according to Scotch wants? He agreed that there was a much more perfect ideal to be aimed at, and he should be exceedingly glad if they could see their way to attain it. Very important remarks had been made by the hon. Members for Glasgow, Inverness, and Edinburgh, who were opposed to the present monopoly of the Scotch banks. Those observations should guide the House in its policy of legislation on that subject; but this was too large and important a question to be entered upon at the present time. It was a matter which required to be dealt with, and he hoped to be able to deal with it in another Session. But he did not see why the leaving of that question over for the present was a reason for stopping a measure which was likely to be of advantage to English banks. He was sure that nothing could be further from the wishes of hon. Members from Scotland than to adopt a dog-in-the-manger policy, and to stop English banks from obtaining an advantage to their business, because it was not possible to deal with the Scotch banks. He would ask the House seriously to consider if it was possible to deal with the Scotch system of banking fully and properly unless in a Bill limited to Scotland, and if it was possible, at the present period of the Session, to inaugurate such a piece of legislation as that. He hoped the House would be willing to read the Bill a second time, and to commit it pro forma, and allow it to proceed as an English Bill, and not stop it because it was not possible at present to deal with the whole system of banking.

MR. SHAW said, the object of the Bill was a very simple one—namely, to enable bank companies to transform themselves from unlimited to limited liability companies. The question whether the latter should be termed limited, or reserved liability, was quite another matter. The question of issue in Scotland or Ireland never entered into their contemplation at all as being part and parcel of the Bill; and he could not see why it should have been referred to now, except it were to show that hon. Members from Scotland felt there was a rod in pickle for them next year, when this question would again come up. There was no reason why the few clauses of the Bill should not be applied to the three parts of the Kingdom. He did not know whether banks would benefit by the measure in the long run, for its operation might be, in some respects, detrimental to business. But the most important matter now to be considered was whether they should make the change now asked for on so important a subject at a moment like the present. It was very doubtful whether, at this period of the Session, the Bill could possibly pass. He had himself proposed that it should be referred to a Select Committee, and, in doing so, he had anticipated that it would have been read a second time some months ago, so that he would have had time to have considered it. He feared, with all the difficulties that were cropping up, it could not now pass; and he doubted the wisdom of tinkering with the question in the present sensitiveness of the public mind about all matters of business, and particularly about banking. They were told they were to have a larger measure referring to the Three Kingdoms. Would it not be well to defer dealing with this question which, though a small one, would be large in its results? The Recess would not be lost, if the bankers devoted it to a full consideration of the subject. Reference had been made to the difficulties that were always met with when legislation was attempted on the question of bank issues. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had it in his power to give a quid pro quo, and to say—"You want to restrict your liability; do so by all means; but you must do something to meet my wishes. You cannot come into the privileged position I am about to make for you, except you can give up something yourselves." Why should there be three descriptions of banks? Why make more disturbance than was necessary? Why not invent a system that all banks could glide into, if they yielded to the proposals of the Government? For his part, he would not attempt to obstruct the Bill. He granted that the measure was one of importance for the interests of the country. He was told that the directors and shareholders in unlimited banks were very anxious for it, because they desired to free themselves from their liabilities. Still, the law of the land was such that they could not get away from its present operation for two years; and he again asked, would it not be wise, when business was in its present nervous state, and the country was in a condition bordering on collapse, to leave the question alone until next Session, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer could bring in a Bill to deal with the question in all its aspects? He, therefore, urged the advisability of postponing the Bill.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM regretted that the Government had abandoned the 8th clause, to which he attached great importance. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to be sanguine of facilitating legislation next Session by the experience gained this Session; but next Session he would have to face the opposition of Scotch and Irish Members, accompanied with the avowed indifference of those who represented the banks in the Midland districts of England. It was said the Scotch banks demanded no privilege at all; but they had no need to make such demand, because they were already in possession of privileges. All that was required by bankers in the North of England was that they should be placed on equal terms. The Act of Sir Robert Peel was passed years ago, when the present condition of things, resulting from the increase of commerce, was not anticipated; and what the bankers of the North of England said was that the Scotch bankers should abandon their privileges and meet the English banks on equal terms. Did the House realize the anomalous state of things now existing? The Clydesdale Bank was a large and powerful Scotch bank, with branches in England, and it had a branch in the main street of Carlisle, close to the Cumberland and Union Bank; and there was this absurdity—that while the Clydesdale Bank could transact its London business through its own London office the Carlisle Bank could not, but was obliged to transact it where it could, or else give up its right of issue. Let the Scotch bank give up its right of issue and meet the Carlisle bank on equal terms; or, if it retained its right of issue in London, let it give up its branches in the country. The English bank could not cross the Border, but the Scotch bank could, because it was required to have less capital locked up. They ought to be placed on equal terms; and, on that account, he regretted that the Government had given way. He did not believe there was any great probability of next Session affording more favourable opportunity for legislation than the present. By giving way on this occasion, they would have created a feeling of great disappointment in the Northern counties, where all that was asked for was fair play and nothing more.

MR. CHILDERS desired to remind the House of the circumstances in which the Bill came before them. If a Bill of this character had been introduced last year, he did not think half-a-dozen Members would have been found to say that such legislation was necessary. Limited and unlimited banks had gone through the panic of 1866, if with considerable danger in more than one case, without coming to Parliament to ask for such legislation as the present Bill provided. Again, several of the greatest banks had been much shaken at the time of the Collie frauds, when more than one had large amounts of their reserves taken away, and yet they never came to Parliament with such a proposal as this. If, again, at the commencement of the year money had been worth 1 per cent, as now, it would not have been thought necessary to entertain such a Bill. But the frauds that came to light last autumn in connection with the City of Glasgow Bank, and the consequent pressure experienced by banks in London and the country, had produced such a state of feeling with reference to the security of unlimited banks that the Government, at the commencement of the present Session, when the state of trade and the value of money were different from what they were now, were pressed on all hands to do something in connection with such banks, and that was the origin of the present Bill. If it had been proposed last year to deal with the banking question, the great majority of those who thought the subject called for legislation would have said that the question of issue was the paramount question to be considered by Parliament, and anything approaching to a proposal to pick out unlimited banks for special legislation would have been set aside, because hardly any unlimited bank would have desired to be put on the footing of limited liability, and no considerable part of the commercial world desired that unlimited banks should be so dealt with. This Bill was, therefore, especially the outcome of the panic of last year; and now that the panic was over, no one was surprised that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was obliged to modify it. However, the main provision which remained in the revised proposal was for enabling banks with unlimited liability in some manner to reduce it—and this was a matter of principle which could well be treated by itself—with the subsidiary provisions for the protection of the public in respect of note issue where unlimited banks issued notes. The other parts of the Bill approached more nearly to what had been called grandmotherly legislation, that most mischievous tendency to protect by law one member of the community against another in matters of purely voluntary business. Happily the Bill avoided many of the reckless and absurd proposals that were made in the Press during the Recess as to inspection and audit, and interference with banking at almost every stage. Still, the Bill dealt largely with those arrangements between directors and shareholders which, as a rule, were much better left to themselves; and in this respect he hoped some improvement would be made in Committee. But, as he had said, the main object of the Bill was to enable unlimited banks to become limited, and the Bill appeared to carry out that change in what seemed to him to be, perhaps, the most satisfactory way in which it could be effected. They could not conceal from themselves that it was by an oversight that the change could not be made under the existing law. Of course, the change ought not to be made to the detriment of the existing creditor by diminishing his security; and because the Bill was fair in this respect he thought it ought to receive a second reading. The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not expect that all the changes that he had shadowed forth would facilitate the passing of the Bill through Committee. For instance, he had proposed that limited as well as unlimited banks should have power to become banks of reserved liability; but every shareholder in a limited bank had definitely fixed his liability, and it ought not to be increased without his consent. This was a very different matter from saying that a majority of shareholders should be enabled to reduce their liability. As to the Scotch and Irish banks, he confessed to feeling some difficulty. He was not prepared to admit that the evasion of the Act of 1845 was unimportant; still, it was a separate matter, and did not really touch the question of limited liability. On the whole, he was prepared to support the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if leaving the Scotch and Irish provisions till next Session would enable the important part of the Bill to pass now. But he would, at the same time, remind the House that the Bill morely dealt with the fringe of the banking question, so far as the public interest in the security of the note issues was concerned, and that this as a whole was now ripe for discussion. With these reservations, he trusted the House would pass the Bill.

MR. BIRLEY said, he was very glad that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Childers) was prepared to give his support to the second reading. It had been very truly said that the Bill was much desired by the banking community of England; and he thought that hon. Members ought to give credit to the bankers of England for knowing enough of their own business to understand the merits of this Bill. A good deal had been said about the panic out of which the Bill was supposed to have originated; but he thought the Bill might claim a more deliberative character. There were many points on which great differences of opinion existed, and he did not pretend to deal with all the clauses; yet, in the main, he was of opinion it would cure a very serious grievance. What was the real difficulty in regard to unlimited banks? It had arisen, no doubt, in great measure from the City of Glasgow Bank panic—that was to say, attention had been more pointedly called to the matter. It was now found that many persons who formerly believed they were not liable beyond the amount they had invested were aware that they were liable to forfeit their whole property, and it was also found that trustees incurred the same liability. Until the law was altered that must continue, not only to the injury of trustees and others, but to the prejudice of the proprietary of the banks. They could not expect to maintain a proprietary of a substantial character unless they could get persons of substantial means on the proprietary. See how this would affect a man of large fortune. The moment he died, if he himself had been a prudent man, or if his executors were prudent men, his shares must go into the market, and the consequence would be that shares in unlimited banks would be rapidly withdrawn. This in itself would be a misfortune, as it would diminish public confidence in the banks. He would not refer to other points, however interesting; but he could not sit down without expressing the hope that the opposition which had been raised against the second reading of the Bill would be withdrawn.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would reconsider his determination to except Irish and Scotch banks. Failing that, they would have the whole discussion over again next Session. They might, he was sure, carry a Bill of this kind if they chose to do so. Of course, those who were opposed to private issues would, if the 8th clause was abandoned, become strong opponents of the Bill. He agreed that the English banks were placed at a great disadvantage in competing with the Scotch banks. If the Cumberland Union, or any other English bank, sent a cheque into Scotland a commission had to be paid; while, on the contrary, Scotch banks could collect cheques throughout England free of charge. The hon. Member for Glasgow had pointed out very clearly some of the disadvantages accruing to Scotland from the monopoly of the Scotch banks; but he objected that it would be unjust to turn them out of England. The Bill, however, now before the House did not do so; but coupled the new privileges to be given with a certain condition, and it would be optional with the banks whether they adopted the Bill or not. But it must be remembered that in coming to England the Scotch banks certainly broke not only the spirit of the law, but, in the opinion of high legal authorities, the letter also. There could be no doubt that Sir Robert Peel's intention was to apply the same principle to Scotland, and, in fact, the general opinion long was that he had done so. Nay, more, evidence was given before the Committee which sat upstairs on the question some four years ago that the Scotch banks in opening branches in England were actually breaking the law. That was the opinion of Sir James Stephen, of Sir Henry Thring, and of Lord Selborne, who was consulted on the subject by one of the Scotch banks. The English banks felt that it was very hard that the Scotch banks should enjoy privileges which were denied to them. They only asked for justice. The English Country Bankers' Association had issued a Memorial on this subject, in which it was stated that they unanimously, and very naturally, asked that if Scotch banks desired to compete with English banks they should do so on equal terms. For his part, he thought it very important that this question should be settled now; and he believed it would be desirable that it should be settled according to the original form of the Bill and for the United Kingdom.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN confessed he had heard with regret that the Government proposed to confine this Bill to England, and he was glad to agree with the hon. Member who had just sat down, though for very different reasons. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to think that he had disposed of the question before the House and vindicated the proposal of the Government, when he pointed out the great difference between the banking arrangements and laws in the three parts of the United Kingdom. It was true that the laws relating to issue, and, indeed, the whole circumstances of banks, were different in the three countries. It was true that there was a monopoly in Scotland; but that fact had really nothing to do with the question they had to consider. The Bill before them was one affecting the liability of proprietors and shareholders in banks, and applied to the conditions under which they should hold their shares. But it had nothing to do with the Scotch issue under the authority of the Government, or to any of those complicated questions to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred. His hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh said that what was good for England was good for Scotland. He might have gone further, and said that if there was one part of the world in which this Bill was required it was Scotland. A great bank with unlimited liability, as they all knew, failed last autumn, and caused a stupendous calamity in Scotland. There was a desire, almost a universal desire, in the interest not only of the shareholders in banks, but of the general public, to see some limitation imposed upon the responsibility of shareholders in banks. The Government had to consider also their own interests, and as responsible for the issue they had preserved the full liability of banks in regard to issue in this Bill. They proposed that unlimited banks should have the power of converting themselves into limited liability companies; but the first thing the right hon. Gentleman did was, so far as Scotch banks were concerned, to attach to this privilege conditions which made it perfectly futile. He was not going to follow the hon. Member for Maidstone in discussing the 8th clause, as to the Scotch banks coming to London. This subject was considered before a Committee a few years ago, and if it had then been thought that Scotch banks should be excluded, why did the Committee never make such a recommendation? It merely reported its evidence. The hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) said he had high legal authority for saying that the Scotch banks had no right to come to London; but there was high legal authority adduced before that Committee on the other side. The question was so difficult to settle in the direction of the hon. Member for Maidstone that the Committee made no Report; but merely reported their evidence, and no action had been taken on the subject since. But now the right hon. Gentleman, in not only a singular, but he might almost say a shabby way, wished to attach to this measure a condition which would exclude the Scotch banks from London. And yet—would the House believe it?—that condition would not have been applicable to the particular bank that had been mentioned. The bank never was in London at all. What happened was this—a certain bank failed, and caused a widespread calamity. Then it was said—“Let us prevent this for the future; let us have a limit to the liability of shareholders; and let us prevent Scotch banks from coming to London.” But that bank never came to London. In fact, one strong argument in favour of excluding the Scotch banks from London was that it was said that they would enter into speculative business if they came to London, which they would avoid if they remained in Scotland. But the case of the City of Glasgow Bank showed that nowhere could such speculative business be conducted more completely and more ruinously than in Scotland itself. The hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) complained, and very properly, of the position of the Cumberland Bank. The hon. Member said that the Clydesdale Bank was in Cumberland, and the Cumberland banks had restrictions, while the Scotch bank had not. He agreed with him; but as to the remedy he would say, remove the restrictions from the English banks rather than impose them on the Scotch. He doubted whether Scotch banks had done wisely in coming to London; but having come, it would be unfair to remove them and deprive them of a lucrative business. The Government having thought it impossible to go on with the 8th clause, they then proposed to confine the Bill to England, and there was at least some consistency in their conduct. Their original proposal was to turn the Scotch banks out of London because a bank had failed which never came to London at all; and their present proposal was, because a Scotch bank had failed and spread ruin around it, to confine their remedial measure to England alone. They were consistent in this—that both proposals missed the point of the case. Now, the House was asked to wait till next year for similar legislation for Scotland and Ireland; but they did not know what might happen next year, or what sort of Bill would be introduced. For his part, he did not regard the Scotch system of banking with perfect admiration; and so far as the position of the Scotch banks at present was concerned, he believed that if the Government would deal with that great, important, and delicate question, they would receive considerable assistance from all parts of the House. But, in the meantime, they wished to secure for these banks the advantage of this Bill, which had nothing to do with the question of issue; and he was afraid the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in confining it to England, would find the Scotch Members little disposed to assist him in passing it.

MR. MUNDELLA thought it would be very much to be regretted, in the interests of commerce, if a Bill were not passed this Session dealing with the liability of banks. It was a pity, he thought, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have mixed up the two questions of issue and liability; he seemed to connect the two questions in his mind when addressing them on the subject, as well as in the Bill. He thought it would have been better if the Bill had been confined to the one question of liability, and extended to the Three Kingdoms alike. If it were admitted, for the sake of argument, that the Scotch had a considerable advantage over the English with respect to issue, it would not increase that advantage that they should be placed on an equality with their neighbours regarding liability. What was more, there was no use contending that they would accomplish anything by attempting to thrust the Scotch banks out of London. The fact was, that the banks doing the largest business were Scotch banks of limited liability, and in no respect affected by this measure; so that, while Parliament were endeavouring to drive a bargain on this matter, they were creating a feeling of soreness on the part of the shareholders of the unlimited banks of Scotland, and doing nothing to satisfy the greed, or at least the grievance, which the London banks had against the Scotch banks. It had been said that the public mind was in a peculiar condition on this subject. Well, he thought that if a Bill was passed dealing with one branch of the question it would go far to allay any feelings of that kind. They did not want grandmotherly legislation; but it was fair to expect that the Government would facilitate any change from a condition of unlimited liability, which was found, after all, to limit the business of the country, to one of reserved or limited legislation. He did not see the difficulty of effecting a change from unlimited liability to reserved liability. In the majority of cases, he thought the change would not be so difficult as had been supposed. In any case, he hoped that they would all, English, Irish, and Scotch Members, facilitate the passing of the Bill this Session, in order to restore the confidence of the country.

MR. LAING thought the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) must be a sufficient proof that Scotch Members were not actuated by mere vague apprehensions, nor pursuing what was called a dog-in-the-manger policy, if they objected to partial legislation, which would leave the fate of Scotland to be decided in another Session. There was no doubt that in the Bill, as originally introduced, Clause 8 was really an instrument for deciding by a side-wind a great banking controversy brought up in that House and the country a few years ago, as to the admission of Scotch bankers to London. That was a very large question, upon which a great deal was to be said; but the practical result was to lead to a combination of London banks for the purpose of excluding Scotch bankers from London. Whatever legal opinion they might have obtained as to the existing law of the case, they had never ventured to test that opinion by bringing it before a Court of Law. A Committee was appointed to consider the subject, and, practically, the result was nil—they reported evidence, but offered no opinion. He was not going to argue now whether it was a right thing that Scotch banks, under these circumstances, should be allowed to come to London or not. There was something to be said on both sides of the question; but, looking at it from a public point of view, he thought it was impossible to deny that it was for the benefit of the trade and commerce of London and the Empire generally that a portion of the vast deposits which were attracted into Scotch banks by the system pursued there should be able to find some employment in a discount business in London, because they could not find legitimate employment at home to the full extent, without being driven into wild speculations, such as those which proved ruinous in the case of the Glasgow Bank. At any rate, it was not found possible to persuade a competent Committee of that House to report in favour of the exclusion of the Scotch banks, or to induce the Chancellor of the Exchequer to introduce a Bill directly attacking the system, and putting an end to it; and, therefore, the members of Scotch banks had great reason to feel alarmed when they found an attempt by a side-wind to do that which the Government were afraid to do directly. There could not be any reasonable doubt that if the Bill were passed in its present shape, and confined to England, the Scotch banks next Session would find themselves in great jeopardy of having the question of coming to London not decided upon its own merits, but made one of the conditions of availing themselves of a certain privilege. The jealousy which Scotland felt in this respect was not confined to bank managers and shareholders; but the people of Scotland generally felt attached to their existing system of banking. The very basis of that system had been that, owing to the power of issuing notes, especially £1 notes, the banks had been able to multiply and extend their branches in that country to an extent which was quite unknown in England. Well, no one who was at all practically acquainted with Scotland could doubt that that had been one of the main causes of the great prosperity of Scotland. It had been the main cause of those habits of thrift in the Scotch character which had been the foundation of the great progress which that country had made. Why, in the most out-of-the-way districts in the Highlands, they found in some small town of 2,000 or 3,000 inhabitants two or three banks doing a large business, attracting a large amount of deposits, and doing exceedingly useful work in that part of the country. That system had always been viewed with a certain amount of disfavour in England, and had been exposed to repeated attacks. To go as far back as 1828, they all know that the Scotch £1 notes were only saved from extinction owing to the panic which then ensued by a series of able letters published by Sir Walter Scott, which excited a strong national feeling on the subject. Again, in 1844, they all knew that if Sir Robert Peel had had his way, and some of the political economists who supported him in the Act of that year, they would have restricted or prohibited the issue of paper altogether in Scotland. There had been not merely a quarrel between the London bankers and the Scotch bankers as to establishing agents in London, but there had been a long and persistent jealousy of the Scotch system of banking prevailing among influential classes in England; and, therefore, it was a matter of considerable anxiety in Scotland that any Bill touching the banking interests of the country which was brought forward should be not partial but comprehensive in its character, and introduced at a period of the Session when it could be fully considered and discussed by the country and that House before any measures were finally adopted. As regarded the necessity of proceeding with any measure at all at this period of the Session, he must say he disagreed so entirely with the arguments of his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) that he would hardly have thought of repeating them to the House if it had not been that he disagreed with them. His right hon. Friend argued that the Bill was one which no one would have thought of introducing or supporting, if it had not been for an isolated catastrophe to a Scotch bank which created a panic; and then he went on to state, with great truth, that the panic had in a great measure passed away. On that point, he (Mr. Laing) should wish to bear his humble testimony as far as it went, because he had heard it asserted very broadly in that House that this was a measure imperatively called for by the present interests of commerce. He did not agree with that conclusion. He thought this Bill was called for by a certain number of nervous shareholders; but as regarded the general commercial world, there never was a time when there was less banking panic or less distrust in the great banks than at the present moment. They had just completed a period when a number of these banks had submitted their balance-sheets, and made reports for the half-year; and he ventured to say there was not one of the balance-sheets issued by those great institutions which had not given very great satisfaction to the commercial community. As regarded the suggestion which had been made of Government interfering and laying down a stereotyped form of audit, he would say, read the City articles in the newspapers for the last fortnight, and what did they find? They found articles commenting on different systems of audit introduced by the different joint-stock banks, condemning one and commending another, and showing how a very great emulation had been going on amongst those institutions in order to improve the form of balance-sheet and inspire confidence in the public. The Union Bank had brought its balance-sheet as near to perfection as the complicated system of banking accounts would admit. And how much better was this state of things than to have one stereotyped system under an Act of Parliament, admitting of no improvement, and inspiring a false confidence on the part of the public, from the idea that there was no possibility of loss under it. He must say that if ever there was a subject to be approached deliberately it was the great question of banking, and any Bill which touched that question should be referred to a carefully-chosen Select Committee to be discussed in all its provisions. He positively denied that there was anything like a necessity for proceeding with the Bill at the present time, and did not think the slightest harm would be done in any circle of legitimate business if the consideration of it were to stand over till next Session. He did not see why, subject to existing liabilities, any bank in future might not go upon the principle of limited or reserve liability, provided only these two conditions were observed—first, that if it was a bank of issue it must make proper provision for its notes; and, secondly, it must so register the condition of its capital and the liability on its shares as to give perfect information to anyone who might be disposed to deal with it. If he might venture to advise the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would suggest that he should not encounter the opposition which he would have to meet from important interests connected with Scotland and Ireland for the sake of passing an imperfect Bill for which there was no hurry, but withdraw this measure and introduce another next Session, the details of which might be carefully elaborated in a well-constituted Select Committee of the House.

MR. GOLDNEY expressed his belief that if they allowed the Bill to be read a second time, as had been suggested by the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), they would give very great satisfaction to the whole commercial community, and especially to the banking portion of it; and they might take the discussion as to whether the measure should extend to the Three Kingdoms or not on going into Committee.

MR. W. HOLMS confessed he had listened with very great surprise to the announcement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he proposed to withdraw Scotland and Ireland from the Bill, more especially as an opinion had been expressed in that House, over and over again, in favour of having uniform legislation for the Three Kingdoms. It appeared to him that the Bill, which contained only two provisions,—namely, that for limiting the liability of Companies on the one hand, and for providing a Government audit on the other, was so simple that it might equally apply to the Three Kingdoms. Moreover, it appeared to him that the true reason why the Chancellor of the Exchequer had withdrawn Scotland and Ireland from the Bill was to be found in the fact that the Government believed they could not carry this Bill with the 8th clause in it. For his part, he distinctly objected to that clause. Practically, the Bill, if passed with that clause, would put the three countries in this position—it would provide that unlimited Companies in England might unconditionally accept all the provisions of the Bill; but as regarded Irish and Scotch banks they should only obtain them on certain onerous conditions, because conditions were surely onerous which would compel great Companies to give up lucrative businesses which were now being carried on in England. He ventured to characterize the 8th clause as a London banker's clause; and it was unfair to Scotland and Ireland that the Government should have, as it were, smuggled into this Bill a provision which had practically nothing to do with the real object of the Bill. They were told that if they would only agree to this Bill now they would have two Bills introduced next Session—one for Scotland, and the other for Ireland—but what sort of Bills would they be? They would, in all probability, be very much upon the same lines as the 8th clause, which had nothing whatever to do with the principle of the measure. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would withdraw the 8th clause, and allow the Bill to apply to Scotland and Ireland as well as to England, he (Mr. Holms), as a Scotch Member, would give him his hearty support in carrying the Bill. As to the amount to which the liability of shareholders should be reduced, he expressed his conviction, from the experience afforded by the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, that the shareholders in unlimited banks would be only too glad to be called upon to pay five or even ten times the amount of their original capital. He would, therefore, suggest that in any Bill which might be proposed, whether for England or for the Three Kingdoms, reserved liability should not be one-half more than the paid-up capital, but three or four or even five times that amount. He thoroughly agreed with the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) that this was not a question to be dealt with in a hurry. The present Bill was in the nature of a panic Bill; it was brought in in consequence of a panic; and it would not command the confidence of the public, unless it was based upon thoroughly sound principles. Under all the circumstances, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would carefully re-consider the question, and take the course originally proposed of having only one Bill for the Three Kingdoms. The people of Scotland and Ireland would otherwise not consider themselves fairly treated. The hon. Gentleman was proceeding to point out that the result of the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank was greatly to the credit of the shareholders from the manner in which they had surrendered their property, and to the people of Glasgow who had voluntarily raised no less than a third of a million to alleviate the suffering, which had been occasioned when—

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till this day.

LORD CLERK REGISTER (SCOTLAND)
BILL.—[BILL 196.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Cross.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 7, inclusive, agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 8 (Treasury to appoint to offices in Register of Sasines, &c.).

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON) moved, in page 2, at the end of the clause, to insert as a new paragraph—

“The Commissioners of Her Majesty’s Treasury shall have power to fix the salaries and emoluments attached to any of the offices aforesaid, and, with the consent of one of Her Majesty’s principal Secretaries of State, to regulate any of the said offices, and to change the designations thereof and the duties of officers employed therein, and the terms on which appointments shall be made thereto.”

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON) moved, in page 2, after Clause 8, to insert the following clause:—

(Superannuation of officers.)

“All appointments hereafter made to any of the offices aforesaid shall entitle the holders thereof to superannuation upon such conditions as the Commissioners of Her Majesty’s Treasury, having regard to ‘The Superannuation Act, 1859,’ shall prescribe: Provided, That it shall be lawful to the said Commissioners, if, and so far as they see fit, to grant superannuations to the holders of such offices before the passing of this Act, although they may not have obtained certificates from the Civil Service Commissioners.”

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked, what was the intention of the clause?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON) stated, that it was one of the leading purposes of the Bill that these officers should receive their appointments from and be removable by the Treasury; and the object of the last clause, which had been very carefully adjusted, was to make them Civil servants. There were men in the Office who had served for a long period, but who were not originally appointed as Civil servants, and one main object of the proposed clause was to enable the Treasury to retire them on Civil Service allowances.

MR. M’LAREN could assure the hon. Member for Forfarshire that this clause had been very carefully considered in Edinburgh, and that it had received the sanction of everybody concerned in it.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he was only surprised that so important a clause should have been originally left out of the Bill.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON), said the clause had been inserted in substitution for another one which secured the same object, but less efficiently.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. M’LAREN said, that in the absence of the noble Earl the Member for the County of Edinburgh (the Earl of Dalkeith), he wished to move the insertion of a new clause, of which the noble Earl had given Notice, with respect to the regulating the office of sheriffs’ clerks, and placing it under the control of the deputy clerk-register.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the moving of this clause would necessitate the adjournment of the Committee.

MR. M’LAREN said, in that case he would not press it.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

civilization in the shape of missionaries and steam ploughs. The Armenian Papers had lately been moved for by Lord Carnarvon in "another place," and the Motion had been agreed to, so that it was unnecessary that he should ask for them. A sad change, however, had been shown by the debate. Lord Salisbury's splendid list of reforms, included in his despatch of the 8th of August of last year, had become "impossible" in his speech of the 27th of June. Not only had the 61st Article of the Treaty not been carried into effect, but the 62nd Article, also, was shamefully violated in Armenia. The troops which were needed to restore order in the Provinces were sent to Thessaly, and placed under the command of that abominable miscreant, Chefket Pasha, in order to crush the Greeks and prevent the will of Europe being carried into effect. Lord Salisbury, as would be found at page 210 of the Protocols, had said the object of the proposal with regard to Armenia, which was ultimately agreed to by the Congress, was "immediate amelioration" as well as "future progress." There had been no "immediate amelioration"—there had been no amelioration whatever. The Government of England, which, on account of the Anglo-Turkish clandestine-conditional Convention, ought to have been the first among the Powers to insist on the execution of the Treaty of Berlin, had, on the contrary, been the most inclined among them to hold back and to throw obstacles in the way. In December and in February last, he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had asked for Papers on the subject, which were still withheld. The Government had never published the suggestions of Germany, made last year immediately after the end of the Session, for obtaining the execution of the Treaty of Berlin. As the Government assured them that the only difficulty was that with regard to money, and as the admission by Europe of the Russian Indemnity made it certain that Turkey never would have money, he thought that they ought, at the same time, to press for the Correspondence which had taken place with regard to the Indemnity Clause. England had undoubtedly assumed, in the eyes of foreign countries—all now by far less pro-Turkish than ourselves—by the Cyprus Convention, at least a responsibility for the destruction of those institutions which cut off the Turkish Empire from Europe and from civilization. Throughout the Turkish Empire slavery existed in every household belonging to the ruling caste. It had been proved last year that even in the capital itself—even in the homes of those Pashas whose names were well known to us as the so-called reformers of the present and of recent Turkish administrations—Christian children, some bought, but the great majority of them stolen from their parents, were detained in slavery. Whatever else had been accomplished in Eastern Roumelia slavery had disappeared. There was no reason to suppose that in imitating the Constitution of Eastern Roumelia in other portions of the Empire, the Turks, in the absence of serious European pressure, would abolish slavery. The probable return to power of Mahmoud, the enemy both of England and of reform, made this, if possible, more certain even than before. He had now justified the first portion of his Resolution. He passed to the second portion of the Resolution, which dealt with the unexecuted arrangement with regard to the Greek Frontier. The Blue Book (Greece, No. 1) was like a modern novel in its construction. The beginning and the end of it were both good; but the middle would not bear investigation. Lord Salisbury, with the intelligence of a popular writer, had trusted to the well-known fact that people habitually read the beginning and the end, but not the middle, of a thick volume. The excellent despatch with which its contents concluded was contradicted by the principal portion of those contents themselves. The Turks all along had said—"This is an awkward question for us; force our hand, and we will submit." The whole of Europe, as represented at Berlin, was willing—nay, was anxious—that the course which the Turks themselves proposed should be adopted, and it was our Government which, by changing the French-Italian proposal, endorsed as it was by the three other Powers, had prevented rectification of the Frontier from becoming a distinct Article of the Treaty. After the Congress had concluded its deliberations, the other Powers again began to press that something should at once be done, and our Government again held back. At page 35, our Minister at Athens sent home the rumour that Great Britain had refused to act with Germany, in August or September, to procure the immediate settlement of the question. He added, to please the Minister, that this was "Probably one of the daily reports circulated by the telegraph throughout Europe, which has little or perhaps no foundation in fact ;"

but it was true, as would be seen by the despatch of Germany, for which, in December, in February, and again to-night, he most pertinaciously had asked. At page 39, they had a fresh example of Lord Salisbury's powers of delay, which were quite Turkish in their strength of resistance. He described how, in October, he had told the Representative of Greece that he "expected no advantageous result" from mediation at that time. Why? Because the "Consent of the Porte was not sufficient to procure the cession of territory in which the Mussulman population was predominant."

But to say this was to beg the question; because in the particular portion of Thessaly and Epirus not only was the "Mussulman population" not "predominant," but it formed only a most miserable minority. At page 52, they would find a further application of Germany for action, and the manner in which it had been received. This was in November, for each time Lord Salisbury had contrived to hang the matter up for a month. The German Ambassador had called upon him to ask him to answer the French Circular of the 21st of October, saying that—

"Germany, as well as Austria, Italy, and Russia, had resolved to adhere to the French proposal."

In face of language of this kind, Lord Salisbury was obliged to promise "that England would not refuse her general concurrence;" but "the proposal" which the whole of Europe except England had accepted "must be modified, and must not be a menace addressed to Turkey." "The time," also, "was inopportune." Lord Salisbury "regretted that the Powers had not thought fit to delay the step." This was throwing a good deal of cold water upon the action recommended by the five Great Powers. Although Lord Salisbury had promised not to refuse his "general concurrence," they saw, by page 53, that, six days after, M. Waddington told Lord Lyons—

"That he had received from all the Governments, except from that of Her Majesty, an unconditional assent to the proposal he had made, that a simultaneous and identic representation should be addressed to the Porte on the Greek question."

It would be seen from page 57 that, owing to the delay of England, more than another month elapsed—for there was a complete gap between the 12th of November and the 17th of December; but, at last, owing to the pressure exercised within those walls in the December Session, the Porte appointed Commissioners at Christmas. The Papers showed that those Commissioners were appointed only for the purpose of gaining time; and the French Government had informed Lord Salisbury that the time so gained had been utilized by the Commissioners themselves in importing Mahomedan Albanians from the North into these particular portions of Epirus, so as to alter the balance of the population. The House would find how our Ambassador at Constantinople had tried, in the despatch—No. 100—to help the Turks, by finding apologies for their conduct; but, at page 68, there was a despatch from him as to which it was necessary to make even more severe remark. Sir Henry Layard, writing in January, did not hesitate to urge that the line named by the Congress did not give Janina to Greece. He said—

"I am not acquainted with the intention of the Congress as regards the exact nature of the frontier line proposed. Judging from your Lordship's despatch to me of the 28th of last May, it would not, in your Lordship's opinion, include Janina."

A more monstrous statement could not be imagined than that the line suggested by Lord Salisbury before the meeting of the Congress was to override the deliberate will of Europe, afterwards agreed to by Lord Salisbury himself. It had been proved by France, and it was believed by Germany and by the rest of Europe, that Janina was a Greek town, the capital of a district purely Greek. He himself had received an address, which had been signed by the whole of the aldermen and town councillors of Janina, who, without exception, were favourable to the concession of the boundary line which had been named in the Protocols of Berlin. He had spoken of Europe as agreeing in this view; but Italy had for a time been an exception to that concert. Happily, the Italian Prime Minister of last year, who was a member of the Greek Committee, had now returned to power, and a Government had sprung up at Rome in the place of that which, intriguing in Albania on its own account, had pretended to support Lord Salisbury's views. A document, which had come to light two months ago, had shown that the late Italian Administration had been in secret correspondence with the Turkish Commissioners in Epirus for purposes of its own. Lord Salisbury, in one of his despatches—No. 141—most clearly showed his desire to prevent Janina becoming Greek; and Sir Henry Layard went even far beyond his Chief, for he said that he himself was convinced that unless the Porte kept Janina it would be impossible to retain Albania. Another circumstance worthy of notice was the falsity of the statements made by the Albanian delegates, in which they claimed Prevesa, Arta, and Janina, as Albanian towns; for the truth was, as was indisputably proved in another part of the Blue Book, that eight out of nine of all the inhabitants of Prevesa were Greeks, and that all of them spoke Greek; while at Arta the whole of the inhabitants were Greek, and in the town of Janina the Greeks were three to one, the district outside the town being wholly Greek. These facts were completely confirmed by the information supplied by the French Government, by Mr. Macdonald of Janina, and by another gentleman. Lord Salisbury was indeed slow to learn; for after he had received this information from our Minister at Athens, and also from the Government of France, it would be seen that, although the Austrian Government, of which he had had some hopes, had deserted him, and although Germany had declared to him that "the matter was one in which the German Government took great interest," and that "it would be necessary to bring the controversy to an issue," Lord Salisbury still pleaded for delay. It was evident that if our Government had spoken throughout, as had the Governments of Germany and France, the present deadlock would never have occurred. Even when Lord Salisbury was stirred up to act, the language which he used should be contrasted with the plain language of Germany—

Sir Charles W. Dilke

"The German Government will give the French proposal their cordial support, so that the stipulations of the Berlin Treaty may be carried out with as little unnecessary delay as possible."

At another part of the Blue Book there was a Note upon an intrigue which was closely connected with the Italian intrigue of which he had already spoken, but which, being a Turkish intrigue, was of an even more corrupt and an even more stupid nature. It was there stated that the Porte had paid the travelling expenses of three gentlemen whom they had sent on a tour round Europe, and who had been described as delegates of the Albanian nation. Now, he could prove that those gentlemen were Turkish functionaries, that they were paid by Turkey, and that they did not come from, or know anything of, that portion of Epirus which it had been proposed that Turkey should cede to Greece. At page 190, a simple-minded British Consul, Mr. Greene, had written that—

"Two Albanian nobles, Abdul Bey, of Pharsala, and Mehemet Ali Bey, of Berat, had recently visited Rome," and were in Paris, and—

"That the mission of those Beys to Italy and France does not appear to have caused the Turkish authorities any uneasiness."

Now, considering that the Turkish Government had paid the salaries and expenses of those gentlemen, it was hardly conceivable that their mission should have caused uneasiness to that Government—unless, indeed, it was uneasiness of the breeches' pocket. At page 203, there would be found a statement of those persons' views, which was an imposture from the first line to the last. One of those two gentlemen had asked pay from the Greek Government in order to come upon the Greek side and support their views, and, being very properly refused, he sold himself to the Turks. Lord Salisbury was aware of this fact; but he received that gentleman, and, probably, shook him by the hand. The other, Abdul Bey, was brother-in-law to the Turkish Ambassador at Rome, who had been concerned in the Italian intrigue, and had no connection with Janina, in the name of which town he, however, spoke. Lord Salisbury, who had just refused to receive the Bulgarian delegates, never theless saw these gentlemen at the Foreign Office and reported their views to Constantinople, although these consisted of the most outrageous misrepresentation of the facts, without remark. After seeing Lord Salisbury, the two Albanians went to Berlin to see Prince Bismarck. Prince Bismarck, who also knew their character, at once informed them that he would not see them. They then sent to him to say that they had seen Lord Salisbury, upon which the Prince replied that that made not the slightest difference. As they still persisted, Prince Bismarck presented his compliments to them, and said that he did not believe that an Albanian nationality existed; that if it did exist, its existence had no bearing on this subject, inasmuch as Janina was not an Albanian town; but although he protested against the Albanian question being raised, as they asked his opinion, he must add that if there were such a thing as an Albanian nationality in North Albania, "the sooner, in the interests of civilization, it was stamped out the better." In Lord Salisbury's last despatch, he tried to disguise the fact that he had been throughout hostile to the full satisfaction to the Greek claims, as they had been admitted by the Powers at Berlin. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) hoped that the words of that despatch might be taken as a promise of amendment for the future; and he would only add that in the six weeks which had passed since it was written no progress had been made, and that they saw as little prospect of the termination of the controversy as they had 14 months ago, at the time of the meeting of the Congress at Berlin. In conclusion, the hon. Baronet moved the Address of which he had given Notice.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I rise, Sir, to second the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) with reference to the first part of it, relating to the reforms in European Turkey and Armenia which were solemnly promised by Turkey and the Treaty of Berlin. I think everyone will be of opinion that the time is come when it is right and reasonable to ask what has been done by Turkey to carry out her obligations? More than a year has elapsed since the conclusion of the Treaty; all those parts of it which are in favour of Turkey have been carried out, or are rapidly being carried out. The Russian troops have all but completely evacuated both Roumelia and Bulgaria; what, then, has Turkey done? I will not recapitulate the obligations, they are partly under the Treaty of Berlin and partly under the Anglo-Turkish Convention. In view of them, I think hon. Members opposite must have been greatly surprised to learn from a recent debate in "another place" that our Foreign Minister not only repudiates, but actually ridicules, the idea that this country is under any responsibility towards the people of these Provinces to see that these obligations towards them are carried out by their Government. I am the last man in the House to wish to extend the responsibilities of this country; we have enough and to spare already in every part of the world; and, however sad it may be that Governments in remote parts of the world should oppress and misgovern their people, it is no part of the duty of this country to enter upon a crusade on behalf of the oppressed; but where we have interfered in the interests of this country, or the supposed interests, to prevent a decaying, corrupt, and brutal rule from being overthrown, and have interfered to save it from destruction, I think there is a heavy responsibility upon us to see that obligations entered into should be carried out. It is due to us mainly, if not wholly, that nearly the whole of what remains of Turkey in Europe has been restored to the direct authority of the Porte, and that a large slice of Armenia was also restored. Surely, then, upon us more than upon others lies the responsibility of calling Turkey to account for the non-performance of those parts of the Treaty which must be considered as the condition on which they were restored. Now, what has been done by Turkey since the Treaty? Absolutely nothing. I challenge the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to produce a vestige or scintilla of evidence to show that the Porte has made any effort to improve the condition of her European subjects, or of the Armenians. It is not merely a question whether any attempt has been made to frame new institutions; but there is not a sign that any single step has been taken to redress those evils, which do not depend so much upon a constitution as upon the very first principles of honest administration. So long ago as August 8th of last year, Lord Salisbury wrote—

“The immediate necessity of Asiatic Turkey is for the simplest form of order and good government, and for such security from rapine, lawless or legal, that industry may flourish and population may cease to decline.”

The same necessity exists, and, indeed, is far more pressing at this moment, not only in Armenia, but in European Turkey. In all these districts, things have been going from bad to worse ever since the war was over. Of Armenia we have a recent statement of the Armenian Patriarch, which is confirmed by independent witnesses, that anarchy prevails there; that the Christian population is harassed and plundered by Kurds and Circassians; that an organized brigandage is being carried on by the officials in a more shameless and open manner than ever. Thousands of the wretched inhabitants are seeking refuge in Russia, where, if they find a severe and despotic Government, they find, at least, security for life and property. When we look at the condition of Macedonia, we find a counterpart of these evils. I have only this day seen a well-known gentleman, a Mr. Rose, who is recently returned from Macedonia, where, I believe, he has been one of the very few who have been able to penetrate at all beyond the coast. His accounts of the condition of the country are most appalling. Anarchy and murder prevail. The Turkish Government has planted over it small bands of Circassians, who terrorize the people, and plunder and murder freely. The officials are in league with these people, and are more shamefully corrupt than ever. What makes his account more interesting is that he has so recently been in Eastern Roumelia. He reports of this Province that, notwithstanding all the sufferings it has gone through during the two years of war, it is rapidly recovering. The Province is in the hands of a native Administration; and the result is that it is perfectly safe for travellers. Property and life are already as secure as in any other part of Europe. How great a contrast is this state of things with that in Macedonia. In the latter it is unsafe to go a mile beyond the large towns without an escort. It seems that the army of petty officials and zaptiehs who have lost their occupation in Bulgaria have drifted into this Province, and are feeding like locusts on the country. The Pashas who have been sent there are the worst of their kind; most of them should be expiating their crimes on the galleys. There is Salik Pasha, who was recalled from Crete at the instance of Consul Sandwith on account of his cruelties and misconduct; he is now holding an important command. There is Amous Pasha, who was responsible for the murder of Mr. Ogle, who is also holding an important post. There is Chefket Pasha, whose crimes are so notorious; he is now holding an important post in Thessaly. Now, let me ask the House what must be the result of such a contrast, how long can the present state of things last? There is already extreme danger of another outbreak. I observe that in May last the hon. Gentleman the Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) wrote that—

The hon. Member has elsewhere stated that he has the highest authority for saying that the Porte is animated by the best intentions; but he must know that the approaches to the Porte have been always paved with good intentions. Meanwhile nothing has been done; the influence of England appears to effect nothing. Sir Henry Layard has not even succeeded in preventing the employment of Chefket Pasha. His policy of coaxing and flattery, and of praising the poor vacillating and weak man who fills the throne of Turkey, seems to be a total failure; surely, then, it would be wise to try some other tone; at all events, it would be well that this House should speak out, so that the Porte should see that its conduct will not escape the attention of this country. I now come to the case of Greece; in adverting to it I shall endeavour to avoid any controversial matter. I know there are hon. Members opposite who are as anxious as any one of us on this side that a settlement should be effected in the most liberal spirit to Greece. There are, however, some points which arise on these Papers which I hope the Government will explain. In the first place, the Papers give us, for the first time, the negotiations which preceded the Congress on the subject of a proposed accession of territory to Greece. We now know that, in June last, Sir Henry Layard made a proposal to the Turkish Government to give up territory to Greece, to an extent bounded by, what I shall call, the Salisbury line. Sir Henry Layard reports that when he made this proposal to Safvet Pasha, who was then Grand Vizier—

“The latter seemed at first but little inclined to entertain the idea of making any territorial concession to Greece. He said that no Turkish Minister could do so, and that if Turkey were to be deprived of territory it were better that it should be in pursuance of a decision of Europe pronounced by the Congress, to which she would have to submit.”

This letter must have reached Lord Salisbury at Berlin a few days before the Greek question was decided. It is most important as showing that the Turks preferred that Congress should deal with and decide the question. Now, I would ask the House to compare this letter with the statements made by Lord Beaconsfield on his return from Berlin. The most full account he gave us of the reasons for the mode adopted in the Greek case was at the dinner given to him at the Duke of Wellington's Riding School. He there boasted of what had been done for Greece; he treated it as an accomplished fact; he claimed that Greece, by trusting to England, had got a larger accession of territory than any of the rebellious Provinces of Turkey which had aided Russia; and he then went on to give this explanation—

“Before the Congress the Sultan had shown a disposition to meet with favour the proposals of England for an accession of territory to Greece; but he had said that what he was prepared to do he wished should be looked on as an act of grace on his part, and of his sense of friendliness to Greece in not attacking him during his troubles; but as Congress was now to meet, he should like to hear the result of the wisdom of Congress on the subject.”

I wish to point out that this statement is not in conformity with the information now before us. If it be accurate, then the Turkish Government has deceived and taken in our Government, and has induced it to agree to the decision of the Congress, taking the form of a recommendation under the belief that he was really prepared to accept its conclusions. If, however, it be inaccurate, we are entitled to an explanation why it was that, knowing that the Turkish Government preferred a decision of Congress, our Representatives did not state this in the Congress, and obtain from them an authoritative decision. The next point I have to notice is that Sir Henry Layard, in the same letter, states that he pressed upon the Porte Lord Salisbury's line of Frontier, on the ground that a comparatively small concession might settle the question; while if it were left to Congress to decide it might come to a decision more disadvantageous to Turkey. This leads to the fact that the Congress did, undoubtedly, recommend a wider concession of territory than that previously proposed by Lord Salisbury. I think no one can doubt this. If Lord Salisbury's line had been agreed to, it would have been adopted in his language; but the line recommended by the Congress was to follow the valleys of the Kalamas and Salameria, and I think no independent person can come to any other conclusion than that it was intended to include Janina. Yet no sooner was this done than we find the Turkish Government repudiating absolutely and obstinately not only the line of Frontier recommended by Congress, but also Lord Salisbury's line; and we find Sir Henry Layard throwing himself into the cause of Turkey, so far as Janina is concerned; and from that day to this he has been the strongest opponent of the line proposed by the Congress. In page 68 there is a letter from Sir Henry Layard, expressing the strongest opinion that Turkey ought not to be called upon to give up Janina, and again another at page 100; and it is well known that the whole of his influence has been used to support the Turks in their opposition to this concession. There is also a despatch to which I must call attention. It is that from Lord Salisbury to Mr. Corbett, our Minister in Greece, dated October 22nd, in which he expresses the opinion that none of the Great Powers will be prepared to coerce the Turkish Government in order to carry out the conclusions of the Congress; and he adds that, inasmuch as moral persuasion is the only weapon at hand, it could obviously be used with better chances of success if an interval were allowed to elapse during which the excitement among the Mussulmans were allowed to calm down. Now, I would ask what effect upon a negotiation such as we are now engaged in must such a statement have? We may presume that the Turks also have been informed that moral persuasion is the only weapon we have at hand, or intended to use. I ask, where in the history of the Turkish Empire has moral persuasion been of any use, or effected anything? It may, or may not, be wise to use coercion; there are many degrees and methods of coercion. It does not necessarily mean the actual use of force, and history shows that where Europe is agreed and determined on a particular course a mere demonstration is sufficient; and I may remind the House that the settlement of the Greek question was only effected by France sending a Force to Greece; and later, in our own day, the settlement of Syria was only effected by France sending a Force there. In neither case was there resistance; but in both the demonstration was necessary, and without them nothing would have been done, and so it may be again in the future. If Europe agrees, and shows that it is in earnest, the Porte will not, and cannot, resist; its hope consists in dividing the Great Powers; and if one of them says, we will use nothing but moral persuasion, the Porte knows well enough what that means, and that she may safely refuse. It seems to me that to publish such a statement at this moment, at a time when mediation is pending, is to court failure, and to repeat the mistake made after the Conference of Constantinople, when the Turks were politely informed that whatever their decision England would never join in compelling them to do anything. Now, Sir, the letter I have quoted, and many other despatches in the Book, frankly admit that the Government has not objected to the delay which has taken place; they have thought it better that time should elapse, during which the Mussulman feeling should calm down. With all deference to the motives of the Government, I cannot but think that great evil has already arisen from the delay. The Turks have occupied the interval in preparing for local resistance. They have filled Thessaly and Epirus with troops; they have incessantly agitated among the Albanians; they have imported Albanians, Mussulmans, and Circassians into Epirus, and they have armed the small Mussulman minority; and, meanwhile, the Provinces are a prey to disorder; all this might have been avoided by more prompt action on our part. Now, I will willingly admit that the last despatch of Lord Salisbury, in reply to the invitation from France for mediation, is far more satisfactory than any previous document; but it must be taken in connection with the previous Correspondence. It does not disclaim Sir Henry Layard's objections to the surrender of Janina. It is quite consistent with it that Sir Henry Layard will continue his opposition on that point, and that we may find, on conclusion of the negotiations, that all the influence of England has been used to limit and curtail the recommendation of Congress. What we desire is, a full and frank statement from the Government that the influence of England will be used to obtain for Greece the widest extension of territory which the recommendations of the Congress are capable of, in lieu of the smallest, and that they will abide by the spirit of the conclusions of the Congress, and will endeavour to carry it out. If it be said that it is an unusual course to interfere with a debate in this House while negotiations are actually pending, I would venture to point out that we are only repeating the precedent set us by much greater men in 1830. The present position is almost identical with what it then was. The question what should be the limits of the new Kingdom of Greece was then referred to a Conference of the Ambassadors of the Great Powers at London; and it having leaked out that British influence was being used to curtail the limits, Motions were made in both Houses of Parliament, at the beginning of 1830, by Lord Russell in one House, and by Lord Holland in the other, calling upon the Government to use its influence to secure a sufficient accession of territory to the new Kingdom. Lord Russell, Lord Palmerston, and Sir James Mackintosh argued most strongly that the two Provinces of Thessaly and Epirus, and the Island of Crete, were essential to the new Kingdom. I wish I could quote their speeches at length; they would serve word for word for the present occasion. They argued that without these Provinces Greece would not have territory enough for her proper development; they said that to leave outside the new Kingdom Provinces whose inhabitants were so largely Greek would lead to constant agitation and prevent a settlement of a lasting character. Time, however, has proved the truth of the arguments of Lord Russell and Lord Palmerston. Unfortunately, those arguments did not prevail, and we now know, from the memoirs of those who carried out the negotiations, that under a false idea as to the interests of England all our influence was used to curtail the limits of Greece. We have the additional arguments drawn from a comparison of a free independent Greece with the condition of those Provinces left to wither and decay under the rule of Turkey. I ask those who doubt to visit these districts, and to compare Athens with Janina or Larissa, or go from Syra to Crete, or from Patras to Prevesa. He will find it is as going from light to darkness, from civilization to decay, or from the land of freedom and progress to the region of decay and desolation. It is admitted, on all hands, that a grave mistake was made in 1830; it was admitted by Lord Beaconsfield in the Congress, and by Lord Salisbury in his last despatch; the grounds alleged by both were—first, that the Frontier lines were badly traced, and encouraged brigandage; and, secondly and mainly, that it left outside Greece districts in which the Greeks largely predominated, and that it was not to be supposed that, with such a Government as Turkey, there could be contentment among the population thus left out, or that the people of Greece could not do otherwise than sympathize with their kinsmen left under cruel bondage, and that hence, from the very nature of things, there must be continued agitation and perpetual danger to the peace of Europe. We have now an opportunity of rectifying the mistake of 1830; for God's sake, do not let us repeat it again. The line drawn by Congress is already too narrow; by excluding the district of Janina we shall be repeating the mistake, for no one can doubt that it is essentially a Greek district. Just in proportion, then, as we extend the Frontier, so as to include all that is really Greek, we shall make that settlement a lasting one, one in the interests both of Turkey and Greece, and the best security for the peace of Europe.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to use Her influence to procure the prompt execution of those Articles of the Treaty of Berlin which relate to reforms in Turkey; and further praying that, in undertaking mediation under the 24th Article of the Treaty, She will endeavour to procure for Greece the rectification of frontier agreed upon by the Powers."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

MR. ILANBURY, in rising to move the following Amendment:—

"That this House desires to express its gratification that the main portion of the stipulations of the Treaty of Berlin has been successfully carried into effect, and approves the steps which Her Majesty's Government have already taken to secure the full accomplishment of those portions of the Treaty which are still in course of execution:—"

said, that if the Motion which had been brought forward had been simply an abstract expression of opinion there would have been no occasion for his Amendment. If the Motion of the hon. Baronet merely conveyed to him the fact that the Powers of Europe, and especially this country, were interested in seeing the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin carried out speedily and completely, all parties would be equally ready to accept it. Turkey had given to her one more chance of life; and it would, of course, be the extremity of folly and little short of suicide if she were to refuse to carry out, with all possible speed, the proposed reforms, and to make use of this last opportunity. But when he came to treat the proposition of the hon. Baronet as a practical proposal, he found that it meant a great deal more and a great deal less than the truism he had enunciated. What had been the course taken by the Government down to the present moment? By advice, by remonstrance, and by rebuke the Government had pressed and forced upon the Porte the absolute necessity of setting its house in order. He appealed to hon. Members with confidence, and asked whether it was possible for the Government to have done more by diplomacy than they had done—at least, short of bluster and menace? Would the hon. Baronet have the Government persuade the Porte that reform was even more to our interest than to its own? Such a suggestion would surely prove to be very mischievous. When he listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Reading, who had just sat down, and heard him hint rather vaguely at coercion, he seemed to hear him advocate, not diplomacy, but the old, discarded method of physical force, which was not the way of the Government, and which, if adopted, would require, as an indispensable condition, the assistance of a confederate. But now the nation that might have been the confederate had good reason for keeping its charity at home, even if it were inclined to have a reformed country on its Frontier. It was neither the wish of England nor of the Ambassadors at Berlin that Turkey should be coerced. They said to her—"You must reform or perish; we put before you the choice; and the responsibility, if you refuse, must rest with the Porte, and with the Porte alone." There was, however, another principle in the Treaty, which was conspicuously absent from the terms of the Motion, and that was the elementary principle of fair play. By that principle, Christians and Mussulmans ought no longer to be judged by two different standards. It was a principle applicable, in the first place, to the Empire of the Sultan, but not more so to the Pashas of the Porte than to the Benches of the House of Commons; and when he found the hon. Baronet taking out of the Treaty just those portions that suited him, and setting aside, as mere verbiage, other portions that were equally important, he felt that he was not giving fair play to the country he attacked. The hon. Baronet singled out Turkey, a country demoralized by intrigue, still staggering from its death-struggle, and oppressed by a more gigantic task than had ever fallen to any other Government, and, under such conditions, expected it to reform in the course of the 365 days that might be called by courtesy a year of peace. Were there no other nations equally bound by the Treaty, and bound to give to their peoples the liberty for which they cried so loudly in the case of Turkey? Were the inhabitants of Bulgaria—where, by-the-bye, the fortresses had not been utterly dismantled—yet in the enjoyment of their farms and villages? Were not the Jews of Servia and Roumania as far as ever from freedom? The hon. Baronet left them on one side, and heaped all the vials of his wrath upon unfortunate Turkey. It seemed to him that it was most inconsistent of hon. Members, in so short a space of time, to bring such charges against the Porte. They usually described Turkey as a festering mass of corruption. How, then, could they expect that its rotten body could take up its bed and walk, immediately after being relieved from the terrorizing and galvanizing influence of the bullets of the Czar? The hon. Baronet had brought forward many Motions in the course of the Session, and in one of them he had complained that Cyprus had not yet been made a paradise. They might quarrel about the occupation of the Island, but not as to the fact that an English Governor would try to procure for it the best government he could. Cyprus, in all its conditions, could compare favourably with the gigantic Empire of Turkey, and, moreover, had not been ravaged by war; yet the hon. Baronet had come forward to complain of its government. Possibly, the hon. Baronet might say that, with the present Government in Office, English Governors were as bad as the Turkish; but, in that case, he could not very well ask the Government to give a lesson and example to Turkey. Reform was always a very slow process in the East; and, at the present moment, the word "prompt" was a remarkable word to put upon the records of the English Parliament. It had taken them four months to discuss the discipline of the Army, and yet it was urged that a year was enough to recover and re-model a great Empire in the East. Did the hon. Baronet suppose that there was no such thing as obstruction in Turkey? He ought to have remembered that the East was the natural home of obstruction? The Bishops and the Pashas alike misrepresented the people. He knew from personal experience that they were about the most sober, industrious, and patient people in this world. He had travelled several times over that country, and, therefore, he had an opportunity of seeing what the people were. It was not only the Christians who complained of bad government at Constantinople. Hon. Gentlemen opposite would fall into the mistake of supposing the Conservative Party to be friends of the Pashas instead of the people of Turkey. Their object really was to bring about good government for all, and he had no hesitation in saying that the Mahomedan Government of Turkey was as much de-tested by the Arabic and Syriac populations as by the Christians. If there was to be a speedy and effectual reform of that country, the change must come from below rather than from above; from the country districts, instead of from the pandemonium of Constantinople. ["Hear, hear!"] He was glad to hear those cheers from the opposite Benches, because what he was leading to was this—that a short time before war broke out a remedy was prescribed, which he believed to be the best and most speedy way of effecting a reform. A Turkish Parliament was suggested; but by Members on those Benches the suggestion was treated with the greatest scorn, and it was to a great extent owing to the bad reception that Parliament had met with in this country that, in dealing with the question of reforms in Turkey, it was with the Sultan and the Pashas they had to take account. It could not be expected that the Government of Turkey would show any great activity in carrying out reforms, if the engagements entered into with it by this country were not fulfilled. At Berlin a promise was given to Turkey that if she would give her people freedom and good government we would give her Empire rest. The signatures of our Ambassadors were hardly dry on the Treaty of Berlin before the engagements we had entered into, not only in that Treaty, but in the Anglo-Turkish Convention, were criticized and condemned by the rank-and-file, as well as by the Leaders and ex-Leaders of the Liberal Party in that House. Was it not, therefore, possible that the Sultan and the Pashas were at this moment waiting to see whether they were dealing with a country that respected its pledges, or with one that repudiated, in one year, the pledges and obligations it had entered into the year before? With regard to that part of the hon. Baronet's Motion which referred to Greece, he would observe that it was vague, like many previous Motions expressing want of confidence in Her Majesty's Government. The language was such as to convey to people outside a totally different idea from that conveyed to persons who were intimately acquainted with the subject. The hon. Baronet asked Her Majesty to endeavour to procure for Greece the rectification of Frontier agreed upon by the Powers. What did the hon. Baronet mean by a rectification of Frontier? It was quite possible he meant two things. If he meant a general rectification of Frontier, he (Mr. Hanbury) agreed with him. It was agreed there should be a rectification of Frontier. But if he meant any particular rectification of Frontier, then he entirely disagreed with him, because they had only to read the Protocols to find that the line recommended was a most vague and general line indeed. Lord Salisbury said Her Majesty's Plenipotentiaries understood a line to be indicated in a general way, and M. Waddington made a statement explicitly to that effect. In quoting from the despatches of Sir Henry Layard, the hon. Baronet gave the House to understand that our Ambassador was not acquainted with the intentions of the Congress as regarded the exact nature of the Frontier line; but, only two lines below the extract quoted by the hon. Baronet, Sir Henry Layard gave the recommendations of the Congress, and said that the line did not give Janina to Greece. He maintained the line was very vague; and, as a matter of fact, looking at the map, he did not believe that Janina was actually included in the line. Then it was urged that if the proposals of Berlin were carried out Greece would have all she claimed. That was by no means the case. Mediation did not mean that one side was to have all it claimed and all the advantages of the bargain. It would be necessary to consider the attitude of Greece, and Greece had declared that not one inch less would she take than the line laid down at the Congress in Berlin. That was all very well, but the line was a vague one. No Frontier was agreed upon; there was simply a recommendation that Turkey should accept a vague, general boundary, as proposed at the Congress. When the hon. Baronet brought the charge against Her Majesty's Government of not having taken sufficient interest in the cause of Greece, he seemed to ignore what England had done for her. At the Congress England had been the best friend of Greece. He had heard it said on the front Opposition Bench by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition that the Treaty of San Stefano was, in many respects, a Treaty much preferable to that of Berlin; but if the Treaty of San Stefano had been carried out, then goodbye to Greece and her extensions. Therefore, it could not be said that the English Government had taken insufficient interest in the cause of Greece. The Greeks were perfectly satisfied with the efforts of Her Majesty's Government. Both the King and the President of the Council thanked the British Minister at Athens for what this country was doing for her; and even the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), writing in The Nineteenth Century, said—

It was, therefore, somewhat curious that, after so short a time had passed, a Motion should be brought forward which virtually impugned the conduct of the Administration with reference to the Greeks. A good many reasons were assigned why something should be done for Greece. There was a sentimental idea abroad upon the subject, and he had no doubt that in that idea many hon. Members shared. But what sentiment was there in the matter? The Greeks were simply the inhabitants of a country in which there lived some 2,000 years ago the famous men who might or might not have been their ancestors. Then they were referred to the plea of good behaviour; but Frontiers were not given to nations for good behaviour; but even if that was the case he did not think Greece could put forward such a claim. He was told that England was under obligations to Greece. Why, it was exactly the other way. When, during the Turkish War, Greece was likely to do mischief, England interposed and saved her from what would have been well-merited punishment at the hands of Turkey. Again, an appeal was made on the ground of nationality; but here they were on dangerous ground, for there were Mahomedans in these districts, and even in Janina. Did the people of this district wish to be annexed to Greece? In addition to interfering with the affairs of Thessaly and Epirus, Greece had followed a similar course in Crete, and had created so strong a feeling of disgust that a riot occurred among the Cretans, and several of the Greek agents were massacred. He could not think that, on the question of nationality, speaking on the nature of all the evidence before Parliament, there was anything to be said in favour of the proposed annexation on the ground of nationality. Then, again, it was said—“You are going to set the Greeks up as antagonists to the Slav; and, to prevent the Slav going further South, you ought to encourage the claims of Greece.” It was a little too late in the day to make that objection, after the Treaty of Berlin had been agreed to, which gave such great powers to the Slav in Roumania and Bulgaria; but, even if it were not too late, had the Greeks ever shown any likelihood whatever of being able to cope with the Slav? A noble poet, who took the utmost possible interest in the condition of Greece, once wrote—

“We have the Pyrrhic dance as yet, Where has the Pyrrhic phalanx gone?”

and this seemed to him to explain, as nearly as possible, the condition of the country at this moment. What was the one reason for which the recommendation of the Congress of Berlin was made? Simply and solely in order that Turkey might have rest on this subject, and on condition that Greece herself should give no further trouble to Europe. What did that imply? It implied that the Frontier which was to be drawn between Greece and Turkey should be a strong one; but it was impossible to read the statements of the Turkish Generals without feeling that, if the line roughly proposed by the Congress were adopted, they would have no kind of natural Frontier between Greece and Turkey. That was a formidable difficulty; but the real difficulty lay in the fact that Greece herself proclaimed most distinctly that, even if what was now proposed were given to her, she would not take it as a final settlement; and in this refusal he was sorry to say she was encouraged by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich in one of his numerous contributions to periodical literature. Greece was now meddling in Crete and in Cyprus; she was maintaining as loudly as ever the possibility of a Byzantine Empire; and in all these instances it was much better for Her Majesty's Government to say to Turkey and Greece, “Settle this matter between yourselves,” than to follow the course of those friends of Greece who proposed that a line should be imposed by an outside Power. If Greece entertained these indefinite ideas of extension, it upset the whole principles upon which the recommendations made in the Treaty of Berlin were founded. It was the want of finality in these arrangements which made Turkey hesitate before she took up these reforms. Indeed, the hon. Members who took up this line were playing into the hands of the unpatriotic Pashas, who would lose a great deal if real reforms were granted to all these Provinces, and into the hands of Russia, which Power did not want to see a reformed country on her Frontier. The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea declared that recent intelligence from Turkey showed that she was going from bad to worse. He maintained that that assertion was the very contrary of the fact, for the news received from Constantinople that very day showed that Khairaddin Pasha had gained a triumph over the Sultan; that was of the greatest importance, and was full of promise for the future prosperity of Turkey. In spite of all her difficulties, a great deal had been done by Turkey during the past year. In the first place, she had gone through the difficult operation of handing over vast Provinces to her conquerors. She had assisted in giving good government to Eastern Roumelia; she had given good government to Crete, the latter having been made a model Province. She had appointed able Governors to several Provinces, and given to some of these Governors a long term of office. She had also got the bad Pashas out of the way. [Cries of "Chefket Pasha!"] Of course, it was possible to point to the case of Chefket Pasha, and his retention in office was undoubtedly a great slur upon Turkey; but, certainly, some dangerous Pashas had been got rid of. Again, the organization of justice had been re-modelled, and, on the recommendation of Lord Salisbury, the tithe had been confined to a single Province. In many important respects Turkey had acted upon the recommendations of Lord Salisbury. She had appointed Europeans to control the gendarmerie and the Judges, and in this respect she had exercised a very wise discretion. Turkey had two great difficulties—one with reference to money, and the other with reference to men. The first of these difficulties ought not to be too much insisted upon, because Turkey must reform herself whether she had money or not. Turkey was, however, an agricultural country, and probably she could recover from her distress more easily than many other nations. He hoped, therefore, that in future they would hear less of this difficulty of money. As to foreigners, he was bound to say they were not a panacea for the evils of Turkey, for some of the foreigners formerly employed in that country had turned out to be as great scamps in their way as the Turks themselves. He considered that the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea was premature. After all, they had to deal with the Sultan and the Pashas, as being for the present the only possible Governors of Turkey. They must endeavour to do them justice, bad as they might be or good as they might be. If the Turks failed, who were to come in their place? They could not divide Turkey in Asia as they had divided Turkey in Europe. If the Turk fell, the Russian must come. Turkey in Asia was largely a Mahomedan country, and what would be the fate of the Mahomedans under Russian rule? Many of the Christian population were not of the Greek, but of the Latin Church, and they might judge of what would be their fate from their experience of the treatment of the Latin Christians in Russia itself. He advocated also, in the interests of his own country, that they should give this the only possible Government in Turkey a fair chance, because, if the Turkish Government were to fall, there would be an upheaving of the great deep and a beginning of trouble, which would involve us and Europe in a long and costly struggle, of which no man could foresee the end. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Mr. GLADSTONE rose, but gave way to—

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF, who said, he regretted to stand between the House and the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone); but he was about to second the Amendment. He desired to express his gratitude to his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) and the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) for the kind manner in which they had spoken of his recent labours in Eastern Roumelia. Although he and his noble Friend (Lord Donoughmore) might have been chosen as Party men to serve on a Bulgarian Commission, they were determined to execute their task irrespective of Party politics; and the instructions they received from Her Majesty's Government were that they should carry it out on the principles of local self-government and free institutions, which had been so successful in this country. He also expressed his acknowledgments to the right hon. Member for Greenwich for having said, in a letter he had written to some Bulgarians who had sought to enlist the right hon. Gentleman in favour of setting aside the arrangements of the Treaty of Berlin, that he would offer no opinion on the matter until he had seen the results of the Commissioners' labours. Before he went into the question of the non-fulfilment of this Treaty he would point out that there were other Treaties, the stipulations of which had not been fulfilled. The Treaty of Vienna was still unfulfilled in many points, and in 1848 or 1849 Lord Palmerston used some forcible language about its non-fulfilment in regard to the City of Cracow. In 1856, shortly after the Treaty of Paris was signed by the Representatives of the Powers, the English Government was obliged to adopt the strong measure of sending the Fleet to the Black Sea before it could compel Russia to comply with the stipulations of that instrument. The hon. Member for Chelsea had not treated the matter fairly in merely singling out the non-fulfilment of certain stipulations by Turkey; for, as his hon. Friend the Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Hanbury) had already pointed out, there were many other unfulfilled stipulations of the Treaty, though they had heard little of them. For instance, the fortresses of Bulgaria had not yet been destroyed, and the Jews had not yet been emancipated in Roumania, and were not entirely so in Servia; but he could bear testimony to the fact that the Turkish Commissioners on the Commission in which he acted were the strongest in supporting the principles of civil and religious freedom on which the Constitution drawn up for Eastern Roumelia was based. The hon. Member for Chelsea said they had not re-established the direct rule of the Sultan in the Province, and that the "bag-and-baggage policy" had been carried out. Well, it was not for the hon. Baronet to blame the English Commissioners even if that were so. But he thought that the direct rule of the Sultan existed quite as much in Eastern Roumelia as that of Her Majesty did in the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands. The Queen had the right of garrison in the Channel Islands, and of giving her assent or dissent to the Acts passed by their local Legislatures. The Commissioners were instructed to establish the direct political and military rule of the Sultan as far as concerned the external defence and protection of the country; but they were also instructed to give the Province an autonomy based on the law of the vilayets and on the decision of the Conference of Constantinople, in which Lord Salisbury took so prominent a part, and which conceded the widest local liberty. The hon. Member for Chelsea said that Aleko, the Governor of Eastern Roumelia, was not a Turkish Pasha. If he was not that he did not know what he was. He had been all his life in the Turkish Service. At one time he was a Secretary of Legation, and afterwards he became Ambassador at Vienna. He was a Turkish subject, a Greek by education, and a Bulgarian by birth. He had arrived at the Frontier in a fez. The Russians had then sent to him what is usually called a "billycock" hat as a compromise. His Excellency had, however, assumed the kalpak. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) thought the importance of the question had been much exaggerated. To put on the kalpak, which was the national head-dress, could hardly be said to involve a formidable attack on the authority of the Government. If they could suppose such a thing possible as an insurrection in Scotland, it could hardly be thought, when it was appeased, that if a Governor went to that country in a kilt he thereby made a great attack on the integrity of the British Empire. The hon. Member for Chelsea said that the Turks were prepared to extend the Eastern Roumelian statute to the other Provinces of European Turkey only as far as claiming tribute was concerned. But this statute placed the whole question of taxation and its collection entirely under the control of the local Legislatures, so that it would be impossible for the Turks to lay hands upon any portion of the revenue not assigned to them without the consent and assistance of the local authorities, who would have the matter completely in their own hands. His hon. Friend had also spoken of a statement of Lord Salisbury's to the effect that the Commission was only to last for three months, within which time the other reforms ought to have been completed. They met for the first time on the 30th of September, and the three months would have terminated at the end of December. But the Commissioners felt it would be utterly impossible to finish their labours by that time, and in answer to communications from them the different Governments agreed to extend the time. But even if, for certain purposes, their Commission had expired after three months' time, it was provided by the 19th Article that the European Commission should continue to administer the finances of the Provinces till the new organization was complete. As it happened, they only handed over the administration of the finances to the local authorities about the 1st or 2nd of June; and, therefore, he thought that complaint fell entirely to the ground. The hon. Member for Chelsea had quoted a statement of his to the effect that the want of money was no excuse for the Turkish Government, and contrasted it with something Lord Salisbury had said in "another place." But the hon. Member seemed to him to be in some error, inasmuch as Lord Salisbury's language referred to reforms not in European but in Asiatic Turkey. For his own part, he still maintained that the want of money was no excuse for delaying such reforms as the drawing up of reforms for the European Provinces. He thought Turkey was very much to blame in this; and, though he could not support the Resolution of his hon. Friend opposite, he believed that a strong expression of opinion on the part of that House was most desirable in order to force upon the Turkish Government the necessity of carrying out such reforms. The hon. Member had also alluded to certain atrocities now occurring in Macedonia. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had gone with no preconceived opinions, and had been most particular in inquiring into the question of atrocities. He had sent his Private Secretary, Mr. Walpole,

Times' Correspondent, who was by no means a Turcophile, into a neighbouring village, and later alone into Macedonia, and he must say that there were very great atrocities being committed on Turks by the Bulgarians. One case was reported in the Blue Books. In another case he had been informed by some Turks that they had been driven out of their village by the Bulgarians with the cognizance of the Bulgarian head-man, and their wives had been violated. These Turks refused some money which he offered them, saying it was no good taking it because they would be at once deprived of it. These facts would all appear in the Blue Books. The two gentlemen whom he had mentioned went at his request to examine into the matter, and they certified to the truth of all these statements. There was another very recent case in which some Bulgarian zaptiehs went into the house of a Turk and asked a woman where the money was. On her refusing to tell, they stabbed her in one or two places and put burning coals on her breast until she gave the information they demanded. He had sent his private secretary and his official secretary, who took a deposition as to the fact. He did not dwell upon these cases very much, because in times of war and disturbance great horrors would happen. But it was not quite fair to charge these horrors entirely on the Turks. The object of the Commissioners was to establish such a system of police in Eastern Roumelia as to prevent this kind of hostility between the races in the future. He was convinced it might be done away with. In some parts of Eastern Roumelia the Turks and Bulgarians were, at the present time, on very good terms; and he had great hopes that when the Russian Forces were withdrawn, and the country had become absorbed in agriculture and commerce, the two peoples might live very well and happily together. He did not deny the existence of Turkish atrocities; but they ought to acknowledge that there were atrocities on the other side as well. He would not go into the question of Greece, as he had not been able to follow it closely; but he was of opinion that the wisest thing Turkey could do would be to come to terms with Greece as speedily as possible. The House would recollect that the question did along with Mr. Mackenzie Wallace, The not affect Greece only, but also a very large population in Turkey who sympathized with their Greek brethren outside. This Greek element was at present well-affected towards Turkish rule; but they sympathized with their brethren in Greece proper, so that it would be best for Turkey not to refuse their demands much longer. He need hardly say that one of the standing difficulties of Turkey was the chance of a war with Greece. There were still other questions to be grappled with in Turkey; and as Khairaddin Pasha, the present Grand Vizier, whose opinions were liberal and enlightened, had always shown himself disposed towards carrying out the necessary reforms, he believed that his tenure of office would conduce much to a satisfactory settlement of the difficulties. For his own part—speaking with a strong sense of responsibility, and being desirous of maintaining the Turkish Empire—he felt convinced that that Empire could only be maintained by a complete system of decentralization. The state of Constantinople was something perfectly appalling, and he scarcely liked to tell of all the instances of corruption that had come under his notice. The House would be able to judge from one or two instances. It was generally known that the import duties were to the amount of 8 per cent ad valorem. A friend of his had imported goods to the extent of £800, and wished to have the boxes opened at his own house and not at the Custom House. At the Custom House he declared their value, and offered £64, the duty of 8 per cent, together with a fee to cover the expenses of the Custom House officer. Nothing would induce the Custom House officer to accept the offer, and a broker at last tried his hand and obtained the boxes for £8, the £64 being taken as the basis of the duty. Of this £8, 8 per cent on £64 was paid to the Government, the rest being appropriated by the officers as back-sheesh. He was informed by a gentleman who had had access to the Papers relating to the Revenues of Turkey that, at the present time, only about £12,000,000 went into the Treasury Chest; while he was convinced that no less than £25,000,000 were paid by the taxpayers, and the country was thus reduced to poverty. Notwithstanding that, the informant said that the country did not require the services of any heaven-born financier in order to overcome the difficulties and to set things straight. If only the present arrangements were honestly worked, the revenue would rise to its proper amount. Every attempt had been made to patch up the finances of Turkey. An offer had been made by M. de Tocqueville, and had fallen to the ground; and, again, a plan had been suggested by which the Ottoman Bank should relieve the wants of the country. These offers comprised a loan of the sum of £6,000,000, which was wanted for the disbandment of troops, the redemption of the caime, and establishing a gendarmerie; but if that proposal had been accepted, it would have been all but fatal, as it would have given Turkey the means of going on for another six months. Then there would be another crisis, with the old story over again. If Turkey wanted to live she must look into the question as a whole, and institute reforms to last, not for six months, but for many years. That could only be done by decentralizing. If the finances were mismanaged in the capital, how much more were they likely to be mismanaged in the Provinces, where there was no check upon them, and whence an appeal could only be made to the mismanagement of the Metropolis. So, why not allow the Provinces to govern themselves and pay for their own police? Why should they depend upon the police, which were said to be sent down from Constantinople; but which he knew, in many instances, were really not sent down at all? Turkey ought to adopt the plan which had been suggested by England—namely, to lay by so much of the annual revenue of the Provinces for State purposes—for the Army, Navy, Diplomacy, and Public Debt, and spend the rest of the money in the Provinces under supervision. There were some who were now prophesying smooth things for the Turkish Government, and endeavouring to maintain them in their old traditions, saying—“Hold out, for England must in time come to help you;” but, for his own part, he submitted the Turkish Government must help themselves. Although he could not, for the reasons he had stated, support the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea, he felt that it would be well if there was a strong expression of opinion from the House of Commons to the effect that we had done all we could for Turkey, that we were friendly, that we felt the necessity of her existence as a barrier to Russia; but that, at the same time, she must execute the stipulations she had entered into, and show herself capable of carrying out the reforms which had been marked out for her. For this purpose he thought the Amendment quite preferable to the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House desires to express its gratification that the main portion of the stipulations of the Treaty of Berlin has been successfully carried into effect, and approves the steps which Her Majesty's Government have already taken to secure the full accomplishment of those portions of the Treaty which are still in course of execution,"—(Mr. Hanbury),

—instead thereof.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I need not say I bear in my mind the fact that no hon. Member in the House, excepting those who have moved and seconded the Motion and the Amendment, have yet been led to address it, for want of time. I confess it appears to me little less than a mockery to commence a general discussion, upon a question of this vast extent, after midnight. That is the condition, however, in which we are placed; and if this were the time to discuss obstruction, there are many things with regard to the Business of the House that I could say that only the extreme pressure of time prevents me from saying. The effect will be that I shall, myself, avoid a great many topics of great interest and importance, and a great many observations that have been heard in the speeches delivered, of which I should wish to take notice, but which are not absolutely essential to the main purpose that we have in view. Allow me to say, Sir, however, that I have listened to the hon. Gentleman the Secunder of the Amendment (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), in the main, with lively satisfaction. I am obliged to make that qualification, "in the main," which he will thoroughly understand; because no one could listen otherwise than with pain to the statements which he made in regard to the outrages, which, as I have always said, if committed by Christians upon Mahomedans and Turks, are even worse than outrages if committed by Turks and Mahomedans upon Christians. These are matters of investigation, on which I give no opinion, beyond the general principle; but, as regards the speech of the hon. Gentleman, I will not say it has surprised me, after what I have seen and heard of his labours elsewhere; but it demands from me an expression of lively satisfaction. What the Mover of the Amendment thought on the subject it would be difficult for me to conjecture; but there are indications frequently in the course of speeches and at the close of speeches by which one can judge, in a certain measure, of the impression that they make on the two sides of the House. The speech of the hon. Member was greeted, during its delivery, and at its close, with the liveliest expressions of sympathy and satisfaction from this side of the House; but I am sorry to say that I did not catch, though I listened anxiously and intently, any corresponding amount of similar expressions from the hon. Gentlemen among whom the hon. Member sits; but having endeavoured, as well as I can, to compliment the hon. Secunder upon the character of his speech, will he permit me to offer a single criticism? My criticism is this—I am at a loss to connect the speech with the vote he proposes to give. He stated that he should vote against my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) on account of reasons which he had given; but it appears to me that those reasons were a part of the hon. Member's purpose, which he had been obliged to drop in consequence of the pressure of time. I do not detect these reasons in any portion of his speech, and that he may be assured that I am not indulging in captious criticism I will just call the attention of the House to the two branches of the Motion of my hon. Friend, and I will consider the bearing of the speech of the hon. Secunder upon the two branches of that Motion. In the first branch, my hon. Friend invites the House to pray Her Majesty to use her influence to procure the prompt execution of those Articles of the Treaty of Berlin which relate to reform in Turkey. Upon that portion of the Motion the hon. Secunder recorded a very strong opinion that a decided expression of sentiment from this House, urging Turkey forward in the path of reform, and conveying to Turkey the conviction it entertains as to the policy of her excuses, would be an expression of the utmost value. Then, with regard to the rest of the Motion, it appears that Turkey will endeavour to procure for Greece the rectification of the Frontier agreed upon by the Powers. Well, Sir; but the hon. Gentleman, in the same spirit of ingenuousness as well as intelligence which characterized his speech at large, stated, in his judgment, as totally distinct and different from, and at variance with, and in contradiction to, the Mover of the Amendment, that it was essential to the interests of Turkey that she should proceed to a prompt settlement on the lines of the Treaty. Well, Sir, I entertained very lively hopes, under these circumstances, that we might have had the benefit of the vote of the hon. Member. Not having the benefit of his vote, I am still more grateful for the strength and encouragement we derive from the whole tenour of his speech. Let us hope it will be reported, as having come before the hour of midnight; it will be reported with greater accuracy and precision than those who, like myself, fall upon still more advanced hours. I trust it will be circulated far and wide; for I am sure, coming as it does from a Gentleman of intelligence, who has had the confidence of the Government, and has lately been engaged in important duties in Turkey and has come back from there, and from his knowledge and experience of the country, that it will have a most beneficial effect. When I turn to the speech of the Mover of the Amendment (Mr. Hanbury), I am very sorry to say that I am unable to hold a similar strain of language. The Mover of the Amendment, Sir, is desirous of appearing as a supporter of the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government; but it is evident that he altogether disapproves of the important despatch written by Lord Salisbury on the 12th of June, which is, in point of fact, a manifesto of the prospective policy of the Government. If it is not a manifesto of the prospective policy of the Government, it would be a gross delusion on the House, coming, as it does, at the close of the volume; but, on that point, I do not entertain the smallest doubt. I accept it as a clear and luminous description of the bases on which they mean to proceed, and it is totally at variance with the views and sentiments of the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment. He is not only at variance with the Government, but he is at variance with the Treaty of Berlin. He objects altogether to that Treaty. He says the Frontier, in the first place, is a very vague and unintelligible one; and, secondly, that it is a very bad one. He says what is necessary is not that the Powers should intervene, that the Treaty should be fulfilled, and that the operations should take effect; but he thought Turkey and Greece should be left to settle it between themselves. That is to say, that they should go to war with one another — [Mr. HANBURY: No, no.] — Is not that the meaning of "settling it between themselves?" Does the hon. Member suppose that a settlement between them can be attained in any other way excepting by the authority of the Powers? If he does think so, I believe he is the only man in this House who thinks so; and he certainly is the only man who is governed by a credulity which I should be sorry to impute to a Gentleman of his intelligence. A settlement between Turkey and Greece either means nothing at all, or it means a settlement by the strong hand—by force of constant rebellion, fed and fomented in the Turkish territory by the direct sympathy of Greece, by the invasion by Greek Forces to support that rebellion, and by the occurrence of a state of things so dreadful that the interference of Europe would be an absolute necessity for the purpose of bringing about a settlement. The hon. Gentleman appears simply as an enemy of the Treaty of Berlin—in that point of view in which he touches the Treaty in a definite manner. I do not suppose he regards the earlier portion of the Motion. No objection can be taken to the desire of urging the Turkish Power forward. "In the immediate execution of reforms," is an expression in itself so general that it conveys no inconveniently rigid demand upon Her Majesty's Government so as to fetter their discretion. The definite part of the Motion of my hon. Friend is that to which I will now address myself—namely, that which proposes that the Government shall endeavour to procure for Greece the rectiification of Frontier agreed upon by the Powers, because, he says, this rectification is bad, and a rectification which ought not to be made. What are the reasons the hon. Gentleman advances in support of his extraordinary attack on the Treaty of Berlin? With regard to the character of the recommendation, he says it is extremely hard to attack Turkey, for that in Turkey the people are very good, and the Pashas and the Government are very bad. He speaks as if my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea was anxious to apply force to the people; but it is to the Pashas and the Government that he wants to apply force; and, therefore, the Mover of the Amendment ought to be extremely glad that this corrupt Government, whose faults he has described, and takes credit to himself for describing, are to be placed under pressure on the authority of the Powers of Europe. He makes all manner of charges against the Greek Government and peoples; and against me he makes charges the most groundless that I have ever been subjected to, though they are not very serious. He made them out by quoting, as my own sentiments, the account I gave of the Greek Memorandum.

MR. HANBURY: I beg pardon. I distinctly quoted the right hon. Gentleman's words. I quoted four instances—half the first were his, and the whole of the next.

MR. GLADSTONE: I know the hon. Gentleman did. He began his main quotation, and the only quotation which, in the slightest degree, went to the point, with words in which I have described the purport of the Greek Memorandum; next he read words which are historical, which are perfectly true, which are perfectly just, and to which I adhere; and they do not bear one shred of the meaning the hon. Gentleman ascribes to them. It is perfectly true that the principle on which the Congress proceeded at Berlin was a principle that would have justified the wider recommendation that France had asked for, and that Lord Palmerston, and Lord Russell, and the Cabinet of Lord Palmerston in 1862 had made a wider recommendation. But he did not quote these for the purpose of insinuating and saying that the Greek ought not to be satisfied with what the Congress had recommended. Not one word can he find to justify that. He may choose to suggest the insinuation; but, with the recollection of what I wrote, I challenge him to produce it, showing one word to that purpose. What I did was this. I showed that the wider recommendations that had been made by France, that had been made by Lord Palmerston, and that might have been involved in the proposal, were so many reasons why Turkey should promptly acquiesce in that settlement now made, and why Her Majesty's Government should vigorously set about promoting that settlement, in order that Turkey might get—what I always desired she should have—the best settlement of which the circumstances permitted for the disposal of this part of the question. The hon. Gentleman says the Greek Government has been meddling in Crete and Cyprus. What do we know of that? The hon. Gentleman has given us no details, no particulars, has quoted no authorities; but seeks, by raising a vague prejudice against the Greek Government, to draw the House off from the purpose we have now in view. The hon. Gentleman charged the Greek Government with one act which, he said, was an act of misconduct—the sending of the Army across the Frontier. But that was done before the Congress at Berlin, and before the time when, for a very short period, the British Government made themselves champions of the Hellenic nation. It has acted in good faith since the judgment given by the Congress—since the mediation recommended by the Congress. The hon. Gentleman says that the people of Epirus and Thessaly do not want to be annexed to Greece. Where is his authority for that? That is his opinion, and in that opinion he is perfectly in conflict not only with—I will not say the opinions on this side of the House—but he has here also come into conflict, and in direct conflict, with the opinion of Lord Salisbury. He thinks that Epirus and Thessaly may very well remain under the rule of the Sultan. [MR. HANBURY: I quoted the opinion of Sir Henry Layard.] Does the hon. Gentleman think that Epirus and Thessaly will remain under the rule of the Sultan? But, if he quoted Sir Henry Layard, I can only say he is in complete conflict with Lord Salisbury; because his Lordship, with great good sense, in the despatch of the 15th June, after urging upon the Sultan the consideration that the territory in question is rather a source of weakness than of strength, adds, that if he retains this district under his dominion it will

"Bear him a reluctant allegiance. Being Christians, they do not add to the number of his Army; that in time of trouble their discontent is a standing source of danger and a steady drain upon his defensive power. The desire, which has been chronic among them for so long, prevents them from yielding any revenue compatible with the cost which it imposes."

The hon. Member comes here as a friend of Turkey. I have no doubt that he is the friend of Turkey, but he is one of those friends who have lured on Turkey to her destruction; and now he is advising Turkey not to give way, not to accede to the demands of the Powers, and not to listen to the authority of Europe. That was the whole tenour of his speech, and it wound up with a recommendation that the Powers should abandon their solemn conclusion, and leave the matter to be settled between Turkey and Greece. Well, Sir, I do not recollect whether there is any other important allegation made by the hon. Gentleman that it is necessary for me to mention; but he spoke, I remember, of the impossibility of regenerating the Turkish Empire in 12 months, and then of certain things which had been done in the way of reform. When he spoke of making a good appointment, he was naturally reminded of the case of Chefket Pasha, perhaps one of the greatest miscreants on earth, who was so described solemnly by the British Government, and who was indicated by the British Government as a man whose crimes called for condign punishment. That man has been favoured, petted, kept in good offices, placed in disturbed districts, invested with the power of determining the happiness and misery of hundreds of thousands of people by the Sultan and by Pashas upon whom the hon. Gentleman said—"For God's sake do not exercise pressure." Then the hon. Gentleman spoke of Midhat Pasha. I know that Midhat Pasha is, among all their enemies, the most formidable, and more than formidable, the most repugnant to the subject-races. The hon. Gentleman says the Sultan has appointed him for five years. I do not know whether he is so appointed, and I confess I care very little if he is so appointed. A man of that class is certainly likely to be appointed somewhere; but I decline entirely to accept that appointment as a proof, such as he wishes me to take, of the commencement of reform in Turkey. Then the hon. Member has spoken of the appointment of Photiades Bey in Crete for five years. I believe he has not received an appointment of an irrevocable character. I believe if Photiades Bey were appointed under a valid instrument not revocable that he would probably be a very good Governor of Crete; but I am obliged to confess myself in conflict with the hon. Gentleman on the point of fact, and judging from my information, derived at least from a man of great experience in Crete who ought to be well informed, Photiades Bey holds his appointment from day to day, depending altogether on the breath of the Sultan and the officers by whom he is surrounded. Well, now, Sir, if I may leave the question—Oh, yes! there was the other point. We have recently heard of the re-organization of the Judges, of the reform of the Judicial system. We have been so profitably busy about it in this country for the last 50 years that the hon. Gentleman was quite justified in supposing that that would sound to us as if it were a great title for commendation. The statement he made was that 183 Judges had been appointed—which was more than the whole Judicial Staff in this country—and that out of these 166 were Mahomedans. [An hon. MEMBER: 83.] The hon. Gentleman may be better informed than I am; but I must speak from the information I have received. But out of these Judges nearly all are Mahomedans. The appointment of a number of new Judges is no sign at all of the reality of improvement in Turkey. Let us hear from the lips of responsible Ministers that progress is being made, and then we will begin to believe it. The hon. Gentleman is old enough to reflect and to remember what took place in former times in Turkey—after the Hatti-Cheriff in 1839. After the Hatti-Humayoun in 1866, there arose a great promise of reform—nay, more—there were real beginnings of reform. It is only just to Turkish statesmen to say that after the Hatti-Humayoun of 1866 there were some real beginnings of reform. But we have now given Turkey 12 months, and we have not heard from the lips of responsible Ministers of the Government, who would not speak without knowing that they are well informed, any real assurance of any real progress made—of any district better governed, and in the single instance which amidst the pressure of Parliamentary Business a particular case has been cited—namely, the case of Armenia, the language held has been totally different. Not a project has been advanced, not a hope even has been ventured that any improvement has been made. Well, now, Sir, it was necessary for me to notice these points of the speech which referred to the case of the Greeks, and which were intended to prejudice the Greek Government in the eyes of the House, as the hon. Member also thought to prejudice the case in the eyes of the House by talking about the dangers that were to follow the downfall of Turkey. Perhaps dangers would follow the sudden downfall of Turkey; and, if so, that was the more reason for not following the advice of the hon. Member, because it was to him and other so-called friends that a very large part of the dangers of Turkey are now due. They have had their way. What has happened during the last three years? Who is responsible? Are not you in the majority? Have not you had countless triumphs in this House? Have you not had the whole power of the Empire at your back? Do you think, then, you can come here and say that the minority has marred your valuable efforts, or has baffled you? If you are a majority, you are the Parliament of England. You are the Queen's Government. You are the House of Lords and the House of Commons. You say you also have had the people at your back. I should think, then, the hon. Gentleman himself would be ashamed that the handful of persons sitting on these Benches have been enabled to baffle the operation of that enormous powerful machinery, or to say that by its combinations the whole forces of your policy have been so enfeebled and made useless that its efforts have resulted in the prostration of Turkey, in the humiliation and mutilation of Turkey, in the increased weakness and corruption of Turkey, and in the aggravation of every danger which it was your duty to avert. I hold, on the contrary, that the best friends of Turkey are those who, at an early stage of the controversy, in plain and decisive language, without any of those innuendoes which sometimes destroy the force of language, laid before Turkey the necessities of the case, and cast upon her the responsibilities of the evils that her misconduct or folly might entail, and did not exclude from their view that ultimate possibility, which was then first brought into action, that Europe, for the sake of peace, even for the sake of Turkey itself, might be obliged with strong hand to interpose. Moderation in the demands that you may make of her, firmness and earnestness of purpose, and no equivocation in the manner in which you press them—that, I believe, is the proper policy to pursue. But the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman is totally different from the Motion in more than one particular. The point of difference, however, to which I would draw the attention of the House, is this. The Amendment of the hon. Member is entirely a retrospective Amendment. It expresses satisfaction with what has been done, and approves the steps that the Government have taken. My hon. Friend entirely avoids that ground in his Motion. Having the Papers in his hand, he felt it necessary, in his most able statement, and my hon. Friend near me (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) also felt it necessary, to go over that ground. But it is his Motion with which we have to do. That is entirely and wholly prospective. But it does not imply any censure whatever on Her Majesty's Government. Now, Sir, if I am to go back upon the past, I am bound to say I must agree with him in all his criticisms on the course Her Majesty's Government took; but I do not wish to go back upon the past, for there is something better we can do. I say there is something better; and that is, to do what my hon. Friend invites us to do—to look straight to the future, and to endeavour to do so without prejudice and without animadversion upon Her Majesty's Government, and to assist Her Majesty's Government with the weight and authority of this House in procuring the general fulfilment of those portions of the Treaty of Berlin essential to the happiness of the people of Turkey, for whom my hon. Friend is so solicitous, and particularly and specifically to procure the carrying out of the clauses of the Treaty, and the consummation of those relating to the Frontier of Greece. No doubt, it is our duty to call Her Majesty's Government to account—to criticize their conduct, and to find fault with them in whatever way our understanding and conscience may dictate. That, no doubt, is a part of the duty of a Member of Parliament; but it is a duty which he certainly need not be so enamoured of as to flaunt it about, and resort to it on every occasion, particularly when it may come into conflict with the attainment of useful objects. If it be a duty to animadvert on the policy of the Government where we think they have gone wrong, it is certainly a much higher duty to waive retrospective criticism, and to use the influence of the House to mitigate the serious evils which afflict the East, and to promote the happiness of the populations of the Turkish Empire. This is what my hon. Friend asks the House to do. He asks the House to do no more than that. He begs you generally to press for the prompt execution of the Article relating to reforms, and that an undertaking may be given that the Articles of the Treaty may be carried out, thereby endeavouring to procure for Greece the rectification of the Frontier agreed upon by the Powers. Is there anything improper in that? I am sure Her Majesty's Government will not tell us that we must not interfere because negotiations are going on. There is a perfectly distinct Article in the Treaty that is the completion and consummation of a great negotiation, and what we want is the application of that, and that is not a matter which ought to be or which could be affected by complicated negotiations when the views of the Powers are unknown. The Mover of the Amendment seems to think that the Treaty is very difficult to understand upon this subject. He says, and says quite truly, and quotes Lord Salisbury as his authority, that the Frontier line was generally indicated, and not indicated with precision, by the Treaty of Berlin. That is perfectly true; but is that any reason why we should not ask the parties who are competent to interpret their own words to proceed to do so, because the hon. Gentleman may happen to think, or I may happen to think, or anybody else, that these words are difficult to construe? That is no reason why the words should not be construed by the proper authorities. We are not the proper authorities. The proper authorities are the Powers who conducted the negotiations. I presume they know their own meaning. I believe they do know their own meaning. I believe that these difficulties are perfectly airy and theoretical. The French Government, at the foundation of the Greek Kingdom, made most intelligent studies of the whole question of the Frontier, and contributed very greatly at that important period, if not to secure to the Greek nation a good Frontier, at least to prevent her having a much worse one than she actually got. If you will procure them, you will find they knew perfectly well what this Frontier is, and ought to be. That is not a question, at any rate, to be regulated by talk about vagueness, encumbered with words that are nothing to the purpose. There is no fear of the result. What is our fear? It is that we are interrupting the peace of the land. We should raise our voice in defence of those arrangements which are for the interests of justice, peace, and reform in these countries; and, for that reason, what we ask is that Her Majesty's Government will work in co-operation with other Powers in order to bring this matter to a speedy consummation. Let the hon. Gentleman say, if he likes, that this question can end in but one way. I have never incited, and I will not incite, or endeavour to incite, the Government of Greece not to regard this as a final measure. The only communication I have had with any person connected with the Greek Government on this subject is this—namely, to make known my belief that Lord Salisbury was perfectly justified in saying that if Turkey acquiesced in the arrangement contemplated at Berlin it might be fairly asked of Greece that she should give satisfactory assurances for her future good conduct. I charge the hon. Gentleman with misrepresenting me, and he enabled me to refute what he has said, by referring to actions of mine in a totally opposite sense. I entirely disclaim the intention, and I am perfectly willing to sympathize with the hon. Gentleman and the Pashas in their desire for finality, if that were really a difficulty. As I have said, this can only end in one way. Greece, weak as she may be, is yet strong in the principles on which she rests. She has the assertions made by the Turkish Government; she has the strong sympathy of these populations; she has the assertion of the uselessness of these populations to the Sultan; she has, on record, the engagements by this country, now some 13 months ago, promising our careful consideration, which is well known to mean the favourable consideration of some of her territorial claims. She has got certain words inserted in the Treaty; she has got a description of a certain line of Frontier. That line of Frontier is a line which, like every other line, is different from a line drawn along the surface of the earth; but the subsidiary arrangements are such that they must be made by the same authority which declared the line in principle. What we ask is, that the declarations of Her Majesty's Government ever since Lord Salisbury and Lord Beaconsfield came back from Berlin shall be fulfilled. One of the earliest declarations, constantly repeated over and over again, was that "the Treaty of Berlin shall be fulfilled in the spirit and in the letter. We have never receded, and we do not believe and cannot believe that anybody will recede, from the Treaty of Berlin; but, whoever does recede from it, the Government of England will not be the people to do so." This was accompanied by the announcement that the Greeks had now the opportunity of obtaining a larger share of territory from Turkey than any of those rebellious subjects, as they were called, who had taken part in the war had previously obtained. These assurances held out by this Government cannot be forgotten. They weaken your hands, if you are to attempt to interrupt the fulfilment of that arrangement. Greece may be weak, but, rely upon it, she will not recede; and I will go further, and say, she will not recede from that which Europe has promised her. She cannot have higher sanction than that of Europe. In my opinion, it was very mistaken policy to sever Eastern Roumelia from Bulgaria; but so strong is my respect for that settlement that during the whole period of that arrangement I have never opened my mouth for one word of criticism. We must, Sir, respect these conclusions at which the Powers of Europe arrived. In combinations and circumstances so difficult and complicated as these, if you are to unsettle them on small cavils and private opinions, there never can be peace, there never can be progress towards the settlement of national questions. We have now reached a point at which our duty is to form the best judgment we can upon the policy of Her Majesty's Government so described. As I understand, the despatch of Lord Salisbury refers to previous proceedings of the Government in which a more limited settlement of territory was proposed. It likewise refers to a preference which the Government had entertained, as I should say very mistakenly, in favour of a postponement of further proceedings; but it is purposely stated at the bottom of page 234 that they have not thought it right to insist on their views in this matter in opposition to the Powers' expressed opinion, and, therefore, that line had been abandoned. Lord Salisbury goes on, in the course of a rather lengthy statement contained in page 235, to express the views upon which Her Majesty's Government intend to act. Of course, Sir, I do not pretend, and have no right to pretend, that I have any information as to their meaning beyond what I can draw from their official language. I read that official language with great care, and with as much candour as I can apply to it. I understand it to mean that Her Majesty's Government, reserving, of course, to themselves, and properly so, the same right of interpretation that belongs to every other Power, yet, notwithstanding that, they intend to require from Turkey that she shall accept the general line of recommendation at Berlin. Sir, if the general line is kept, upon that very little difficulty will remain. It is impossible to admit the claim as to Janina. I am reluctant, independently of the lateness of the hour, to enter into the argument about it, because I feel that the authority of the Treaty is something very much higher and stronger than any argument I can use. But this I will say—and the hon. Gentleman himself did not for a moment contest the fact—that the people who inhabit the district of Sandjak and Janina, and who form about one-half of the whole population of Epirus, are, in an overwhelming majority, Greeks by language. Of that there is no doubt whatever. A handful of Turks dwell in the town of Janina, and they are, unfortunately, men of station and position; but the population are a Greek-speaking population, and they are very strongly Greek in their sympathies. That is declared in Lord Salisbury's despatch. More than that, I doubt whether this House is aware how intensely Greek the City of Janina is. It is more Greek than an ordinary Greek city. Five hundred Epirot students are in the University of Athens. I need not say that they have got no Turkish University. But, Sir, I will go a little further, and I will quote the unprejudiced and unsuspected testimony of Lord Byron in the year 1810, before these troubles began. In that year, commenting on the statement that Athens is still the most polished city of Greece, he says, in these few interesting words—

Three thousand years ago, this was the cradle of the Greek nationality. I do not mean that the precise site of the city was the centre; but, at any rate, there, or within six miles of it, was the cradle of the Greek nationality, and of the Greek religion. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment says there have been mixtures of races there. Have there been no mixture of races in England? Are we Danes, are we Saxons, are we Romans, are we Normans, are we Celts? [Laughter.] If laughter is to be excited in that way, very good laughter indeed could be made at the mixture of races which prevails among ourselves. I cannot but believe it is one of the greatest conditions of the excellences of human nature. Such is the case with Janina. It is Greek, which is not to be disputed; but it is Greek with a singular and marked character. The Turks do not claim Janina. Nowhere, that I can find, have the Turks said—“Give us Janina, and then we will be satisfied.” Their old argument is—“No, we must have the whole country down to the Gulf.” They are vitally at variance with the whole of the Powers, and the best mercy that the Powers can show will be to do to-day what Safvet Pasha recommended some 12 or 14 months ago—that the will of Europe should be announced to them, and that they should be made to attend to it peremptorily. I cannot conceive myself anything more unfortunate than that we should continue to keep Turkey in the midst of her difficulty by the sort of encouragement given to her, and that has been given to her to-night by the speech of the hon. Gentleman, by these vague apologies and vague professions of friendship to her, of which she has had enough. If we say, “We have had enough of her promises of reform”—and I think we have—I think she is entitled to retort upon us that she has had enough of our promises of friendship. Bleeding as she is at every pore under our encouragement, groaning under the burdens which we have encouraged her to undertake, I think that Turkey has great reason to complain, and I think she has a very great disposition so to complain. I do think it is most important to her to have a friend. We cannot expect, at any rate, we do not in this House believe, that Russia is likely to be that friend. The Empire of Austria is assuming, almost from month to month, a position more and more formidable, and of more and more undisguised hostility to Turkey. It is laying its plans for distributing the Provinces, for acquiring and appropriating these dominions, and for opening to itself the territorial frontier to the Ægean Sea. To endeavour to create some friendship between Turkey and the Hellenic race would be a wise and judicious policy, and it is that policy which we ask you to-night to adopt. I believe it is fairly founded on the basis that is described in this despatch—that is to say, the suggestion indicated is a reasonable suggestion by the Congress at Berlin—and, on the other hand, the giving of assurances and guarantees from Greece for the observance, and the faithful observance, of good neighbourhood to Turkey. That is what we ask the House of Commons to pronounce. I believe it is a demand not only agreeable to all the interests in view, but a demand which is most agreeable to the vast mass of the people of this country—a people who have been much divided in regard to the questions between Russia and Turkey, who have suspected everything connected with the Slavonic progress, because of its supposed association with Russia, but a people whose sympathies with the Hellenic interests are unquestionably large now, as they have been in former times. We ask you, therefore, to adopt this step, to allow this House to express its views for the fulfilment of the Treaty of Berlin. The Prime Minister said, on the 9th of November last, that, if necessary, he would appeal to the people to obtain the full accomplishment of the Treaty of Berlin, in the letter and in the spirit. Sir, it is not necessary for him to go so far as that. If he appeals to the House, we know that upon that side of the House his application will be favourably entertained, and he certainly will have on this side a warm and enthusiastic answer to his appeal. We trust that Her Majesty's Government will not take upon themselves the responsibility of forbidding these attempts of the House of Commons to concur with them in giving effect to the concert of Europe for a purpose declared by European authority highly favourable to the interests of freedom, but that they will be disposed to give their assent to the Motion—I think the most reasonable Motion—of my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea.

MR. BOURKE: Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that every hon. Member now present will admit that there is nothing more irksome, or more disagreeable, than addressing a weary House of Commons. I regret, Sir, that it should have fallen to my lot on this occasion to do so. At the same time, I do not think it would be respectful to the House, occupying the position I have the honour to hold, if I were to abstain from stating, as I will do very shortly, my views on the Motion now before us. And first let me say that I think it is very satisfactory that we have so many prominent Members of the Liberal Party in this House who are anxious to advocate the more perfect fulfilment of the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin. After the many vigorous denunciations, uttered both in this House and in the country against the Treaty, and considering that it has been declared by eminent Members of the Party opposite that it would be absolutely impossible to carry out its main stipulations—considering also that the provisions, the execution of which has been characterized as impracticable, have now been either executed, or are in process of execution, it is consoling to my mind that we have now a proposal made to us by the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Charles W. Dilke) for an Address to the Crown, praying that the Crown will use all its endeavours to secure the carrying out of the other Articles of this Treaty which remain unexecuted. The Motion of the hon. Baronet points to two distinct things—the first is, the reforms in Turkey; and the second, the claims of Greece. Now, I say most sincerely, and without the fear of contradiction, that both of those subjects have, from first to last—from the beginning of the protracted struggle which has gone on in Turkey for a period of four years—been prominently before the mind of Her Majesty's Government, who have, in fact, never ceased for one moment to be fully awake to their importance. Sir, amongst the many subjects which the hon. Baronet opposite has treated, there was one that he touched upon rather lightly, and which was afterwards adverted to by the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), to which I wish to allude at the outset, because I fear that, in my short address, I shall have to say some very disagreeable things; and, therefore, I wish to begin by saying something that is more agreeable than those topics to which I have alluded. I was, I must say, considerably relieved by finding that those hon. Gentlemen, although they made an attack on the Government in respect to nearly every point to which they referred, did not attack the Government on the question of Crete. It has, on many occasions in this House, certainly been insinuated that the Government have not been alive to their duty in many particulars; and they have even been charged with being dead to their duty. But now that the Papers have been produced, and the policy of the Government has been fairly placed before the House, it is satisfactory to find that no fault is imputed to them in regard to Crete. And I must here pay a tribute to our Consul in that Island which I think is well deserved, because it will be seen from these Papers that that gentleman has, from the first, endeavoured to obtain for the Christians in Crete all the liberties which they are entitled to enjoy. Sir, on many occasions, the good offices of England were solicited by the Cretans; and we have the satisfaction of knowing that although, quite lately, the Cretan A bly did make the most formidable demands upon Turkey—demands which a short time ago we could not have supposed that Turkey would concede—yet, mainly owing to the exertions of the English Government and to English influence, all the demands made by the Assembly have been agreed to by Turkey with one exception. As it is now, we have some chance of getting a good Government in Crete, provided only that Photiades Bey, and other good Governors who have the welfare of the people at heart, shall be really secured in the government which they at present hold in that Island. Sir, now with regard to the 23rd Article of the Treaty, and the reforms in Turkey in Europe; that subject has already been so exhausted by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) that I do not think it is necessary that I should weary the House by entering upon it. But I think I should not be doing my duty, as this is the first time I have had an opportunity of speaking of the labours of my hon. Friend, if I were not to take this opportunity of saying that I believe no portion of the labour which has been bestowed upon Turkey of late will be of so much good in the end, or will produce so many valuable results, as that great work in which my hon. Friend has been engaged in concert with my noble Friend, Lord Donoughmore. But, the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Charles W. Dilke), I must say, in treating this subject was, as I am sorry to say he has been before, rather hard upon Sir Henry Layard; and I must certainly take this opportunity of pointing out in the strongest terms that Sir Henry Layard, in addressing the Porte on this occasion, used no less energetic language than my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch employed. Sir Henry Layard is not here to defend himself, and the hon. Member for Christchurch is. And I must say that when absent persons are performing their duty as well as they can to this land, it is, above all things, the first duty of those who represent them in this House to take care that their actions are not misrepresented in this House, and that they do not receive a less favourable construction than they deserve. Now, Sir, the hon. Baronet mentioned the remonstrance of Sir Henry Layard as being a very mild remonstrance indeed to the Porte upon the subject of their defaults.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE explained, that what he had said was this—that the remonstrance was very strong in its terms; but that it was made in the form of a note verbale, which was the mildest form of diplomatic interference.

MR. BOURKE: I really cannot follow the hon. Baronet in the distinction which he draws, because whether a note verbale is the mildest form of diplomatic interference or not is of very little consequence. If the words used are strong, it does not matter much whether they come in the shape of a note verbale or of the most solemn and binding Treaty. The words used by Sir Henry Layard were these—

“Her Majesty's Ambassador has on many occasions brought this very important matter to the notice of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and has received from his Excellency verbal assurances that the Règlements to be introduced into the European provinces of Turkey were being considered, with a view to being submitted in each province to the special Commissions, in which the native element is to be largely represented. But no steps in that direction appear yet to have been taken, although more than ten months have elapsed since the Treaty of Berlin was ratified.

“Her Majesty's Ambassador trusts that the Sublime Porte will enable him to inform his Government that the new Règlements have now been referred to the above-mentioned Commissions, and that they will soon be ready to be submitted to the European Commission instituted for Eastern Roumelia for its advice, as provided by the XXIIIrd Article of the Treaty.”

I cannot imagine anything more direct, or which would more plainly give the meaning of Her Majesty's Government and of our Ambassador, than these words. Therefore, I think it was rather hard that the remonstrance of Sir Henry Layard should be contrasted in that manner with that of the hon. Member for Christchurch. It seems to me that it is quite as strong. Now, Sir, the hon. Baronet then went on to speak of Asia, and he said we had peculiar responsibilities with regard to Asia. He spoke of the responsibilities that attached to Her Majesty's Government, not only in consequence of the 67th Article of the Treaty of Berlin, but also of those accruing in consequence of the Anglo-Turkish Convention. Sir, it is not my duty, on this occasion, to retreat in any way from the responsibilities of Her Majesty's Government with regard to Asia; for they have, from the first, been perfectly mindful of their duties. And, in August last, Lord Salisbury drew attention to this subject in one of the strongest despatches that has ever appeared in the Blue Books. He pointed out the necessity for reforms in the Police, in the Judicial system, and in the collection of the Revenue. Since that despatch was written, two Commissions have been sent to Asia Minor. We have received Reports from the Consuls who accompanied those Commissions, and I am sorry to say that those Reports reveal the existence of a very unsatisfactory state of things in that part of the Turkish Empire. In fact, I do not think that anything can be much worse than the condition of some parts of Armenia. I feel that the Armenians are entitled to the sympathy of this country, and I hope that they will obtain it, and enlist on their side the exertions of all to gain the reforms that we consider necessary; but, at the same time, much as we sympathize with the oppressed races, I beg to protest against the inference that Her Majesty's Government is responsible for the existing state of things, and that we are to blame for the non-fulfilment of Turkish promises. We have done our best, and have brought all these matters under the notice of the Porte. I, for one, have no wish to make excuses for the Turkish Government. More might have been done by them than has been done, for the state of things revealed by the visits of our Consuls in Asia Minor is, in some places, shocking and revolting. The misconduct of the Pashas, the corruption and extortion of the officials, the tyranny and cruelty of those in authority, is as bad as anything we have ever heard of. It is useless, however, to denounce the Turkish Government in one breath, and in the next to taunt Her Majesty's Government that reforms have not as yet been carried out. We ought rather to try to remedy and improve the condition of Asia Minor. The difficulties, I admit, are great, and have been much increased by the emigration of a large portion of the Mussulman population; but, bad as the condition of the country certainly is, it does not become us to be discouraged. Political questions of the highest importance have occupied the attention of the Porte, to which it has been necessary to give great attention. Such questions as the settlement of Bulgaria, of Eastern Roumelia, of Montenegro, of Albania, and the Frontier of Greece. It has been absolutely necessary to deal with these questions, which are of vital political importance, particularly from an International point of view. The Sultan has been opposed, from first to last, by a most fanatical Party at Constantinople, who have opposed all concessions. I believe the Sultan is perfectly convinced that the steps which Her Majesty's Government have recommended to him are the only means of giving prosperity to his country. With regard to the immediate future of Asia Minor, Lord Salisbury has lately written a despatch, from which I will make one or two extracts, to show what, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, are their duties with respect to Asia Minor—

"By Article LXI. of the Treaty of Berlin the Porte engages 'to carry out, without further delay, the improvements and reforms demanded by local requirements in the provinces inhabited by Armenians, and to guarantee their security against the Circassians and Kurds.'

"It further undertakes 'to make known the steps taken for this purpose to the Powers, who will superintend their application.'

"Further, in Article I. of the Convention between Great Britain and Turkey of the 4th June, 1878, the Sultan 'promises to England to introduce necessary reforms, to be agreed upon later between the two Powers, into the government, and for the protection of the Christian and other subjects of the Porte' in his Asiatic territories.

"Under these two Treaty stipulations the Sultan stands bound not only to promulgate new and improved laws, but actually to carry out reforms in the administration of the provinces situated within the sphere of Major Trotter's observation. Any proceedings inconsistent with the spirit of that promise furnish an ample ground for remonstrance -- by the Consul in the first instance, and afterwards, should occasion arise, by the Ambassador.

"Judgment must, of course, be used, both as to the expediency and the manner of such representations, and great care should be taken not to act upon information the accuracy of which is open to doubt. But, subject to these precautions, Great Britain is bound to spare no diplomatic exertion to obtain good government for the populations of Asiatic Turkey."

Under these Treaty stipulations, Lord Salisbury has pointed out that the Sultan stands bound, not only to promulgate new and improved laws, but to carry out reforms in the Provinces of Europe and Asia. But, subject to these precautions, Great Britain is bound to spare no diplomatic exertion to obtain good government for the populations of Asiatic Turkey. These are the views of Her Majesty's Government at the present moment. They do not desire to withdraw from the course they have marked out for themselves; and, certainly, the suspicions of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea are not well-founded. Six Consuls of experience and ability have been appointed in Anatolia. Her Majesty's Government have perfect confidence that wherever there is bad administration, or tyranny of any kind, these Consuls will perform the duty imposed upon them by Her Majesty's Government—namely, to report the matter to Her Majesty's Government; and I myself have known many instances of Reports of that kind doing much good, and bringing to light abuses which have subsequently been remedied. Well, Sir, if nothing else had arisen, the recollection of what took place after the Crimean War would have induced Her Majesty's Government to take the course they adopted; because, beyond a doubt, much of the evil which has fallen on the populations of Eastern Europe in recent years is to be attributed, in my opinion, to the neglect of opportunities which have arisen subsequently to the Crimean War. Sir, when these accusations are made against a Conservative Government—accusations which are now made, and have been made for some years past, in every shape and form that it is possible to make them—when these accusations are made, it is as well to recollect that between 1856 and 1874, a period of 18 years, Liberal Governments were in power for 14 years. I should like to know what evidence there is to show that, during those 14 years, the Liberal Governments were alive to those duties and responsibilities incurred after the Peace of 1856? Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) has mentioned the Hatti-Houmayoun. I have studied all the documents which arose out of it, and, I must say, I cannot find that the Liberal Government, or any Government in Europe, was really alive to the responsibilities which they undertook; and this is the more surprising, because not only did they undertake those responsibilities as to the improved condition of the various races in Turkey, but they also entered into the famous Tripartite Convention binding them to protect Turkey, so that they had the strongest possible inducement to bring about an improvement of Turkey. They knew that they had guaranteed the integrity of Turkey—of the Turkish Empire—and they must know that the only way to preserve that integrity was to get Turkey to reform herself and her institutions. Now, Sir, I come to that portion of the hon. Baronet's speech which alluded to Greece. It appears to be the wish of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to represent Her Majesty's Government as being totally indifferent to the cause of Greece, and as a sort of drag on the other Powers of Europe, before and after the Berlin Treaty. I do not think anyone can peruse these Papers without seeing that Her Majesty's Government have been, from the first, animated by the most sincere desire to better the relations which exist between Turkey and Greece. Sir, there have been other occasions on which I have been called upon to address the House upon this subject, and I have been obliged to treat it with considerable reserve, because, as the House is aware, ever since the Treaty of Berlin, negotiations have been going on, with reference to Greece, with all the Powers of Europe; and, under these circumstances, it would be impossible for me to state anything in relation to what was going on then without being guilty of bad faith towards some or all of the Governments of Europe. Several hon. Gentlemen have to-night treated this rather as a Party question than otherwise, and have endeavoured to show that, while other Governments were inclined to show sympathy with Greece, the Government of Her Majesty displayed no such feeling. I remember that, on a former occasion in this House, and on other occasions outside its walls, the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea has endeavoured to show that Her Majesty's Government were opposed to the terms of the Treaty of Berlin as far as Greece was concerned. But what is the real truth concerning the matter? So far from Her Majesty's Government lagging behind, it is, I think, clear, from the Papers before the House, that they have approved the course suggested by, and made part of, the Treaty of Berlin in reference to Greece. And, as a matter of fact, Her Majesty's Government suggested the line of the Greek Frontier some months before the Congress met, and an instance of Sir Henry Layard, conferred with Sadyk Pasha question. That rectification of would have been agreed to be- meeting of the Congress, but unfortunate fact that Sadyk Al, and that Rashdi Pasha, needed him, did not take the r. Later on, when Sefket Pasha Sir Henry Layard on the same he said that if this alteration cation of Frontier was to be it must be done by means of brought to bear by the Euro- pers; but, in using this lan- ge did not express the opinions l either by his predecessors or eors. It was just before the that Sefket Pasha expressed on which I have quoted to Sir ayard; and the only question ; was whether it should or ot be taken into consideration ngress. What, then, are the lt must be well known that ie late war Greece distinctly o discourage the attacks which e on the Turkish Frontier, and, important successes of the Army, determined themselves Turkey with irregular Forces. eeding was lost sight of by Her Government, who sent two Greece to endeavour to induce : Government to desist from the pon which they had entered. ore, when Her Majesty's Go- found that there was an in- the part of the Porte to take taliatory measures, they took issuade the Constantinople Go- from sending their iron-clad bombard certain towns on the of Greece. Greece was as- at she would lose nothing by ; from attacking Turkey, and voured to persuade the Porte most prudent and politic thing lo was to observe a policy of n towards Greece. We were in obtaining a truce between owers. At that time we had the believe that Greece would d with the line of delimitation . by Sir Henry Layard. Under mstances, I do not think that s any right to complain of the en by England. Greece ought t this now, and did recollect ne, because she acknowledged that Turkey had a large Army and a large Navy, and it was only by the earnest desire of England that that Army and Navy were not used against Greece. It would have been a great evil and a great misfortune for Greece, if that country had been made the theatre of a contest between the two nations. At that time there was a great alarm in Greece, and the Greek Govern- ment not only besought Her Majesty's Government to interpose, but thanked Her Majesty's Government in the warm- est terms for having prevented Turkey from attacking her. Well, Sir, it has been always the opinion of Her Ma- jesty's Government that Turkey would do wisely to make such arrangements with regard to her Frontier as would restore peace between the two countries. I quite agree with the right hon. Gen- tleman the Member for Greenwich that the question is not as to one particular town or one particular line. The great object is to restore peace, and to do it in such a way that it will be a permanent peace, and that populations which for centuries, or, at least, within the memory of men, have not been able to live peace- ably, might for the future be able to do so. We have impressed on Turkey that if she makes a territorial sacrifice she will be amply compensated for that sacrifice by being relieved from the ne- cessity of keeping up a large Army on her Frontier, exhausting her resources by continual expeditions, keeping up large garrisons, receiving no tribute, and having a population on her border in a state of insurrection. It may be said that one of the difficulties of the situation is to find a defensible Frontier. I believe that the present Frontier may be said to be the most defensible Fron- tier that can be obtained, and I wish to say that, because I think it one of the strongest points that Turkey has. But when one comes to think of it, I do not think it, in reality, a strong point at all ; because a Frontier may be one of the strongest Frontiers in the world, but it may be a very bad Frontier for the maintenance of peace. One of the great- est enemies of peace is brigandage. Sir, the very fact of the Frontier being a mountain in which brigands abound is a reason why it should remain a strong Frontier; but that does not render it a good Frontier. Sir, when the Congress took place, Her Majesty's Government did what could best be done by mediation. There is no evidence whatever to show, in all these Papers, that any Power of Europe was prepared to force the opinion of Congress upon Turkey. In fact, I am prepared to state that there was no Government in Europe prepared to do so. There was no Government in Europe prepared to force the opinion of Congress upon Turkey; and, therefore, that being so, Her Majesty's Government thought that the best, and really the only, way to bring about the agreement between the two Powers, and to effect the object they all had in view, was to endeavour to get the two Powers to agree among themselves. This is really the whole key to their position. They have never held back for one instant. What they said was this—"We believe the best way to arrange this matter is to endeavour to get these two Powers to agree. At the same time, when the proper time arrives, if they do not agree, we are ready to go forward with mediation." The hon. Baronet says in October we broke off the concert of Europe. We did the exact reverse. We got the Powers to adopt our views. We received the support of every Government. We received the support of France, of Italy, of Germany — notwithstanding all that was said by the hon. Baronet. We received the support of Austria, and we received both the support and gratitude of Greece. I will just read one or two quotations from the despatch of Mr. Corbett to the Marquess of Salisbury, dated Athens, December 26, 1878, in which he says—

"M. Delyanni showed me yesterday the note mentioned in my despatch of the 25th instant, which he has just received from the Turkish Chargé d'Affaires, and expressed the satisfaction felt by the Greek Government that at last the Sublime Porte had recognized the principle of a cession of territory by Turkey to Greece."

All this time we had been endeavouring to press on Turkey the advisability of making that concession.

"His Excellency and M. Koumoundouros, the Prime Minister, both requested me to convey to Sir Henry Layard the thanks of the Greek Government for the interest he had shown in the matter of the rectification of the frontier, as reported by the Greek Minister at Constantinople. They attributed to his friendly co-operation the present favourable aspect of the question."

Sir Henry Layard was publicly thanked by the Greek Government for the interest he had shown in the matter of the rectification of the Frontier; and now the hon. Baronet comes forward and charges him with being cold and lukewarm on the subject. I think the House will agree with me that, considering the mediatorial attitude which, at this moment, both Her Majesty's Government and the other Governments of Europe are occupying with regard to Turkey and the Greek question, I may be excused from going into matters of detail respecting the boundary. If I were to do so, I should really break faith with the other Governments of Europe. I observe that only a few days ago the Italian Prime Minister made a remark of that kind in another Assembly; and, therefore, I hope the House will excuse me from going into minute detail with regard to the boundary line between the two countries. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), and the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke), both mentioned the case of Janina. I do not believe there can be any doubt that the general description given of Janina is correct. I do not think anybody can read descriptions of Janina without coming to the conclusion that it is practically Greek. But I do not wish to be supposed to be in favour of the cession of Janina or against it. That is the question now to be decided at Constantinople. Therefore, it would be extremely improper to give an opinion one way or the other. Although I admit that it is, no doubt, a Greek town, at the same time, I cannot help thinking that there is a strong Albanian nationality, and that there is a strong feeling in Albania against the cession of Janina; and it really is not wise in those who will have great influence in acting as mediators in this case to ignore the strong points on one side, whilst giving effect to the strong points on the other side. I am not disposed to think lightly of Albanian nationality. They are an ancient and historic race. We find the Albanians in olden times described by Herodotus and Pliny as being a wild and uncouth race, brave, and primitive in their modes of living. All the characteristics attributed to them are those of the Albanians of the present day. I do not believe there is any evidence to show that Albanians will peacefully submit to absorption of any kind. That is a question that is to be decided hereafter, and it is unwise to shut our eyes to that question. It may be taken for granted that any cession of territory which may be made must be such as to meet with the approval of the Albanians themselves; otherwise, more harm than good will result. I have no doubt whatever that it is most expedient for Turkey to make a cession of territory, and a liberal cession of territory, for the reasons I have already mentioned. Everybody must also agree that it is most expedient for Greece to be reasonable in her demands, and to live on friendly terms with Turkey. She must recollect that there are other Powers which may be more dangerous to her than Turkey; for, after all, whatever may be said against the Turkish Government, it cannot be denied that Hellenic institutions have been allowed to flourish under Turkish rule. I believe it, therefore, to be of the greatest importance to Greece that she should entertain friendly relations with Turkey. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) says it is exceptionally hard for Greece that Her Majesty's present Government should take a less favourable view of her aspirations than any Government who have preceded them. Well, there is no person in this country who knows the political history of England better than the right hon. Gentleman, and I would just carry his recollection back a few years. I would ask him whether, in 1854, Her Majesty's Government did not make the strongest representations to Greece with regard to her tendency to insurrection? I would also ask him whether, later, in 1862, when the cession of the Ionian Islands was first spoken of, Her Majesty's Government did not tell Greece that whoever was on the Throne of Greece must renounce all ambitious ideas with regard to Turkey? More than that, I would ask him whether, in 1870, Her Majesty's Government did not use the strongest threats towards Greece, to induce her to desist from her projects for an extension of territory? Under these circumstances, it seems to me somewhat unfair to accuse Her Majesty's present Advisers of taking a less favourable view of the affairs of Greece than their Predecessors. With regard to the Resolution before the House, I cannot agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it has not a retrospective effect. The whole of the speech of the hon. Baronet who moved it (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was an indictment against Her Majesty's Government for what has taken place. Therefore, I need not say that the Government cannot accept the Resolution of the hon. Baronet. They concur, certainly, in the Amendment that has been proposed by my hon. Friend behind me. I am afraid I have wearied the House by going into details which, certainly, are of a somewhat difficult character; but I hope the House will be satisfied with the statements I have made. The House may rest assured that reforms in Turkey, both in Europe and Asia, will continue to have the best attention of Her Majesty's Government, and that Her Majesty's Government will use their best endeavours to secure a settlement of the boundary question in such a manner as to conduce to the establishment of a permanent peace.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS' (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 246.]

(Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. J. LOWTHER asked the House to read the Bill a second time, with the view that at a later stage a fuller discussion should take place. The Bill was introduced in order to redeem the pledge made repeatedly in the House to deal with the question of pensions to National School Teachers, and it proposed to allocate a sum for that purpose, which it was hoped would meet their requirements. It also made provision for enabling the difficulties respecting residences to be overcome. It was also the intention of the Government to place an Estimate on the subject of salaries before the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. J. Lowther.)

MR. COURTNEY thought they could hardly be expected to read a Bill of this importance at that hour of the night on the very slender information which had been given to them. He listened very carefully to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman; but unless he had had an opportunity of looking at the Bill beforehand he would not have gathered anything from it. The right hon. Gentleman did not tell them that this Bill proposed to take £1,300,000 from the Irish Church surplus. That, of course, might be a very proper thing to do; but it ought not to be proposed at 2 o'clock in the morning without any explanation, and the right hon. Gentleman ought not to ask the House to read the Bill a second time proposing to deal with such a sum as that. He thought it was impossible to work at this Bill at once without further discussion. Therefore, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. MELDON hoped the Motion would not be pressed. This Bill was the redemption of a pledge which was given some time ago. More than 12 months since, he brought forward a Motion on the subject of the National Teachers' pensions, which had been before the House since 1875, and upon that occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary gave a pledge that the Government would deal with the matter and indicate how it would be done. There was then considerable discussion on the matter. He had since this twitted the Government with not having carried out their pledges; but they had now introduced this Bill, and at the very late period of the Session at which they had now arrived, he hoped they might be allowed to read the Bill a second time that night, on the distinct understanding that there should be a discussion on going into Committee. This course was often followed when they had arrived at a late part of the Session.

MR. MONK said, that this Bill had not yet reached his hands, and he had heard with the utmost amazement that it proposed to take over £1,250,000 out of the surplus of the Irish Church. The right hon. Gentleman did not inform the House that it proposed to take this sum for a purpose which was not intended when the Irish Church was disestablished. It might be very true that he gave a pledge to certain Members in regard to this matter; but he was quite certain the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich would not have gone away if they had been aware that a Bill of this importance was to be brought forward. He must ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to take the second reading without further notice. It would be necessary to discuss the matter, and to learn from the Government on what grounds they thought it right to ask Parliament, at this period of the Session, to grant a sum of this magnitude for the school teachers in Ireland. As far as he was aware, the surplus of the Church funds had already been disposed of; but it was useless to attempt the discussion of the matter without having the Bill in their hands. It had not been delivered to him, and he was sure the right hon. Gentleman would not press this measure at 2 o'clock in the morning on a reluctant House.

MAJOR NOLAN hoped that the Motion for adjournment would be withdrawn. The Bill had been a good deal discussed. They had paid much attention to it. They had unanimously decided to reserve any discussion till a further stage. As far as he knew, the Bill was not in the slightest degree denominational, and they had now every opportunity of discussing its merits at a later stage. It was the only measure proposed by the Government affecting Ireland which hon. Members had had for the last 15 months in which they could take any interest; and, therefore, he hoped the Bill would be allowed to go through this formal stage.

MR. PLUNKET appealed to the hon. Member opposite to withdraw his Motion for adjournment, on the ground that full opportunity would be given for discussing it later on.

MR. GRAY made the same appeal. This subject excited the deepest interest in Ireland. It had been discussed for a series of years, and a distinct understanding was come to that the Bill should be introduced exactly on the lines of that now under consideration. It was true the second stage had been reached somewhat quickly; but the lines of the Bill were well known. It was, of course, quite in the power of a single Member to stop a Bill of this kind at that period of the Session; but he would have the same power at a later stage. He would, therefore, appeal to the hon. Member to allow the present stage to pass.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON thought it was very delightful to see a reconciliation between the Ministers and hon. Members from Ireland, remembering the difference which existed between them on the previous night. This, however, appeared to him a very extraordinary Bill to be pushed forward at that hour of the morning. The hon. Gentleman had said it was not denominational. Nobody said it was; that made him suspicious. There was something in it. He should certainly, therefore, join in opposing it. Hon. Members talked about the lateness of the Session; but they heard nothing of that on the previous night.

MR. DILLWYN entirely demurred to calling the second reading a formal stage. That was a stage at which they ought to discuss the principle of the measure; and he thought they ought not to take that stage on a Bill presented at that hour in the morning when the House could not have an opportunity of considering, and especially when they none of them knew what the Bill was, because they had not had an opportunity of seeing it. They were getting very lax in their Rules, and hon. Members did not guarantee that the Rules and customs of the House would be adhered to in these matters. It was an ordinary understanding, when Bills had not been presented in time to be in the hands of hon. Members, that they should not be taken that night.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, as he understood the Bill, it proposed to pension the Irish National School teachers out of the surplus funds of the Disestablished Irish Church, and that seemed to him a very proper method of disposing of those surplus funds. Besides, he was sure they would never have any peace in that House till those surplus funds had been disposed of.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER quite agreed that it was not their practice to read a Bill a second time so soon after it was introduced; but, on the other hand, towards the close of the Session, when Business was in a very congested state, they did sometimes adopt a more rapid mode of proceeding. If there were anything in this Bill which could be considered a surprise to the House, of course, he should not ask the House to go on; but, as had been stated by an hon. Member opposite, this was a matter on which the House had been informed for a very considerable time. Two or three years ago, the Government announced that they recognized the force of the application made for the Irish teachers, and some important suggestions were made as to the mode in which funds should be provided for them. A pledge was given that the matter should be seriously considered in order to see how it would work out. It had been mentioned more than once. He did not think, therefore, that the proposal could be considered as a surprise. He thought the suggestion that they should take a discussion on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair was a very reasonable one. He quite agreed that if they were earlier in the Session it would be better to take a discussion on the second reading; but, under the circumstances, he thought they would not be wrong in accepting the suggestion made that the Government would not fix the day for some little time, so as to give ample opportunity to hon. Members to consider the Bill.

An Hon. MEMBER thought the very liberal mode in which the Government were going to aid Irish teachers should be a great encouragement to make the same gifts to English teachers. After 10 years' work, he managed to get £2,000 a-year for them; and this large grant would, of course, be a great encouragement to him to ask the Government for more money.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH looked at this matter from the English point of view. He thought a most dangerous precedent was about to be established. The Superannuation Vote was already very heavy. Schoolmasters were very well paid already. A feeling was spreading in the country that the Education Vote had been increasing too rapidly; yet, if this precedent were established, he had no doubt strong pressure would be made to get something for English teachers on the Superannuation Fund. Under these circumstances, he thought it was most desirable the Bill should be thoroughly discussed.

MR. O. S. PARKER ventured to join in the appeal to hon. Members to accept the offer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was unfortunate that an endeavour had been made to pass this Bill without a thorough explanation of it; but, under all the circumstances, at that period of the Session, it did seem to him that the second reading might be agreed to with a distinct understanding that there should be an interval and an opportunity for debate before proceeding with the clauses in Committee.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the hon. Member had suggested that an attempt was being made to pass the Bill without thoroughly explaining it. He had not the least idea of leading the House astray. He told the House, a year ago, almost as broadly as he could, what the source was from which the money was to be drawn. He repeated that later on in the Session; and as the Bill was in the hands of Members he was desirous to economize time. He thought there was no need for him to go fully through it in minute detail at that stage of the measure, though he would be prepared to satisfy any desire for information in Committee.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR— LATEST TELEGRAM—VICTORY AT ULUNDI.—QUESTION.

LORD TRURO asked, If Her Majesty's Government had received any further intelligence from the Cape?

VISCOUNT BURY: My Lords, a very satisfactory telegram has been received at the War Office from Lord Chelmsford, dated July 6. I must mention that it is not yet perfect, as it is still passing through the station. The telegram is as follows:—

“JULY 6.

“Following received from Chelmsford:—
‘Cetywayo not having complied with my demands by noon yesterday, July 3, and having fired heavily on the troops at water, I returned the 114 cattle he had sent in, and ordered a reconnoissance to be made by the mounted force under Colonel Buller. This was effectually made, and caused the Zulu Army to advance and show itself. This morning a force under my command, consisting of the 2nd Division, under Major General Newdigate, numbering 1,870 Europeans, 530 Natives, and 8 guns, and the flying column under Brigadier General Wood, numbering 2,192 Europeans and 573 Natives, 4 guns, and 2 Gatlings, crossed the Umvolosi River at 6.15, and, marching in a hollow square, with the ammunition and intrenching tool carts and bearer company in its centre, reached an excellent position between Unodwengo and Ulundi about half-past eight. This had been observed by Colonel Buller the day before. Our fortified camp on the right bank of the Umvolosi was left with a garrison of about 900 Europeans, 250 Natives, and one Gatling gun, under Colonel Bellairs. Soon after half-past seven, the Zulu Army was seen leaving its bivouacs and advancing on every side. The engagement was shortly after commenced by the mounted men. By nine o'clock the attack was fully developed. At half-past nine the enemy wavered. The 17th Lancers, followed by the remainder of the mounted men, attacked them, and a general rout ensued. The prisoners state that Cetywayo was personally commanding, and had made all the arrangements himself, and that he witnessed the fight from Lickazi Kraal, and that 12 regiments took part in it. If so, 20,000 men attacked us. It is impossible to estimate with any correctness the loss of the enemy, owing to the extent of the country over which they attacked and retreated, but it could not have been less, I consider, than 1,000 killed. By noon Ulundi was in flames, and during the day all the military kraals of the Zulu Army and in the valley of the Umvolosi were destroyed. At 2 P.M. the return march to the camp of the column commenced. The behaviour of the troops under my command was extremely satisfactory. Their steadiness under a complete belt of fire was remarkable. The dash and enterprize of the mounted branches were all that could be wished, and the fire of the Artillery very good. A portion of the Zulu Forces approached our fortified camp, and at one time threatened to attack it. The Native Contingent forming a part of the garrison were sent out after the action, and assisted in pursuit. As I have fully accomplished the object for which I advanced, I consider I shall now be best carrying out Sir Garnet Wolseley's instructions by moving at once to Eulongamite, and thence towards Kamaguasa. I shall send back a portion of this force with the empty waggons for supplies, which are now ready at Fort Marshall.

"I beg to forward a list of casualties:—

QUESTIONS.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL PENSION FUND.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it be correct that the compulsory contributions of the seamen of the mercantile marine towards the Greenwich Hospital pension fund amounted at the close of the year 1834 to about £2,000,000; if he will be good enough to state how much of the said amount has been paid back in pensions or grants to the contributories, and also to their widows and children; and, if he is aware that seamen now in receipt of the Greenwich sixpence pension are debarred from receiving the pension legally due from the muster roll fund; and, if so, if he will adopt such measures as he may deem necessary, in conjunction with the President of the Board of Trade, in order that aged seamen so entitled may be paid both pensions?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, he had seen the Notice of the Question only within the last half-hour, and it was impossible for him to ascertain the facts since then. The administration of the fund, as the hon. Gentleman was well aware, had passed away from the Admiralty for many years, and they had really no knowledge of the circumstances to which the hon. Gentleman had called attention.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR— VICTORY AT ULUNDI.

TELEGRAM.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I have just received a very important telegram from the Cape, from Sir Bartle Frere, which I will, by permission, read to the House. It is dated Cape Town, July 8:—

"I congratulate Her Majesty's Government on decisive victory vouchsafed to Her Majesty's Forces under Lord Chelmsford in a fair fight in the open on July 4, and on subsequent capture and destruction of Cetwayo's Royal kraal, Ulundi. Lord Chelmsford appears, according to his promise, to have awaited at camp on White Umvolosi, till noon, July 3, for delivery of guns and 1,000 rifles by accredited Indunas—required by him as earnest of Cetwayo's sincerity in asking to treat for peace. Conditions not being fulfilled Lord Chelmsford left camp laagered, and advanced with 2nd (Newdigate's) Division, and Wood's Flying Column. Was attacked on march in open country by Zulu Force, variously estimated at from 12,000 to 20,000. They enveloped the hollow square of our troops, charging on all four sides up to within 60 yards, when Zulus broke and fled under a heavy fire; were pursued by Cavalry and utterly routed. Lord Chelmsford advanced to Ulundi, burnt and destroyed all military kraals, and returned to camp on White Umvolosi same evening. All arms reported to have done their duty admirably. Zulus slain estimated at 800 by Mr. Archibald Forbes, who rode with above news in 15 hours to Landman's Drift. His telegram reached night of July 5. British loss 10 killed; only name given, Captain Wyatt-Edgell, 17th Lancers, but no other officer killed; 53 wounded—only names given, Colonel Lowe, Major Bond, Lieutenants Pardo, Jenkins, James; none severely. No other casualties named since last mail in any column. General Crealock, having arranged for landing stores at Port Durnford, is advancing on road to Ulundi. Zulus on line of march coming in large numbers to surrender. Sir Garnet Wolseley, after waiting in vain for two days to effect landing at Port Durnford, returned in Her Majesty's ship Shah to Durban, and proceeded by land to join General Crealock's column. Troops with Lord Chelmsford comprised detachments of the 13th, 21st, 24th, 58th, 80th, 90th, and 94th Regiments, the 17th Lancers, one troop Dragoon Guards, 600 Colonial troops, besides Artillery and Engineers. I have received from Sir Garnet as yet only copy of Forbes' telegram which had reached me previously.

PRIVILEGE — TOWER HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE (METROPOLIS) COMMITTEE

Order for Attendance of Mr. Charles Edmund Grissell and Mr. John Sandilands Ward, read.

MR. SPEAKER: Let the Sergeant-at-Arms state to the House whether Charles Edmund Grissell and John Sandilands Ward are in attendance?

The Sergeant-at-Arms: Mr. Grissell is not in attendance; Mr. Ward is in attendance.

MR. SPEAKER: Will you state what measures you have taken to secure the attendance of Mr. Grissell?

The Sergeant-at-Arms: The Order of the House for his attendance was served by the Messenger who usually serves the Orders of the House, on Tuesday, and he was informed that Mr. Grissell had gone abroad. The Order was given to Mrs. Grissell, who said she would telegraph to her husband. I have received a telegram this morning from Boulange-sur-Mer in these words—

"Boulange-sur-Mer, Graham's Hotel, "Bordeaux.

"To the Sergeant-at-Arms. Grissell sent away. Doctor's orders. Not well enough to travel."

MR. SPEAKER: Have you any further information from Charles Edmund Grissell?

The Sergeant-at-Arms: No, Sir.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not know, Sir, what view the House may take as to the telegram that has been read from Mr. Grissell; but I must confess that, to my mind, it does not appear to be at all satisfactory. There is no medical certificate; there are no details that are intelligible, and I think that, under the circumstances, we have no other course open to us than to proceed with regard to Mr. Grissell as neglecting to obey the instructions and Orders of the House. I do not think I need delay the House by entering into the case of Mr. Grissell. As I mentioned yesterday, and as is recorded in this Report, the Select Committee appointed by the House to investigate the matter, have reported that they are "Unanimously of opinion that Mr. Grissell, in asserting that he could control the decision of the Committee on the Tower High Level Bridge (Metropolis) Bill, and the offer he made to do so, was guilty of a Breach of the Privileges of the House."

That having been reported, and Mr. Grissell having been ordered to attend in his place in the House, and his not having appeared, but having merely sent a communication which, I think, the House cannot regard as satisfactory. I shall beg to move—

"That Charles Edmund Grissell having been ordered to attend the House this day, and having neglected to attend, be taken into custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House; and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrants accordingly."

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry my noble Friend the Member for the Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington) is unable to be in his place to-day; but I do not think that many words are required from me in seconding the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It seems to me that it will be the almost unanimous feeling of this House that the only course we can adopt is the one that has been suggested by the right hon. Gentleman. If we are to consider our Privileges at all, we cannot take this telegram into consideration, as it is certainly not sufficient excuse; but we are bound to see that the Orders of the House are complied with.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Charles Edmund Grissell having been ordered to attend this House the day, and having neglected to attend, be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House; and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrants accordingly."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

SIR. GEORGE BOWYER: Sir, I rise to Order. I observed that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that Mr. Grissell had failed to "attend in his place." Now, I want to know—[Cries of "Order!"]
—when an hon. Member of this House is charged with any offence against the House, he is ordered to attend in his place; but that, I submit, is not the case in regard to a person who is not a Member of this House. I therefore call upon you, Sir, to set us right on this point.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am very sorry if I used the expression referred to by the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Wexford; if I did use it, it was, of course, a mere slip of the tongue.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: I wish, Sir, to make one or two brief observations on the question now before the House; or, rather, I wish to elicit information from someone better informed on the subject than myself as to whether Mr. Grissell, if he awaits the conclusion of the present Parliament in some secure retreat abroad, will not be entirely safe from any further pursuit from this House? If that be so, I venture to think that the advice which I was presumptuous enough to give on the first occasion when the matter was brought before the House will, after all, turn out to have been the right advice—namely, that when any person is accused of a Breach of the Privileges of this House he should at once be summoned to the Bar of the House, and then, if adjudged guilty, be committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, when the House will proceed as it thinks fit. It appears to me that what the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer now proposes is, that we should cook our hare before we have caught it, and, I would venture to suggest that this departure from the old precedent is unwise, and that, if we had followed the old precedent, we should have caught our hare in the first instance, and then we might have best determined how the hare should be cooked.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That Charles Edmund Grissell having been ordered to attend the House this day, and having neglected to attend, be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House; and that Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrants accordingly.

MR. SPEAKER: Understanding from the Sergeant-at-Arms that John Sandilands Ward is in attendance, I will ask whether it be the pleasure of the House that John Sandilands Ward be called in? Is it your pleasure that John Sandilands Ward be called in? [Cries of "Aye!" from all parts of the House.] Let John Sandilands Ward be brought in.

"John Sandilands Ward was then called in, and was addressed by Mr. Speaker in the following terms:—

"John Sandilands Ward; Your conduct in connection with the Private Bill relating to the Tower High Level Bridge has been subjected to patient and full inquiry by a Select Committee of this House. That Committee have come to conclusions, which are clearly summed up in the last two paragraphs of their Report to the House, in the following terms:—'Your Committee are unanimously of opinion that Mr. Grissell, in asserting that he could control the decision of the Committee on the Tower High Level Bridge (Metropolis) Bill, and in the offer he made to do so, was guilty of a breach of the Privileges of the House. And they are unanimously of opinion that Mr. Ward was cognisant of, and assisted Mr. Grissell in the matter of, this offer, and was likewise guilty of a breach of the Privileges of the House.' I have now to state on behalf of the House that the House is willing to hear what you have to say upon the matter."

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

"Mr. Speaker,—Sir, I wish to say to this honourable House, if the House in its great kindness will permit me to do so, That I have read the Report of the Select Committee appointed in this matter, and that I am much distressed at the concluding paragraphs of the Report of that honourable Committee, which imply a disbelief in my repudiation of all knowledge of an improper intention on the part of Mr. Grissell when I called upon Mr. Hooker. Now, I beg to state to this honourable House that I am a Solicitor of some nine years' standing; that I have a large and highly respectable practice, and my clients are persons of means and social position; that my connection with Mr. Grissell has been purely professional; that I understood, so far as the slight conversation I had with him on the subject enabled me, that he—being a connection of the late firm of Grissell and Peto, large wharfingers on the Thames and great contractors—had some special means of acquiring information in connection with the matters then before your honourable Committee; that he in no way told me, nor did I inquire, what those means of information were, or what would be the course he would take in support of his notion that he could influence such Committee; that after introducing my client I had no further communication either with Mr. Hooker or any other persons parties to the Bill or connected with the matter directly or indirectly; that my interview with Mr. Hooker, upon which the allegation against me is based, occupied not more than half a minute, as he himself has sworn. The rapidity, therefore, with which the words alleged to be spoken must have been uttered, and the fact that this hurried interview took place in your honourable House—Mr. Hooker having been called from the Committee Room to see me, and being most anxious to return—may, I earnestly submit to your honourable House, account for the discrepancy in the evidence on this point; that when I subsequently saw my client and was informed by him that he had signed the letter drawn up by Mr. Cockell, which disclosed a manifest impropriety, I at once told him that he had acted foolishly and ridiculously. I venture to submit to your honourable House the striking improbability of the proposition—that I, a professional man, in large practice as a Solicitor, should voluntarily seek another firm of Solicitors, themselves officers of your honourable House, in order to propose to them a transaction which on the face of it would be in the highest degree censurable and a breach of Privilege. The slenderest consideration of the relative position of Mr. Hooker and myself would, I humbly submit, lead to the conclusion that to do such an act as this I must either be a person having no character or social position of any sort to lose, or a man who had taken leave of his senses. I, therefore, on this point, further venture to say, and I entreat the indulgence of your honourable House while I do so, that Mr. Hooker is entirely wrong in his remembrance of the exact words that were used at the momentary interview so often referred to. I wish also to state with the most unbounded respect to this honourable House that, deeply as I deplore the conclusions of your Committee, so far as that Report refers to myself, I must, in the satisfaction of my conscience, urge upon your honourable House that nothing was further from my thoughts or intentions than that by any act of mine I should infringe the Privileges or in the slightest degree endeavour to diminish the respect and esteem in which this honourable House is universally held; that I should look upon any act which proposed to impeach the known character for incorruptibility which attaches to all proceedings of your honourable House as an offence which, if it were possible for it to succeed, would be a misfortune to my country, and to all representative institutions. In conclusion, therefore, I wish to say that whilst my conscience acquits me of all improper intentions, and whilst my friends and clients, and all who know me, will believe in this emphatic assertion, yet am I here to-day at the Bar of your honourable House ready to bow to its decision—whatever that decision may be—but impressed with the hope that your honourable House will give due consideration to the solemn statement which I now make that I am the victim of a cruelly unfortunate misapprehension."

MR. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that John Sandilands Ward do now withdraw? [Cries of "Aye!"] John Sandilands Ward will now withdraw.

John Sandilands Ward thereupon withdrew.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Speaker, the House has now heard the statement of Mr. Ward. As far as I can collect from that statement, Mr. Ward confines himself to asserting that the communications which he had with Mr. Grissell were of a purely professional character; that he was not at all aware of the nature of the proposal which Mr. Grissell intended to make to him; and he further states that the recollection of Mr. Hooker on this matter was wrong. Well, now, Sir, I observe that the Select Committee had these points put before them; I observe also that the Select Committee, who had the power of examining witnesses on oath, and who went very fully and thoroughly into this question, having heard, as I take it, very much the same defence brought forward by Mr. Ward as that which we have now listened to, and, after full consideration, to the conclusion that the statements made by Mr. Hooker and Mr. Cockell were true, and that the counter-statements made by Mr. Ward and Mr. Grissell were false; and under these circumstances they came unanimously to the "Opinion that Mr. Ward was cognizant of and assisted Mr. Grissell in the matter of this Bill, and was likewise guilty of a breach of the Privileges of the House."

Under these circumstances, Sir, I do not feel that I am compelled, or that it would be at all consistent with the wishes of the House, that I should pretend to go over the ground which has been gone over so well by the Select Committee. I assume that, nothing new having been stated by Mr. Ward—nothing having been stated by him that was not before them in the examination that has been conducted by them—the House will be prepared to stand by the decision and the Report of their Committee. This being so, I consider that we have nothing before us but to consider what is the proper course to take with reference to an offence which we must consider to have been committed against the Privileges of this House. Of the magnitude of that offence I feel fully convinced I need say nothing. It is one of those matters upon which one only weakens the gravity by enlarging upon them. Therefore I will content myself by moving—

"That John Sandilands Ward, having been cognizant of, and having assisted Charles Edmund Grissell in, the matter of his offer to control the decision of the Committee on the Tower High Level Bridge (Metropolis) Bill, was guilty of a breach of the Privileges of this House."

If the House should arrive at this conclusion, it will then be my duty to make a further Motion as to the manner in which Mr. Ward should be dealt with. I think that it would be the most convenient course that I should confine myself, in the first instance, to making a Motion declaring Mr. Ward to have been guilty of a breach of the Privileges of the House before proposing to the House any Resolution with regard to the course to be taken subsequently.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That John Sandilands Ward having been cognizant of, and having assisted Charles Edmund Grissell in, the matter of his offer to control the decision of the Committee on the Tower High Level Bridge (Metropolis) Bill, was guilty of a breach of the Privileges of this House."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. GOSCHEN: Perhaps, Sir, it would be for the convenience of the House if one of the Members of the Select Committee which has investigated this matter would state whether there is anything new in the statement which has been made at the Bar of the House by Mr. Ward. It would, I think, be satisfactory to this House to know that the point which Mr. Ward has raised has been previously considered by the Select Committee and dealt with by them.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE: Sir, the statement made by Mr. Ward at the Bar of the House turns upon exactly the same point as that which he made before the Select Committee—namely, this—whether in the original communication made by Mr. Ward to Mr. Hooker the word “control” was used by Mr. Ward, or the word “influence.” According to the evidence, Mr. Grissell undertook to say that he could control the decision of the Committee, or that he could influence the decision of the Committee, and that for a consideration he was prepared to do so. When he gave an interpretation of that term—namely, the term “influence,” the interpretation sought to be put upon it was, that by evidence, or by information, Mr. Grissell could influence the Committee’s decision. Such an interpretation, however, was clearly contrary to the circumstances of the case, as they were detailed in the evidence taken before the Committee, and, strictly speaking, it was hardly possible that this could have been the meaning of the term. But whether the word “influence” or the word “control” was used, I conceive that such a charge as that was equally a charge against the Privileges of this House, and that it would equally, in either case, have affected the character and the conduct of the Committee. I am not prepared to say that the Committee would not have arrived at precisely the same conclusion as they have arrived at, supposing they had believed that the word “information” was used. [Cries of “Influence!”] I beg pardon; I am not prepared to say that their conclusion would have been otherwise as regards the Privileges of this House if they had believed that information was the term used as the means by which either control or influence was to be exercised over the minds of the Committee. But the circumstances of the case, according to the evidence of all the other witnesses, necessarily show that the word “control,” and not “influence,” was demonstrably made use of by Mr. Grissell, at all events, and, as I believe, by Mr. John Sandilands Ward also. With regard to the other matters which transpired before the Committee, I do not understand that any question is raised by Mr. Ward respecting those matters. I do not wish to press unduly against either Mr. Ward or Mr. Grissell; but this I must say—that the character of their evidence, their demeanour before the Committee, and the inconsistencies they ran into with reference to the substantial matter before the Committee were, to my mind, quite inexcusable. In what way the House will think it right to deal with the matter after the apology—it is not an apology—but after the submission Mr. Ward has made to the House, that is a question for the House to determine; but as to the single question now before the House whether a breach of the Privileges of the House has been committed, I have no doubt in my own mind, and I believe that the other Members of the Committee have also no doubt in their’s, that such is the fact, as proved before them.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I think, Sir, that in this case also there really can be only one feeling in the House. What we have before us is this fact—that there was reason to believe that a very grave breach of our Privileges had been committed—one as to which it was impossible, with due regard to the character of the House and the dignity of the House, we could avoid investigating with the view of finding out whether the assertion made was well-founded or not. A Select Committee, having the full confidence of this House, has most carefully looked into the matter. They have come to the conclusion that the person who has appeared at the Bar of the House has been guilty of a breach of Privilege. You, Sir, have asked him to make his explanation, and it appears that the explanation he has made is precisely that which he brought before the Committee. We have the testimony of the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Select Committee (Mr. Spencer Walpole) that no fresh statement has been made by Mr. Ward, and we have also his declaration that the Committee unanimously came to the conclusion that the defence which has now been repeated before us, and which was made before them, was one to which they could pay no attention. It appears to me impossible that the House can take any other course than to assent to the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Goschen

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I should like, Sir, to address a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Select Committee in reference to the word "information," which he used just now. Did he mean "information" or "influence?"

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE: I ought to have used the word "influence."

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether the statement made by Mr. Ward before the Committee, that his conversation with Mr. Hooker lasted only 30 seconds, is borne out by the evidence, or not? The right hon. Gentleman said, in submitting his Motion just now, that Mr. Ward had been answered by the evidence of Mr. Hooker and Mr. Cockell. It strikes me that he may be wrong in that. I have not read the evidence—I have not read the whole of the evidence—but I have read some of it, and I elicit from what I have read, and what I have heard from the Members of the Select Committee, that it was only Mr. Hooker who impeached Mr. Ward, and that the interview was held between Mr. Hooker and Mr. Ward, and with no other person, in regard to this matter. Am I to understand that the right hon. Gentleman is right when he states that Mr. Ward's statement was answered both by Mr. Ward and Mr. Cockell? It appeared to me that Mr. Ward never saw Mr. Cockell; that the only interview he ever had with anybody in connection with the matter was that which he had with Mr. Hooker, and which he says lasted only 30 seconds. I wish to know if that be a correct interpretation of the time—that the interview lasted only 30 seconds in the corridor?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD): Perhaps the House will allow me to say a word on this subject. The hon. Member for Dudley (Mr. Sheridan), who has spoken just now, was quite right in his statement of a matter of fact. According to the evidence taken by the Committee, the interview he speaks of lasted half-a-minute—I do not think Mr. Ward said "30 seconds." The expression is one of those colloquial phrases which one does not use with any notion of exactness—the interview lasted about half-a-minute. I think, however, it would be inaccurate to say that that was the only evidence before the Committee to justify the conclusion they have drawn; because Mr. Ward's evidence, the entries in Mr. Hooker's book, and a great variety of circumstances which it is not necessary to go into now, go to confirm, in a very great measure, the clear statement of Mr. Hooker, and that made by Mr. Cockell. There can be no doubt that the whole question before the Committee, as raised on Mr. Ward's behalf, was the same as he has raised at the Bar of the House to-day, and what I understood, and what the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Sheridan) desired to know, was that Mr. Ward made before the Committee exactly the same statement he has made to-day, that what he did was to say he had a client who could secure the decision of the Committee on the Private Bill. Mr. Hooker's evidence showed that there was an express statement that, for a consideration, Mr. Ward had a client who could influence or control the decision of the Committee. I think that that was what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Spencer Walpole) intended to say—that Mr. Ward had said that he had a client who could influence or control the decision of the Committee. I quite concur with my right hon. Friend that the use of the word "control" or "influence," when taken in connection with the rest of the sentence, would be comparatively immaterial. The broad proposition was that, for a corrupt consideration, Mr. Ward's client would be able to determine the decision of the Committee, and that the Committee would be influenced by such consideration. That was the proposition, and that is what we believe was established by the evidence.

MR. PEMBERTON: I only desire, Sir, to say a few words. We have not only the evidence of Mr. Hooker as contradicting that of Mr. Ward, but there is other testimony on which the Committee felt bound to act. It is perfectly true that Mr. Hooker was the only person with whom Mr. Ward had any communication on the subject; that is quite true, but that was by no means the only circumstance or evidence which influenced the Committee in coming to the decision they did. In the first place, Mr. Ward stated that he made no note of the conversation at the time. Mr. Hooker, on the other hand, made a ver full note, and that, immediately af the conversation, he communicated the purport of it to Mr. Cockell. Mr. Cockell communicated that statement to Mr. Littler, one of the counsel engaged for one of the parties concerned in the Bill, and it is a very remarkable fact that both the statements of Mr. Cockell and Mr. Littler entirely confirm the use of the word Mr. Hooker asserts that Mr. Ward employed—that is to say, that he had a client who could control the decision of the Committee. And not only this, but a reference to Mr. Ward's books, certainly, in the opinion of every Member of the Committee, entirely confirmed the statement made by Mr. Hooker, and they are entirely inconsistent with the statement of Mr. Ward, that the communication was a mere harmless communication in reference to someone who could get additional evidence. I believe the opinion of the Committee to have been that the statement that the communication was an offer of additional information on the merits of the Bill was entirely an afterthought, and I do not believe that any Member of the Committee, or any Member of this House, who has read the evidence, would have come to any other conclusion than that to which the Committee have come.

MR. GRAY: As a Member of the Committee, and as one thoroughly realizing the gravity of the decision which the Committee came to, I feel bound to say that I certainly could not have concurred heartily with that decision were the case against Mr. Ward based solely on the evidence of Mr. Hooker. We had the conflicting testimony of these two gentlemen, and we had to judge to which of them was due credibility. We weighed the entire evidence which came before us, and we found that Mr. Ward contradicted himself, that he omitted to state material facts, and that his evidence really was discreditable judged on its own merits. On the other hand, we found that the evidence given by Mr. Hooker and Mr. Cockell was thoroughly consistent, and borne out by all the circumstances of the case; that the entries in the books of Mr. Ward rather tended to show that he had a knowledge of the affair than otherwise, and it was after weighing the evidence upon its merits that we arrived at our conclusion. Although we did not arrive at it without great pain, I do not think any hon. Member who has read the evidence through will think that we could consistently with our duty have come to any other decision.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That John Sandilands Ward having been cognizant of, and having assisted Charles Edmund Grissell in, the matter of his offer to control the decision of the Committee on the Tower High Level Bridge (Metropolis) Bill, was guilty of a breach of the Privileges of this House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Speaker, the House having now arrived unanimously at the conclusion that Mr. Ward has been guilty of a breach of the Privileges of the House, it becomes our duty to consider what course the House should pursue with regard to this gentleman. There are two courses which might be taken; either to commit him to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, or to reprimand him for his conduct. I think, having reference to the character of the offence, it is one which could not be treated by a simple reprimand. The proceedings to which Mr. Ward has been a party were of a character different altogether from that class of breaches of Privilege with which we sometimes have to deal. I allude, of course, to those cases in which language of an imprudent, or of an offensive character has been used; language which is apologized for and submitted to the mercy of the House. In this case, a step has been taken which might, if it were passed over, and if it were treated as of comparatively little importance, be allowed to imply that the House was not jealous of that which is the most important of its characteristics—I mean the unquestionable honour of the House. The proceedings of Mr. Grissell are obviously, on the face of them, absurd, and that is the only kind of defence that could be made for them, or the only extenuation that could be pleaded. But this is a case in which it is not sufficient to say that the offence is one of an absurd character; it is one which, if we do not treat it in such a way as to mark our sense of its gravity, might lead to misconception as to the determination of the House. Therefore, Sir, I shall move—

Mr. Pemberton

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That John Sandilands Ward be, for his said offence, committed to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House; and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant accordingly."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. C. BECKETT-DENISON: Before the Resolution is put, Sir, I wish to say one word. It is this—that there will be no difference of opinion whatever as regards the Motion which has just been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That we shall be unanimous on the point is perfectly certain. But there is this other consideration—that the grave offender in this matter is Mr. Grissell, who has retired from without the jurisdiction of this House, and, for anything we know to the contrary, he may remain in contumacy for any length of time. Then comes the question, if he should adopt that course, and if he should defy your Warrant, what will be the result? The result, I imagine, will be, that the force of the Warrant will be spent the moment that Parliament prorogues; it can be renewed in the next Session, and again the man may remain in contumacy, defying the House, and receiving no punishment whatsoever. If that be the case—and I am quite ready to be told I am wrong in the assumption—if that be the case, then comes this question for the House, is the lesser offender to receive the punishment which you cannot inflict upon the greater offender?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: I wish to make one remark, Sir, upon the observations of my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. C. Beckett-Denison), which is this—that his observations appear very inapplicable to the question immediately before us. If I understand him rightly he has doubts about punishing the lesser, because we cannot at present catch the greater, offender. It seems to me that if you are to lay down the law that you cannot punish the receiver unless you catch the thief, the object of justice would seldom be met.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER: Two persons have offended gravely against the Privileges of this House. One has withdrawn from the jurisdiction of this House and the other is now in custody; or, at any rate, is in attendance upon the pleasure of the House. The fact that one of these offenders has withdrawn from our jurisdiction does not in any way affect our decision. The House of Lords can commit for a certain term, but the House of Commons cannot; we can, however, deal with the matter when we re-assemble next Session.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That John Sandilands Ward be, for his said offence, committed to the custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House; and that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrants accordingly.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS BILL.

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

[BILL 70.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. RYLANDS: I rise to a point of Order. My objection to the second reading of this Bill is, that the Bill now in the hands of the House is different from the Bill originally introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I believe that upon the main point there can be no difference of opinion—namely, that when a Bill is introduced into this House it becomes the possession of the House; and it is clearly not in the right of any private Member to make any alteration in it, without the direct instruction of the House so to do. I wish, Sir, to refer to one or two precedents which appear to bear out the proposition which I now venture to submit to the House—that is, that the Bill now before the House cannot be read a second time. I find that in 1850, Mr. Stuart Wortley brought in a Bill to legalize the marriage with a deceased wife's sister. Mr. Stuart Wortley had obtained leave to introduce the Bill; but in the course of a few days, and before he was to move the second reading of the Bill, it was discovered that the Bill, as introduced, had not been fully matured, and Mr. Stuart Wortley told the House that he had introduced a clause in the Bill which he contended might not materially affect the principle of the Bill. On being appealed to, on the 18th February, 1850, the then Speaker, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, ruled that it was not competent for any Member to make any other than a clerical alteration in a Bill which had once been introduced and read a first time. On the occasion of the second reading of the University Tests Bill, on the 28th March,

1873, by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney, then the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), the hon. Member in charge of the Bill admitted that in the course of the previous few days he had made an arrangement to modify the wording and provisions of the Bill; upon which, Sir, you were appealed to, and you gave decided answer in these words—

“There is no principle more clearly laid down in this House than this—when a Member has introduced a Bill to the House it ceases to be in that Member’s hands, and passes into the possession of the House. No essential alteration of that Bill, at any stage, may then be made without the distinct Order of the House.”—[3 Hansard, ccxv. 303.]

The only other precedent to which I wish to refer is one which occurred on the 23rd of January, 1878, when my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Kincardineshire (Sir George Balfour) brought in his Hypothec Bill. He made alterations in that Bill before the second reading, and when the second reading was called, objection being taken to the Bill being dissimilar with the one originally introduced, you, Sir, ruled that—

“Hon. Members might make clerical or verbal alterations in Bills; but it would not be in Order for any hon. Member to move the second reading of a Bill which, although bearing the same title, differed materially and substantially from the measure which he had obtained leave to introduce.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxxvii. 362.]

I am quite aware that in the last ruling of the Chair there were words introduced which were not in the ruling of the previous Speaker on a similar question, or in the ruling of you, Sir, on the University Tests Bill. For instance, in 1850, Mr. Shaw Lefevre ruled that it was not competent for any hon. Member to make other than clerical alterations in a Bill; and in 1873, you, Sir, ruled that no essential alterations could be made in a Bill without the direct Order of the House. But, in 1878, I observe that other words are introduced in the ruling of the Chair; for you, Sir, ruled that it was necessary that there should be some material and substantial difference in the measure in order to prevent its being read a second time. I will proceed to show that the Bill which is now on the Table of the House is not the same Bill which was introduced by the Government. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will refer to the 2nd clause. In line 18 of the 2nd clause of the original Bill there was a blank in reference to the amount to be repayable upon public loans. That blank has been filled up in the substituted Bill by the addition of the words “four and a quarter per cent.” I shall not, however, rest upon that as a very material alteration; but I will come to what I consider a very material alteration. In Clause 4 of the first Bill there occur the following words:—

“So much of section eleven of the Public Works Loans Act, 1875, and so much of any Act relating to the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland as authorises the repayment of a loan by means of an annuity is hereby repealed so far as relates to any loan granted after the first day of April, 1879.”

But, in the new Bill, the words “and so much of any Act relating to the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland” are omitted. I contend that that is a very material alteration. The effect of that alteration is, that the Bill which authorized the Public Works Loan Commissioners to grant Public Works Loans on annuity, and which originally applied to England and Ireland, is now left to apply to Ireland alone. In the 5th clause of the Bill there is also an important alteration. In the original Bill the clause ran as follows:—

Of course, this was a general saving clause to all loans prior to 1879; but there is a further provision in the new Bill to this effect—

“Nor to any advance which the Public Works Loans Commissioners are authorised to make by sections four and five of the Public Works Loans Money Act, 1876, and the Acts in those sections mentioned, to the Port Patrick and Belfast and County Down Railway Companies, and for improving the harbour of Colombo.”

Now, this constitutes an entire difference in the Bill, for new matter is included in the clause. Well, Sir, I will only allude briefly to the last alteration which occurs in Clause 6, line 25. The old clause had reference to the repayment of the advances to the Public Works Loan Commissioners; but the clause in the substituted Bill also provides that—

“Every sum so advanced shall be repaid, and the interest from time to time accruing thereon shall be paid, out of the sums paid or applicable in or towards the discharge of the principal or interest of any loan granted by the Public Works Loans Commissioners either before or after the passing of this Act, or the advance of such sum, and, if such sums are insufficient, shall be charged on and paid out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom."

Now, I submit that these alterations are not in the nature of clerical or verbal alterations, but in the nature of alterations that affect the scope of the Bill. They clearly affect the material points of the Bill; and, therefore, I must contend that we ought not to be called upon to read the Bill a second time. I venture to submit, Sir, the 4th clause, by the omission of the words "and so much of any Act relating to the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland," has an application very different and more restricted than that which was intended in the Bill originally placed on the Table of the House. I think that is a sufficient justification why the Bill, having been altered while in the possession of the House, should not be read a second time, and why the Order should be discharged.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, that, before Mr. Speaker gave the House the benefit of his opinion, he should like to make one or two observations in support of the course taken by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), and especially in reference to the material character of the alterations which had been made in the Bill. The Bill was one of only seven clauses, and no less than four of them had been altered by five distinct and separate alterations. One of the alterations was the omission of words which were in the original Bill, and the others were the addition of words which appeared for the first time in the substituted measure. As regarded those additions, there was one which his hon. Friend had not referred to, but which, however, was of very great importance. The concluding words of Clause 4 of the new Bill did not appear in the Bill as originally presented. These were "which is not to be repaid within twenty years." By that additional paragraph a whole class of loans was excluded altogether from the action of the clause; and if it were within the province of any Member of the Government to make a change of that kind, it appeared to him that an absolutely new Bill might be brought in, under the cover of the first reading of a totally different Bill. The same remark applied to the alteration of Clause 5, by which a very important Consolidation Act, including many other Acts, and especially referring to two classes of loans, was for the first time excluded from the operation of the Bill. He could not see how, under such circumstances and alterations so considerable in their character, the House could be called upon to consider the second reading of the Bill which was certainly not read a first time some time ago.

MR. CALLAN supported the objections taken to the Bill. He thought that the Bill ought to be withdrawn, and a new measure introduced.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he desired to explain the facts of the case before Mr. Speaker pronounced upon the question of Order. Such a course would have the effect of shortening discussion, for, as they stood, they were very simple. The Bill had been introduced by him at a rather late hour, and no discussion occurred at that time. Unfortunately, however, the copy of the Bill which he had in his hand, and which was presented to the Clerk on that occasion and afterwards printed and distributed among hon. Members, was an imperfect one. It was usual in these cases that a draft should be sent for revision by the office which presented it, before it was circulated. If that had been done in this case, they would have seen that a wrong copy had been given in; but unfortunately that did not take place. When the mistake was discovered it was too late, inasmuch as the imperfect copy had been already circulated and placed in the hands of Members. As soon as the fact came to the knowledge of the Treasury, it was found that there were several provisions in the original Bill which required alteration, especially that which affected the Irish Land Act. On the 22nd February the incomplete Bill was circulated; but on the 26th February, only four days afterwards, the amended Bill was produced and circulated in a complete form. But this was a matter which occurred as far back as five months ago, and no one until now heard a whisper breathed upon the subject. He thought hon. Members might have managed to make known their objections to the measure before that moment. He, however, congratulated them upon their ingenuity in discovering the objection, and only disclosing it on the 23rd July. Of course, if Mr. Speaker should decide that the Government were out of Order in presenting this measure for a second reading, he had nothing to do but to withdraw it and ask leave to introduce another Bill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer showed how the mistake had arisen. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) had not known of the difference between the two copies of the Bill until to-day, and he supposed that was the position of hon. Members generally. But the Government knew of the mistake some time ago, and what could have been easier than to avoid the present difficulty by the introduction of another Bill, and of explaining the mistake? That, however, had not been done. As it was admitted that the alterations in the Bill were not merely verbal alterations, he apprehended Mr. Speaker would rule that only one course could now be taken, and that was, that the Bill must be withdrawn.

MR. SPEAKER: It appears that the Public Works Loans Bill was ordered by this House to be printed on the 14th of February last, and that it was delivered on the 22nd of February. Subsequently, it was reprinted, and was delivered as a substituted Bill on the 26th of February. Now, if any material alterations in the Bill as originally printed were made in the substituted Bill, such a proceeding was, no doubt, irregular, and it does appear to me that the alterations in the substituted Bill were of such a material character as to render the proceeding irregular. The proper course to take, under these circumstances, would, therefore, be to ask leave to withdraw this Bill, in order to introduce a new Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Well, Sir, I have then no option but to take that course, after your ruling. I beg leave, accordingly, to move that the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of the Bill be discharged, in order that a new Bill should be introduced.

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn; and leave given to present another Bill instead thereof.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. CHAMBERLAIN desired to make a suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Public Works Loans Bill had been upon the Paper upon the average twice a-week since it was read a first time. It had caused a great deal of interest in the House and in the country, and a number of Gentlemen had been brought down again and again in order to oppose the measure. This was especially the case at the earlier part of the Session, when it was possible that the Bill might be taken as the second Order. Lately, the right hon. Gentleman had promised that it should be taken only as a first Order, and that had, to a considerable extent, released hon. Gentlemen. Considering the lateness of the Session, he ventured to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he could not hope to carry a Bill containing so much contentious matter; and it would be a great saving of time, and relieve many of the opponents of the measure, if he would now say that in the new Bill he would drop all contentious matter, at all events, for the present Session, and that he would be satisfied to introduce a Bill giving the Government all they required to meet the local requirements for the next 12 months.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE doubted whether it would be possible to pass the Bill this Session.

[BILL 212.]

(Mr. Salt, Mr. Sclater-Booth.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [1st July], "That the Bill be now read a second time."
—(Mr. Sclater-Booth.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH explained that the measure would extend the Act of 1876 to those cases which it did not now reach. It would meet the very peculiar case of the Metropolis, and would relieve the local authorities from certain responsibilities which were now very heavy to bear. He had been pressed by the local authorities of London and the Metropolitan Asylums Board to propose legislation in the direction in which the Bill went, and he hoped the House would now read it a second time.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE doubted very much if there was much chance of the Government being able to pass a measure of such importance at that late period of the Session. He had a very great objection to the 2nd clause of the Bill, which he considered dealt in an unsatisfactory way with the matter in question.

MR. RYLANDS: I must join with my hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke) in regretting that we should be called upon at this late period of the Session to deal with a measure of this kind; and in doing so I wish to point out to the right hon. Gentleman opposite the President of the Local Government Board that the present mode of the election of Poor Law Guardians should receive very great and careful consideration. It is a question which attracts a considerable amount of interest, and the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly aware that a great many complaints have been made concerning the present manner of election. We have a number of instances in which there have been either frauds or suspected frauds, and, in fact, the present system does afford opportunity for the exercise of personal influence in certain districts. I am pleased to find that the President of the Local Government Board is rather disposed to favour the election of Poor Law Guardians by a poll of votes instead of by voting papers. Under the Bill the permissive principle is established, and this may lead to a variety of modes of elections all over the country. In dealing with the elections of Guardians, I think it is important that they should be assimilated, as far as possible, with other Representative Bodies. Certainly, I could imagine no course more inconvenient than that Poor Law Guardians in the country should be elected upon a variety of modes. I will venture to suggest that Guardians should be elected upon a certain fixed principle, and not according to a mere permissive clause.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that the clauses in the Bill dealing with the re-arrangement of the boundaries of parishes and other matters were essential to the proper carrying on of the work of the Poor Law, and he hoped the House would regard that as the important part of the Bill, and agree to it. In answer to the remarks of hon. Gentlemen opposite, a provision had been inserted dealing with the election of Guardians in large and populous places, and in regard to that he should be glad to consider any proposal when they got into Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday.

PRIVILEGE (TOWER HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE (METROPOLIS) COMMITTEE)
—BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

ARREST OF JOHN SANDILANDS WARD.

The Sergeant at Arms reported to the House, That he had taken into custody John Sandilands Ward, pursuant to the Order of the House this day.

COMMISSIONERS OF WOODS (THAMES PIERS) BILL—[BILL 249.]

(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Gerard Noel.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it was an attempt to settle, with the co-operation of the Thames Conservancy, a contention of long standing between the Commissioners of Woods and the pier proprietors on the river. At present, the pier proprietors were under an obligation to pay annually to the Woods and Forests an amount considerably in excess of the tolls. It was not desirable that such a state of things should be allowed to continue; and, therefore, the Woods and Forests proposed to commute their claim into an annual payment of £10 per annum for each pier, thus keeping up their right. Legislative sanction for the arrangement was required in order to give it effect, and that was the object of the Bill, of which he now had the honour to move the second reading, to provide.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time," —(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson,) — put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

LOCAL COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY
(IRELAND) BILL [Lords—[BILL 146.]

(Mr. James Louther.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he would only occupy the time of the House for a very brief space in explaining its provisions. Its object was to give to Ireland what had been long asked for—additional Local Bankruptcy Courts. The House was aware that English County Court Judges possessed jurisdiction in Bankruptcy cases, and that the Irish County Court Judges had no such jurisdiction. There was, in fact, in England a perfect system of local jurisdiction; while in Ireland the great centre of the Bankruptcy jurisdiction was Dublin. Under certain conditions of a somewhat difficult character, there existed powers to send Bankruptcy cases requiring adjudication to the different County Courts in Ireland; but, owing to certain difficulties, it had not been found to work very well, and it was a jurisdiction which had not been largely availed of, and there had been an urgent and pressing demand from the great mercantile cities of Cork and Belfast, urging that their County Court Judges should have Bankruptcy jurisdiction, which would enable them to do perfect justice, and give perfect satisfaction to the mercantile communities in which they were placed. Now, the Bill, which he did not think would take long to explain to the House, proposed to give to the Recorders of Cork and Belfast complete Bankruptcy jurisdiction; and, so far as expenses went, it would not cost much to carry the Bill into execution. With regard to the Recorder of Cork, he at present received £2,000, and he was under conditions of office by which he would discharge this Bankruptcy jurisdiction without receiving any additional pay; and, as regarded the Recorder of Belfast, during the continuance of his particular period of office, he would not require his salary to be increased; and the new Recorder would not be entitled to receive any extra remuneration whatever for the new duties under the Bill. But in the measure, besides providing for that new Bankruptcy jurisdiction for Cork and Belfast, two chief cities of commercial interest next to Dublin, there was a power given to grant similar jurisdiction to the Recorder of Derry and the Recorder of Galway, if it were thought necessary to do so. Machinery was also provided in the Bill for bringing the Act into operation with the least possible expense, by means of the usual jurisdiction, and power was given to attach jurisdiction to existing officers, or to appoint additional officers where it was thought necessary. These, however, were matters of detail, and if any suggestions could be made for improving the terms of the measure, and for carrying out more effectually the working of the new jurisdiction by other officers, they would be carefully and fairly considered in Committee. The Bill also dealt with current proceedings under certain restrictions; but that was a matter for after consideration which it was not necessary to discuss at present. In the districts to be affected by the measure there existed, as he was aware, a perfect and strongly-expressed unanimity of opinion in its favour; and, in fact, he understood, so far as his information went, that the only opposition to the measure came from the rich City of Dublin. He desired it, however, to be understood that no opposition was offered by the Bill to the Dublin Bankruptcy Court. The Judges of that Court, he believed, were most able and efficient, and administered their jurisdiction with the greatest ability. That, however, was not the question. The question really was, whether those great communities of Cork and Belfast were entitled to have the jurisdiction intrusted to them in Bankruptcy which they asked for? While every freedom would be given to hon. Members to discuss the provisions of the Bill, he hoped the House would read it a second time, and that all questions which might suggest themselves as to the details would be brought forward in Committee. The right hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

MR. MELDON, in moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, he must resent the insinuation that any opposition coming from him to the measure was in any way an opposition coming from the Dublin practitioners.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, he had made no insinuation of the kind, and was sorry to have been so understood.

MR. MELDON did not know what the right hon. and learned Gentleman meant by the allusion to the Dublin Court of Bankruptcy. The Court of Bankruptcy which existed in Dublin was the Irish Court of Bankruptcy, and not the Dublin Court. Disclaiming the slightest wish to oppose the Bill, either in the interest of centralization, or of the Dublin Court, or of the Dublin practitioners, he would say that what the Bill proposed to do was to abolish one of the finest and most successful legal institutions in the world. The Irish Bankruptcy system was, he ventured to say, one of the best systems of Bankruptcy in the United Kingdom. It was a system which was fully investigated in 1872, when the whole subject of Irish Bankruptcy was inquired into most thoroughly before the Select Committee of the House of Lords. It was admitted by the Members of the House who had for years past taken the greatest interest in Bankruptcy Law that the system in Ireland most favourably contrasted with that of England. The expense in Ireland of the administration of Bankruptcy estates was, he ventured to say, as small as in any Bankruptcy system in the world. That being so, he thought the House ought very seriously to consider whether it was prudent to interfere with a system which had been working so successfully, and as to which no complaints whatever had been made, and no necessity shown for any alteration in the law. He purposed tracing the course of legislation with respect to Irish Bankruptcy Law from 1857 down to the present time, and thought he could demonstrate, most conclusively, that the principal reason why the Irish Court of Bankruptcy had been so successful was that it was managed in Dublin with a small trained staff, and because in the Irish system there was wholly absent the mischiefs which had arisen in the administration of Bankruptcy in England in consequence of local Bankruptcy Courts. In 1857 the principal Bankruptcy Act was passed. The system of

Bankruptcy which was then introduced was this. There were three systems. There was first the system of Bankruptcy where the adjudication in Bankruptcy took place, and where the Bankruptcy proceedings were conducted in the usual form down to the end. Then there was the other system, by which the insolvent might propose to his creditors a scheme of composition. Then there was the third system, which had been really productive of so much good in Ireland, and it was an arrangement under the Court of Bankruptcy, but without Bankruptcy, which arrangement might very fairly be followed in this country. That law worked very easily, until some changes were thought necessary; and, in 1872, an investigation took place with reference to Bankruptcy in Ireland, and that resulted in an Act of Parliament which was passed in 1872. Agitation followed from Belfast down to Cork. It was suggested that a great want was felt for some local tribunal to administer Bankruptcy matters in the North of Ireland. The case was also put forward that the farmers in the North of Ireland were most anxious that some system should be introduced whereby, under the control of the Court, a system of trusteeship should be introduced. Extensive evidence was taken, and every disposition was shown to meet the views of traders, and especially those coming from the North of Ireland; and, accordingly, a series of clauses called Trustee Clauses were introduced into the Bankruptcy Act of 1872, in consequence of the claims put forward by the commercial men of the North. In deference to their views also, an unlimited power of transfer was given to the local tribunals, if necessary. The only thing that was asked of the Committee which was not granted was, that the right to have initiatory proceedings in the local tribunals was not granted to them. In the English system, power was granted to initiate proceedings in the inferior Courts, and the jurisdiction might not arise before a highly-skilled and competent Judge. A case that had occurred in the Court of Appeal had shown that there was a defect in the English system, in that the initiatory proceedings took place in the inferior Courts; but it was thought, in passing the Act of 1872, that an adjudication in Bankruptcy, by a proceeding affecting a man's entire prospects in life, should not take place in an inferior Court, but in a superior, and that afterwards most unlimited powers should exist to transfer to inferior Courts. The result of the investigation was to place the Law of Bankruptcy in Ireland in the condition in which it at present was. What had occurred to alter the circumstances from 1872 downward? They had not heard from the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland any instance of hardship. No case whatever had been made out, except a general statement that this change in the law was desired by persons in Cork and Belfast. Before he sat down, however, he would show that the change which was proposed would be most mischievous and erroneous. The law was most materially altered by the powers of transfer to the Judges; but what had been the result of the change in the law? There was no difficulty whatever in getting a transfer to the local tribunals; but the system worked so well in Dublin that, while there might have been one case of transfer, certainly from 1872 down to the present time there had not been half-a-dozen such cases. The system of the Irish Court had given unqualified satisfaction to all classes. In England one of the greatest defects had been the number of officers spread all over the country, and which had led to a most fraudulent state of dealing with Bankruptcy property all over England. That was the statement made by the hon. and learned Attorney General for England as one of the greatest defects of the English system; but now the Government wanted to extend the system to Ireland. They wanted to have an expensive staff of Registrars, official assignees, and other persons, because powers were taken in the Bill that the Lord Lieutenant should at any time extend the jurisdiction of the local Courts. But what was the reason why the Irish system had been so successful? The Irish Court of Bankruptcy was presided over by two Judges, before whom all initiatory proceedings must be taken, and who, in every case, acquired complete control. Those Judges were assisted by two official assignees; and he ventured to challenge the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland to say if the work had not been well performed by these official assignees, who were appointed for the whole of Ireland.

Mr. Meldon

Without the slightest hesitation, he would say that the way these gentlemen had performed their duties was above suspicion, and that the system had given the greatest satisfaction, and obtained the highest praise from those most interested. It was now, however, proposed that the number of the assignees should be increased, and one given to every local Court. The appointment of fresh officers was a most undesirable thing in the first place; but those two gentlemen, who had done the work up to the present time, and in a most satisfactory manner, ought to be allowed to continue. The staff at present employed was small and well-drilled; but it was now proposed to have different staffs all over the country; and that was the evil of the English system. Unfortunately, in England, the amount of business was great, and it was impossible to remedy this evil; but in Ireland the state of things was very different. From want of manufacturing interests in the country, the great number of creditors were English, and Dublin was the most accessible place for them in Bankruptcy proceedings. If they had to go to Dublin, to Belfast, to Derry, and to Cork, and all the other places, they would require different solicitors, and would require to be constantly travelling about, and it would seriously interfere with business. He opposed the Bill upon the ground that it would entirely change what had heretofore been a perfectly successful system; also, because it would lead to increased expense in the appointment of officials, and it would give facilities for fraudulent dealings. There was no demand for the measure in the country by way of Petitions, neither could it be pointed out that there had been any demand for it by Chambers of Commerce. In conclusion, he begged, for the reasons he had stated, to move its rejection.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Meldon.)

MR. J. P. CORRY, in supporting the second reading of the Bill, said, his constituents were very much interested in its passing. Small traders in Belfast and the neighbourhood were put to very great inconvenience and expense by having to go to Dublin with Bankruptcy cases, and a friend of his was so disgusted with the worry of frequent adjournments that he gave the matter up, and the bankrupt got his discharge, although it was believed to be a gross case of imposition. The Belfast Chamber of Commerce had had the matter under consideration for the last 10 years, and from time to time had impressed upon successive Governments the necessity of establishing these local Courts of Bankruptcy. It was only last Session they were able to get the matter put in the shape of a Bill; but it was too late to get it through then. He hoped that the Bill, having passed through the House of Lords, would pass its various stages in this House without difficulty. The hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) had said English creditors would rather go to Dublin; but the fact was that the large proportion of creditors were in the locality. He did not wish to go into the details of the measure, but was much surprised that the hon. and learned Member for Kildare should oppose a Bill like this, because the hon. and learned Member was so much in favour of Home Rule. The Bill proposed to give local Courts, and in doing that much of the inconvenience at present existing, arising from the central Court, would be done away with. His (Mr. Corry's) hon. Friends the Members for Cork City and Cork County were quite as anxious that the Bill should be pushed forward as were those in the North of Ireland. He suggested that if English creditors had to come over to look after Irish debtors it would be very pleasant for them to go to Cork or Belfast and see the country. He earnestly supported the second reading, and hoped the Government would see their way to press the Bill to a successful issue that Session.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, it was quite a mistake to say the Bill was not supported by Petitions. There had been Petitions from the Limerick Corporation, Chamber of Commerce, and Board of Guardians. He cordially supported the principle of the Bill, for the simple reason that if they had local Bankruptcy Courts local creditors would have a much more powerful supervision over the proceedings than they could have in Dublin. He ventured to think that under such a local system as was proposed in the Bill the amount in the pound paid by debtors would be considerably raised. Without imputing fraud, there was no doubt that country creditors were deterred by the uncertainty of the present proceedings and the frequent postponements. He could quote many cases in which 7s. and 8s. in the pound had been accepted, and in which something much nearer 20s. in the pound would have been realized if the examination of the bankrupt had taken place before the eyes of his neighbours and fellow-townsmen, who knew what he had been doing, and what he ought to be able to pay. Having said so much in favour of the principle of the Bill, he regretted to find there was no mention of Limerick in the Bill. Cork and Belfast were, no doubt, larger towns; but the people of Limerick, and other parts of Ireland also, were subjected to very much inconvenience in consequence of the present law, as they had to take long journeys. Limerick was a place with a large population, and there were many small towns in the county that could be brought within the jurisdiction of a Court established in the city, while such a Court would serve the wants of a large agricultural population. The commercial prosperity of Limerick had for a long time been increasing, and where that was the case with regard to any district there was a great necessity for a complete Bankruptcy system. He thought the importance of Limerick as a commercial and agricultural centre fully entitled it to be placed in the same position as Cork and Belfast; and he appealed to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to give it the same position, without any recourse to the Lord Lieutenant. The system of giving the Lord Lieutenant and his Privy Council powers to confer jurisdiction had not been a satisfactory one, as was proved by the experience of Belfast in the matter of a local Admiralty jurisdiction. He trusted the facts contained in a recent Return would now operate successfully in that matter. However, if the name of Limerick were not introduced into the Bill in some way on the footing of Galway and Londonderry, if not on the footing of Cork and Galway, he would reluctantly feel it his duty to oppose the further progress of the measure.

MR. MURPHY said, he should give the Bill his most cordial support. The matter had for a very long time engaged the attention of the commercial community of Cork. The inconvenience which had occurred in relation to these Bankruptcy matters, particularly in reference to small traders, was almost inconceivable. One might almost say that the present arrangements held out a premium and incentive to the dishonest trader to put his creditors absolutely at defiance. It was notorious that a very great number of creditors abandoned the possibility of getting anything from their bankrupt debtors, because the expense of the process would probably be more than the dividend they would receive. The very railway fare from Cork to Dublin, and the cost of staying in Dublin a day or two, were often sufficient to swamp the dividend. He recollected when there was a Bankruptcy Court in Cork Commissioners in Bankruptcy sat there, and often administered large estates with great advantage. These Commissioners' Courts were abolished by over-centralization, and the late Lord Plunket said the reason was to insure greater uniformity of practice. The course which was afterwards taken in England with regard to Bankruptcy Procedure ought to have been followed in Ireland; but it took a long time to get English improvements in law to Ireland, in proof of which he would instance the Common Law Procedure and Admiralty Jurisdiction. Reverting to the Bill before the House, he said it was one that was required by the localities. It would do an enormous amount of good; and he was rather surprised that a patriotic Irish Member, who was an advocate for the largest possible extension of local jurisdiction, should raise any objection to this measure, which was wanted by the people of Cork, and which nobody could, after consideration, reasonably oppose.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY also warmly supported the Bill, but thought it was not necessary to take up the time of the House with further reasons than those which had been already given. He could not help, however, expressing the hope that the principle of the Bill would be extended to other matters than Bankruptcy in Ireland.

MR. SHAW said, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) had seemed to consider that the measure implied an attack on the Irish Court of Bankruptcy. He (Mr. Shaw) was sure nothing was further from the minds of its promoters. They believed the Bankruptcy Court of Dublin was administered with great ability and impartiality; but they held that great inconvenience arose from carrying out the law as it stood. It was said that a large proportion of the creditors were English and Scotch merchants. Well, he knew that was not the case in the South of Ireland. It might be so in Dublin; but he knew that such a statement would not apply in the South. Referring to the inconvenience of carrying out the law as it stood at present, he would instance a case in which a trifling objection to the books caused their removal to and back from Dublin on three different occasions.

MR. SYNAN believed the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) had merely made an objection as a pro forma Motion from his love of abstract justice, and his knowledge of the superiority of the administration of justice in Dublin. He, therefore, seconded the appeal to the hon. and learned Member not to put the House to the trouble of dividing on a question on which Irish Members were unanimous. He would also second the appeal to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland on behalf of the City of Limerick. He did not exactly know why Limerick had been left out of the Bill. It ought to be in the 4th clause, and unless it were introduced into either the 4th or the 5th he would join the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) in opposing the Bill at a subsequent stage. He had no doubt, however, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland would give them an assurance on the point.

MR. BRUEN supported the Bill. He, too, would add his voice on behalf of Limerick, and thought it would be right to extend the scope of the Bill so as to include that town and county. Acknowledging the authority of the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) on the question, he could not help thinking that hon. and learned Gentleman's love for Dublin institutions had induced him to attach too great an importance to the maintenance in Dublin of the sole administration of the Bankruptcy Law.

MR. M. BROOKS opposed the measure. It appeared to him that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) and the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) desired to promote the interests of those towns at the expense of the general interests of the community. He believed that the administration of the Bankruptcy Law in Dublin, which was not only the geographical, but the commercial, centre of Ireland, was of the greatest possible advantage. There was in Dublin a small and efficient staff, fully competent to administer the Bankruptcy Laws for the whole of the country. He believed that to have to go to Cork or Belfast would often be detrimental to the interests of the traders for whom his hon. Friends were so solicitous. The real question was, where was the line to be drawn? If they were to have a Bankruptcy Court in Limerick, and another in Cork, and another in Belfast, why should Galway, Kilkenny, Wicklow, and Wexford be deprived of the advantages of a local Court? He disbelieved in the necessity for these local Courts altogether. Certain facilities existed in Dublin, to which people could come in three or four hours from any part of the country, and except it might be to a few professional men in the districts named, he could not see that any good would be derived from the Bill, which would at all counterbalance the great disadvantages that would arise from it. There had been no complaint from traders, and from no one, except a few professional men; and a representation lately emanated from the Dublin Chamber of Commerce as to the disadvantages which would result from the passing of the Bill. He thought that on every ground, except the convenience of the professional men he had alluded to, the argument was entirely in favour of continuing the present very efficient and satisfactory system.

MR. CALLAN, who also opposed the Bill, said, that he had inquired in Dublin as to the opinion upon it, and he had found there was a universal concurrence of opinion amongst the barristers there, and amongst those, too, of the greatest experience, against it. An eminent Judge, to whom he had spoken, had told him that the Bill, if passed, would cause much dissatisfaction. He would also refer to the evidence given at some length by Judge Harrison against the principle of the Bill. The constitution of the Irish County Courts, said that eminent Judge, differed very materially from that of the English Courts in many salient points, a fact which he (Mr. Callan) mentioned for the benefit of English Members, who fancied that a system which worked well in England would work just as well in Ireland. Unless the constitution of the Irish Courts was radically altered, Judge Harrison was of opinion that it would not be well to localize the administration of the Bankruptcy Laws. That being the opinion of Judge Harrison, and there being no demand for the Bill in any quarter of Ireland, except from one or two parties in Belfast and Cork, he would proceed to state other reasons why it should not be passed. It would not be possible to create the necessary staff of officers in Belfast and Cork under an expenditure of £1,500 a-year in each town, in addition to which they must increase the Recorders' salaries, probably making a total increase of expenditure of £5,000. He wished it to be understood that he had no interest in Dublin whatever—in fact, he had a very great dislike to Dublin. His only objection to Home Rule was, that if they got it they would have to have a Parliament in Dublin, and not in Cork, or Belfast, or Galway. The history of the Bill was peculiar, because the matter remained in abeyance until one of the Law Officers of the Crown was looking for a seat in Parliament. He turned his eyes upon the town of Belfast, and to recommend himself he recommended the Irish Executive to confer upon the town local powers in Bankruptcy. He hoped that was the explanation of the Bill, because he did not like to see Cork and Belfast proclaiming that their condition was such as to require local Bankruptcy Courts. There had been an unprecedented number of bankruptcies in Cork during the last 18 months, and he found three-fourths of the creditors belonged to England, Scotland, and Dublin. English creditors, who did business in a large way, generally had agents in Dublin to prove for them, and he believed the present arrangements had given the greatest satisfaction. If the Bill passed, his belief was that it would work very injuriously in the interests of the persons affected, and he intended to offer it all the opposition in his power.

He should like to repeat the opinion of Lord Westbury on the subject. Lord Westbury was the most eminent authority on the subject in England or Ireland. Lord Westbury had said to Judge Harrison—

“I must tell you most distinctly that, so far as I am concerned, I think it would most effectually checkmate your cause, because I feel that we are not in a position to teach you in Ireland. We have been ourselves for the last 10 years muddling this affair of Bankruptcy and making it worse with every Bill. We have brought it to this—that an expense of 30 or 40 per cent is not to be wondered at; and if you have done your corresponding part of the business at an expense of 14 or 15 per cent, I think you have nothing to learn from England.”

He (Mr. Callan) contended that no authenticated case of complaint ever rose under the system; but that simply to comply with the pressure of certain Members who sat behind the Government the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland was introducing a Bill to interfere with a Court which was carrying on its business at an expense of 14 or 15 per cent. He was about to follow the example of England, and to meddle and muddle in the matter of Bankruptcy, making it worse every year until he increased the 14 or 15 per cent to 30, or 40, or 50 per cent. He (Mr. Callan) contended, moreover, that the Bill had come upon him and the House by surprise, neither he nor the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) having been aware that the Government intended to proceed with it on that day.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON): Sir, there are only, so far as I know, three, or, perhaps, four, hon. Members from Ireland who are opposed to this Bill. Two others appear to have been sent to us providentially; but they all attempt to suggest an entirely false inference. The introduction of this Bill is, by no means, an attack upon the Irish Courts of Bankruptcy. Much has been said with regard to the Courts of Bankruptcy now existing in Ireland, and I may say that no one can think more highly of them than I do. The Judges and the officials of those Courts are most capable men, and I know of no body of public servants who are entitled to be spoken of with more praise than the officials of the Irish Bankruptcy Courts. But that is not the question.

Mr. Callan

The question is, whether the large mercantile communities of Belfast and Cork are entitled to have a local Bankruptcy jurisdiction? The principal merchants and traders of those cities have unanimously asked for it, and have pointed out that it would be an immense benefit to them and their local affairs. If they are entitled to have it, having also pointed out that in England there is a similar jurisdiction to that which we propose in this Bill shall be given to Ireland, I do not see that they should be denied. We have not proposed to give this local jurisdiction recklessly everywhere; but we have picked out two of the largest and most important places for the purpose of establishing the new system there; and with respect to other districts, if the Lord Lieutenant should signify that a fair and a reasonable case has been made out, I have no doubt that justice shall be done. Now, I have been pressed, and reasonably pressed, by hon. Members from Ireland as to the necessity of including Limerick in the Bill; and I have been asked whether, in Committee, I will make provision for that city? It is most natural that hon. Gentlemen should consider the interests of Limerick; but I will say at once that I do not see my way clear to granting that which has been asked upon the 4th clause. At the same time, I will take care, in considering the 5th clause, that the Lord Lieutenant shall have, if necessary, an opportunity of considering whether the local Bankruptcy jurisdiction shall be given to Limerick, which is certainly a city of the greatest importance. I do not think it would be reasonable for me to go into the details of the Bill and the many criticisms that have been made, as they will, no doubt, be brought forward again in Committee, where, I am sure, they will receive consideration; and I will now ask the House to give the Bill a second reading.

MR. MELDON said, that, after the expression of opinion that the Bill would work in the interests of the country, he would withdraw his Amendment.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—VICTORY AT ULUNDI.

TELEGRAMS FROM GENERAL CLIFFORD AND SIR GARNET WOLSELEY.

COLONEL STANLEY: I think, Sir, upon this Motion, it would be convenient that I should take the earliest opportunity of making known to the House a telegram which I have received this morning, the first part of which is, apparently, from General Clifford, and the second from Sir Garnet Wolseley.

[The right hon. and gallant Gentleman then read the telegrams, which appear in pp. 1096-7-8.]

At the conclusion of the telegrams, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman said: I think it will not be out of place to add an expression of satisfaction that Lord Chelmsford has been able to vindicate his character as a military commander, and to show that his Force have practically been able to combine at the point indicated, and that his success has so far been complete.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: I rise, because I am very unwilling that there should not be someone on this side to express the satisfaction we must all feel at the news which has been conveyed to us. It seems to me that there is one expression in the telegram which has been read which necessitates someone from this side of the House saying how cordially we hope the wishes expressed by Sir Garnet Wolseley may turn out in the result to be true—namely, that the war will soon be over. I understand that to be the expression made use of, and I do most certainly trust that this expectation may be fulfilled. Whatever opinions may have prevailed as to the first policy of this war, or any portion of its conduct, I am quite certain that throughout the whole country there has existed but one feeling, and that was an anxious desire that the British honour might be vindicated, and that the prestige of the British arms, which seemed at one time to be imperilled, might be restored. The hope that the day may not be far off when the war will be ended is, I say, a wish that is alike dictated by feelings of the purest patriotism and the truest humanity.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER asked the Secretary of State for War, whether Lieutenant Carey, of the 98th Regiment, who was mentioned in the despatch as coming home in the Euphrates, was the same officer that had been tried by court martial; and, also, whether the news had been confirmed that Captain Wyatt-Edgell, commanding a troop of the 17th Lancers, had been killed, as some near relatives of the latter had come down to the House to inquire whether it was true?

COLONEL STANLEY said, with regard to the first part of the question, he believed that one and the same officer was meant. As regarded the second part, he feared that it was only too much to be regretted that Her Majesty's Service had lost a very gallant officer in Captain Wyatt-Edgell.

TURNPIKE ACTS CONTINUANCE BILL.

[BILL 239.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preamble postponed.

Clauses 1 to 6, inclusive, agreed to.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked who had charge of the Bill?

MR. SALT said, he had.

SIR ROBERT PEEL wished to know if the hon. Gentleman could give any information with regard to the continuance of the Tamworth trusts?

MR. SALT said, he was afraid that he could not give any information at that moment with regard to that particular trust. It was a matter of great detail. He would be happy to furnish the right hon. Gentleman with any information in his power to obtain.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, some years ago, he brought this subject under the notice of the House. The town of Tamworth, which he had the honour to represent, was encircled by a net-work turnpikes. One could not move two or three miles out of that town without having to pay toll. He did not know why the Tamworth trusts should be continued, while so many other turnpikes had been abolished; and he should like to know why they were continued as an exception to the general rule?

MR. SALT said, there were two classes of trusts, some of which came before the Turnpike Trusts Committee every year, which dealt with each one upon its merits. Sometimes the trusts were continued up to a certain date by the Committee, with a view to their consideration again, at a particular date. For instance, certain trusts had been continued up to the 1st of November, 1880; they would be considered next year. There was another class of trusts whose Local Acts would expire in a particular year. Next year a certain number of these Local Acts would expire, and they would come in the usual course before the Committee. When the trust to which the right hon. Baronet referred came up it would be considered and disposed of by the Committee. There was also another class of trusts disposed of by this Bill, in which the trusts having come to an end, and the debts having been paid off, the trustees themselves applied for the trust to be discontinued. So soon as the interest to which the right hon. Baronet referred came under any one of these categories it would be dealt with. Any further information in his power to give he would be glad to supply.

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND) ACT (1878) AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 128.]

(Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. J. LOWTHER, in moving that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, briefly explained its provisions, and hoped the House would decide that it was for the benefit of Ireland that the Amendments which the Bill proposed should be made in the existing law. The provision which enabled loans to be raised by sanitary bodies in Ireland, he thought, would commend itself to the House. With regard to loans for paving, he proposed to introduce a clause providing that where any Act empowered any urban sanitary authority to cause the streets or footways under their control to be paved or flagged, such Act, so far as it related to that work being carried into effect, should, for all the purposes of the Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878, which had reference to the borrowing money for the purpose of the Sanitary Acts, be deemed to be a Sanitary Act within the meaning of that term. No new matter was comprised in the Bill, which was merely an amending measure; and he hoped that, as Amendments might be offered in Committee, the House would now agree to the Motion he would make. He wished, however, to say, with reference to an Amendment the hon. and learned Member for Kildare had upon the Paper, that it raised matter which was new to the Bill in a rather inconvenient way. The object of the hon. and learned Member's Amendment might be good or might not; but it was hardly one which ought to be pressed upon the consideration of the House upon the Bill. The Select Committee, which then sat upon the subject, had decided against introducing the provisions the hon. and learned Gentleman sought to draft into the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. J. Lowther.)

MR. MELDON said, he had an Amendment to the Motion upon the Paper, which was to the effect—

"That no Bill to amend the law relating to Public Health in Ireland can be satisfactory which fails to provide for the supervision by properly qualified medical officers of health of the sanitary arrangements throughout the country; and this House is of opinion that this supervision can best be carried out by Local Government Boards having power conferred on them to divide the whole of Ireland into districts, and to appoint inspecting medical officers of health for the purposes of such sanitary inspection."

He also had another Amendment down to the Bill; but he proposed now to postpone them until they got into Committee on the Bill.

MR. J. LOWTHER doubted whether that would in Order.

MR. MELDON then proposed to address the House upon the subject, but—

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. and learned Member was out of Order, as he had already spoken.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. SALT thereupon took the Chair.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preamble postponed.

Clauses 1 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

MR. J. LOWTHER moved, after Clause 4, to insert the following clause:—

(Loans for paving.)

"Where any Act empowers any urban authority to cause the streets or footways under their control to be paved or flagged, such Act, so far as it relates to the paving or flagging of streets or footways, shall, for all the purposes of the sections of The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878, which have reference to the borrowing of money for the purposes of the Sanitary Acts, be deemed to be a Sanitary Act within the meaning of the term Sanitary Acts, as defined by The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878."

MR. MELDON said, he had intended to oppose the introduction of this clause, and, therefore, it was necessary that he should state shortly why he did not oppose it. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in moving that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, said that this was merely an amending Bill, and there was no introduction of new matter whatever. Those remarks were directed against the Amendment of which he (Mr. Meldon) had given Notice. And yet the right hon. Gentleman himself introduced a clause of the greatest importance, which was quite foreign to the object of the Bill. It was now proposed, in a Bill to amend the Public Health Act, to give the Corporation of Dublin most unlimited powers of borrowing money. It was estimated that the Corporation required some £400,000 or £500,000 for the purpose of paving the streets. The powers of the Corporation were confined to certain matters, which did not include the power to borrow so enormous a sum of money to pave the streets. As they could not borrow that money for any ordinary purpose, the right hon. Gentleman now wanted to say that the paving of the streets was a sanitary purpose; and, therefore, in this merely amending Bill, he put down a clause giving this enormous power to the Corporation. In his (Mr. Meldon's) opinion, it was not a power that ought to be conferred in this way. When the town of Belfast wanted similar powers in a modified form, the course pursued was not to attempt to introduce a provision of this kind in a secret and covert manner into a Bill; but they got a Provisional Order of the Local Government Board, which was afterwards passed into an Act, after full discussion, and the attention of the House had been specifically called to it. But in this case this enormous power was slipped into a merely amending Bill, as the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary called it. He (Mr. Meldon), therefore, could not, consistently with his duty, assent to the introduction of this clause. But he now understood that hon. Members of the House who represented the citizens of Dublin were in favour of the clause. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray), as leading Member of the Corporation, in whom all the citizens of Dublin had confidence, had given his assent to the clause; and the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. M. Brooks) also concurred with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in the desirableness of this being done. That being so, he (Mr. Meldon) left the entire responsibility with them, and would not seek to oppose the clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, there had not been the slightest desire to increase the taxation on the citizens of Dublin. He could not agree with the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Meldon) as to what he had said in respect to sanitary purposes in England. The paving of the streets was regarded as a sanitary purpose, and so it was regarded in a good many towns in Ireland. The citizens of Dublin did not think it unreasonable that they should be in an exceptional position, and this being represented to himself and to his right hon. Friend he had thought it proper to give effect to the suggestions made to them.

MR. M. BROOKS said, really the intention of the clause was to assimilate the law in the case of Dublin to that which obtained in every town in the United Kingdom, and to which Dublin was now the only exception. He did not like to hear it said that the clause had been slipped into the Bill by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, as it had been the subject of well-considered Memorials from the Lord Mayor and Corporation of the City of Dublin for a long time.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. MELDON moved the insertion of the following clause:—

“The Local Government Board may, from time to time, appoint so many fit persons as the Lords’ Commissioners of Her Majesty’s Treasury shall sanction, being practising physicians or surgeons, to be inspecting medical officers of health, to assist in carrying out the provisions of ‘The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878,’ as amended by this Act, and may remove all or any of such officers and appoint others in their stead.”

He said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was quite right in saying this was not the first time he (Mr. Meldon) had sought to introduce such a clause into the Public Health Code of Ireland. In 1877, when the Bill was introduced, he had endeavoured to show the necessity of giving the Local Government Board the power of appointing and exercising authority over medical officers of health. He had brought the matter before the Select Committee, and had not been met with any arguments to show that it was improper to confer such power on the Board. In England, full and ample powers were enjoyed by the Medical Department of the Local Government Board, and this was found to work successfully. The point was raised before the Committee on the 1878 Bill, and it was said the Local Government Board could exercise the same powers as in England; but that had turned out to be not so, and over and over again applications made to the Board had been met with the reply that they had no power to interfere with the officers of health. He did not wish to make the appointment of medical Inspectors compulsory; but he wished to give the Local Government Board the power of making the appointments for two principal reasons. First, because in the rural districts officers of health found themselves, owing to local influences, unable to discharge their duties as they would desire. If it became their duty to report upon the existence of a nuisance under the Guardians, their employers, they had considerable difficulty in making their reports, or in having those reports acted upon when made. Then, again, officers might be found who pocketed the money, but did not do their work. On the other hand, in Dublin there was a difficulty in getting the duties properly discharged; and to secure that the necessity of having a superintendent was severely felt. He merely wanted to give the Board power to depute an officer to see that the duties were properly discharged, and in the Amendment he had substituted the word “may” for “shall.” There would be no necessity of appointing new officers; there were other officers in the service; but under the Act there was no power to make it one of their duties to see that the duty of the officers of health throughout the country was properly discharged. These superintendents would be sometimes required to stand between the officer of health and the persons against whom complaints were made; but often they would be required to go about and see that the officers of health were discharging their duties, and this last was most essential in Dublin. It was not easy to get the dismissal of an officer of health for mere neglect; he must be convicted of misconduct, and what was wanted was the means of keeping a man up to his work; and this was what he desired in giving the Local Government Board the power of making these appointments.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he was sorry he could not consent to the insertion of the clause. It would necessitate many fresh appointments, for when the hon. and learned Gentleman said the Local Government Board had in its service competent Inspectors, to whose duties this might be added, without going into the question of how far their time would allow of this, he wished to point out that the words used in the clause, "being practising physicians or surgeons," would exclude all lay Inspectors; and there were no practising medical officers connected with the Local Government Board, for those accepting appointments had to devote their entire time to the service. The clause would, therefore, not only add many new appointments, but a new class of appointments, and would involve considerable disarrangement in the service as it stood. He hoped the clause would not be pressed.

MR. MELDON said, he would not press the Amendment, for this reason, if for no other, that he saw he had no possibility of success in pressing it.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MELDON said, the other two clauses, being consequent upon the first-mentioned, he would not move them.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Pell.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE expressed surprise, saying that he had understood from the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Hanbury) that the Bill would not come on. That was at 10 minutes past 2 o'clock.

MR. PELL said, the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Hanbury) asked him, subsequently to that time, to move the second reading of the Bill.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, its promoters should have given some reasons why it should be read a second time, for it was of a most important character, involving, as it did, the efficiency of the provision made for educational purposes in every borough throughout the country. It was scarcely courteous to the House to have the Bill flung amongst them without a single word in its favour. The House was taken a little by surprise, and it was difficult to know how to deal with it; but he wished to point out to the House that the provision of school accommodation was not at all a voluntary matter. The various authorities were compelled by Statute to provide sufficient accommodation for all children of school age within their districts. It could not, therefore, be pretended that the Bill was directed to economy, for the school accommodation must be provided. The Bill proposed that loans raised for those purposes should extend over periods of 30 years instead of 50 years, as heretofore; and the effect of that must be that a very much larger sinking fund would have to be created. He had not calculated the difference exactly; but he be would not be less than an increase of from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $1\frac{3}{4}$ per cent per annum on the whole capital expenditure upon building. Hon. Members opposite had posed as advocates of economy in School Board management, and they had complained of the school rate of London reaching 5*d* in the pound; but if the proposals in the Bill had governed the action of the London School Board, the rate would be at least 1*d*. or $1\frac{1}{4}$ d. more than it was at present. The Board would have had no alternative. They must have made the same provision, and incurred the same expenditure; but the charge on the present generation of ratepayers would have been increased to the extent he had stated. Of course, it was difficult to answer arguments in the dark, and he did not know what might be advanced in support of the Bill; but he could not see that the future generation of ratepayers were in any way damnified by the extension of the loan over 50 years. The buildings erected for the purpose of schools, both in the Metropolis and throughout the country, were substantial buildings—much better than the average of similar buildings. Certainly, they would have a much longer life than premises usually erected on 99 years' lease. The life of an ordinary house in the Metropolis was supposed to be about the term of the lease; but all these school buildings would last at least considerably more than a century. At the same time, he did not wish to suggest that loans should extend over such a long term as that; but, certainly, no reason had been shown why the term should be shortened in the manner proposed by the hon. Gentleman. The proposition was certainly a most short-sighted one, and it was a policy instigated by a feeling of opposition which had always existed in the minds of some to school boards and their work. They thought that the more expensive they made the work to the ratepayers the more unpopular the school boards would become with the ratepayers; and in that way they hoped to aid the denominational system, which had always had their consistent support. He did not apply this remark to the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), who was nothing, if not an economist. But in this case the economy was a very short-sighted one, for the certain result would be to increase the charge which he (Mr. Pell) and others thought was already too heavy. Under the circumstances, he (Mr. Chamberlain) hoped the Bill would not be allowed hastily to pass the second reading, for it was a measure that must seriously hamper educational work, and add seriously to the already heavy burdens of the ratepayers. He moved the rejection of the Bill.

MR. RYLANDS seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

MR. J. R. YORKE supported the Bill, and said, he thought the facts which had come to the knowledge of the House would, to some extent, justify some jealousy of school board expenditure. The Metropolis was a fair specimen; and, so far from the large expenditure becoming reduced, it seemed to tend to indefinite increase. He was not specially actuated by regard for denominational schools; but he wanted the cheapest system, and he did not see why he should pay a much larger sum for the luxury of compulsion than it was necessary to pay for a voluntary school. The Bill would probably not increase the rates, and the scheme proposed in it had nothing of novelty to recommend it; it existed in Scotland, and the Scotch people, who had many admirable qualities, had one quality in particular—namely, that of looking narrowly after the way in which their money was spent. They preferred repayment in 30 years, and he was bound to believe that they had good reason for that preference. Further, he believed the Bill would prevent the repetition of cases like that of the Shaftesbury, for luxurious furniture would have to be renewed in less than 30 years. He did not, however, pretend that the Bill by itself would go very far; but it would do something to bring home to the present generation of ratepayers that if they would indulge in these educational luxuries they must pay the piper. It was not an isolated attack on the school board system, for the Bill was on all fours with the Bill of the Government for limiting to 30 years the loans of the local authorities from the Public Works Loan Commissioners.

Mr. Chamberlain

MR. RAMSAY said, the Scotch Education Act had enabled school boards to borrow for 30 or 50 years, and, perhaps, the majority of loans were for a period not exceeding 30 years. He, himself, was in favour of that term as the maximum; because, apart from other reasons, he thought that the generation for which a school was provided was the generation on which the burden of erecting the school should fall. On looking at the Bill, he did not see that it was one which should meet with opposition from the House. No doubt, in some instances, money had been borrowed in Scotland for longer periods; but, in the general run of cases, it had been thought expedient that the term should not exceed 30 years. In a great many instances, school boards themselves proposed this. In favouring the proposal of the Bill, he must not be understood to be in any way opposing the operations of school boards. If hon. Gentlemen complained of school board expenditure, they should remember that it was the ratepayers who bore the burden, and appointed the school boards, and it rested, therefore, with them to correct any extravagance in the expenditure.

MR. ROWLEY HILL, in opposing the Bill, said, its effect on the school district with which he was connected would be to make the school board rate 7*d.* in the pound instead of 5*d.*

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the change proposed was an important one, and the House was entitled to hear the views of the Government from a Member connected with either the Education Department or the Treasury, before it signified its assent to the principle of the Bill. In fact, the proposal hardly ought to have been made without the Education Department being represented in that House. He could not conceive for a moment that the Vice President, if he had been aware that a Bill was coming on affecting the position of school boards throughout the country, would have been absent from the discussion. The schools were not built so badly that they would last only for a generation; they would last for two or three generations at least, and it was, therefore, equitable that succeeding generations should contribute to the cost of the buildings while they lasted. It was really only the buildings that were in question, for the amount spent on the furniture was a ridiculously small part of the expenditure of school boards, as the hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke) would see, if he were to move for a Return. The House would remember that, 10 years ago, when the Act was passed, it was at first proposed that the loans should be for 30 years; but the matter was fully considered by Parliament in connection with the year of grace, during which building grants were allowed to be made to the managers of voluntary schools; and that year of grace was agreed to in consideration of the extension of the term of the loans from 30 to 50 years, so that if the shorter term were now imposed there would be a distinct breach of Parliamentary agreement. The inevitable effect of the Bill would be to increase the school board rates by throwing the cost of the buildings on the rates of 30 years instead of 60 years, and, by putting an unjust burden on one generation in respect of the buildings, to restrict either in that respect, or some other, the educational supply. The hon. Member for East Gloucestershire was candid. He avowed that he wished to stop school board expenditure, which he thought was too great. But if the House was asked to legislate on the supposition that school board expenditure was extravagant, it ought to have far more evidence before it than had been yet adduced. More facts ought to be brought forward. Even assuming that the London School Board had made one mistake in respect of a ship, that did not prove anything as to the school buildings on land; and it was not disputed that both in London and the country more schools were wanted and must be supplied, and it would not do to make it more difficult than before to provide those schools. That being so, was it prudent to make the rates heavier for 30 years, in order that for 20 years afterwards the ratepayers might escape contributing to the cost of the schools already built? The ratepaying population was not now in such a state of prosperity that it should be asked to repay faster than it had been accustomed to do, neither was the country in such a condition that it would cheerfully accept a present increase of rates for the benefit of posterity. He should have imagined that the Government, if it had been represented by any other Members than the Chief Secretary for Ireland and :

irritation on the part of those who had been parties to that compromise. He appealed to the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council to say whether the Government were prepared to support the Bill, and on what grounds.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR, as a member of the first School Board of London, testified that that body had taken the greatest care and pains to select sites and build schools in the cheapest and best manner; and he believed that it had succeeded, on the whole, in executing that work, especially considering the unavoidably expensive character of many of the sites, as economically as it had been done in the country districts. He thought the passage of the Bill would be most unfair to the school boards throughout the country, and would be most damaging to the cause of education.

MR. DILLWYN said, he did not think the House should come to a decision without the Government stating their opinion upon the Bill. He would, therefore, move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. BARRAN seconded the Motion, remarking that the Bill had been unexpectedly sprung upon the House that afternoon. It would, undoubtedly, whatever the motives of its authors, retard the cause of education.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
(Mr. Dillwyn.)

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he was sorry he had not been present during the debate; but he had never expected the Bill would be reached. He had, however, come down to the House directly he heard it was under notice. From what he had heard, the debate seemed much ado about nothing. ["Oh, oh!"] The Bill simply proposed to substitute "30" in place of "50." In many cases, school board loans had been already contracted for 30 years only; and the Bill would make no difference whatever, as regarded the terms upon which loans had been already raised. The school accommodation throughout England was almost sufficient, with the exception of that of a few large towns. It was only in London, and some other large towns, with a constantly-increasing population, that the school boards would have to borrow money. If that was all that was proposed in the Bill now, how could hon. Members connect the proposal with any injury to the quantity or quality of the education given? The Bill proposed that in future any sums which were borrowed with the consent of the Education Department, in order to provide necessary school accommodation, should be repaid within 30 years, instead of 50. His hon. Friend, in fact, merely proposed to assimilate the borrowing power of school boards to that of other local authorities, for those bodies were the only public institutions which were not compelled to pay back loans in 30 years. No doubt, it would hit the present generation rather harder than the existing Act, but it was not a material difference; and as, in his judgment, the Bill would do no harm, he should be prepared to vote in favour of the second reading.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council was under considerable misapprehension, when he said that other local authorities were compelled to pay back loans in 30 years. By far the larger amount of the loans made by the Public Works Loan Commission, under various Acts of Parliament, had been made for much longer periods than 30 years, the periods being 50, 60, and even 75 years in some cases. The noble Lord also was under a misapprehension when he said the Bill would not seriously affect the education in many parts of the Kingdom—

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

ARTIZANS' AND LABOURERS' DWELLINGS ACT, 1875.—RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN rose to call attention to the enormous pecuniary loss already incurred by the Metropolitan ratepayers in carrying out the Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act, 1875, and also to the declaration of the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works that it was impossible to estimate the entire cost which might fall to the ratepayers under that Act; and to move a Resolution. The noble Earl said, he believed he would be able to show that the result of the proceedings taken under the Act up to the present time had resulted in a loss to the ratepayers of seven-eighths of the money expended, or £500,000 sterling; that thus there had been thrown upon the ratepayers a very heavy burden, which, to a large extent, ought to have fallen upon other shoulders; and even that the Metropolitan Board of Works, who were the authority charged with carrying out the provisions of the Act, were unable to say what would be the ultimate cost of the measure to the ratepayers. Indeed, in reply to a Question addressed to him elsewhere, Sir James M'Garel-Hogg, the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, made the following statement:—

"It is impossible to say what will be the entire cost to the Metropolitan ratepayers of carrying out the Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act, as there are many cases before the Board in respect of which schemes have not yet been prepared nor estimates made. Up to the present time, of 14 schemes approved by Parliament, the loss on the six sites referred to will be £562,061, while that on the remaining eight is estimated at £514,409—assuming that the prices received for land equal, and do not exceed, those already offered. The whole matter is under consideration by a Committee of the Board, who propose to make a representation to the Secretary of State, with a view to the amendment of the Act."

Thus, there was already a loss of £1,000,000; and it might, therefore, be fairly contended that if all the schemes in contemplation were carried out there would probably be a loss to the ratepayers of upwards of £2,000,000. Moreover, it was quite possible that the Medical Officers of the various parishes might submit further schemes to the Metropolitan Board of Works; and, therefore, it must not be supposed that the sum of £2,000,000 which he had mentioned necessarily included all the expenditure which might be incurred under the Act. Now, to whom was this very large sum of money to be paid? It would be paid chiefly to the owners of dwellings which were unfit for human habitation—those dwellings against which the Medical Officers reported that they were fever-nests of the worst description. For instance, a Report sent in by the Medical Officer of the Bermondsey Vestry stated that the whole site proposed to be acquired was a plague-spot and a fever-nest. That that was the worst Report of the whole he was bound to admit; but it should be remembered that all the Reports had reference to houses which were declared to be totally unfit for human habitation. Their Lordships would naturally inquire how it happened that so large a compensation was given to persons who had no claim to liberal treatment? In the first place, the sums paid to them were out of all proportion to the sums eventually obtained by the sale of the sites. Again, these bad houses were very densely populated; but when proper houses were erected fewer tenants could be accommodated, and the money received for rent was consequently very much less. If, in the first instance, the Nuisances Removal Act had been put in force, these fever dens could not have been used for habitations; and in that case the ratepayers, when they came to acquire the property, would have obtained it for something more nearly approaching its real value—this applied to the six sites referred to in the answer of the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board to the Peabody Trustees, and the private persons who undertook to build houses for the working classes. But these persons were unwilling to pay large sums for these sites. It was said that the Board had taken these properties at the fair market value. If that was so, there was some defect in the working of the Act. He did not object to a purchase “at the fair market value;” but what was that fair market value? It seemed as though the Board had purchased the property, not according to the actual value of the individual house, but had taken the rents paid by the the tenantry, and given so many years’ purchase upon them. It seemed to him that the proper mode of proceeding would have been to consider these houses as condemned nuisances, which must be removed under the Nuisances Removal Act, and paid for them accordingly. Let them consider what had been the effect of the Artizans’ and Labourers’ Dwellings Act up to the present time. He had no hesitation in saying that the effect had been to establish and encourage a trade in those houses which were unfit for human habitation. It was notorious that persons had been paid for such houses very much larger sums than they could have obtained in the open market; therefore, it might be taken for granted that in the case of the other schemes which had not yet been sanctioned a considerable trade in this class of houses would be established. Who was to blame for this state of things? The Metropolitan Board of Works had been very earnest in endeavouring to prove that they were not responsible for it, and that they were merely the instruments for giving effect to the provisions of the Act. He admitted that he did not think the Home Office, in introducing the measure, sufficiently considered what would be the result of the arbitration clause. For his own part, he agreed thoroughly in the purposes of the Act; but it would have been better if provision had been made for purchasing the property at a price more nearly approaching its real market value. The Metropolitan Board of Works was stated to be composed of the most eminent members of the vestries and yet they had never thought of enforcing the provisions of the Nuisances Removal Act. Had that been done it would not have been necessary to pass the Artizans’ and Labourers’ Dwellings Act of 1875. The information of the Metropolitan Board of Works on that whole subject appeared to have been very inadequate. According to a Return of the 6th of March last the net cost of six of the schemes to which he had referred was £562,000; while he found that on the 31st of December of last year the Metropolitan Board of Works estimated the cost of those improvements at £285,101. He could not understand how so great a miscalculation should have arisen. Up to the present time they had cost £500,000; and if the Metropolitan Board of Works insisted on purchasing the sites they might acquire under the eight other schemes which had been sanctioned by Parliament, they would probably lose another £500,000. He thought that such a state of things ought not to be allowed to continue, and he trusted their Lordships would at least refuse to sanction any more of these schemes until some amendment was made in regard to the principle of compensation. He understood that the superintending Architect of the Metropolitan Board of Works had now advised the Board that the only alternative course it could adopt in order to relieve it from its difficulties and put it in the best commercial condition was to obtain an Act that would enable it to erect buildings on the sites which it might purchase. Now, he hoped that whatever else their Lordships might do they would not sanction such a proposal as that. He might be asked what remedy he would propose? At any rate, there was one very simple remedy which might be resorted to—namely, they might pass an Act requiring the Nuisances Removal Act to be put in force with an adequate penalty. Why should the owners of houses which were a source of plague and disease and a disgrace to a civilized community be allowed to let such places for human habitation? For these reasons he had brought forward his Resolution. He had been informed, within the last few hours, that the Home Secretary had given Notice in the other House that it was his intention to introduce an Act to amend the Artizans' Dwellings Act. Now, he submitted that in passing his Resolution their Lordships would not be interfering with any improvement which that Minister might be making; but that they would be expressing their opinion that it was very undesirable that Parliament should sanction any other scheme based on the principle which had been followed up to the present time.

Moved to resolve—

"That in the opinion of this House no further improvements ought to be sanctioned under the Act until the principle on which compensation is awarded for property taken shall have been amended."—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he was glad that the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown) had brought forward this subject, which had caused a good deal of misapprehension, and, in some cases, even an amount of panic. It often happened that when some large and beneficent scheme of improvement was in progress all went very well until the bill was presented, when the cold fit came on, and many people stood aghast. In this instance, however, he thought he could show their Lordships that there was really not so much ground for alarm as the noble Earl's remarks might lead them to suppose. The noble Earl had said that the burden of the Artizans' Dwellings Act ought to be thrown on other shoulders; but he had failed to indicate whose those other shoulders should be. The only hint he had given them on that point was that the owners of the property proposed to be taken should be compelled to undergo a considerable sacrifice in order that the Act might be carried out. When the Artizans' Dwellings Act was passed in 1875, nobody questioned its wisdom or denied its justification; and it was then pointed out that, in the nature of things, a considerable time must elapse before its full benefit could be realized. The scope or object of the measure was not to provide dwellings for artizans, but to provide sites for such dwellings; and, in connection with that it was sought to clear certain overcrowded areas, which were fever-dens and plague-spots in the midst of a dense population. That object was, in some measure, in process of being attained. The noble Earl based his Resolution on the cost of carrying the Act into effect. It was a famous saying of Napoleon that they could not make omelettes without breaking eggs. It was equally impossible, in a city containing some 4,000,000 of inhabitants, to get rid of those centres of disease and infection without incurring considerable expense. He did not think that the noble Earl had made out a case of mismanagement against the Metropolitan authorities. A great many Metropolitan improvements had been carried out during the last half century; but, unfortunately, those very improvements had in a great degree occasioned the evils of overcrowding which the Act of 1875 was intended to remedy, because they had caused a great displacement of the working classes without providing them with other and more suitable dwellings. It would be most undesirable to sweep away from the Statute Book that provision of the Act of 1875 which said that the improvement schemes of local authorities should be accompanied by conditions in favour of the working classes who might be displaced. The Act of 1875, no doubt, followed very much the lines of the Improvements Acts of Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Liverpool; but those cities, being neither so large nor so populous as London, found it comparatively easy to accommodate the working classes in the suburbs and elsewhere when their old houses were demolished. In London, on the contrary, this was in many cases quite impossible, and it was necessary to provide dwellings for the working men in the neighbourhood of their work. The noble Earl had pointed to the compensation clauses as another cause of expense. Now, one reason why areas had not been cleared long before arose from the great complexity of the interests involved. The noble Earl appeared to imagine that in every case there was some individual owner who could be promptly and easily dealt with. This, however, was a misapprehension. There were often three classes of persons to be considered—namely, freeholders, leaseholders, and occupiers. Then, again, because a house was situated in an unhealthy district, it did not necessarily follow that it was itself a nuisance, or in an unsanitary condition—many unsanitary buildings existed side by side with others which were unobjectionable—but they had to deal with the area as a whole, including this latter class of buildings. In these circumstances, it would be manifestly unjust to deprive the owner of a habitable house of proper compensation when his property was taken from him. The noble Earl would, therefore, see that the interests might be very complicated, and that it might be impossible to settle the question of compensation by any simple process. The Nuisances Removal Act was a very useful measure; but the expense it would entail was such as to prevent them from proceeding under its provisions. It was very desirable, in dealing with these sites, to have a uniform system of valuation; and the Act of 1875, so far from neglecting the question of compensation, took a very stringent step regarding it. It contained a very special provision, borrowed from the Irish Lands Clauses Act, which provided that owners of property should not receive compensation for the enhanced value, but only the fair market value of the land as it stood. What panacea did the noble Earl propose, and on whose shoulders did he wish to throw the burden? In drawing a picture of the expense incurred, he had omitted to speak of the number of persons who would be benefited. He found, for example, that on the six sites to which the noble Earl had referred the population displaced amounted to over 11,000, and provision had been made upon them for as many as 11,500. It was, he thought, some satisfaction that the outlay would be attended with substantial benefit to so large a number of persons. He denied that the loss would be so great as the noble Earl had represented. Experience had shown that even in Glasgow and Edinburgh, where a building had been removed and replaced by another, a substantial pecuniary benefit had been derived. For one thing, the rateable value would be increased, and the indirect benefits would also be considerable, because it was an ascertained fact that the improvements were always attended by a diminution of disease and pauperism. The case was, therefore, not so bad as the noble Earl would make it out to be. Great attention had been paid to the accumulation and study of statistics; but of what use were they if not as a basis of legislation? They were too apt, in dealing with statistics, to forget that every unit represented human life and human suffering. If it could be shown that disease could be controlled and diminished, and human life prolonged, by such improvements as the Artizans' Dwellings Act introduced, the House would be slow to accept the indictment that had been made against it by the noble Earl. It would be a great injustice to go beyond the provisions of that Act; the owners were not a class to be treated in a rough-and-ready manner, and there was a great complication of interests to be regarded. When the history of the present Reign came to be written, there was no page which would shine more brightly than that which recorded the efforts made for the improvement of the health and morals of their fellow-subjects.

EARL GRANVILLE said, their Lordships were all ready to acknowledge that the object of the Artizans' Dwellings Act was a most desirable one—the question was, how had it been carried out by the present Act? With regard to the statement made by his noble Friend (the Earl of Camperdown), he thought it was one which had not been answered by the remarks of the noble Earl who had just sat down. The noble Earl said that his noble Friend did not indicate on whose shoulders the expense was to fall. Now, it was quite clear, from his noble Friend's observations, that he did not wish for any act of spoliation against the owners, and that what he sought was that they should be dealt with justly and reasonably. Great dissatisfaction had been justly felt at the excessive sums that had been given as compensation for dwellings which were absolute nuisances. The noble

Earl seemed to think that the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown) brought a charge against the arbitrator, Sir Henry Hunt. But he did not do so. Sir Henry Hunt was, and is, well known by many of their Lordships as a gentleman whom all would be glad to choose as an arbitrator, not only from his knowledge and abilities, but also from his high character. But he had to deal with the facts as they were created for him by the statute; and it was, besides, only right when they were purchasing eggs to make omelettes they should take care they were good ones. The only explanation offered by the noble Earl opposite, with reference to the Nuisances' Removal Act, was that it could not be put into force on account of its great expense and complexity. But no one would, surely, believe that that expense would amount to the enormous cost entailed by the application of the Artizans' Dwellings Act, as they had now discovered. Nothing could be more fatal than to allow so large an expenditure as that which was being incurred in carrying out the Artizans' Dwellings Act to be borne by the ratepayers of the Metropolis. Notwithstanding the pressure put upon the Government at the time, they persisted in departing from the principle adopted in the Glasgow and Liverpool Acts. That, he held, was a great mistake. The Government would, he feared, be straitened in their humane efforts in promoting the objects of the Artizans' Dwellings Act if they remained perfectly satisfied with the status quo, and consented to an enormous fine to be inflicted upon the ratepayers of the Metropolis.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, I am sorry to hear the noble Earl (Earl Granville) charge the Government with being contented with the status quo, after the announcement made this evening by my noble Friend that Notice had been given in the other House of the intention of the Government to amend the Act which we are now discussing. That, I think, shows that, on our part, there is a wish to improve that Act. No doubt, when an undertaking of this kind is attempted, it is very difficult, from the largeness and novelty of the subject, to bring forth at once an altogether perfect measure. The noble Earl who has just addressed us has not touched any of the points in my noble Friend's (Earl Beauchamp's) speech, and, indeed, I think they were not very easy to answer. In the first place, with regard to the Nuisances Removal Act, the reason why the Artizans' Dwellings Act was brought in was because the machinery provided by the Nuisances Removal Act was found insufficient to effect those changes which were absolutely necessary. Before it became law, it was possible to deal with isolated houses here and there; but they could not deal with areas; and unless they dealt with areas they could not secure a change in the sanitary condition of a great city like London, although public opinion, expressed in a most undisguised and undoubted manner, demanded such a change. With regard to compensation, the charge made by the noble Earl who introduced this debate was met by my noble Friend (Earl Beauchamp) in a complete manner; but the noble Earl who has just sat down avoided that answer. My noble Friend showed—as was impressed upon the House by the noble Earl who introduced this discussion—that compensation was not merely given to the owners of the miserable haunts of fever and disease, which were swept away under the provisions of this Act, but that it was also demanded, and it was necessary to afford it, in respect of those tenements which were really not themselves liable to that imputation. I hope, although Parliament will always be ready to improve the working of the Act, as experience guides and enlightens it, there will be no attempt to tamper with the principles on which that Act is founded, and with the admirable provisions which it contains. I do not believe there was any measure ever brought forward more desired by the country, and more approved by it, or which more completely effected the object it had in view—namely, the improvement of the sanitary condition and health of the people of this country.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN observed, in reply, that it seemed only too evident that compensation was sometimes given for houses unfit for habitation. The owners of such houses ought either not to let them, or else to put them in a proper state of repair. The noble Earl, who had stated that the Nuisances Removal Act could not be worked on account of the expense, was apparently, not aware of the procedurunder that Act. It was simple enough. The local authority complained to a stipendary magistrate, and the magistrate could prohibit the use and occupation of the house till the necessary repairs were done. He would point out, in conclusion, that the ratepayers of Glasgow and Edinburgh, fortunately for themselves, lived under a very different government from the government of London.

On Question? Resolved in the Negative.

THE INCOME TAX — AGRICULTURAL DEPRESSION.—QUESTIONS.

THE EARL OF STRADBROKE asked the Lord President of the Council, What amount of Income Tax is to be paid by landlords whose rents have been reduced since last year owing to the existing severe depression of agriculture. Also, what tenants are to pay, who can prove that they have made no profit on their occupation during the last year?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, in reply to the first Question, that the Income Tax assessed under Schedule A was paid by the landlord through his tenant, who afterwards deducted it from the rent. The amount on which the tax was levied was either based on the actual rent or the annual value, as the District Commissioners might think fit to assess it. If the landlord remitted a portion of the rent, that was a private arrangement between himself and his tenant which took the form of a mere casual reduction for the year. It might, therefore, be quite in the power of the landlord to say to the tenant that he would remit a certain proportion of the rent minus the Income Tax, and then the tenant would pay the tax as before. If, however, as the noble Earl seemed to put the point, the reduction of rent was to be permanent, then, of course, it would be open to the tenant to apply to the Commissioners and to state that the rent upon which the assessment had been made was no longer the rent of his farm. As to the second Question—which came under the head of Schedule B—all that would be necessary was, that the tenant should go to the Commissioners and prove to them that he had made no profit out of his business, and that, therefore, he ought not to be taxed an an income which he had never received. The two cases were, in fact, quite distinct. The arrangement between the landlord and his tenant was one between themselves and not between them and the Government; while, in the second case, all that the tenant had to do was to show the Commissioners that he had made no profit out of his farm.

THE INCOME TAX—EDUCATION RATES. QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked, Whether farmers or others paying an education rate exceeding 3*d.* in the pound are not entitled to deduct from their income the amount paid for education rates in paying Income Tax?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON, in reply, said, that the amount paid to the School Boards for the purposes of education did not constitute an allowable deduction from the Income Tax.

QUESTIONS.

INDIA—THE MAHARAJAH DHULREP SINGH—QUESTIONS.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the fact that an application has been made to the Secretary of State for India in Council, by Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, for an increase in the allowance annually made to him out of the revenues of India; and, if such application has been made, what action has been taken in reference to it by the Secretary of State in Council?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes, Sir; it is true that an application to this effect has been made. It is still under the consideration of the Secretary of State in Council, and the opinion of the Government of India has been invited on the subject.

MR. FAWCETT asked, Whether, before the Government came to any decision on the point, Papers on the subject would be produced, in order to enable the House to express an opinion in reference to the application?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Will the hon. Member give Notice of the Question?

MR. FAWCETT said, he would repeat the Question on Monday.

HALL MARKING (GOLD AND SILVER). QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY (for Sir CHARLES RUSSELL) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What action the Government will take upon the recommendation of the Select Committee on "Hall-Marking (Gold and Silver);" and, in the event of the duties being lowered or abolished, when the change in the law will come into operation; and, whether rebate will be allowed on the stocks of new plate held by the trade?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, in answer to my hon. Friend, I can only say that, at present, the Government have no intention of proposing any reduction in, or the abolition of, the duties on gold and silver.

GREENWICH AND MERCHANT SEAMEN HOSPITAL—QUESTION.

MR. FRY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the fact that a large number of merchant seamen who formerly contributed to the maintenance of Greenwich Hospital, and who are now incapacitated by age and infirmity from following their calling, derive no benefit from their contributions to the funds of the hospital; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will take any step to remedy the grievance in question?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, no communication has been addressed to me on the subject of the hon. Member's Question since I have held my present Office, and I have no facts before me to enable me to say whether the supposition upon which it is based is a correct one; but, as far as I have been able to ascertain in the Office, I am inclined to doubt it. If the hon. Member would be so good as to send me a statement on the subject, I should be happy to inquire into it carefully, and to give him the fullest information I can in the matter; and if he should think it desirable I will lay upon the Table of Parliament the Correspondence between us.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ESQUIMALT DOCK.—QUESTION.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Provincial Government of British Columbia applied to the Imperial Government through Admiral de Horsey, in 1877, for a grant of £100,000 in aid of the dock at Esquimalt in lieu of £50,000 already promised; whether that Admiral and his predecessors have repeatedly urged on the attention of the Admiralty the necessity of providing dock accommodation for Her Majesty's ships on the station; what is the condition of the Esquimalt dock at present; and, whether there is any correspondence on the subject, either at the Admiralty or Colonial Office, which can, without prejudice to the public service, be laid upon the Table?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, there has been some Correspondence between the Provincial Government of British Columbia, the Dominion Government, and the Home Government with respect to assistance suggested to be given to a proposed dock at Esquimalt; but it would not be to the public interest that the Correspondence should be produced. The necessity for dock accommodation on the Pacific Station has been urged by the Admirals commanding; but it is doubtful whether Esquimalt would be the best position for the work the Squadron has to perform. I am not aware how much progress has been made with the dock at Esquimalt.

COLONIAL NAVAL DEFENCE ACT, 1865—ROYAL COLONIAL NAVAL RESERVE MEN.—QUESTION.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he will either state or grant a Return of the number of Royal Colonial Naval Reserve men and Royal Colonial Naval Volunteers enrolled under the provisions of "The Colonial Naval Defence Act, 1865," in the Dominion of Canada, and in the Colonies of New South Wales, South Australia, Tasmania, Queensland, and New Zealand?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I believe that none of the Colonies mentioned in the Question have availed themselves of the provisions of the Colonial Naval Defence Act; but in the Colony of New South Wales there is a force of 282 Naval Volunteers, and in New Zealand of 431, raised under local Acts. These numbers must, of course, be considered as the numbers of a force capable of expansion if required; and I do not doubt that they will be increased in accordance with the efforts being made by these Colonies to provide for their defence.

MERCHANT SEAMEN—LEGISLATION.
QUESTION.

MR. BURT asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he can state when he will introduce the promised Bill relating to Seamen?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, I have been most anxious to introduce the Bill respecting Merchant Seamen, which I mentioned at the beginning of the Session I had prepared. Up to the present date the prolonged discussions which have occurred in this House have made it impossible for me to ask the House to deal with this and other matters of importance, such as railway questions, in connection with the Board of Trade; and now I am sure the hon. Gentleman will agree with me that to bring in a

Bill of importance at this period of the Session could lead to no good or useful result.

ARMY—SUPPLY OF WATER TO LAND-GUARD FORT.—QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Landguard Fort has not been rebuilt without providing a supply of fresh water; whether the water in the new artesian well is not salt; and, whether it is intended to continue expenditure at Landguard Fort when, from want of fresh water, it cannot be garrisoned?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that when the re-building of Landguard Fort was commenced there was a good supply of fresh water; but it had since been impaired by the operations of the owner of a neighbouring property. Samples from well-boring had proved brackish; but he hoped a better supply would soon be obtained. The war authorities were considering what should be done in the matter. The fort was now completed, and would be garrisoned.

POOR LAW—PAUPER NURSES.
QUESTION.

MR. RATHBONE asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to an inquest held by Dr. Hardwicke, on the 27th of June, at Clerkenwell, on the body of a child, found dead in Farringdon Road Workhouse, who had been placed under the care of a deaf pauper nurse; and, if he can take steps to prevent paupers being placed in situations of trust and responsibility where want of skill or care must frequently result in permanent injury or death?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, my attention has been drawn to this case, and application was made by my directions to the Coroner several days ago for the depositions, which I only received this morning. I have also caused one of the Inspectors of the Metropolis to make inquiry into the matter. It is true that this child was placed, with some others, in a ward which was left at night in charge of a pauper nurse who is rather deaf, although during the day the ward is in charge of a paid and responsible nurse. It is obvious that this was an improper proceeding, and steps will be taken to prevent its recurrence. Constant efforts are being made by me to insure that all offices of trust and responsibility in workhouses shall be filled up by paid officers and assistants, and in the new infirmaries I have succeeded in abolishing pauper help almost entirely.

ARMY (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)— HEAVY RIFLED ORDNANCE —
THOMAS v. THE QUEEN.
QUESTIONS.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any person other than Mr. Lynall Thomas claims to be the originator of the system of heavy rifled ordnance of which the 7-inch 7-ton gun was stated in the evidence given by the Crown, in the case of Thomas against the Queen, to be the standard gun in Her Majesty's Service; and, if so, whether he will be good enough to give the name of that person?

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any person other than Mr. Lynall Thomas claims to be the originator of the system of heavy rifled ordnance, of which the 7-inch 7-ton gun was stated, in the evidence given by the Crown in the case of Thomas against the Queen, to be the standard gun in Her Majesty's service; and, if so, whether he will be good enough to give the name of such claimant?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Sir, the system of heavy rifled ordnance in use in the Service, and alluded to in the Questions, was originated in the Government factories quite independently of any gun designed by Mr. Lynall Thomas, and this view is borne out by the evidence for the Crown in the case referred to.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked, Whether it was not the fact that the jury in the recent case of "Thomas v. the Queen," gave a unanimous verdict in favour of Mr. Lynall Thomas's claims?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Perhaps the hon. and gallant Member will repeat that Question on another day?

IRELAND—ORANGE CELEBRATION DINNER IN GOREY.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CLERY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If Mr. John C. Pouden, of Ballywalter, co. Wexford, is a Justice of the Peace for that county, and if he presided recently at a Twelfth of July Celebration dinner in the Orange Hall, Gorey; whether the parties over whom he presided on that occasion subsequently displayed firearms through the town, and whether breaches of the peace occurred in consequence; and, whether his conduct in so acting is approved by the Government?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I have not yet been able to receive information on this subject. As soon as I saw the Notice of the hon. Gentleman's Question I sent over to inquire; but there has not been as yet any time to receive a reply. However, I cannot say that this gentleman, assuming that the facts are as stated, was guilty of any act calling for censure, because there is no statement that he accompanied any of the parties.

ARMY OFFICERS AS WAR CORRESPONDENTS.—QUESTIONS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, since it appears from General Roberts' letter of April 18th, and otherwise, that officers of the Army in Afghanistan have been acting as special correspondents of the "Times," "Daily Telegraph," "Standard," and other papers, and that this is contrary to the Regulations for the government of the Army (as stated by the Secretary of State for War), he can say if the Government of India have relaxed those Regulations in respect of officers serving under them; if so, whether all officers in the Field are allowed to act as special correspondents, and to receive pay for doing so, or only particular officers specially permitted so to act; whether officers so acting are free to write as they choose on their own responsibilities, or their communications are subject to the control and approval of the commanding officer; and, in case he cannot completely answer these Questions, whether he will inquire from India?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, the "Bengal Army Regulations" follow the "Queen's Regulations" in forbidding the publication of military information, but only where the publication of such information would be prejudicial to the interests of the Public Service. Paragraph 517 runs—

"Commanding officers are to use their utmost vigilance to prevent the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men publishing information relative to the numbers, movements, or operations of troops, or any military details that may be prejudicial to the interests of the public service; and any officer or soldier will be held personally responsible for reports of this kind which he may make without special permission, or for placing the information beyond his control so that it finds its way into unauthorized hands."

Within the scope of the Regulation thus limited, and under the responsibility thus imposed on him, doubtless an officer may communicate information. Whether for such literary work they receive pay or not is a matter with which the Secretary of State for India has no concern, and whether the officer commanding the troops considers it needful to exercise control over the communications which leave his camp, must depend on the nature of the duty on which the troops are employed, and the peculiar circumstances in each case, and must be left to his discretion. To lay down any general rule in such cases, without regard to the circumstances, would be to fetter the discretion of commanding officers in a way which would be prejudicial to the Public Service.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked, Whether the "Bengal Regulations" were applicable to the Regular regiments serving in India?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I believe so, Sir.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL—MONUMENT IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

QUESTIONS.

MR. PRICE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that a Circular, bearing the address "Horse Guards, Pall Mall," has been forwarded to every regiment of the regular Army and Militia, inviting subscriptions from the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of each regiment for the purpose of erecting a memorial to the late Prince Louis Napoleon; and, whether there is any precedent for issuing such a Circular, purporting to have emanated from a meeting of officers of the British Army, "held under the auspices of the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief," bearing the address "Horse Guards, Pall Mall," and which Circular invites subscriptions for a purpose about which it is not impossible there may be differences of opinion?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, it is the case that a circular was issued inviting subscriptions; but it was distinctly understood that such subscriptions were to be of a private character. I regret to say that the circular was drawn up inadvertently by an officer, who overlooked the fact that it was dated from the Horse Guards. I believe, however, it is well understood throughout the Service that the subscriptions are entirely private and entirely voluntary. If I find that any misapprehension exists on this point, I shall cause another circular to be issued which will remove it. In regard to precedent, I have already stated that the matter arose through an oversight; and I do not think, therefore, that any former precedent will apply.

MR. E. JENKINS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Crown or the Government has, by custom or law, any power or control over the granting of sites for monuments in Westminster Abbey; and, whether, in view of the relations of the late Prince Imperial to the Government of France, with which Her Majesty is in friendly alliance, they will take steps to prevent the granting of a site for the erection of a monument to the Prince Imperial in Westminster Abbey?

MR. CALLAN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether there is any precedent for Government interfering in, or any authority vested in them, to exercise any power or control over the granting of sites for monuments in Westminster Abbey; and, whether, in view of the circumstances surrounding the melancholy fate of the late Prince Imperial, Her Majesty's Government will not deem it undesirable to aid in any way in interposing obstacles in the way of the erection of a monument in Westminster Abbey to one who met his death while gallantly serving as a volunteer with the British Forces operating in South Africa?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the right and responsibility of granting sites for monuments in Westminster Abbey rest entirely with the Dean of Westminster. The Government have seen the announcement of what is intended in the case referred to; but they have not thought fit to give any advice on the matter, thinking that no political significance attaches to the matter.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL—THE COURT MARTIAL ON LIEUTENANT CAREY.—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any foundation for the statements which have appeared in French and other newspapers, to the effect that Colonel Harrison, Assistant Quartermaster General, was a member of the court martial on Lieutenant Carey, and is the same Colonel Harrison who directly sanctioned and personally superintended the reconnoitring party placed, as stated by Lord Chelmsford in his telegram, read in the House of Commons by the Secretary of State for War on Friday morning the 20th June, under the command of the late lamented Prince Louis Napoleon, and on which occasion he lost his life?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, it is not the case that Colonel Harrison was a member of the court martial on Lieutenant Carey. The foundation for the statement probably arose from the fact that, as I am informed, Colonel Harness, R.A., was a member of it, and the error made in confusing the two names was probably a misprint.

RAILWAY BRAKES.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the President of the Board of Trade, If, in consenting to lay upon the Table of the House on the 21st inst. a copy of a report dated the 24th April 1879, made by F. E. Harrison, Engineer to the North Eastern Railway Company, on the use of the Westinghouse Brake, it is to be inferred that the Board of Trade gives a preference to that brake; and, whether he will cause to be stated, as a preface to the papers, that the report was not drawn up at the instance of the Board of Trade, nor are its conclusions adopted by the Board of Trade?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, I should have thought it would have been understood, from what I have said in the House formerly on the subject, that I give no opinion whatever on behalf of the Board of Trade respecting the merits of a particular brake; nor, in the present state of the case, could I consent that any preference should be shown by the Board to any particular invention. But as the brake controversy excites great interest in Parliament, I think it right to lay upon the Table of this House any Papers of interest which are sent to the Board of Trade concerning the various brakes which hon. Members may wish to have made public in this way. The form of the Return, which I had not observed, might possibly mislead the public as to the nature of the Report; and I will certainly take care that in the Report, as it is presented to the House, no doubt whatever shall exist as to its character.

COMMISSION ON AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS—NAMES OF COMMISSIONERS.

QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Ministers to inform this House, before the close of the Session, of the names of the persons whom Her Majesty will appoint as Commissioners, in accordance with the Address voted by this House on the 5th of this month, recommending that inquiry be made as to the depressed condition of the agricultural interest, and into the causes to which this depression is attributable; whether the causes are of a temporary or of a permanent character, and how far they have been created by, and can be remedied by, legislation?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the names of the Commissioners on the Depressed Condition of Agriculture have not yet been settled; but the Government will endeavour to communicate them to the House before the close of the Session.

NAVIGATION OF THE THAMES—REPORT OF COMMISSIONERS.

QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, What measures he intends adopting for the purpose of giving effect to the alterations recommended by the Departmental Committee of the Board of Trade relative to the better navigation of the River Thames, as shown to be necessary in the collision which took place between the "Byw Castle" and "Princess Alice?"

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, the hon. Member is, I think, aware that the Report of the Committee upon the Navigation of the River Thames has only been presented to me within the last few weeks. He is also aware of the importance and value of the Report and of the evidence, and of the bulky character of the documents in question. They will require, and will receive, the most careful consideration of the Government, in concert with the River authorities. Legislation, I need hardly say, is at present out of the question; but it is clear, from the proceedings of the Committee, that the River authorities are fully aware of the responsibility which rests upon them in this matter.

GREENWICH AND THE MERCANTILE MARINE HOSPITAL.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it be correct that the compulsory contributions of the seamen of the mercantile marine towards the Greenwich Hospital pension fund amounted at the close of the year 1834 to about £2,000,000; if he will be good enough to state how much of the said amount has been paid back in pensions or grants to the contributories, and also to their widows and children; and, if he is aware that seamen now in receipt of the Greenwich sixpence pension are debarred from receiving the pension legally due from the muster roll fund; and, if so, if he will adopt such measures as he may deem necessary, in conjunction with the President of the Board of Trade, in order that aged seamen so entitled may be paid both pensions?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the amount derived from the 6*d.* a-month paid by merchant seamen in aid of the income of Greenwich Hospital, under the Registered Seamen's Act of 1695, averaged £23,000 a-year in 1834, when the Act was repealed, and £20,000 a-year was granted to Greenwich Hospital in lieu out of the Consolidated Fund. It is not possible to state the aggregate amount received from 1695 to 1834. There was no Greenwich Hospital pension fund, and I think it right to add that the sixpences contributed by the merchant seamen in no way gave any right to pension or benefits of Greenwich Hospital. The contribution was exacted because of the protection to commerce afforded by the Navy, and no merchant seaman was entitled to admission to the Hospital unless "wounded in action with an enemy or pirate." The hon. Gentleman, no doubt, has seen a letter from Lord Auckland to Sir James Graham on this subject, which was presented to Parliament in 1867 (Parliamentary Return, No. 350 of Session 1867), in which it is stated that of the 2,710 men then (1834) in the hospital, upwards of 1,000 had served in the merchant service for an average time of 13 years, and there were 117 children in the school whose fathers had never served in the Navy. By the Greenwich Hospital Act of 1872, 35 & 36 Vict., c. 67, pensions or annuities are granted out of Greenwich Hospital Funds to men who contributed 6*d.* a-month. Under the regulations contained in Order in Council of the 6th of July, 1870, £16,944 has been paid in pensions, and £123,400 in purchase of annuities. The pensions are limited to £3 8*s.* per annum. No pensions or allowances are authorized to be paid to widows or children of the contributories. Sons of merchant seamen are eligible for admission to Greenwich Hospital School. By the "muster roll fund," the hon. Member means the Merchant Seamen's Fund, in aid of which an annual Vote is taken in the Civil Service Estimates, and is accounted for by the Board of Trade. If seamen are in receipt of a pension of £3 8*s.* from the Merchant Seamen's Fund, they are not entitled to any additional pension from the Funds of Greenwich Hospital (by Clause 4 of Order in Council of July 6, 1870, and Section 2 of Greenwich Hospital Act, 1872). If the hon. Member's proposal be entertained—namely, that both pensions be paid, an Act of Parliament and Order in Council would be necessary and an additional charge would fall upon Greenwich Hospital Funds.

PARLIAMENT — ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. HEYGATE asked, What the Government intended to do with the Banking and Joint Stock Companies Bill?

MR. MUNDELLA asked whether the Government would not make the Bill apply to the whole Kingdom?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was aware it was desired by many persons that a measure for enabling unlimited banks to limit their responsibility should be passed this Session. He should be prepared to proceed with the measure which the Government had introduced to make that alteration; but he proposed to strike out Clause 8, which referred to a different matter which, though not an important one, was not connected with the subject. He proposed to retain in the Bill those parts of which it made it applicable to the whole of the United Kingdom.

Mr. ANDERSON said, that in consequence of this statement he would not further oppose the Bill; and he thought he could say the same for a number, though not for all, the Scotch Members. He desired, however, to know after what hour it would not be proceeded with?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It cannot be taken after half-past 12.

In reply to Mr. W. E. FORSTER and Mr. BERESFORD HOPE,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was proposed to take as first Order to-morrow the Consolidated Fund Bill, which would be followed by the two Indian Loan Bills. On Monday, the Government proposed to take the Irish Estimates, with which they hoped to make some progress. The disposition of the rest of the Orders would depend to some extent on the progress made on Monday. His right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty was anxious to bring on the remainder of the Navy Estimates, and he should be glad if they were able to fix Thursday for that purpose.

In reply to Sir ALEXANDER GORDON,

Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that as the Poor Law (Scotland, No. 2) Bill was not opposed, the Lord Advocate proposed to proceed with it to-night, if it came on at anything like a reasonable hour.

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE RUSSIANS IN EASTERN ROUMELIA.—QUESTION.

Mr. YORKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any further intelligence as to the Mussulmans in Eastern Roumelia sentenced by General Ptolypine to exile in Siberia; and, if not, whether Her Majesty's Government will make inquiries on the subject?

Mr. BOURKE: Sir, as I stated before, these prisoners were tried before General Ptolypine, and sentenced to be exiled to Siberia. The charge against them was of having committed acts of brigandage. The matter was referred to Aleko Pasha, and referred by him to the Porte. Therefore, at the present moment, I do not think Her Majesty's Government would be called upon to interfere in the matter.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND) (No. 2) BILL [Lords].—[BILL 260.]

(Mr. James Lowther.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. J. LOWTHER: Sir, in rising to move the second reading of this Bill, I should hardly be justified in referring to the question of University Education in Ireland at any length from an historical point of view. One reason why I should not feel disposed to adopt that course would be that this matter has been so constantly and recently a topic of consideration in the public mind that enough is known about it by all hon. Gentlemen without my going into it. There is another reason why, upon the occasion of the second reading of the Bill, the retrospect to which I have referred would not be a very inspiring one. The study of the list of casualties in previous engagements is hardly an encouraging theme for anyone who is girding on his armour for the fight; and, therefore, I would rather leave the historical retrospect of Irish University Education to other hands. I have myself thought that the moral we should draw from what has taken place on this subject is this—that if ever this question is to be finally disposed of and satisfactorily settled it must be by the abandonment of all Party controversies, and by a resolute determination to deal with the subject honestly and apart from any attempt to snatch a Party triumph. The Bill which is now before the House whatever may be thought of its merits or demerits, is, at any rate, an honest and sincere attempt to deal with this difficult subject in a sense to remove it entirely from the realms of Party strife. It is not necessary for me to point out the necessity of some measure dealing with this subject. That necessity has been admitted on all hands. I am quite aware that Parliament, many years ago, endeavoured to lay down a system of University Education in Ireland which, it was hoped, would finally settle the question. I am aware that hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House will admit that that attempt has been in some measure a decided success. The Queen's Colleges have, from an educational point of view, done very good work. They have placed the advantages of University Education within the easy reach of the Irish people. The benefits those institutions have conferred have not been confined to one religious persuasion. All the various creeds of Ireland have freely partaken of its benefits. ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen may say "No, no!" but I think the study of statistics, which are within the reach of any hon. Gentleman, will show that the Queen's Colleges and University have been attended by numbers of students of all the religious creeds of Ireland. It is true that in the case of the Roman Catholic body there has not been the cordial appreciation of the institutions which was hoped by those who founded them, and that being so, the necessity is found to exist of endeavouring in some way to make good the defect which experience has proved to exist. That, Sir, is the reason why the Bill is introduced. I have said that this Bill is not introduced with the object of promoting the interest of any Party; in fact, University Education is a subject which is approached, I think, by the various political Parties without any settled purpose in the mind of any Party, and I think no Party is united upon it. The staunchest Tory, or the most enlightened, if I may say so without offence — the most philosophical Radical, may approach this subject from different points of view, and, perhaps, in some cases arrive at the same conclusion. This is not a case for destroying bridges and burning boats, and expressing any great and heroic determination. It is rather an opportunity for inviting the House of Commons calmly to consider this question in a judicial spirit, and to endeavour to arrive at a settlement without consideration of the Party by whom it may be introduced. The proposals of the Bill are to establish a new University, to which shall be given the power to provide examiners and to grant degrees. We do not propose that there shall be a third University, for the proposal before the House is that the Queen's University shall in a manner provided for in the Bill cease to exist, and that the graduates of that University shall form members of the Convocation of the new University. I think there are many reasons why a third University in Ireland would be objectionable. Those who are now graduates of the Queen's University can be transferred to the new University without interfering with the advantages of the degrees they have already obtained. The Convocation of the new University would occupy a position as high in public estimation as the body which exist at present. The Bill does not propose any arrangement of a financial character. I notice on the Paper an Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) which directly challenges the opinion of the House on the subject of Collegiate Education. The advantages of Collegiate Education do not require to be dwelt upon. I had the privilege of being a member of one of the old Universities, and I confess I have always thought—apart from the social aspect of the question—that the intercourse of one with another in the University is an advantage certainly not second to the education there obtained, and the advantage of the association of students in the Colleges is, I think, very great. But in the case of the more recently founded institutions, it is not the practice to insist on residence in the manner it was in the old Universities; and, in fact, it has always been the object of University reformers to place the privileges of obtaining degrees and taking part in the various examinations and classes incident to a University career within the reach of those to whom residence in College may not be convenient. That has been the principle upon which Parliament has proceeded in its grant to the London University, and is the principle upon which University reform has invariably proceeded; though, at the same time, it seems to me that there is much to be said for facilities being afforded to those who may prefer what I think is a great advantage in training. We propose in this Bill to transfer the grant that is now annually made to the existing Queen's University to the new University. It is a matter of some £5,000 a-year. The Queen's Colleges would retain the existing grants, as part of the Parliamentary Votes, and, of course, the existing endowments. But it is said that in the Bill for the promotion of Intermediate Education passed last year the principle was adopted of payment of what are called result fees to institutions which educated successful pupils, and that that principle might be made available in the case of University Education. Now, I think it will be manifest to the House that in the case of students of an age below that of a man the payment of prizes in any great proportion to them would be undesirable; but in the case of students of more advanced years the objection vanishes, and I think the House will agree with me that the form the prize should assume to the successful student would be that of payment to himself. With regard to the financial proposals—the absence of which from the Bill I have just remarked upon—I must confess that the form in which it is proposed in a Bill recently before the House to deal with the financial problem is one that is open to many objections. The sources especially from which the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) sought to obtain the desired finance was one which, on the whole, it appeared undesirable should be trenched upon for the object of his Bill; and, therefore, not being prepared to propose any demand on the Irish Church Surplus, or the appropriation of any capital sum whatever, for the purposes of promoting University Education, no reference is made in the Bill to finance with the exception of the transfer of the University Vote to the new University. At the same time, I think that there is good reason in what has been urged with regard to the absence of any encouragements to conducting education in places other than Queen's Colleges. I think as long as Parliament continues annually to appropriate a considerable sum for the promotion of education within the Queen's Colleges, those who are invited to come within the University pale, but not to place themselves within the walls of the Queen's Colleges, must naturally complain that they are placed at a disadvantage; but in attempting to remove that disadvantage the Government must adhere to their determination that any endowment whatever to any denominational institution, from whatever source it comes, is one to which we will not assent. The endowment of any strictly denominational institution is one which I think Parliament will not be likely to sanction, and it is one which Her Majesty's Government would be very unlikely to propose. The appropriation, therefore, of any sum of money, whether derived from the taxation of the country or from any other source, to the endowment of any Collegiate institution of any sort or kind was a thing which we could not propose. At the same time, it seems to me that the absence of any financial proposals in the Bill need not by any means preclude us from dealing in some other manner with the difficulties involved in finance. I think I am right in assuming that the annual Votes of Parliament are the proper places in which provision can be made for the grants to which I have referred. I certainly shall have no objection, subsequently, to the introduction into the Bill of words which will enable such a proposal to be embodied hereafter. I shall, in fact, be prepared to submit in Committee words which shall throw on the Senate of the University to be created the duty of framing and submitting a scheme for the promotion of education in the following way:—I should propose that provision should be made at the instance of the Senate by Parliament by annual Votes for the establishment of Exhibitions, prizes, Scholarships, and Fellowships. In adopting that course, the Government is strictly complying with the terms and conditions which they have laid down in regard to the subject in “another place,” and also upon a recent occasion when discussion took place in this House. On the second reading of the Bill of the hon. Member for Roscommon, it was stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that we entertained special objections to that portion of his scheme which would involve the payment to a new University, and to the allocation of a portion of the Surplus Funds of the Irish Church. On that point we do not recede. And in the scheme now before the House we have endeavoured to avoid that. With regard to the name, we do not propose to select any name for the new institution. The House will see that is a matter better dealt with by other hands than those of Parliament. I have heard it suggested that there would be some difficulty; but I do not share those fears. It is quite possible that at the first mention of the idea the members of the Queen's University might not wish to lose the name they had hitherto borne, and that various opinions might be entertained as to the best one to substitute for it. It is an old saying, "What's in a name?" but I cannot think that such a detail will prove an insuperable barrier to the settlement of a great question. The fact that a new University is to be established, and that plans of a financial character are to be the subject of a subsequent consideration, suggests the propriety of leaving as many details as can be conveniently left for the deliberation of those who may bring their minds to bear on the subject. [A laugh.] Hon. Members may be amused; but I must remind them that this Bill does not propose to found a new University, but proposes to give powers under which a University may be constituted. The question of granting a Charter to a University is a Prerogative of the Crown and is entirely outside the function of Parliament; and I think that if the Government proposed to forestall the action of the Crown in the exercise of its Prerogative, it would be doing an action which would be unconstitutional. Now, Sir, I said that the financial arrangements would, I thought, be made by Parliament for the objects I have named. Of course, there may be other objects which may partake of the nature of detail, such as the erection of suitable buildings, &c.; because a University must have a local habitation as well as a name, and the erection of buildings for the holding of examinations, and probably a library, would be necessary. The funds necessary for such a purpose would come naturally within the scope of a Parliamentary Vote; and if the House goes into Committee, as I hope it will very soon, I shall be prepared to move words which shall enable provisions to be made in that direction. In connection with this subject there has been a good deal of unnecessary mystery thrown around—I do not say the history—but the contemporary history of this subject. It has been said that negotiations have been carried on by Her Majesty's Government with I know not whom in Ireland. It has been hinted that a proposal for the settlement of this question had been submitted by the Irish Executive to persons in Ireland. I took the opportunity, the other day, of saying that these ingenious surmises are absolutely destitute of foundation. I cannot, of course, within the limits of the Orders of this House, refer to what took place "elsewhere;" but I may, without infringing upon the Rules, say that nothing has been said in this or the other House upon this subject which really in any way detracts from the absolute accuracy of my statement. I have heard it stated that observations were made somewhere or other to the effect that propositions had been submitted, and negotiations had taken place, and so on; and it appears this was denied by one of my Colleagues, who said that if any such negotiations or arrangements had been conducted he, undoubtedly, would have been informed of them. Well, that is perfectly true; and the truth is more apparent when I say that the Members of Her Majesty's Government were not only not aware that any negotiations had taken place, but were positively aware that they had not. When members of the Irish Executive find themselves in communication in private circles with members of various religious communions in Ireland, it is, of course, only natural that they should avail themselves of the opportunity to converse upon subjects of public interest. Since I have been officially connected with Ireland, I have had many such conversations, and I hope to have many more. It has been observed—sometimes in not very flattering terms, though, at the same time, with perfect truth—that persons having no direct connection with Ireland are sent there to govern the country, and, of course, a person going there, as I have myself, could not undertake to be aware of all the various questions requiring to be dealt with, and must take opportunities of becoming acquainted with local opinion; and I say, without any attempt at concealment, that I frequently have availed myself of opportunities of learning what the different classes of opinion are; and that, so long as I continue to have the honour of holding the Office of Chief Secretary, I have every intention of adopting a similar course. That is the sum total of all those wonderful negotiations and propositions; and if what I describe has given rise to the rumours, I can only say that many similar opportunities will arise. I shall not longer detain the House by dwelling on this subject. I thank the House for the attention it has given me, and beg to express the hope that the hon. Gentleman who proposes to move an Amendment to the Bill will consider the propositions which I have made, and will not consider this as a fitting opportunity to oppose the principle of the measure. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. J. Lowther.)

MR. SHAW, who had on the Paper the following Amendment to the Bill:—

"That no measure of University Education can be considered satisfactory to the people of Ireland which does not provide increased facilities for Collegiate Education as well as for the attainment of University Degrees," said: Sir, I acknowledge the fairness of the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, who, I think, has delivered it in a somewhat less oracular fashion than usual. With regard to the negotiations to which he has referred, I am not disposed to make too much of them. I think it would be a pity if any outcry on the subject should prevent free intercourse between gentlemen who govern Ireland and the leaders of public opinion in that country. I have only to express the hope that when the right hon. Gentleman returns to that country he will continue to carry on those pleasant negotiations of which mention has been made, and I hope that it will result in making him considerably more of an Irishman than he is at present. I ought, in respect to this Bill, to say that I differ from my hon. Friends around me, who think that this Bill is a sham and has been introduced merely for electioneering purposes. I must say I do not think it is anything of the kind, and I must begin by giving the Government credit for an honest attempt to deal with the subject. You may call it a simple attempt if you like; but, at all events, I think the Government wish to settle it, and the speech of the right hon. Gentleman has confirmed that impression. There were reasons why the Government should prefer not to touch the question until after a General Election, and probably they would not have touched it had it not been that they were almost forced to it by the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon. Now, I concur entirely with the remark that this question should be treated and looked at as much as possible apart from Party considerations. Party treatment is what we complain of in Ireland. We are not come here to war against this country. Our action has an intelligible basis. We do not object to your Conservatism and your Conservative Party being in power. We know well that there is a very strong sympathy between many principles of Conservatism and our principles. What we do object to is that the Conservative Party, and those who are in the Government of Ireland, should be ruled in their treatment of Irish questions by the narrowest and most ignorant section of their Party. We take no objection to the Liberal Party. Historical and other reasons make us remember the period when the Liberal Party were in power with pleasure; but what we object to is that the Liberal Party, in their treatment of Ireland, should allow themselves to be ruled by the narrowest and most bigoted section of the Party. That section of the Party which, having the phrase of Liberalism in their mouth, trample on its spirit. Our action in this case is based upon that intelligible principle enunciated in The Quarterly Review, which I am sure every Member of the House must have read—"Treat us, not by repression, not by force, but by justice;" and that is all we demand. Now, in looking at this Bill, perhaps I may be allowed to refer to the difficulties which stand in the way of the subject. They are very great difficulties indeed. There is no doubt that it is not an easy subject to settle. One great difficulty arises from this—that there is in this country and in this House a constant notion that we should legislate upon some defined and abstract principle. I met a gentleman to-day who is a distinguished ornament of the Party opposite, and he said to me—"Sir, the genius of legislation for the last three-quarters of a century is against your proposal." Well, said I, that would be a very fine sentence, no doubt, on a platform where you are bound to adapt your nonsense to the nonsense of the people you are addressing. But my opinion is very far from that sentiment. We are not a company of scientific legislators, but we are an Assembly of men of business who know the world, and we come here from our constituencies, and we endeavour to adapt our legislation to the wants of our constituencies. It must be, from the very nature of the case, a system of give and take legislation in such a country as ours; and if any one of us construct our legislative machine, and want it to do the work of the world, we will soon find it knocking itself against obstructions. Now, this has been the difficulty to Ireland with this subject. As regards Ireland, the philosophical Radicals who exist somewhere—I do not know what to call them; I do not know whether there are really any philosophical Tories—whenever those subjects connected with Ireland and with religion in Ireland come up, think they have some great principle upon which to legislate. There is nothing more absurd than that. We must look at the difficulties, the requirements, the prejudices of the country for which we are asked to legislate. Well, there is another great difficulty in the way, and that is the dislike that exists in this country, and in Scotland, to the religion of three-fourths of the people of Ireland. There is no doubt of its existence, though it is not expressed. Some of my Friends on this side of the House would not for a moment like to say they were affected by anything but the highest principles of Liberalism in dealing with Ireland; but if we could get at the bottom of their minds we would find that beneath all that profession of Liberalism, there exists the opinion that this is the machinery they are setting up to destroy the religion of the Irish people. There is the notion that mixed education is, for this purpose, the best thing to be adopted. I want to speak to the Protestants in this House quite independent of the Catholics, and to show them that this attempt at repression, this endeavour to drive the people of Ireland out of their religion, is one of the most unjust and absurd that was ever inflicted by one people upon another. It would be more honest to repeal all the beneficial legislation of the past, and to re-enact the Penal Laws, if this atmosphere of suspicion and doubt be maintained in Ireland. There is another feeling, Sir, in the minds of many Members of this House, and that is, that the Irish Members are not the masters of the situation; that they are moved by a body behind who pull the strings, and who give them orders. In fact, I myself saw in a paper the other day that my Resolution had gone over to Dublin to be submitted to the opinion of certain ecclesiastics. I acknowledge that I did consult certain hon. Members about this Resolution. I showed it to about a dozen of them, and every one of the dozen had a different Resolution; and so, in desperation, and to save myself from doing something rash, I came into the House, and threw it on the Table to the Clerk; but as to showing it to any ecclesiastics, with a view to obtaining their opinion on it, I never had such an idea in my mind. I can say for myself that I was returned by a constituency, and had the confidence of every Roman Catholic in the place; and for two years they had a full belief I was opposed to them on this question. I was never asked a question about it, although it was of as much interest then as now. I have the honour of knowing—and not only that honour, but the friendship, of some of the highest dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church, and I have consulted with them on this subject; but, instead of their giving me orders, I was always surprised to find that they wished to ascertain my opinions and advice, and I never anywhere found a more sincere desire than among those gentlemen to settle this question on the foundation of reason and common sense. Now, the Government acknowledge that there is about the granting of degrees an inconvenience. They acknowledge that about the endowment question there is very great injustice. This Bill provides for the inconvenience, but it leaves the injustice where we found it. However, I acknowledge that the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman, to be embodied in Amendments, would go to some extent, but to my mind, a very small extent, to meet the injustice. I would beg the Government to re-consider their decision, and go a little further. If they do, they may really be the means of settling this great and difficult question. They may say that the fund out of which this question may be settled cannot be taken out of the Irish Church Surplus Funds; but I cannot see the reason of this at all. This very week they have laid on the Table of the House a proposal to apply £1,300,000 to the education of the lower classes. Last year they took £1,000,000 for the education of the intermediate classes; but this year they cannot see the reason or sense of taking £1,000,000 or £1,500,000 out of that fund, and laying the foundation of a good and healthy system of University Education. The noble and learned Earl who introduced the Bill in "another place" (Earl Cairns) evidently thought that there was some great difference between the principles of Intermediate Education and University Education. It would not have been probable that he would have made an elaborate joke; besides, he was not born at the right end of the Island for joking; but this looks very like one. There can be no possible difference in principle. We have now come to a crisis at which, I think, this question may be fairly settled. We have on our side reason and moderation, and we are not going in for any great or heroic measures. I believe this is the time for a complete measure; but if you say you will bring in this bit of a Bill this year, and that you complete it next year, then I say that that is absurd and unreasonable. You may not be there next year; we may not be here next year; and if you do introduce another Bill next year, perhaps it may not at all fit with the Bill you pass this year. And so it will go on, year after year, a mockery, a delusion, and a snare. I believe that if Sir Robert Peel's original proposition with regard to the Queen's Colleges could be carried out, it would go far towards settling this question. If the Colleges of Cork and Galway were under the control of Catholics, were for the benefit of Catholics, and met the desires and wants of the Catholics, the question would be very nearly settled; but they have got into such a state now that it would be quite impossible to go back to the original intention without creating an immense amount of confusion, and hence the proposal we have made; and we have not the slightest hesitation or difficulty in placing side by side with the proposals of the Chief Secretary the Bill of the hon. Member for Roscommon. So far as I am concerned, I would not hesitate for a moment about allowing a Roman Catholic College in Dublin, or in Cork, or in Galway, giving the money for secular education, and guarding, at the same time, against the money being applied for religious purposes. You have left this question unsettled for three generations. Just think what the effect has been upon the Irish Roman Catholics! They are a class of the community from whom you have cut off the advantages of higher education. You could hardly conceive the evil influence it has had upon the higher and middle classes to feel that they are shut off from University Education. The deterioration that must result from this increases more rapidly than by geometric progression. You have throughout Ireland a large class constantly moving higher and higher in the social scale. You have old landed families, you have a large class of business men whose sons would naturally go for University Education; but they find themselves driven to private seminaries, or they have to send to England or the Continent for that education which they have no prospect of getting in Ireland without their first step being at variance with all they hold sacred. I know that sons of gentry and of business men have not a chance of aspiring to high positions, because, as Catholics, they have not access to their University degree. This must cramp and isolate them. Do you think you will by this means destroy their religion? Why, if there is anything bad, anything narrow, anything antiquated in their religion, you go the way to perpetuate it, for you refuse to lift them from the prejudices that surround them. You shut them out from knowledge and science. Now, the suggestions of the Chief Secretary go, to a certain extent, in the direction we wish. They propose to give us Exhibition Scholarships and Fellowships, which, I presume, will be under the direction of the Senate. Well, what is to prevent them from going a little further? Even then, the Catholic youth of Ireland will be heavily weighted in the race for knowledge in Ireland. You have the Queen's Colleges well endowed—I will not say richly endowed, but well endowed by the State. I do not wish to say anything against them. They are doing very good work; but it is not the work which is so much wanted. Then, you have Trinity richly endowed for another section of the community. But Her Majesty's Government say to the Catholics—"Your youth may go in and get prizes, but you must do all that is required for secular and scientific teaching at your own expense; we will not reach out a hand to help you, though we give money to the Queen's Colleges and to Trinity College without stint." Why is this? Such a state of things is bad every way. Consider how bad it is for the individual, how bad for the country, how it will ever widen instead of unite the feelings of the people of Ireland from this country. We ask you to give us, in addition to what you propose to give, result fees; and in saying this we consider our request is a moderate one. Some years ago our demands went considerably beyond this. These result fees will not be for religious teaching, and will not supplement religious teaching, and will not and cannot do more than pay half the expenses of secular education in any College. Whether as a matter of principle or policy this is a moderate settlement we propose, and I do not see why it should not be granted. Hon. Gentlemen opposite may say—"Oh, why should we attempt to settle this question? Why not leave it to our successors? We have no objection to their getting into difficulties, for which they have a fatality; but we do not mind aiding them in that direction. Why not leave this vexed question to be settled by the noble Lord when he comes into power, with his lieutenants below the Gangway?" This would be a fair resolution to come to, if they regarded it only from the jocular point of view; but I do not think that right hon. Gentlemen opposite, once they have touched the question, will withdraw their hand until they have completed its settlement. It may not bring them many votes in Ireland; I cannot promise that, for this is only one of many questions which will have to be answered at the next General Election; but I do not doubt, if they meet us in this, they will excite feelings of gratitude in Ireland. Not that I lay much stress upon that, for there is no such thing as gratitude in politics. All we do is on the maxim—"Do the best you can in the present, and get as much as you can in the future." We are grateful for what we are going to get, and we assume that the past was done on principle, and not as fishing for compliments and gratitude. Legislation must stand on its own merits, and we cannot approve of things we object to because, in Sessions past, things were done which we liked. The Party opposite have done good things for Ireland. They have given us no "heroic measures," and the great difficulty about "heroic measures" is to keep them within the bounds of justice and right. They are so influenced by sentiment and vanity and all sorts of nonsense that they are very apt to run over the boundary of right. I would rather have measures of common sense policy, the result of thought and examination of all the circumstances dealt with. The Government deserve great credit for what they did last year in the Intermediate Education Act. I hope they may deserve well for what they do this year. I am not here to place difficulties in their way, but to co-operate with them in passing a good, useful measure. I know the difficulties they have to contend with from some enlightened Members of their own Party, and the difficulties from some superlatively enlightened Members on this side of the House. This question is ripe for settlement. It is a very remarkable thing that there is hardly an organ of public opinion in the country that is not in favour of such a settlement as I have suggested—The Times, and almost all the other daily papers of the Metropolis, the two weekly organs, The Saturday Review and The Spectator, and the great organ of Conservatism, The Quarterly Review. With such a concurrence of opinion outside, and such a concurrence of opinion in, the House—for during the discussion on the Bill of the hon. Member for Roscommon that has been shown—there is an opportunity of settling this question, if only the Government will put down their foot and say, "We are determined to carry it." You will not lose a vote if you do. Take the senior Member for Belfast (Mr. J. P. Corry). Do you think he would go into violent opposition if you carried it—or the hon. Member for Armagh, or the hon. Members from Lancashire, the source and centre of true Protestantism in England? I tell you they will do nothing of the kind; they will be obedient to your Whip. You would not lose support in the country. On the contrary, you would have a chance of gaining. I do not know but you would retain a seat or two which we should otherwise take from you. We have the highest respect for some of our Irish Conservative Members, and I shall be sorry to lose them as business men, and we should feel a kind of delicacy in turning them out after their support of a very little extended programme, such as I have suggested. Now, I hope the utterance of the Chief Secretary is only preliminary. When we had the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon before the House, we had a statement early in the night, and we had another statement later which differed considerably from the first. Now there will be nothing like the variance if, some three or four hours hence, the Chancellor of the Exchequer gets up and concedes our proposal as reasonable and sensible, and grants all we ask — perhaps a little more. I desire this debate should be conducted with good humour. I know there are Gentlemen around me who are men of genius. Now, I am always afraid of men of genius; and I hope, during the progress of the debate, there will be nothing said to excite the feelings or disturb the equanimity of the Bench opposite. They have been worried terribly this Session, and I think they ought to have one quiet night. I have ventured to trespass so much on the time of the House, sincerely trusting that the Bill will not be objected to on its merits, but that if we divide on the Resolution I have placed before the House the Bill will be allowed to pass the second reading, and in Committee we will endeavour on both sides, and with an anxious desire, to make this a good useful measure for Ireland. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no measure of University Education can be considered satisfactory to the people of Ireland which does not provide increased facilities for Collegiate Education as well as for the attainment of University Degrees,"—(Mr. Shaw.)

—instead thereof.

MR. NEWDEGATE gave the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) the greatest credit for the tone of his speech. It appeared that the Party of which he was the Leader were about to reap the reward of their exertions for the last three Sessions. They had prevented the House from proceeding with legislation which was deemed essential by the country. A section of the Irish Members had completely fettered the action of the Legislature; and now the hon Member, in the most good-humoured manner, came forward with his Amendment upon the University Bill which the Government had introduced because they felt they were unable to agree to the principle of the Bill already before the House. The hon. Member had enunciated a sort of maxim which he seemed to hope would be accepted by the House—"that they should do as well as they can for the present;" that was the hon. Member's advice to the House generally, and then he went on, "and get what they could for the future." This last was the hon. Member's injunction to his adherents. His Amendment was the embodiment of the Bill proposed by the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), to which the majority of the House was known to be so positively opposed that there was no chance of its passing. Was it possible for a majority of the House, who had practically refused to assent to the Bill of the hon. Member for Roscommon, to accept this Amendment, which embodied the principle of that Bill? The position in which the House stood was this. It had been coerced for three Sessions by a small section of its Members, and they were now to comply with the requisition of the hon. Member for Cork, by discarding all principle in dealing with the question of higher education in Ireland as the consequence of the coercion to which they had been subjected. The hon. Member for Cork had put the matter most dexterously, and in a form which he hoped would be acceptable to the House; but it was clear, from his statement and Amendment, that although the Government had made an enormous concession he expected and desired that they should concede still further. The Chief Secretary for Ireland proposed to cancel the Royal title of the Queen's University, and leave it to the body to be created by this Bill to designate by what other name the new University should be known. Was there any loyalty in Ireland? If there was, he (Mr. Newdegate) did not think this concession would be agreeable to the loyalty of Ireland. The expunging of Her Majesty's name from all connection with Irish education would scarcely be regarded as a tribute to Irish loyalty. The Government had in this Bill made the widest concession in principle which the English and Scotch people would permit. He hoped it would not be attempted to carry concession further. If they did, he was convinced that the feeling of national dignity and loyalty would rise up against them, and that their whole scheme would be defeated. He had no wish to keep up a feud with Ireland. He had been long a Member of the House; but he had never seen unprincipled concession really conciliate Ireland, or produce peace in that country. The recommendations of the hon. Member for Cork were cloaked by the old cry of "justice to Ireland." He remembered that the Repeal movement adopted as one of its banners, "Justice to Ireland." He had known every unreasonable demand of the Ultramontane hierarchy of Ireland—the representatives of those dominant principles in regard to education which France and Belgium, both Roman Catholic countries, were resisting—he had known these dominant principles asserted under the plea that justice should be done to Ireland. He did not believe in "the justice" that was not founded in principle.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, in spite of what the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had said about justice to Ireland, he (Colonel Colthurst) should use that argument. He considered that no settlement of this question could be satisfactory which was not only framed in the spirit of justice to Ireland, but in the spirit of reparation to the Irish people for injustice in the past in the matter of education. He contended that University Education ought to be looked upon, as the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) said on a former occasion, as being, not as it was in England, the luxury of the few, but as the food of the many. This was what it had been in Scotland for many years. In the early part of the last century, education was brought into harmony in Scotland with the religious convictions of the great majority of the Scotch people. Parish schools were introduced all over the country, and were brought into connection with the Universities; and he would here remind hon. Members from Scotland that for three of those four Universities the Scotch people were indebted to Catholics and to Catholic ecclesiastics, members of that Ultramontane hierarchy which the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had denounced. The result of 120 or 130 years of such legislation for Scotland had been what might naturally have been expected. The people of Scotland were, perhaps, the best educated and the most intelligent in Europe. In Ireland the result aimed at was directly the reverse as far as the mass of the people were concerned. They were entirely shut out from education by the effect of the Acts for the prevention of the growth of Popery. It was made penal for a Catholic to teach a school, and it involved forfeiture of civil rights to send a son to be educated abroad. This state of things subsisted for 70 years, or two generations, and when it was modified, and in 1793 was finally abolished, and Trinity College was opened to the upper classes, what was the fate of the masses of the people—those to whom the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh said that University Education should be thrown open? System after system was devised, all equally repugnant to the consciences of the Catholic people of Ireland, and the education of the people was never encouraged till 1832. It was not to be wondered at that the Irish people were not as well educated as the people of Scotland, though they were naturally as intelligent and as clever. Directly opposite treatment had produced directly opposite results. But if they took the narrow view that it was not a grievance to the mass of people to be deprived of University Education—if they took the grievance as being confined to the upper classes—they were told that the class of Catholics in Ireland who might fairly look for University Education was very small, and that ample facilities were afforded by the Queen's and Trinity Colleges. Well, perhaps the Catholic gentry of Ireland was a small class; but why was that? It was the direct result of the legislation of England. If the laws against the growth of Popery pressed hard on the masses of the people, they pressed with tenfold rigour on the gentry. When these laws were brought in the Catholic gentry numbered one-third of those holding property. The laws were avowedly directed to their extirpation, or, as Burke said, for their degradation. Besides persecution, various inducements were held out to them to conform, and during the 70 years ending in 1777, when the laws were modified or repealed, 4,000 persons conformed. That was not surprising, for the people would have been martyrs to hold out against the persecution and annoyances to which they were subjected. The laws were designed wilfully and knowingly to prevent the acquisition or retention of property, land, position, or power by the Catholics of Ireland; and in 1777, when they were modified or repealed, the Catholic gentry had been reduced to a handful. Of that handful which remained steadfast there were worthy Representatives in that House, like the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) and others. That was only 100 years ago, and when they considered what was the present number of Catholic gentry in Ireland, and the number of Catholic professional and commercial men who had attained a high position by their intelligence, and industry, and energy, he thought it was much to their credit. He held that the House and the country were bound in this matter of education to make reparation, and that no legislation would be satisfactory which did not approach the subject in that spirit. In saying this, he did not lay down the form which such legislation should take. Of course, it must in some way or other produce equality. The Bishops of Ireland, though they were called an Ultramontane hierarchy, had never asked for anything but equality in all the proposals which they had put before the Government of the day. Equality might be attained in various ways, and he left the selection of the method to the Government; but the Catholics of Ireland asked equality with their Protestant fellow-countrymen. He hoped, though appearances were not very favourable, that the Government would see their way to put the roof on the edifice of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, to his everlasting credit, dug the foundation and raised the walls in 1869.

MR. COURTNEY sympathized with the observation of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, as to the desirability that this should not be treated as a Party question—a hope which he feared would be disappointed. They ought to have at heart the educational improvement of the Irish people; but he feared that would not be the motive of their action. Because the question was embarrassed by Party considerations it was likely to be exposed to peril. There was something very singular in the situation. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) had advised the putting aside of all principle except the great one of obtaining all he could. They were asked by Her Majesty's Government to assent to a Bill of an imperfect character, explained in an indefinite and uncertain way, which did not disclose the proposal of the Government; and that could only be regarded as trifling with a great subject. They did not approach it as an educational problem; if they did, was it conceivable that at the last moment the Bill would be amplified by suggestions of endowment, which were not explained, lest, being understood, they should alarm any section of Members? The hon. Member who moved the Amendment said nothing of a definite character; and a natural conclusion from his admirable speech would be that the Chief Secretary for Ireland and he were playing a comedy; that one had said his part, and the other had taken his cue; that, by-and-bye, they might or might not have a Division, and in the course of a few weeks this undeveloped Bill would attain to some form which would satisfy the hon. Member for Cork, and would not dissatisfy the supporters of the Government. It was not very respectful to the House that it should be asked to entertain a question of this kind in this way. It was bad enough that they should approach the question at the fag-end of the Session; but that it should be put before them in a shadowy form, wholly undefined, with suggestions of modification, was a thing not to be tolerated. On the ground of the imperfect and unascertained character of the Bill, they ought to be slow to assent to the second reading. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had assumed the necessity of doing something; but he had not pointed to any evil to be remedied. They ought not, because of an agitation, to take for granted the alleged defects of higher education in Ireland. He was slow to admit that the existing system had failed at all, or that there was a gap to be filled. A all events, they ought to realize accurately what the present organization was. The Queen's Colleges were branded as godless Colleges and irreligious institutions, which it was supposed Roman Catholics would not frequent; but he denied altogether the accuracy of the character given to them. Remarks by been made conveying the impression that the Colleges were buildings in which resident students received their education. The Chief Secretary for Ireland apparently thought they were of this character; but the truth was that each of these Colleges was a University in itself; its buildings embracing museums, libraries, and lecture-rooms; and a certain number of Professors delivered lectures on secular subjects to students of all creeds. To the extent that the lectures were of a secular character the Queen's Colleges might be said to be godless. But it was open to every religious communion in Ireland to build halls of residence, to appoint Deans of residence, and to found theological Professorships in connection with the Queen's Colleges, so that facilities for religious education of every kind were provided in connection with those Colleges if only the different religious Bodies chose to take advantage of them. The hon. Member for Cork admitted that if the present system had been managed with more discretion, it might have succeeded in satisfying the claims of the people of Ireland generally. But whose fault was it if it had not succeeded? There was no disguising the fact that it was because the Roman Catholic hierarchy had refused to co-operate in the system that Parliament was now asked to legislate. If the Roman Catholic Bishops had cared to make an appeal to the faithful for funds to build halls of residence and establish theological Professorships everything would have gone smoothly. No hon. Member who examined the constitution of the Queen's Colleges with reference to the facilities given for religious education could fail to see that there was nothing scandalous in the present system, and that it was the duty of Parliament to regard with great suspicion any demands such as those now made. But, after all, was it the fact that the present system of the Queen's Colleges had failed to satisfy the people of Ireland as distinct from the Roman Catholic hierarchy? Since the foundation of the Queen's Colleges, the number of Roman Catholic students attending them had gradually risen, though subject to fluctuations in consequence of the periodic fulminations of the Roman Catholic Bishops. People went on sending their sons in greater and greater numbers to the Colleges; but every now and then there came some pastoral, some declaration from this or that Bishop or body of Bishops, and the progress of the Colleges was for the time arrested, only to resume when the terrors of the Roman Catholic hierarchy had been forgotten. The proportion of Roman Catholic students attending the Colleges was about 25 or 30 per cent. No doubt, the proportion of Roman Catholics to Protestants in Ireland was much greater than that; but it should be borne in mind that only persons of a certain amount of means could afford to give their sons a University Education, and the number of such persons would not be found to be so very much in excess of 25 or 30 per cent. It had been estimated not to exceed 35 per cent altogether, and when allowance was made for the circumstance that all Roman Catholic theological students were educated elsewhere, while the Protestant theological students were not, it would be found that the number of Roman Catholic lads actually attending the Queen's Colleges was just about what it might reasonably be expected to be. If it were the case that a large mass of Roman Catholics were deterred from attending the Queen's Colleges who would be glad to attend a Roman Catholic University, why, he would ask, did they not concentrate themselves upon Galway or Cork, and, by their mere numbers, make the Colleges there as distinctly Roman Catholic in character as the College at Belfast was Protestant? What the Bill proposed was to create a University which would admit all students, however educated, to examinations for University degrees. As an educational matter, he ventured to say that that was an alteration of very doubtful expediency. The existence of the London University, which now examined students in Carlow and Dublin, did away with any necessity that might formerly have existed for such a Bill as the present. The change proposed was a dangerous one, because the new University would be a competitor with the London University for the same class of students, and it might be assumed that the University which admitted students with the greatest ease would be most patronized. There was, therefore, this danger—that the new University would make its examinations easy for the purpose of out-bidding the London University. Then, again, the Bill created a University open to all comers—but how would it do so? First, it created a University, then it destroyed an existing University, and then it passed over the graduates of the existing University to the new University. What was the use of that roundabout way of doing a very simple thing? Why was it not proposed, instead, to give the Queen's University the power of examining students from without? Why not enable it, with its traditions, and standard, and machinery, and organization, to examine outsiders? The reason given in "another place" was this—that, in 1866, an attempt was made to enable the Queen's University to examine outsiders by means of a supplementary Charter, which was rejected by the Queen's University. It required the authority of a Lord Chancellor to make such a reason as that plausible. The change might not be possible by Charter; but why should it not be done by Act of Parliament? They could do what they liked with the University by an Act of Parliament, and they were going to destroy it by an Act. It was perfectly clear that there was something beyond and below this. There was only one reason he could suggest for it—namely, that when they got rid of the old University they would get rid of its Senate; and when they created a new University they could bring in a new Senate disposed to be very favourable to certain institutions. That was only another reason for looking at the Bill with extreme jealousy. If they were to make an alteration, why should it not be done in a straightforward way, by enlarging the powers of the existing University? It had admittedly done good work. Why destroy it? Why not supplement it? With respect to the admission of all new comers to examination, he would quote the opinion of a very distinguished man, recently returned to England, after receiving great honours, which all Englishmen, who had any regard for culture and genius, were glad to know he had received—he alluded to Cardinal Newman. If he had to choose, he said, between a University which dispensed with residence, and gave its degrees to those who, on examination, were found to be qualified, and one which had no Professors or Examiners at all, as was the case with Oxford 60 years ago, which kept its students for three or four years, and then sent them away—if he had to determine which of the two courses was the more successful in training, moulding, and enlarging the mind, which produced the better class of public men, he would not hesitate to give the preference to that University which did nothing in preference to that which taught its students every science under the sun. That opinion was worthy of consideration, when they were asked to drag down an existing University and substitute for it a mere Examining Body. The hon. Member for Cork, in his Amendment, stated that the Bill did not meet the demand for increased facilities for Collegiate Education in Ireland. It was true that the Bill gave no such facilities; but he was not quite sure, from the ambiguous language of the right hon. Gentleman, that those facilities would not be foisted into the Bill. And in what manner was it suggested that these facilities should be afforded? They were to be made dependent upon annual Votes. In other words, they were threatened with an agitation from year to year every time the Votes were brought on. Every friend of higher education must object to that. He held that Collegiate Education, in the best sense of the word, was provided by the system of the Queen's Colleges as they existed. The Roman Catholics, it was said, would not take it; but the facilities for obtaining Collegiate Education existed, and those who opposed the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork were voting for true Collegiate Education against the sham Collegiate Education of which he was the advocate. What was really the point in dispute? It was a question not confined to this country, but was at issue in France, in Belgium, and in Italy. The question was, whether youths should be educated together or apart in distinct and separate institutions? Which of the two systems, he asked, deserved to be approved as a means of education? The Roman Catholic hierarchy had insisted, again and again, that they would be content with nothing that did not give them exclusive control over the education of their youths from first to last; that they should teach them not only morals and religion, but science; that they should not only teach but examine them, and have control not only of the education, but of the examinations also. He was for the free education of youths jointly and together, for youths by communion one with another learnt very quickly that life was greater than the particular forms of life in which they were bro up, that the world was vaster, and humanity wider, than anything taught in particular schools of theology. This knowledge obtained in Colleges was what prepared men for life. In the House of Commons there were men of all creeds, and they were the better for it. Why, then, should a College be restricted to one? He, and those who agreed with him, were fighting for the freer, wider, and better education, against those who, under the pretence of offering facilities for Collegiate Education, were endeavouring to obtain the opportunity of cramping youthful minds by the teaching of particular seminaries. In defence of the higher education to which he had referred, which had been established in Ireland for 30 years and more, which had flourished there in spite of opposition, he hoped the House would refuse to listen to proposals, however convenient, which were made for the promotion of Party purposes.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT thought the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) had shown very conclusively the great benefit which the Queen's University had been to Ireland. The hon. Member had quite refuted the argument of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw), who said that it was the great wish and intention of the House to exclude the Roman Catholics from their fair share of education. The hon. Member had shown rightly that their object was that Catholics and Protestants should be brought up side by side, because to bring them up in this manner would have an influence upon their after life which they could never forget. In the statement of the hon. Member for Liskeard were contained the views of a large majority of the House. He knew that the Roman Catholics stated, and firmly believed, that they had a grievance with regard to higher Education; and it was in the endeavour to meet that grievance that the Bill of the Government had been brought in. He regretted that a Division was not taken on the Bill of the hon. Member for Roscommon. He held, in fact, that it was one of the greatest mistakes that had ever been made that the House was not allowed to show to Ireland in connection with that Bill what the real view of the country was in reference to the question of higher education in Ireland now before the House. Their great object was to give to the Irish people the best education which they could possibly give; but that could not be secured by subsidizing, as the hon. Member for Roscommon proposed should be done, those Roman Catholic seminaries which now existed in Ireland. This would perpetuate in the future all the evils which had disfigured Irish education in the past. In his opinion, the question could only be dealt with in a national sense, with regard to the wants of the country. He agreed that it would be a mistake absolutely to abolish the Queen's University. He certainly wished that the name might be retained. Surely the House had the power to extend the Charter of the University and increase its Senate. He hoped that later in the debate the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would say that the Government did not intend to interfere with the present Senate of the University. He was most anxious to see this question settled; but it could only be done upon lines approved by the great majority of the House; and he hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would clearly state that the Scholarships, Exhibitions, and Fellowships to be given for secular purposes in the University were to be provided for by money voted annually by Parliament. He felt certain that the country would not agree to the application of a lump sum of money out of the Disestablished Church Fund to the purpose which he had named.

DR. WARD warned the Irish Members against listening to the proposals made to them by the Liberal Party. It was by the mouthpiece of philosophical Radicals that they heard it said—"You can have nothing but what I can give you;" and, therefore, he would say to his Friends from Ireland—"Be cautious of what you hear from the Liberal Party when it is said—'Pass this over, we will give you something better.' " They had listened to such advice before in the hope of getting something better than was offered them at the time, and the result had not been satisfactory. Lord Mayo made a proposition, the generosity of which towards Catholics had never been equalled; but the present Lord Emly, a Member of the Liberal Party, said—"Hold on; you will get more from us when we are in power." What was the fact? The Liberals got into power, and the Irish got nothing. The same thing, he believed, would happen again. He would, therefore, have them take warning from the past. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) got up and stated the grounds upon which the all-powerful tail of the Liberal Party would proceed, if in power, and they were—that Ireland must have secular education, and secular education alone. Nothing else would be given now if that was to be the line on which the Liberal Party was to be worked; and they knew it was, because they knew the Liberal Party could not get on without its tail—then he (Dr. Ward) said it was hopeless for the Catholics of Ireland to give up the half a loaf which the Government offered. [Mr. SULLIVAN: Oh!] It appeared his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth was willing to give it up; but what happened 13 years ago? Thirteen years ago, they threw up a good offer from the Conservatives in the hope of getting something better, and, as a consequence, three generations of young men in Ireland had been practically destitute of University Education. Who were the people, he asked, who were much interested in this question, perhaps, more than anyone else? It was not the House of Commons, nor the ecclesiastics, but it was the young men of Ireland, who were exceedingly interested in this matter of their education; and the hon. and learned Member for Louth would take upon himself a great responsibility if he shut the doors of University Education to the young men. ["Oh!"] It was shutting the doors, he repeated. The Government said they would open those doors and enable young men to enter them by grants of money. What did the hon. and learned Member for Louth expect from the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) and the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), and those Members who led the Party to which he was so proud to belong? What did the hon. and learned Member expect from that Party? [Mr. SULLIVAN: Nothing.] The hon. and learned Gentleman said nothing. But he did get something from the Party opposite. The Bill before the House was an honest attempt to settle the question. [Mr. SULLIVAN: Oh!] The hon. and learned Member said "Oh!" but he would repeat his assertion that the Bill was honest in its purpose and desire to settle the question. In the teeth of a very strong Party behind the Government, he said it was a thoroughly honest consideration, and nothing but faction and prejudice in the House had tried to prevent the endeavour succeeding. He could say more in that direction, and he spoke in the interests of the young men of Ireland in protesting against that spirit existing which he had indicated. They had heard a great deal said with regard to the terrors of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, and he had something to say about that matter. He had nothing to urge against the Queen's Colleges; he had received kindness from them; and although his father and three sons had had a connection with Queen's Colleges his Bishop said nothing against it. Yet the minds of some hon. Members of the House were filled with terrors respecting the Catholic hierarchy. He denied the existence of any such terror in Ireland. Of course, they wanted the Queen's Colleges, but they wanted more; and if they could not get more they sometimes availed themselves of what those Colleges offered. He believed the Bill might be made a very good measure, as it gave them what they did not now possess. The hon. Member for Liskeard, who was wiser than the people of Ireland, came down with an array of figures, and with his science, with the object of showing that there was no practical impediment in the way of any Catholic in Ireland who really desired education. In the county which he (Dr. Ward) represented, there were a number of Catholic gentry whose sons never availed themselves of the Queen's Colleges; but who were, practically, uneducated so far as University Education was concerned. Those were the very people they would get at by this Bill. The hon. Members for Liskeard and North Warwickshire were understood to be fighting the phantom of clericalism; but they were, in point of fact, fighting the battle of clericalism. The young men to whom he referred were shut out from University Education because their parents had objections against their entering the Queen's Colleges, and the consequence was they were sent into clerical seminaries. That was what the hon. Member for Liskeard and others were doing. They were actually promoting and upholding that state of things, for they advocated the system which, of all others, was most calculated to fix clericalism on the country. Did they tell him the people in Ireland were different to the people in other parts of the world? They knew well that the people would say—"Hands off," if they put the education into the hands of the clericals, and they overstepped their bounds. He did not deny that the Queen's Colleges were good institutions; but he did assert that the system in Ireland was not educating the large proportion of the people of the country. They wanted a loyal and understanding people in Ireland; but how were they to get that? Ireland must have that which it required, and in the name of this great Empire, and of all that was called liberty, he asked that it should be granted them. He deprecated the action of those who were but theoretic upholders of liberty, and who said if they did not educate their sons in a certain fashion they would not educate them at all. In a short time he thought they would have some of these gentlemen endeavouring to regulate their breakfasts. In his belief, the Liberal intolerance of the Liberals was the worst of tyranny; and if they were to be governed by the hon. Members for Hackney and Liskeard, backed by a few Gentlemen opposite, life would be absolutely unbearable. They ought to approach the question from the point of utility, and if they did that they would find that the Bill afforded a very fair opening. [Mr. SULLIVAN: No.] Again the hon. and learned Member for Louth said "no." Would he tell them what his Party would give? [Mr. SULLIVAN: The Home Rule Party is my Party.] Well, the Leader of that Party had distinctly endorsed the policy of Her Majesty's Government; and if the hon. and learned Gentleman would follow his Leader he would vote for the second reading of the Bill; because, if the hon. Member for Cork could not get what he wanted in its entirety, he had not refused what the Government offered him. No doubt, the hon. Gentleman would endeavour to secure the adoption of his Amendment; but if it should be rejected he must take the milder proposition. With regard to the provisions of the measure, he ventured to say that they enabled the sons of Roman Catholics to obtain a thorough education. At the same time, there were some which might well be considered for amendment, so that the scope of the proposal might be somewhat widened. Whatever was done, however, the House should be most careful not to hold the responsibility of rejecting the Bill. It was a grave thing that three generations of Irish young men should have gone down without receiving University Education, while they had been quarrelling in the House over mere words. He now appealed to the House to accept the Bill as a fair compromise, and allow the Government to do this year an act greater than it did last year for Ireland by giving the country extended University Education.

MR. KAVANAGH said, that although he believed in the abstract truth of the views which had been expressed by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw), he could not support the Amendment of that Gentleman, because to pass that Amendment would be equivalent to rejecting the Bill. Moreover, he believed that he would not be representing correctly the interests of his Roman Catholic friends in Ireland, who were anxious to obtain increased facility for higher education, if he were to throw any difficulty in the way of the Bill, even in its present form. He was glad to observe that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had enlarged the scope of the Bill very much indeed. As the Bill was originally introduced—namely, in the House of Lords—he was inclined to find fault with it, not for what it did, but for what it did not do. He, however, thought it would meet a want which he heard very generally expressed in Ireland, and upon that account he made up his mind to support the second reading in the hope that in Committee Her Majesty's Government would see their way to put a little more flesh on the bone. The right hon. Gentleman, on introducing the measure, had unveiled the way by which he hoped it would be found acceptable to all parties in Ireland; and, therefore, he (Mr. Kavanagh) would be all the more sorry to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork. Many remarks had been made by previous speakers about the Queen's Colleges, and work which they had done in Ireland. He did not disparage the Queen's University or Queen's Colleges; but he did not believe that they had fulfilled the intention of their founders. The Queen's University and Colleges were founded for the purpose of conveying to the Roman Catholics in Ireland equal advantages to those possessed by the other religious persuasions. Now, that he did not think they had succeeded in doing. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) quoted some figures which, he said, proved satisfactorily that the Queen's Colleges had accomplished their object. He (Mr. Kavanagh) had not got the figures with him; but the statistics he had seen certainly proved the very opposite. If he remembered correctly, the students in the Queen's University numbered 920 in the years 1878 and 1879, and out of that number he found that there were only 230 Roman Catholics. Now, if they compared the number of Roman Catholics to the proportion of the other religious denominations, they would find, even allowing that the Roman Catholics, as a rule, were of the poorer class, and, perhaps, did not desire so much University degrees as the members of other denominations — even allowing for that, he thought they would find that the discrepancy was a very marked one indeed. If the present Bill were passed, he believed that University Education would be placed within the reach of those people who at present were unable to afford it. He, however, was desirous of taking this opportunity of joining with the hon. Member for Cork in appealing to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, and to Her Majesty's Government, and to the whole of the Party on this side of the House, to grant what he asked in his Amendment—namely, result fees. He believed result fees would be the most rational and most useful way of assisting education. It was perfectly well known that they could not advocate any scheme which bore the slightest tinge of endowment. The days of endowment had gone by; but, although that was so, he thought it was quite in accordance with the old principles and traditions of the Conservative Party to be generous as well as just. The policy of disendowment had never belonged to their traditions. On the contrary, if they looked back to history, from the time of Mr. Pitt, they would find many instances to show that concurrent endowment, and not disendowment, had been the policy of the Conservative Party; but that policy, he was sorry to say, had now passed. It was no use attempting to re-open that question, especially since the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church. He did not want to re-open it; but he did ask hon. Members on his own side of the House—some of whom were strongly opposed to giving Roman Catholics anything—he did ask them to put aside their prejudices, and to be generous as well as just. Had the hon. Member for Cork been in his place, he would have suggested to him that the best course for him to pursue might be to withdraw his Amendment, and let them all see what Her Majesty's Government were prepared to do in Committee. Then, if all their efforts failed to obtain anything satisfactory, or if the statements which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had made proved to be empty promises, the Amendment would apply with quite as much force, and with a great deal more reason, on the third reading of the Bill. He believed that it would be a great pity indeed to reject the measure which, although it might not be exactly what the hon. Member for Cork and his Friends wanted, would afford the foundation to build upon, and to effect what he hoped might become a just and generous settlement of this great question.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that it was because they believed that the estimate of the duties and functions of life given by theological teaching was the true estimate that the Catholic Church wanted a safe and guarded kind of education. His hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) pointed out the inequality which the Bill proposed. It was admitted on all hands that the measure, as it now stood, only gave the power of receiving degrees, but provided no adequate means whatever for giving to young men all the benefits of University Education; and his hon. Friend proposed that the principle of payment by results should be adopted to supplement the Bill, and to provide young Catholics in Ireland with University Education, and with all the benefits of Collegiate life. Now, that did not contain the objectionable feature of denominational education which was regarded with dislike by many hon. Members. What his hon. Friend claimed was Collegiate Education in secular matters, and not in religious matters. Supposing the State consented to give them payment by results for secular matters, the State, undoubtedly, would have the right to see that the money paid for results was devoted altogether for secular learning. Furthermore, the State would be intitled to establish machinery by which to insure that the fees were devoted to purely secular subjects, and that they were so applied to them as to produce the best possible good from an educational point of view. Let them see what the State would be fairly entitled to do, in order to see that the result fees served no denominational purpose. The first matter to which he would call attention was the appointment of Professors. Much would depend upon the class of Professors appointed. In the Bill of the hon. Member for Roscommon there was a provision which no Roman Catholic would object to being employed in the appointment of Professors—namely, payment by results. In the hon. Member's Bill it was proposed that salaries should be paid to Professors appointed by the College and approved by the University. No one was disposed to ask for money to be paid for Professors solely appointed by the Bishops or the Body in charge of the affiliated Colleges. They would not do so, but were perfectly willing that the secular Senate or the State should have an equal voice in the appointment of Professors. Some time ago he made, through another channel, the suggestion that the State or the Senate should have the power of appointment, subject to the approval of the affiliated Colleges, and that the affiliated Colleges should have the power of dismissal if the Professor turned out unsuitable. If the Professors were to be paid by results, the affiliated Colleges should not claim the paramount right of appointment. If they had payment by results, probably they would insist on the introduction of a Conscience Clause to guide the studies in the affiliated Colleges. A Conscience Clause was introduced in the Intermediate Education Act. In that Act they were dealing with schools in which boys from 11 to 16 years of age were educated—an age when religious principles were formed, and when the religious edifice of a man's life was built up. It was said in "another place" that a Conscience Clause would be useless in the affiliated Colleges of a University, although it would be useful in a school; but he thought it was quite the other way. A Conscience Clause was no use whatever for the purposes of mixed education, because no Catholic would think of going to a Protestant intermediate school, and vice versa. Therefore, the Conscience Clause was a mere sop of no practical use with regard to Intermediate Education; but it was a very different thing with regard to the halls of a University, where the young men came to pursue their secular studies. It was perfectly possible that Protestants would come to the halls of a Catholic College; and if a Catholic College was a success, he thought there would be a larger number of Protestants come to it than many hon. Gentlemen supposed; and, therefore, he had no objection to a good and substantial Conscience Clause to protect the rights of the Protestants who might wish to come. Mixed education seemed to be a source of great anxiety to many hon. Members, who said they would be glad to see the Protestants and Roman Catholics studying together. He believed that if they provided this safeguard for Roman Catholic education, guarding it, at the same time, by a Conscience Clause, there would be a greater chance of bringing both classes together than there was under the present system. He would suggest that, if the payment by results was adopted, the State should have the right to inspect, by the officers of the University, the affiliated Colleges of the University; and the State should also have the right of seeing that the money that was given for the purpose of furthering secular study was applied for that purpose. He also thought the State should be entitled to lay down certain conditions as to the constitution of the Colleges which were proposed to be affiliated, in order to secure that the Colleges should not be altogether under clerical control. The State, also, would be bound to see that nothing in the nature of an intermediate school received one halfpenny of payment by results. In regard to this matter, the hon. and learned Member for Louth had been misunderstood. He had suggested that, in the first instance, a hard-and-fast line should be drawn, and that it should be determined that, until an Act of Parliament allowed it, only two or three institutions in the country should receive any endowments in the shape of result

fees. There was an institution in Dublin known as the Catholic University, and the result of this would be that an institution like that, having a status, would be a nucleus of University life, and result fees would pour in, guarded by a Conscience Clause. He desired not merely to have provision for instruction for young men, but he desired a Collegiate and resident University life to grow up; and it was only by excluding intermediate schools and seminaries from result fees under this Bill, and confining the fees to institutions which, by locality, number of pupils, and absence of intermediate teaching from their curriculum were qualified, that the wants of the people could be properly met. The young men of the present day fell behind in culture the generation which was passing away; and, he believed, if hon. Members could see the falling off in Ireland in this respect—talents lost and capacities abused, bad habits formed for the want of culture—they would generously make a sacrifice of principle. But no sacrifice of principle was required. Result fees, properly guarded, would involve no sacrifice of principle. With regard to the Fellowships proposed to be created under the scheme, one solution of the question which had been proposed was to pay the Professors. He would suggest that they should make the Fellowships which were to be created tenable on condition that the Fellows taught in some University College affiliated to the University. He thought that was a fair solution. A good deal had been said about the Intermediate Education Act; but it did not afford any worthy or satisfactory analogy on the present occasion, and it was weak and dangerous to pursue that line of argument. They should accept the proposal of the hon. Member for Cork, and, in connection therewith, the payment by result fees would stand upon its own merits. As he had sketched that payment, it did not in any way involve the principle of denominational education, and it was free from the trait which made denominational endowment or denominational education so objectionable to the great majority of the Members of the House. Unless the suggestions of his hon. Friend the Member for Cork, or some similar proposal, were adopted in the Bill, such as would give means for growth of University life in Ireland, this question could not be regarded as settled. If an attempt were made to pass the Bill into law without such an addition, the Government would probably succeed; but they would only succeed in carrying a measure unworthy of a Government which pretended to deal seriously and effectively with this question, and unworthy, also, of the warm approval of the Representatives of Ireland.

MR. GREGORY had listened with regret to the speech of the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down, because he thought the Government had gone quite as far as many of their supporters, and certainly as far as he himself would be prepared to go. He could not help feeling that, logically, hon. Members who represented Roman Catholic constituencies in Ireland had hardly a case for the Bill which was now introduced. As a matter of fact, it appeared to him that all the requirements of the Roman Catholics were met by the institution of the Queen's Colleges; that there was no ground, logically speaking, for the prejudice entertained by the Roman Catholic gentry of Ireland against those Colleges. Some of the leading members of the Roman Catholic Church in this country had, he believed, sent their sons to the English Universities. He accepted the statement, however, that the Roman Catholic gentry of Ireland objected to send their sons to the Queen's Colleges, and, on that ground, he was willing to go so far as to accept the present Bill; but it would be necessary to see that the endowments under the Bill, whatever they were to be, were to be endowments of a University, and not of denominational Colleges; and the House did not yet know what those endowments were to be. Taking the Bill as it stood, he should give it his support. In so doing, he confessed he did not feel there was a very strong case made out for the measure. He accepted it on the representation of certain Members of the Roman Catholic persuasion coming from Ireland, and in deference to their feelings and prejudices, rather than on account of any logical ground on which the measure stood.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE could not help regretting the unfortunate results with which the introduction of the first Bill on this subject this Session had been met. He was quite sure the prese

Bill would not satisfy the demands of the Irish people for University Education. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, in 1874, would have been far preferable to them, for by it Trinity College, Dublin, would have been converted into a National University, which would have been affiliated to the Catholic Colleges throughout the country. The present Bill did not propose to give any money endowment to Catholic Colleges in Ireland. It was impossible that the Catholic people of Ireland could shut their eyes to the fact that denominational education was at present amply provided for in England and Scotland. They had only to look at the provision made for elementary education in England and University Education in Scotland to see how liberally the sister countries were provided for in a matter in regard to which the scantiest justice was denied; and while this was the case, the Irish people had taxed themselves to the amount of £200,000 to establish a Roman Catholic University, they not receiving a single farthing of public money to aid them in this great effort. Trinity College was one of the most richly endowed educational establishments in the Three Kingdoms. It had 200,000 acres of land, museums, and libraries, was rich with valuable manuscripts; but it was thoroughly Protestant. All its Professors were Protestants, nearly all its students Protestants, and the whole tone of the institution showed it was, though nominally open to Catholics, practically as exclusive as if it were closed by law to all but members of the favoured faith. In view of these circumstances, the Irish people could not but be extremely disappointed with the present Bill. It was impossible that English or Scotch Dissenters could understand the question of Catholic University Education in Ireland. When Protestant Dissenters went to a Protestant institution they saw rites and ceremonies, not the same as their own, no doubt, but not so very different as to occasion them any shock, and they took no great exception to the religious services of the great Protestant Universities. Between these denominations there was not that enormous difference to be found between either; and Roman Catholics could not in this respect act as the Dissenters did.

Major O'Beirne

They did not think their sons could learn history from a Protestant Professor, because, to begin with, the whole course of Irish history took its character from what occurred 200 years ago; and the Catholic parent objected to history distorted or coloured by the prejudice and bigotry of a Protestant Professor. They conscientiously insisted that the Professors who trained their children should be Catholics, and what they were contending for was really a Catholic University. How, he asked, if the tables were turned, would Protestant parents like to send their sons to an institution where all the Professors were Jesuits, or even Catholic laymen? It was only natural that Ireland should insist in her demand to have a grant of money for a University; and although some hon. Members might be willing to accept the proposition of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) of payment by results, yet, he was sure, that would never settle the question. That settlement could only be arrived at by disendowing Trinity College, selling the property, and devoting the proceeds to national purposes, and putting every religious denominational College on an equality, or by giving equal endowment to Roman Catholic Colleges.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he should give his most sincere support to this Bill, principally because it dealt in a genuine manner with the great grievance of which the Irish Roman Catholics had hitherto complained—namely, that there was no University in Ireland which gave degrees to persons educated in denominational schools and Colleges. That was so with the Queen's University, because that University gave degrees only to those who had studied in the Queen's Colleges, and those Colleges were undenominational. Then there was Trinity College. It had, no doubt, been made accessible to Roman Catholics; but it was under conditions which Roman Catholics could not accept, because in that College the education was undenominational. Parents had a right, on behalf of their sons, to insist upon that form of education of which they approved, and the Roman Catholics of Ireland had a right to say their children should not be denied a University degree because they had been educated in schools where the Catholic religion was taught. They had been told that

Irishmen might come over to London and take degrees at the London University. But Irishmen had a right to say they did not want to come over here, but desired to have a University in their own country capable of granting degrees. That was a most reasonable feeling on their part. What would the Scotch think if they were obliged to come to the English Universities to receive their degrees? The Roman Catholics were a majority of the people of Ireland, and their religious principles ought to be respected; and, in his opinion, this Bill really did remedy one of their grievances, because the University to be created under it did not favour Roman Catholics more than anybody else; at the same time, it was a concession to those who were in favour of their sons receiving a denominational education, because under the Bill young men who had been educated in Roman Catholic Colleges or schools would be able to obtain these University degrees, which they could not do at present. It had been contended at some length that an institution which brought young men together was much better than a mere Examining Board. No doubt, this was true but; it was beside the question, for it did not apply to the present case. They could not have what was best in the abstract, and must content themselves with that which best met the special circumstances of the case. This Bill did not interfere in any way with the Queen's Colleges. It had been argued that the Queen's Colleges ought to be amplified. He supposed what was intended was, that there should be something in the shape of the Supplemental Charter of which so much had been said, and that what had once been vainly attempted by means of such a Charter should now be effected by Act of Parliament. He maintained, however, that to introduce into the Queen's Colleges principles which were totally different from those upon which they had been founded would be a process of mere tinkering and cobbling, which could not lead to any satisfactory result. If they wanted to redress the grievance that admittedly existed in Ireland, it would be necessary to make a clearance, and to erect something new. Had the Queen's University been a venerable institution, sanctioned by age and history, he should have hesitated to destroy it; but, in point of fact, it had been created by Act of Parliament, and might, therefore, be abolished by the same means. The wisest plan would be to sweep it away, and to set up something more in accordance with the necessities of the case. He had felt, with regard to the Bill of the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), that there was a great objection to it in the fact that it created a third University; but the present Bill steered clear of that obstacle to its acceptance. Whatever endowments belonged to the Queen's University would be transferred to the new University, which would, consequently, not have to ask for fresh benefactions. The Bill, however, did not interfere with the Queen's Colleges, which would still remain, and would be included in the new University, which, at the same time, would grant degrees to persons educated in denominational Colleges. He had been very anxious that the Government should offer some subvention to the new University. When the Bill had first been introduced he had felt that that new University would be in forma pauperis, and that it would not be able to hold its own against Dublin; but the Government had made a considerable concession in the direction of supplying it with Fellowships and other advantages of that kind. However, even if no important concession had been made, even if no money had been granted, the Representatives of Ireland would make a great mistake in rejecting the Bill. They had made a mistake in rejecting the measure of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. ["No, no!"] He said "Yes," and he believed a majority of the Irish Representatives would now agree that a mistake was made when that Bill was rejected. They had made another mistake at the time when Lord Mayo was in Office, and the Conservative Government had been disposed to make concessions to the Roman Catholics. A great step was to have been made in that direction, whatever might have been the precise intentions of Lord Mayo. Hon. Members should remember that extreme views were fatal to legislation, and that, now they had thrown away several valuable and important opportunities, they had to make the best of their position. The Government had made a liberal offer in endeavouring to remove the grievance of which they complained. The University of London, whether it was in Piccadilly or in Carlow, was still English, and not Irish, and the Irish had a right to have an University of their own that would give degrees to persons educated in denominational Colleges. He would be very glad to see a purely Roman Catholic University endowed; but how could they expect such a thing? If any Government proposed it, they would be turned out of Office in a fortnight. It could not be done; for neither the strong Protestants, nor the Nonconformists, nor the other House of Parliament, would give their assent. They might just as well cry for the moon. They must not ask for what was impossible, and they ought not to expect any Government to knock their heads against brick walls, ending in their political destruction. No doubt, it would be very heroic to see that species of martyrdom; but it was impracticable. The Bill of the hon. Member for Roscommon, though it did not propose a Roman Catholic University, certainly went very near the endowment of denominational schools and Colleges; but even if the Government had supported him he could not have carried his Bill. Even in the case of the present Bill, which avoided the difficult question of endowments, they had had the violent speech of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), and probably some Nonconformist Member would join his opposition to it. Nor, in fact, did he himself think the Bill perfect; but he wished to avoid the grave error of refusing a fair offer for the sake of the unobtainable. He could not vote for the Amendment, because, if it were carried, it would be fatal to the Bill. Hon. Gentlemen, he was sure, would not vote for that Amendment if they thought there was a chance of its being carried, because, if carried, it would be fatal to the Bill. The Bill conceded as much as the Roman Catholics could expect—not so much as they had a right to, but as much as they could get. He did not mean to say that when the Bill was in Committee modifications might not be introduced in it; possibly there might be. He should be very glad if Her Majesty's Government would modify the Bill in the sense he had indicated. But he gave a most cordial support to the Bill, and, when carried, he thought Her Majesty's Government might congratulate themselves on having settled what the French called a burning question—a very difficult and troublesome question; and he was sure the people of Ireland would find they were benefited by the Bill.

MR. J. MAITLAND thought the reasonable demands of the Irish in this matter would be conceded by the people of this country as soon as it became thoroughly instructed in the matter. He was humbly of opinion that the people on this side of the Channel did not know what they themselves had in the way of Universities, and what the people on the other side of the Channel had not. He had himself had a good deal of experience at various Universities, and he should like to point out, in the first place, what we had in this way. The impression was general in this country that we had at our great Universities a secular system—that, in point of fact, our great Universities were not Protestant, and certainly not denominational. Now, at Oxford, not only the Professors, but the tutors, Fellows, and students were almost to a man not only Protestants, but members of the Episcopalian Church of England. Besides that, it was necessary, or, at least, the custom and practice—anyone who did not conform to it rendering himself an outsider—not only to attend the College Divinity lectures, but to attend the College chapel. It was quite true that the Dissenters in this country—and amongst them he included the Catholics—had obtained the right to go there without signing tests; but that had not been the kind of grievance which the Roman Catholics had objected to. What they objected to was, that if a Roman Catholic allowed his son to go to Protestant chapels there was a high probability that he would not leave it a Roman Catholic, if he did not leave it a Protestant. The same state of things existed at Cambridge. In a much less degree the same thing prevailed in the Scotch Universities. He knew perfectly well that it was said these Universities were not mainly supported by the State, and that the Professors did not draw their salaries largely from the Consolidated Fund. At the same time, there was a very considerable number of Regius Professors who were appointed by the Crown, and, he understood, received salaries from the Crown. This was said not to be a public endowment; but both the Universities of England and Scotland had a very large amount of endowments of Professors, but endowments which had, over and over again, been dealt with by a Parliamentary Commission, which had been treated as public, and had been handed over from one Professorship, and from one purpose to another. It therefore appeared to him that these endowments were thoroughly, or in the main, public. What was the position in Ireland? The Protestants had a University, and a good one, already endowed. But the people of Ireland—the 4,000,000 of Catholics—had not an endowed University. They had not got a University which their religious scruples or religious prejudices would permit them to send their children to. It was said that if that was so the Catholics should put their hands in their own pockets. He maintained that to ask them to do so was entirely unjust, as putting them in a position which was totally different from that of the people of England and Scotland. It was very difficult for an English or Scotch Member thoroughly to understand the needs of the people. The mere offer of degrees to the people of Ireland was not what they principally wanted. What they wanted was education; and they wanted the education to be brought to the poor people of Ireland. He was very much struck with the speech of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), who seemed to think that University Education was only for the rich. Why, anybody knowing anything of the Scotch Universities knew that they were the Universities of the people. Hon. Members would be surprised how very small a sum of money would bring a youth up from the country, and get him all the advantages of a University Education. This was what the people of Ireland wanted, and had not got. He hoped the Irish would stick to their colours, for they were fully entitled to have something more than this Bill would give them. When the people of England and Scotland thoroughly understood the position of the people of Ireland—that they had themselves got what the people of Ireland had not got—he believed there was too much justice in this country to make this the subject of a Protestant cry.

MR. HOLT said, no one who understood the subject could be surprised that the Bill had given rise to much speculation, and had been sharply criticized. He was of opinion that the statements made by the Home Secretary in that House, and by the Prime Minister and the Lord Chancellor in "another place," amounted to a definite pledge on the part of the Government, which ought to disarm opposition on the part of those who objected to denominational endowments. The conviction that such was the case would render his criticism very friendly. He looked at the Bill, under these circumstances, as an honest endeavour to deal with this question. He had stated on a previous occasion that he did not at all approve the erection of a third University in Ireland, and he must express his regret that a very good institution now in existence should be destroyed in order to build another on its ruins. For his own part, he should prefer to retain the old name of the Queen's University, to enlarge the number of the Senate, if need were, and to increase its powers. The subject had, however, he had no doubt, been carefully considered by the Government in that aspect; but he would invite them to explain to the House the reasons which had induced them to destroy the Queen's University instead of bringing in a Bill to deal with it in the way which he had just suggested. Regarding, as he did, the constitution of the Senate to be created under the Bill as a matter of the greatest importance, he hoped special care would be directed to that point. There appeared to him, he would further observe, to be a great deficiency in the Bill, as originally introduced, which, however, had been to some extent remedied by the suggestions which had been made by his right hon. Friend who had moved the second reading. The Bill would, he thought, be rendered more perfect and attractive by some provision for University prizes; and if the thing were worth doing at all it was worth doing well; but if Fellowships and Scholarships were to be provided, he hoped the University would be endowed with money voted annually by Parliament; that the endowment would be kept entirely separate from any Collegiate institution, that the Fellowships and Scholarships would be thrown open to public competition, under ref lations to enable them to be held by students resident in any part of Ireland without any restriction whatsoever as to creed. There was one restriction, however, which, in his opinion, should be imposed, and that was that they ought not to be permitted to be held along with similar preferments in any other University. He had no objection whatever to raise as to the suggestion which had been thrown out by the Government with respect to the erection of University buildings, for it was very desirable, he thought, that the new University should have a visible existence and a local habitation. But that would not satisfy the wishes of the hon. Member for Cork. His Amendment was entirely antagonistic to the principle of the Bill as he understood it. It was alleged that the Roman Catholics of Ireland were unfairly treated with regard to higher education; but on examining into the matter he found that they enjoyed an exceptionally favourable position. Every hon. Member was aware that the Church of Ireland had long been connected with Trinity College, Dublin, and that Churchmen there enjoyed educational advantages of a high order; but they were also aware that the doors of the University of Dublin were open to all comers. And, again, as to the Queen's University, he found that for the year 1877-8 there were in attendance at the Queen's Colleges 348 Presbyterians and no fewer than 224 Roman Catholics, the members of the Church of England being 226, while there were 88 belonging to other denominations. The fact, therefore, was that even though Presbyterians were the most numerous, the advantages conferred by the Queen's University were enjoyed by students of all denominations. He must, however, observe, as to the Roman Catholics, that it seemed to be generally forgotten in the course of the debate that there was in Ireland such a College as Maynooth which was exclusively the property of Roman Catholics, which was not open to Protestants, and which was entirely free from the control of that House, and that not less than £1,000,000 of the public money had in one way or another been expended upon that College. That being so, he could not help thinking that, with the Queen's Colleges and the University of Dublin also open to them, the complaints which were made by the Roman Catholics of Ireland on the score of inequality as regarded education were not well founded. No doubt, it was generally understood that Maynooth was reserved for the education of candidates for the priesthood; but if the Roman Catholic authorities were apprehensive that the minds of young priests might be contaminated by association with laymen of their own communion, that was their concern, and not the fault of Parliament. It seemed to him that the Protestant Members of that House ought to do everything which they could to encourage education in Ireland; and, for his own part, he would concede to Roman Catholics everything which he conceived he would be entitled to ask for himself in a Roman Catholic country. He did not think, however, that the House ought to be required to concede more. He thought the privileges allowed to Protestants in the City of Rome, under the temporal rule of the Pope, might be fairly taken as the measure of the concessions which Roman Catholics were entitled to seek from a Protestant Legislature. He would ask hon. Gentlemen opposite whether any one of the Popes of modern times would have given to Protestants residing in Rome such advantages as were already freely accorded by Parliament to the Roman Catholics of Ireland? But he was willing to go still further—to give them more than they would give to him—and should have no objection to see the provisions of the Bill extended. He should vote for the second reading for two reasons—because he was willing to do all that he could to meet the wishes and the religious convictions of his Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, and because he regarded the Bill as a deliberate declaration by Parliament that it was not prepared to vote money for the endowment in Ireland of an educational institution which was not to be under the control of Parliament and for the efficient management of which Parliament could take no sufficient guarantee.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the general subject had been so ably dealt with on both sides of the House that he should not refer to it at any great length. If the hon. Member for the County of Cork went to a Division, he should certainly support the Amendment; but, at the same time, he should not vote against the Bill of the Government. The sole reason why he did not think he should be justified in voting against that measure was, that, although obnoxious and unsatisfactory in probably every other respect, it was very satisfactory in this respect, that it was an excellent unsettling Bill. It was a Bill which broke up some very obnoxious institutions which introduced the thin end of the wedge of change into the existing educational system in Ireland; and while Her Majesty's Government might think they were entitled to stop there he had no doubt whatever that the National Party would drive home the wedge before they were done with the subject. The Bill, as it at present stood, might be thus summarized, taken in connection with existing institutions which were not intended to be touched. They had Intermediate Education, recently reinforced and improved, with the object of preparing young men for Colleges. They had the Queen's Colleges to receive them in view of the supporters of denominationalism and secularism in Ireland; and now they were to have an extended University, to which the Queen's Colleges would have the same access as ever, and which would be assisted by a considerable endowment from the public funds. It was said the funds that would be spent on the new University would be equally open to Catholics. That was evidently not the case, because these funds could not be equally open to competition so long as Protestant and non-Catholic students had exceptional and special advantages and facilities in professional halls for being educated for these prizes, while the Catholics of Ireland received no such facilities whatever. Although the Bill, as it stated, was an amplification and extension of secular education in Ireland, yet expressions had been dropped by various Members of the Government, and by the more advanced and truly Liberal Members of the Liberal Party, which did not deprive the Irish Members of a hope that the measure might possibly be amended in Committee. Besides, the Bill proposed to do away with the Queen's University in Ireland; and, while it was all very well to talk about the Queen's Colleges being left untouched, it would be necessary in the new University to raise the standard of secular education; and the moment that was done the present education given in these Colleges would be no longer fit to qualify men to obtain University degrees. It was not known, except to those who had studied this question, that the Queen's University was founded for a severe degree examination, and that the Colleges did not prepare their students to pass that examination, and that they accordingly proposed to lower it, and, in spite of the protests of the graduates of Cork, Galway, and Belfast, the old degree examination was adulterated down to the level necessary in order, to quote the words of Vice President Andrews—

“To allow of the presentation of a good number of students for degrees at the annual examination in the presence of the public in Dublin Castle.”

This Bill could be no settlement; it was the beginning of great changes in the Queen's Colleges which, ultimately, it would revolutionize. It was impossible to lay hands on the Queen's University, and to leave the Queen's Colleges untouched. It would be necessary to raise the standard of secular education, as it now stood, to qualify for a University degree. Then, the Bill would encourage the National Party in Ireland not to stop or stay until, by levelling up or levelling down, they had placed the Roman Catholics on a footing of equality with their Protestant fellow-countrymen. Englishmen must not be misled by the figures which were sometimes used to show the success of the Queen's Colleges. There were, it was true, 900 students in these Colleges; but of these, 600 were medical or professional students. Only 200 or 250 of these students were Art students, yet, out of these, there were 25 Roman Catholic students at the Cork College, 20 at Galway, and 3 at Belfast. Now, the Queen's Colleges were not originally intended to be mere professional schools. They were intended to be the medium of giving a University Education to the youth of Ireland. In that they had failed, as the figures he had quoted showed. How had these Colleges had the success which was supposed as professional schools? It was perfectly true that the Colleges of Belfast and Cork were good medical schools; but good medical schools existed in those towns before the Queen's Colleges were established there, a were not created, but were simply annexed by the Colleges. The so-called Medical School of Galway had no real existence. Therefore, even in regard to medical education, these Colleges had not had the success which was supposed, while their Arts Faculties had been a complete failure. However they might regard the question, this Bill was certain to be the forerunner of great changes; as it stood, it was suspected by the whole of the Catholics and many of the Protestants of Ireland. The reason why he did not oppose the second reading was, that the Bill held out such hope of thoroughly unsettling everything that at present existed in Ireland in the way of education as to insure that the question must be thoroughly treated at some other time when, perhaps, the Government might be a little less afraid of the ultra-Protestants, and the Front Opposition Bench might be able to look at Irish questions with a little less dependence upon the ultra-Radicals. Anyhow, whether it came to be a question of levelling up or levelling down, the Irish people were determined to be placed on a level in the matter of education.

MR. J. P. CORRY said, that as he presumed he was one of those narrow and bigoted Conservative Members to whom his hon. Friend the Member for Cork referred so pointedly in his able and humorous speech he felt bound to say a few words. Knowing, as he did, the feeling of the North of Ireland on this subject, he had some right to express his views. His hon. Friend thought that unless they had denominational Colleges endowed in Ireland there could be no real University Education. He, on the other hand, was very strongly of opinion that if this Government, or any other, proposed the endowment of Roman Catholic Colleges it would upset them. His hon. Friend had referred to the Intermediate Education Bill of last year. So far as the granting of Exhibitions and premiums to the students was concerned, he was thoroughly at one with those who supported the proposal; but he altogether objected to the payment of result fees to denominational institutions. His hon. Friend had said that he (Mr. Corry) was so strong a Party man that, no matter what measure was proposed by the Government, he would vote for it. But he could conscientiously say that if the Government proposed to endow any denominational institutions he would certainly oppose them. His hon. Friend the Member for North-East Lancashire referred to the money given to Maynooth. That seemed to have been kept out of sight in every debate since 1869, when a large sum was handed over to that College. If it had not been for that, and if the money had to be voted annually, they would not have had the opposition to the grant to the Queen's Colleges which they now had to contend with every year. He was quite of opinion that what the Chief Secretary for Ireland had shadowed forth in addition to this Bill would meet the wants of University Education in Ireland. In connection with the Queen's Colleges, there was about £4,000 a-year given in Exhibitions. That was a large amount; but there were no Fellowships attached to them. He would strongly urge the Government to establish Fellowships of a substantial amount, to be competed for, not only by students of the Queen's Colleges, but by students from outside. If an equal amount to that now given in College prizes were given to students outside, it would be in the first place, at all events, a very fair settlement of the question. He was very glad his right hon. Friend intended to propose that there should be University buildings, libraries, museums, and other appliances in connection with the new institution. In such matters the Queen's University had hitherto felt a great want. He agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) in preferring that the existing University should have been continued and extended; but he presumed the Government had some reason for the change proposed. He hoped the House would hear from them the reason for making the change. He sympathized with the graduates of the Queen's University in the extension of their University, and he hoped the Government would take the views expressed by them into serious consideration. He thoroughly supported this Bill, especially with the additions foreshadowed by his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland; and he was anxious that it should be thoroughly debated and decided that night.

MR. FAWCETT said, it would be generally admitted that the House had been placed in a position of unusual—

he might almost say unprecedented—perplexity, by the extraordinary course adopted by the Government. So far as he was aware, what had recently occurred, and especially that evening, had never happened before. A Bill calmly considered, and obtaining a large amount of support, had been introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon. He had not intended to support that Bill; but he could not conceal from himself that it met with an unusual amount of support from Irish Members and from many distinguished Members sitting on that (the Opposition) side of the House. That Bill was fully discussed, and at the end of the discussion, without a word of warning, the Government suddenly announced that they were going to introduce a Bill of their own. In a Session when Members were constantly told that there was not time for the practical Business of the House, when many important measures had to be abandoned, when Supply had been huddled up and thrust into the last corner of the Session, surely a Government anxious to economize the time of the House might have adopted some other course than, at the end of a Wednesday Sitting, announcing that they were going to meet the Bill of the hon. Member for Roscommon with a measure of their own? But, strange as that proceeding was, what happened that evening was infinitely more strange. A Bill was introduced in the House of Lords by almost the most important Member of the Government—the Lord Chancellor—who, above all others, would be supposed, from his intimate acquaintance with University Education in Ireland, to have been prepared with a matured and not an inchoate and ill-considered measure; that Bill was discussed on the second reading, and passed subsequent stages without a word of warning as to what was coming. What was the House asked to do now? Not to give a second reading to the Bill introduced by the Lord Chancellor, the Bill which had obtained the assent of the House of Lords; but, without having seen it, to give a second reading to an entirely new Bill. He had almost thought of appealing to Mr. Speaker, as a question of Order, whether such a proceeding was not absolutely an infringement of the Rules of the House; whether it was not, at any rate, laying down a precedent which might have extremely awkward and inconvenient results? The second reading of a Bill was not an empty form, an idle sham; it was the affirmation of a principle. What was the Bill which was introduced and had passed the House of Lords—the Bill which, so far as the printed document was before them, they had to consider that evening? It was simply a Bill for extending the examining functions, the degree-conferring powers of an existing University in Ireland. But what was that Bill suddenly, without a word of warning, converted into? A Bill for the endowment of a new University. That was an entirely distinct and different proposal. He did not wish hastily and prematurely to express an opinion; but he would say that nothing was more dangerous than for that House to affirm a Bill which they had not yet seen in print, and to assent to proposals which might assume altogether a different character when they had an opportunity of seeing them on the Paper. Whatever their opinions might be on the vague and shadowy proposals sketched by the Government that evening, the House ought not to allow this entirely new Bill to be read a second time, unless they received from the Leader of the House some more distinct and precise explanations than had yet been given of it, and also a distinct assurance that before they were asked to go into Committee the nature and the amount of endowment should be placed on the Table. Unless they received a distinct assurance to that effect, after the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) was disposed of, he should move the adjournment of the debate. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork, read in the light of his speech, amounted to a declaration that no solution of the University Question in Ireland would be satisfactory without some distinct endowment in the shape of result fees, or in some other form. To such a proposal as that he could not give his consent. The hon. Member for Cork had attributed certain motives to a section of the Liberal Party. He said the Front Opposition Bench was influenced, almost coerced, by a section of the Liberal Party, which had but one object in view—to steal away from Catholics that faith to which they were attached. The hon. Member for Cork had a perfect right to say their opinions were wrong, ‘ mischievous; but he had no right to attribute motives. Let him specify more distinctly who those Members were to whom he referred as anxious to sap the foundations of Catholic faith. He could only say for himself, so far as any opinions he had expressed or any action he had taken on the subject, he had but one motive—to place the Irish people in exactly the same position with reference to University Education as the people of England and Scotland. In his own University no one would work more cordially than he was prepared to do in getting any remaining disabilities removed. One of the first things which the Liberal Government would be called on to do whenever they came into Office would be to remove those disabilities, and if they did not do so they would be forsaken by nine-tenths of their supporters. They would have to sweep away every vestige of denominationalism, so as to leave University Education in England what they wished it to be in Ireland. In this matter of University Education there was no middle course—they must either have freedom or restriction. With regard to the proposals of the Government, of course, they had to consider both their original and their new Bill. There was great force in the argument of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney)—the nature and extent of what was called the Irish Catholic grievance had been greatly over-estimated. It was said, for instance, that the Queen's Colleges had been failures. But the Queen's Colleges had never had a fair chance. The Irish people had never been allowed to go freely to them. Not only had they been subject to the constant opposition of the Catholic Prelates, but, what was worse, they had been made the victims of political intrigue. When left alone they had exhibited a steady and sure progress; but, from 1865, they had been tampered with. The Catholics had shown great anxiety to go to the Queen's Colleges; if not, why should Catholic Bishops have fulminated severe denunciations against parents for sending their sons to them? Cardinal Cullen and Dr. Derry had gone so far as to threaten to deprive them of the Eucharist and of the Last Sacrament; they could not have gone further if the object had been to deter parents or their children from some great immorality. Much of this

Catholic grievance was not a natural grievance; it had been artificially created; and it ought not to receive from this House so much consideration as it would be entitled to if it were a natural grievance of spontaneous growth. He should be asked—"Do you think, then, that nothing requires to be done, and that everything should be allowed to remain as it is?" Of course, in politics they could not always be logical, and so anxious did he feel that no Irishman should be placed at the least disadvantage in regard to University Education that he would sacrifice some logical consistency rather than run the slightest risk of placing Catholics at a disadvantage. With the precedent of the London University before him, and the promise of a Charter for a new University for the North of England, he was not prepared to resist the claim embodied in the first draft of the Government Bill, so that it might be possible to obtain a degree in Ireland without going to a particular institution for instruction. But he could not support the Bill of the Government, because it did a thing desirable in itself in the most undesirable way it was possible for the ingenuity of man to devise. He had not heard an argument to show why the Government should destroy an existing University in order to carry out the small change of conferring degrees on those who had not attended particular Colleges. When that principle was applied to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, what would have been said if it had been proposed to destroy them in order to set up a new University? Why did not the Government give the Queen's University the power of conferring degrees upon others than those educated at the Queen's Colleges? There would be no legal difficulties in the way, no infringement of the Prerogative of the Crown. All that was necessary was to say it should be lawful for the Queen to amend the Charter of the Queen's University, so as to allow of the desired change being made. However, if destruction were deemed necessary, it ought to be nominal only, and members of the existing University and of its Senate should be transferred to the new University. As to the suggested endowment, the Government must have some scheme. It could not be that the Chief Secretary for Ireland had simply said in a careless way—"Let us throw in a sop, and say we will give some endowment, just to satisfy the Irish Members." The creation of a new University was a very important matter. The House had a right to explicit information as to the amount of endowment, the number and conditions of the Scholarships, the Professorships, and the Fellowships. Then, again, they had a right to know whether there would be new University buildings. These, and other points, would have to be sifted before legislative sanction was given to the Bill. As the Government seemed to be perplexed to know what to do with the Irish Church Fund, why should they not devote a portion of it to this purpose, instead of taking money from the English and Scotch taxpayers? The only pledge that had been given with respect to the Surplus was, that it should not be devoted to denominational purposes; and as £1,000,000 had been devoted to Intermediate Education, and £1,500,000 was proposed to be applied to the provision of pensions for school teachers, why should not the same Surplus furnish what was required for the new University, unless the Government feared that it would be denominational in its character? Again, it would be a great advantage to sever this new University from an annual Parliamentary Vote. Nothing could be worse for a new University than to be made the subject of political discussions and the victim of political intrigue. It was sometimes said by Irish Members—"Oh, a certain section of English Members wish to govern Ireland according to English ideas;" but, to make a slight alteration in the words, he thought that a more unfortunate phrase than that of "governing Ireland according to Irish ideas" had never been invented. Governing Ireland according to Irish ideas led straight to Home Rule, and Home Rule simply meant disruption of the Empire. They all knew that undenominational education was alike a boon to England and Ireland; and they were, therefore, determined to maintain the principle. They believed that it was a great advantage to Ireland that people of different religious convictions should be brought harmoniously together, so that they might forget their bitter sectarian differences. They believed it was of advantage for England; and they knew it was an advantage for Ireland; and they also believed that one of the great hopes of the people of that country was that they should be no longer torn asunder by denominational differences and political rancour.

THE O'CONOR DON thought the subject was quite wide enough already, without entering upon a discussion of Home Rule, or denominational education. He desired, at the outset, to express the great sense of responsibility he felt in taking part in the debate. He could only say that he had never addressed the House under a feeling of greater difficulty than at the present moment. One of the reasons why he felt himself placed in a position of such great difficulty was the reason supplied by his hon. Friend who had just addressed the House (Mr. Fawcett)—namely, that whilst a skeleton Bill had been before the country for the last few weeks—it was not that Bill which they were asked to discuss, but something else which had been shadowed out in a very vague manner by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. His hon. Friend who last addressed the House spoke in his speech of the great change that was to be made in the Bill; but he (the O'Connor Don) confessed that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman had left him quite uncertain as to whether the actual Bill was to be changed at all or not. It might be that the right hon. Gentleman meant to ask them to accept the present skeleton measure, and merely to suggest that when the Senate it proposed to constitute had been firmly established an application should be made to Parliament for funds to enable it to provide the prizes he had indicated. He did not feel sure that there was to be any provision in the Bill upon the financial question, and if there was, they were left in ignorance as to its direction and amount. They did not know what was to be done, even as regarded the present emoluments of the Queen's Colleges. If these new Scholarships, Exhibitions, and prizes were to be founded under the new University, were they to be competed for by the Queen's College students, and were the Queen's College students to hold, in addition to them, the prizes which they had at present? They were in ignorance on that point. They did not know whether the Scholarships which were at present in existence were to be thrown open to students who would come from other places to have the advantage of the University if it came into existence, or whether they were to be reserved as the special prizes of those students who would also be allowed to compete for the new prizes which were to be given. In the absence of such information they approached the question under the greatest difficulties. He had, personally, some reason to complain. He had placed before the House a Bill of the fullest character, and concealing nothing. He had explained its object. It was distinctly stated by several of his hon. Friends who followed him that if the Bill was found not to carry out the intentions of its promoters, which had been clearly laid before the House, the promoters were perfectly willing to amend it. But what did the Government say? What did the Home Secretary say? He said—"Oh, it is all very well for hon. Gentlemen to talk about intentions. We must look at the Bill as it is. We must look at the Bill as laid on the Table, and the Bill, according to our interpretation, does not carry out the intentions which the promoters profess to desire to carry out." This objection came from a powerful Government with a large majority at its back, which had it in its power to alter the measure as it thought fit. And yet the same Government now brought down a Bill which in itself was utterly valueless, and said there was something else to be added to it which ought to give satisfaction. What did the Government propose to give them? As far as he could gauge their promises, there were to be certain prizes and Scholarships and Fellowships established, for which the students of the Queen's Colleges, who were to be students under the new University, and anyone else, were to be allowed to compete. They proposed, at the same time, to retain for the Queen's Colleges all their present endowments; and then they came forward and told them that this was equality, and that it ought to give satisfaction to the Irish people. What had been all along the demand of the Irish people? What they had demanded was equality; what they said was that they had not been given the means of obtaining that education which would enable them to secure University training. The existing inequality would be only made the more patent by placing in the same University Colleges richly endowed, and then asking them to compete with institutions to which the State did not give a farthing. Surely the demand made by the Irish people ought to commend itself to the most extreme politicians sitting on that side of the House. They were not asking for anything in the shape of religious endowments. They had a right to select the institutions to which they would send their children to receive secular education; and those institutions ought to be treated in the same manner as similar institutions were from which, for conscientious reasons, many young Irishmen were excluded. That was not a principle held by Roman Catholics exclusively, for it was embodied in a Memorial presented to the House by the Wesleyan body last year. They, owing to conscientious objections, could not send their children to certain State-supported schools, and they complained that the fact that their own schools were deprived of public grants was an infringement of religious liberty; and he agreed with the memorialists that it was. As he had said, the parents had a right to select the schools to which they would send their children, and the State ought to assist them in obtaining secular education. That was the principle to which he endeavoured to give effect in the Bill which he had introduced. What he asked for was an extension of the principle recognized and adopted in the Intermediate Education Bill of last year. By that Bill, rewards were given to students; but grants were made also to the institutions in which they were educated. But, said the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the Intermediate Education Act dealt merely with children, and the University would deal with young men; but the right hon. Gentleman forgot that the children so dealt with ranged from 15 to 18 years of age. Such an argument as that used was simply a trifling with the House, because there was no real difference between the class of students who went to the intermediate schools and those who went to the University Colleges. They were told that the University Colleges were more denominational than were the intermediate schools. But what were the intermediate schools? Why, they were the most essentially denominational schools to be found in Ireland. There were amongst them Jesuit schools, schools conducted by religious ladies, and ecclesiastical seminaries, which were attended by children of one denomination only. A Conscience Clause applied to such schools was a perfect farce. He had so stated last year, because he knew that to speak of a Conscience Clause as regarded those schools would be merely to throw dust in the eyes of the public. But with respect to the University Colleges, he thought a Conscience Clause might much more easily and effectually be applied than it could be to the intermediate schools. Then there was the point as to inspection. The intermediate schools, it was said, were inspected, and there was no proposal to inspect the University Colleges. That was altogether a mistake. There was no inspection of the denominational schools. How, he asked, could they justify the payment of the result fees to the intermediate schools, and refuse them to the intermediate Colleges which prepared young men for the University? The wording of the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Cork had been criticized; but all it asked was an extension of the principle which had been adopted last year. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard had twitted the Chief Secretary for Ireland with his ignorance of the state of education in the country, and alluded to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman seemed to entertain the view that residence in the Queen's Colleges was necessary. [Mr. J. LOWTHER denied that he had said so.] He did not charge the right hon. Gentleman with that; but the hon. Member for Liskeard did. Then, having informed the House that Collegiate residence was not necessary in the Queen's University system, he quoted a most eloquent passage from the writings of Cardinal Newman, with every word of which he (the O'Connor Don) agreed, the whole point of the extract being in favour of Collegiate residence, and apparently thought that he was strengthening by that the case for the Queen's Colleges. The hon. Member was also very uneasy lest the very high standard of education in the Queen's Colleges should be injured by the establishment of this new University. He wished the hon. Gentleman really knew what the standard of education maintained at the Queen's University was. He had been informed by a gentleman, on whose word he could place the utmost reliance and who was the head of one of the intermediate schools, that, within the last year, boys from his institution who held a very low place there had gone up to the Queen's University and not only matriculated, but gained Exhibitions and prizes, although, in his school, they were not at all able to take front rank in the examination. It was notorious in Ireland that in order to gain students the Queen's College standard had been lowered to such an extent as to prejudice the education of the country. One of the great results which he hoped would be obtained by the institution of a new University was the raising of the standard of education, which the Queen's University had so greatly lowered. He trusted that the Government would explain more clearly before the close of the debate what they really proposed, and whether their proposals were or were not to be embodied in the Bill. For himself, hazarding his own individual opinion, he did not think that a proposal which would give prizes and rewards to be competed for in a common University by institutions largely endowed, and institutions which had no endowments whatever, would be satisfactory. To accept the proposal would be to give up the principle which he and his Friends had fought for so long. He could not, therefore, accept the proposal as a settlement of the University Education Question.

Mr. GÖSCHEN said, he did not propose to trouble the House with any lengthened observations upon the Bill. He thought there was a general feeling among hon. Members to the effect that they were placed under some disadvantage in discussing the measure, because they did not precisely know what the proposals of the Government were. His hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had already alluded to the extraordinary fact that they learned on that evening for the first time the intention of the Government with regard to finance, in relation to which not one word escaped the lips of any of the Colleagues of the Leader of the House in "another place." The Chancellor of the Exchequer had been asked to give explanations upon this point. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would feel that it was due, not only to that House, but to the House of Lords, that those explanations should be forthcoming. At the same time, he thought it was scarcely satisfactory that they should only hear those explanations at the end of the debate. The absence up to that moment of such explanations reminded him of another occasion, when, after the House had discussed a Bill for a whole day, one of Her Majesty's Ministers at the close of the debate gave some explanations which completely changed the whole aspect of affairs. He hoped the explanations to be given would be satisfactory, and would not be confined to the one point which he had mentioned. It was quite possible that actual clauses could not be passed in the House of Lords relating to money; but surely it was incumbent upon the Government to state, when presenting their Bill, this important fact—that the House of Lords did not have before them the whole case, and that the most important feature of the Bill—namely, the question of finance—was reserved to be introduced when the Bill should be read a second time in the House of Commons. These circumstances appeared to be still more remarkable, when it was remembered that a statement was made in “another place” that the Bill had been carefully considered, though it appeared to hon. Members on this side of the House that the Bill was only a 10 minutes' Bill. If the measure was in the minds of the Government before the commencement of the Session, they were entitled to know whether this endowment of the University formed part of the original scheme. The hon. Member who had spoken last had indicated some further questions, upon the answer to which depended their whole attitude towards the Bill. He regretted that they had been obliged to debate the Bill without the requisite knowledge respecting those important questions. Was it intended by this Bill to open up the whole scheme with regard to the endowment of Universities, or only to introduce certain clauses which would leave the Senate to deal with the matter hereafter? If it were intended to follow the latter course, he could only say that Parliament would be handing over to the Senate of the University difficulties which were baffling Government and Parliament, and which it eminently baffled Government and Parliament to settle themselves. Parliament was entitled to know the whole policy of Her Majesty's Government, and he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would make what might be called a “clean breast” on this question. At present, the House was not at all acquainted with the scale of endowment which was intended. Nor did they know whether it was proposed that the endowments to be given to the University were to be tenable by students of the Queen's Colleges, which already possessed endowments on their own account—endowments intended for the extension of University Education in Ireland, or whether the endowments to be proposed were to be of the nature of certain Scholarships, available only to those who were non-resident students and who did not belong to any of the Colleges. It seemed to him that the difference between what appeared to be the present proposals of the Government and those which the Leader of the Home Rule Party had announced himself ready to accept had become very small indeed, and that possibly a golden opportunity might thus be afforded for that settlement of the question which, he believed, hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House most earnestly desired. He could not admit that the Home Rule Party were begging the question, when they said they were ready to accept results fees in addition to an endowment, because that was much less than had been demanded by the Roman Catholics in Ireland on previous occasions. He could not but think that Her Majesty's Government would do well to adopt, with modifications, the suggestion of the Leader of the Home Rule Party. It appeared to him that the difference between the Government and those speaking on behalf of the Irish was now so small that, if there was any desire on both sides to settle the question, an agreement might very soon be arrived at. He was sure that he spoke the views of a great many who sat on that side of the House, when he said that they would not grudge the Government the credit of settling this thorny and difficult question in a satisfactory manner. The only point of difference between the Government and the hon. Member for Cork appeared to be that the Government proposed to pay to the successful student a certain sum of money, whereas the Member for Cork wished that the institution which prepared him should share the fees. But it had already been pointed out that this principle had been accepted by Her Majesty's Government, and the distinction which had been drawn by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland as to the youth of the students was not one which would hold good. He did not wish, in the present state of the discussion, to give any decided opinion on the Bill; but it appeared to him that the difference was now becoming so small that, with the goodwill of the House, this difficult question might now be settled. The speech of the hon. Member was, he must say, a most moderate one; so moderate, that it must have commended itself not only to those who sat on that side of the House, but also to those who sat opposite. He stated distinctly the sense in which he wished his Amendment to be supported. He must say that the course of the Government, in amplifying their own Bill, showed that the hon. Member was perfectly justified in putting his Amendment on the Paper. Under the circumstances, he should feel it his duty to support the Amendment of the hon. Member; and if that was negatived, he should hope that the Bill might be so amended as to bring about a settlement of this thorny and difficult question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Although I cannot say that the result of this evening's discussion is to leave us in perfect harmony with regard to all the difficult points of this question, yet I think I may fairly congratulate the House on the tone and spirit in which the discussion has been carried on, and the evident desire that has been manifested in all parts of the House to consider this question in a fair and reasonable spirit, and, above all things, the desire to arrive at a practical and useful settlement in which we shall regard much more the object to be attained than the credit which may belong to particular persons in advancing towards it. I am sure that this is the spirit in which a question like that now under consideration ought to be approached. No doubt, there have been for many years attempts made by different persons in different senses, all of which attempts I am willing to believe were made in the most thoroughly honest spirit and with a full desire to arrive at practical results; and I hope that we are now prepared not to go back more than is needful on old sores, but that we are desirous to arrive at a practical settlement. I am asked, in the first place—and that is the question which I ought first to attend to—to explain what is the precise proposition which the Government, as has been indicated by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, desire to make in Committee on this Bill. There are several points on which I should wish to say a few words; but after the direct appeal which has been made to me by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) who has just sat down, I ought explicitly to state what our proposal is. In the first place, I must take exception to what the right hon. Gentleman said with regard to this being a proposal which had no foreshadowing in the discussions on this Bill "elsewhere." The right hon. Gentleman referred in such terms to those debates that it is necessary for me to quote a few words that were used by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor in a discussion on this measure. He said—

"The London University has a grant made to it annually by the State for that purpose in the Votes of Parliament. For this year you will find that there are several thousands—I cannot remember the precise amount—to be paid to the London University, in order that they may be able to confer Exhibitions, Scholarships, and rewards of that kind upon those who pass examinations satisfactorily. I want to guard myself to show that it is to a state of things of that kind that my observations point. But that is not denominational education. That is a system of open rewards given to all comers capable of winning them, and it is one of the best ways of promoting education. If the University created by the Bill were to come to Parliament next year or the year after, and say that, for the purpose of advancing learning in Ireland, it would be highly desirable that we should arm it with the power to confer Exhibitions and rewards of the same kind—if the University came to Parliament with a demand of that kind, no objection would be taken by Parliament on the ground that it was a grant for denominational education."—[3 Hansard, cexlvii. 1860.]

In those words my noble and learned Friend exactly shadowed forth the views taken by the Government of what was the nature of the proposal we should have to make. We have objected throughout these discussions to anything in the nature of an endowment of a denominational system. We expressed that objection upon the discussion of the Bill of the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don); and it is the objection which we entertain to the endowment of a denominational system that, at the present time, prevents us from coming to an ag

ment with the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw) and with those who desire to introduce proposals which we think would lead to the endowment of a denominational system. Then we had to consider what we could do in this matter. The object of this Bill, as it was explained in "another place," and as it has also been explained by my right hon. Friend to-night, was to remove a grievance, or, as my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, I think, said, rather to supply a deficiency in the University system of Ireland. That deficiency was occasioned by the fact that there was not in that country a National University at which degrees could be obtained by those who did not belong to certain particular Colleges, and the scope of the Bill was to remedy that defect by providing for the constitution of a University which would give those facilities. That is the particular and the main object of the Bill; but undoubtedly we feel that merely to establish such a University might be considered a very imperfect act, unless we were prepared to furnish the means, which are necessary for the conduct and for the development of a University. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Lancashire (Mr. Holt) speaking on this subject a little while ago and expressing his approval of the course which, in the circumstances, Her Majesty's Government are taking in this Bill, expressed also his hope that we should be prepared to supplement that course by making a grant, and, as he said, a liberal grant for prizes and Exhibitions, and for other purposes connected with the University. Now, the proposal which we intend to make is this. It was, I thought, sufficiently indicated by the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, when he introduced the Bill this evening; but as those remarks do not appear to have been fully understood I will endeavour to make them still clearer. It is intended to propose in Committee on this Bill a clause, which clause my right hon. Friend will place on the Paper to-morrow, and which I think he stated would be to a certain effect, though he could not at the moment bind himself to the precise words, because they required legal revision. But the nature of the proposal is that there shall be in this Bill a clause which shall declare that it shall be the duty of the Senate, within 12 months after their first appointment, to prepare a scheme for the better advancement of University Education in Ireland by the provision of buildings, including examination rooms and a library, in connection with the University to be founded under this Act, and by the establishment of Exhibitions, Scholarships, Fellowships, and other prizes, or any of such matters in which scheme the following conditions shall be observed:—

"First, that the said several prizes shall be awarded for proficiency in subjects of secular education, and not in respect of any subject of religious instruction. Secondly, that they shall be open to all students matriculating or who have matriculated in the said University, and the scheme may propose that they shall be awarded in respect of either relative or absolute proficiency."

I call the attention of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) to these expressions—

"Thirdly, in fixing the value and number of the said several prizes, the Senate shall have regard to the advantages of a similar kind offered by the University of Dublin and Trinity College, Dublin, to students in that University, so as to avoid, as far as possible, injury to the advancement of learning in that University and College. Fourthly, that provision shall be made that no student holding any Scholarship or similar prize in Trinity College, Dublin, or in the Queen's Colleges, shall hold any prize or Scholarship in the new University founded under this Act without taking such other Scholarship or other prize into account."

That is the nature, generally speaking, of the proposal which is to be made. [Mr. FAWCETT: What is meant by relative and absolute proficiency?] I think the hon. Gentleman will see that relative proficiency means superiority in a competitive examination, while absolute proficiency is rather in the nature of coming up to a test standard. That is a proposal which, as the House will see, is made with reference to the duties that the Senate will perform; and directions will be given to it when constituted to prepare such a scheme. But it will be clearly understood that the scheme will be of no effect whatever unless it is accepted, and unless the funds to carry it out are provided by Parliament. Therefore, we are not liable to the charge which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) suggested that we might be liable to of throwing on the Senate that which the House ought rather to undertake to deal with; but we provide that a scheme of an academical character, and which must be framed with a due regard to academical considerations, shall, in the first instance, be elaborated by an academical body, in the quiet of its own apartments, and then submitted for approval to Parliament in order that provision may be made for giving effect to it. Having, I hope, now explained at all events, what the view of the Government is, our conduct will, I think, be seen to have been entirely consistent in this matter. I do not know whether there is any further explanation that may be asked for; but I shall be most ready to give any that can be desired.

MR. GOSCHEN: Why was not that introduced when the Bill was before the House of Lords?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have said already that in the discussions in the House of Lords the Lord Chancellor did state what the views of the Government were. But I must remind the House of what has been the position which the Government has taken in the matter from the commencement of the Session. In the beginning of the Session, and before it began, there is no doubt that the subject of University Education occupied the attention of the Government both here and in Ireland, and that it was a question for us whether we should or should not deal with that subject in the present Session. We communicated, and we considered, and we discussed the question, among ourselves; but we came to the conclusion that we would not undertake to bring in a Bill this Session; and among the reasons which we gave for not bringing in a Bill, one—and it was a very important one—was this. That we had last year established a new system with regard to Intermediate Education, and we were anxious to wait until we had seen how that new system worked before we proceeded further in the task of dealing with the higher or University Education. It was in consequence of the action of the hon. Member for Roscommon—the action which he had clearly the most complete right to initiate, but which he had taken without communication with, or without any reference to, the Government—it was in consequence of our being obliged to say “Aye” or “No” to his proposals, that we felt it impossible to say “Aye,” and also impossible to give a simple negative without explaining, to some extent, what we ourselves were prepared to do. What we were prepared to do at once was that which is indicated in the Bill as to its main purpose; and with regard to what might be necessary in respect to grants which might be made hereafter, it appeared to us that it would be the best course to leave that matter to be dealt with when the Senate was constituted. That was the reason why, in the original Bill, as introduced into the House of Lords, nothing was said about the prizes and Exhibitions, and other grants, because we thought all that would be best left to the Senate when it was constituted and brought into operation. That was the view the Lord Chancellor had when he made those observations. But we have since thought that, in order to prevent misunderstanding, and to show clearly what the whole mind of the Government was, it would be better that instructions to the Senate should be put into the Act of Parliament of such a nature as to indicate what was the line in which the Government and the Legislature wished the Senate to proceed. Their action, as I have said before, will not be final, but will be the subject to the decision of Parliament; and I hope the result of this will be that we may arrive at something of a satisfactory character. I would say a very few words on a point which has naturally been raised by some few of those who have expressed themselves in an unfavourable manner towards this Bill. I say some few, because, although it has been more or less critical upon the conduct of the Government, and although some Members have expressed their dissatisfaction at the Bill not going further, yet the general tenour of the debate has been in favour of a measure something like this. But we have had from the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) a distinct challenge. That hon. Member took us to task, and said—“Why do you want a Bill at all? Why are you not satisfied with the University as it now exists? You have a most excellent University in the Queen’s University, and most efficient institutions in the Queen’s Colleges. They are doing the work which they were set to do, and there is no reason in the world why the people of Ireland should not be content with them. And if there is any want of satisfaction, if in any respect these institutions do not give perfect satisfaction," adds the hon. Gentleman, "I am a member of the Senate of the University of London, and we are ready to supply all deficiencies." Well, the hon. Member, of course, comes forward as, to a certain extent, a competing tradesman, if I might use the expression, and he offers to the people of Ireland his wares, in case they are not pleased with those they now have.

MR. COURTNEY: I never said I was a member of the Senate of London University.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I beg pardon; the hon. Gentleman is an Examiner of that University. He spoke with some sensitiveness, I think, with regard to the proposed new University; because he said that the London University can do what is required, and he complained that this new University would be a competitor with the London University. I do not all blame the hon. Member for speaking up for the London University. It is a most admirable institution, and one that cannot be spoken of with too much praise. But I must say that I feel a little sympathy with those Irish Gentlemen who say that, good as the London University may be as a stop-gap, they would much prefer to have a University of their own. The hon. Gentleman says that the Irish people ought to be content with the University they have. I will not enter into that question. Perhaps they ought; but, as a matter of fact, they are not. The case is one in which nobody knows where the shoe pinches so well as the wearer of it. And as for the hon. Gentleman saying, "I am sure the shoe cannot hurt you, because it is exceedingly well made," that is not an answer to the observations made from the other side. And, moreover, the authority of statesmen of all Parties, as well as that of the Irish people themselves, is against the hon. Gentleman, because we have for years found statesmen of every Party and every shade of political opinion coming forward and saying there is no doubt that a need of this kind exists. Therefore, I think, we may set that aside. It is not necessary to go minutely into questions of statistics. These have been given over and over again. I think we may assume that, with the exception of the hon. Member for Liskeard, everybody is of opinion that there is room for improvement in the Irish University system. Well, granting that that is so, we are met with another question—"Why do you propose to dissolve the present Queen's University? Why not expand it?" I quite admit there is something to be said on that point—I do not at all disregard—I honour—the sentiment of honourable jealousy which animates those who have been educated at that University, and who are reluctant to see it apparently set aside. But we have to consider the object which we desire to accomplish—to provide for the deficiency in Irish University training. When Sir Robert Peel established the Queen's University he had not the experience we have gained by the great development of the London University since those days. That great development of the London University has shown what might be done by the expansion of the Queen's University. But since its establishment the Queen's University has acquired a certain character of its own; and, moreover, there is that connection between the Queen's University and the Queen's Colleges which renders it exceedingly difficult to expand the Queen's University without appearing to maintain a system which a large portion of the Irish people declare to be unsatisfactory. If you want to establish an Examining University, such as is now proposed, and to put the Queen's Colleges upon an even footing with other institutions, I think you gain a great deal by dissolving the existing University and making a new departure. If a mere expansion of the existing University took place, new institutions would come in, so to speak, on a secondary footing. Then we are asked—"Why are you going to endow"—as the expression is, though we do not use it—"Why are you going to endow by annual Votes, and not out of the Church Surplus?" Of course, there is a great temptation to endow out of a fund like the Church Surplus, and to put the matter quietly out of the control of Parliament. But that is exactly what we think ought not to be done, and what we understand Parliament would not assent to. We have, no doubt, done it in the case of Intermediate Education; and I think, on the whole, we were justified in making the experiment. But the House will feel, considering the thorny nature of the subject, that there is much more delicacy in dealing with a great University Question than with a system of Intermediate Education; and although we not like annual wrangle, we think the new system ought to be brought under the annual review of Parliament until, at least, it has taken root. It would, no doubt, be a great relief to get rid of these annual Votes for education, and, perhaps, even the learned Bodies concerned would benefit by it. But that time has not yet arrived. We do not hold out the idea of any sectarian endowment; but we agree that some means should be adopted to secure for the Irish people the advantages in the matter of a University which they do not now feel themselves able to obtain. We hope that the Bill may be accepted in the spirit in which it is presented; and we are very much encouraged by the mode in which the proposition has been made, and by the language that has been used in all quarters, and which, though not always in perfect agreement with us, has, nevertheless, been on the whole of a sympathetic character. I trust this may be the beginning of a settlement, which may be of the greatest utility to our friends in the sister country. We hope and believe that a proposal which is made in the full faith that if it is fairly worked it will accomplish great good, even if not the whole of the good that some may expect—we sincerely hope and believe that if that proposal is accepted in the spirit in which it is made it will be one which will confer real, great, and lasting benefits both on Ireland, and, I trust, also on this country.

MR. GLADSTONE: I entirely share the general desire of this House that these discussions should be so conducted as in no way to impair whatever chance or prospect there may be that the present Bill may be made the basis of settlement of a very difficult question. But the course of proceedings with regard to it on the part of the Government has been, I think, so important, and has produced, also, so unusual and so important a bearing upon the Forms of this House, and the Rules of this House, that are so essential to the character and conduct of its Business, that I cannot help making it the subject of notice. I shall endeavour to do so as in no way to prejudice the general discussion. I must say, however, at least, that I heard with surprise, and especially I heard with surprise for the first time in my life, a responsible Member of the Government and a Departmental Minister, propose to-night the second reading of a Government Bill closing his speech by expressing a hope that Members would not consider this an opportunity for questioning any principle. ["No, no!"] Well, those were the words used by the right hon. Gentleman. Now, the right hon. Gentleman must be perfectly well aware that the second reading of a Bill—

MR. J. LOWTHER: I referred to dividing against the Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: But the right hon. Gentleman did not use the words, "divide against the Bill." He used the words, "questioning any principle of the Bill." Does the right hon. Gentleman disclaim the words?

MR. J. LOWTHER: What I meant to say was, that I hoped the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment would not think this was an opportunity which would justify him in challenging the principle of the Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: That is an amendment of the words; but, still, it seems to me an extraordinary invitation to address to any hon. Member, because the second reading of a Bill is the precise opportunity presented by the Rules of the House for accepting or challenging the principle of the Bill. I am bound, however, to say, though I cannot approve, I can perfectly understand the singular attitude of the right hon. Gentleman, and which I think is the reason that lay at the bottom of it. The reason is this—he has in his hands, and he is asking the House now to give a second reading to one Bill; whereas he has in his mind, as we all know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the most important portion of the provisions which really point to another thing. The Government Bill which is now proposed for second reading is a totally different measure from that which we are asked to discuss in Committee. I put the points to this test—supposing that my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), or my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett)—I am not now quoting them with reference to the opinions of this or that Gentleman, or any particular Gentleman—had brought a Bill into this House to constitute an Examining Board in Ireland, and on the second reading had said he would not be himself loth to see introduced, or he would himself propose to introduce, in the Committee provisions for enabling the Senate of a University to present to Parliament, with its official authority, a complete scheme of endowment for certain purposes, I am quite sure, from all I have seen of the practice of this House, he would have been met on all sides with the observation—"The Bill which you are now shadowing forth to us may be good or bad; but it is a different Bill from that which you have laid on the Table. Your proper course is to withdraw the Bill you have laid on the Table, and present to us for second reading a Bill which you really mean us to discuss." It has just been said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there was an indication in "another place" of something of this kind. Now, I have some information, which I remember well, on that subject, and it is this—that considerable efforts were made, at a period corresponding to that which we have now reached, to draw forth the intentions of the Government on the subject; that these efforts ended in entire failure, and that the expression used was that the Bill expressed the present intention of the Government. The words which were used, and which have now been quoted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, are extremely vague words, and I think I am right in stating that they were not words used either on the introduction or on the second reading of the Bill. Therefore, Sir, the House of Lords was asked to examine a Bill totally different in its conditions from the Bill now shadowed forth by the clause of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am entirely at a loss to know why that clause should not have been made known to the House of Lords. I apprehend it is in no sense a clause such as the House of Lords could have no power to entertain. On the other hand, I think it a most unfortunate thing that a tolerably accurate acquaintance with the views and intentions of the Government should not be obtained at the time when a Bill is originally introduced to Parliament by a responsible Minister—the House of Lords should not even have before it the Bill which is presented to us in the House of Commons, or even the official statement with which it is submitted to us, and by which we first become aware of the real value of what is intended, at the close of the debate on the second reading. I feel it quite necessary to offer this protest against this mode of proceeding, because I am quite sure if it were allowed to pass as a precedent without such a protest—if the Government, who ought always to be watched more strictly in regard to these matters even than private Members, on account of the great power and influence they possess over the proceedings of the House—if they were to make a principle of this manner of making known in debate in the House of Commons a complete transference in their measures, the consequence would be to throw into total confusion the Business of the House, and to make some of its most important Rules perfectly useless. These observations, however, are devoted entirely to the method of procedure which has been adopted; and I, for one, am quite prepared to say that I will not desire, on this occasion, so to use any regulation connected with the mode of procedure as to impede the progress of this Bill, or to diminish its chances of success. There are a number of important points raised in the measure, three of which I will endeavour to discuss. First, it is intended to make over to the Senate the initiative, the whole scheme of—what shall I say?—the endowment?—the dotation?—the subvention? I do not want to raise a question on the form of the word. Secondly, it is intended that that subvention shall be given by an annual Vote; and, thirdly, it is intended, as indeed is implied in what I have said, that no recourse shall be had to the fund of the Established Church Surplus. All this must appear to me to be matter which calls for a good deal of discussion. I have some doubt as to the principle of the present division, and whether the Bill ought to make over any such right of initiative; and I have a still greater doubt whether it is wise to leave that scheme to the annual discussion of Parliament, and the chances there may be that passion, prejudice, and Party interest may gather round it. I think, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer says, it may be long before the institutions of this University have completely entered into the habits and feeling of the country so as to conform to its general views. But I must say, if there is any general class of institutions in the whole circle of our institutions which it is desirable to exempt from the influence of another discussion in Parliament the class of institutions is the one we know by the name of a University. Something like solidity, something tranquil, something like freedom from the waves of passion and Party interest is absolutely necessary to enable these institutions to conduct their work with freedom. However, these are matters which may be discussed in Committee, and that, no doubt, will be the proper place for discussion. I shall vote without any difficulty with my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw). It appears to me that this subvention ought to go beyond that which has been described by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the clause which he has read. I do not intend at present to attempt to give any special construction to the Motion of my hon. Friend, for which I am prepared to vote. He has put his own construction; but that construction is not so expressed in the Motion as to make it binding upon our consciences or understanding; and there is, as I think he will be quite prepared to admit, and as we have seen in the speech of the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), room for a considerable variety of opinions as to the precise form in which it may be right to make the pecuniary aid of Parliament contributory to the advancement of a superior education in Colleges in Ireland. That liberty of opinion I wish to reserve on my own part. That with which I agree is a sentiment which he has declared. I should be very sorry indeed to take the responsibility upon myself, having failed in an attempt to settle this great question, to introduce any obstacle in the way of those who are making an endeavour to settle it. The rule which I wish to take for my own guidance is this—this is pre-eminently an Irish question, and I do not wish, unless driven by some high consideration of Imperial policy, to separate myself in such a matter from those who represent the general and well-considered feelings of Ireland. Moreover, I will not lightly, or without good reason, nor without much consideration, and then only with reluctance, determine, if I find I am compelled, so to separate my path from theirs. This is their question more than it is ours. They have made, and are making, the most intelligent and conciliatory efforts to arrive at some settlement. It is my duty and business to co-operate with them as far as I can, and as far as I see, and that co-operation I cheerfully offer. Undoubtedly, one thing I could not do; having been myself a party to larger efforts and proposals than are contained in the Bill before the House, I could not be a party to forcing upon Ireland the acceptance of a Bill which I believe in itself to be inadequate. That, Sir, is a principle which I shall endeavour to be governed by in all future proceedings in this matter. And it will be to me, as it will be to them, and to all Members of this House, a sincere satisfaction if, out of an imperfect administrative proposal which is now on the Table, and in the shape of a printed Bill, such a measure can be framed as shall tend to give to Ireland the fulfilment of her highest expectations on a question of that vital importance.

MR. SULLIVAN: Sir, under no ordinary circumstances would I rise at a moment like this, at an hour so far advanced, and when many hon. Members regard the debate as closed. Yet I do appeal, as I never did before, to be allowed to speak what I feel must be spoken, at all hazards, before this Division, in justice to myself, in justice to the House, and in justice to the people I represent. It is hard on me to interrupt the flow of amiable felicitations by a jarring note of unpleasant truth; but there is something I value beyond the applause of these Benches, and that is my own character for truthfulness and honest dealing, and I should be deficient in each if I allowed you to act under the impression, which seems to prevail on all sides, that with this Bill you are happily going to satisfy and settle the Irish University Question. The remarkably conciliatory tone and substance of the speech delivered by my hon. Friend the Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw), and the extremely moderate proposals he made to the Government may, perhaps, induce the Government and the House to think that because he spoke in such a moderate and conciliatory tone, he places, or we place, but a small value on the demands he made. Let no one suppose that my hon. Friend attaches but a slight importance to the suggestion he has made; because the fact and truth is, if the Government are not in a position to accept the proposal of the hon. Member for Cork, this Bill will not be acceptable to the people of Ireland, and will not even temporarily settle the Irish University Question. I would ask the House to avoid self-delusion and consequent waste of effort. What is it that is demanded and required? The Catholics of Ireland require and demand a University to which they may send their sons for Collegiate training and University Education without violence to their conscientious convictions. No one else in Ireland is asking you for change, because you have already, nay, long ago, satisfied all others. If, then, this Bill does not meet the necessity of the Irish Catholics, and liquidate their demands, there is no reason for the Bill at all, and you are simply wasting your time. ["Oh!"] Well, just answer to yourselves candidly the question—Does this Bill give the Irish Catholics University Education as acceptable to them and as consonant with their conscientious convictions as Trinity College is to the Irish Protestants, or the Queen's Colleges are to the Irish secularists? This proposal of the Government is simply a sort of London University, with a few money prizes tacked on as a bait to the youth of Ireland. Setting up an Examining Board is not what we have asked. Would the men of your Oxford, or our Protestant Trinity, exchange their University for an Examining Board? I do not want to unfairly disparage the London University. In this matter of University Education I am liberal enough to recognize, and freely concede, that in a country possessed of what I call genuine Universities, one like this may be found exceedingly useful for young men whose circumstances preclude them from a course in Collegiate life. But to say that this shall be the best, the first, last, and only University acceptable to the Irish Catholics, is not meeting their demands and necessities. You are, in fact, delivering us over to mere "pass" learning. This is the enthronement of "cram." You may distribute amongst the youth of our Diocesan Seminaries a few hundreds of pounds in prizes; but you are going to destroy in us for ever all hope of possessing a genuine University—a great central, National Institution—in which the youth of Catholic Ireland might enjoy the advantages of an academic life and training. But you claim that this Bill will establish equality—that its prizes and rewards will be fairly and equally open to all comers, without advantage or favour to one class more than another. But is this so? No, nothing of the kind. Inequality and injustice are never more reprehensible than when they clothe themselves, as in this Bill, in the garb of equality and justice. No, you do not deal out fair play. On the contrary, this Bill perpetuates in its worst and most offensive form the inequality and partiality of which we complain. For you retain to the Queen's Colleges all their endowments out of the public funds, and you propose that the students, whom you thus educationally feed and equip and train at the public expense, shall compete in the race against those towards whose training or equipment you refuse to vote a farthing. And this is what you are pleased to call equality and fair play. The intellectual requirements of a small section of our population are, forsooth, to be lavishly provided for, while those of the great bulk of the nation must be met at their own expense! This is a state of affairs with which the Irish Catholics will never be content—never! ["Oh!"] No doubt, we hear to-night some capitulating voices; and far be it from me to blame too severely men who dread to sacrifice, as they view it, a certain present measure of good for the sake of a future they despair of. I consider for their difficulty; but it is their faint-heartedness. I would remind them that long before 1829 the Catholics of Ireland might have had large instalments of Catholic Emancipation, which they refused to accept, though many of their friends and advocates thought these were valuable and substantial concessions. But I am not for rejecting any instalment, if it does not in itself perpetrate an injustice upon us, and prejudice our indefeasible right and claim. I only want it to be on record that you were honestly warned, and frankly and fairly told to-night, that this Government Bill, as it now stands, will not and cannot settle the question. You but put it off a year or two. It will return, as of old, to plague you here. I know that even some of my own Friends think we ought not to say this now, but let you think you are going to make an end of your difficulty. I cannot lend myself to such tactics. I tell you, honestly, we Irish Catholics must have equality, and mean to be content with nothing less. I say, moreover, I cannot allow this question to be let down to the low level of a paltry squabble about a few pounds for school prizes. No; there is, in my conception, something higher, and grander, and nobler, in the object before us than this; and I, for one, will be no party to closing the future upon the youth of Ireland, or selling away their birthright, to buy for ourselves a petty and transient ease. The object of our hopes, our demands, is that we, Irish Catholics, may possess ourselves of, and hand down to our children, a National University, around which their associations may twine, in the halls of which their ambitions may be elevated, and to which, as to a genuine Alma Mater, they may always look back in after life with reverence, affection, and pride.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped neither the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), who immediately preceded the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), nor any other Member on either side of the House, would imagine that the hon. and learned Member for Louth was entitled to speak on behalf of Ireland in this debate, or to pronounce more than his own views. He (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) would only speak for himself on the subject; but he would do so frankly. He could not regard the Bill now before the House, or the proposed new clauses, as a full compliance with their demands; they did not even purport to be so; but he, nevertheless, considered the Bill, with the Amendments foreshadowed for Committee, as an honest effort and a significant step on the part of the Government to settle the question; and, in the same spirit, he would thank the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich for the speech he had delivered, and for the intimation he had given them that if they divided on the question now before the House he would be found voting with the Irish Members. This was an important announcement; for the right hon. Gentleman, some years ago, introduced a measure with the same object in view as the Bill now before the House—namely, with, as he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) believed, an honest desire to settle the question for the time, within such limits of power—and they were not always very extensive—as a Minister or a Cabinet could exercise over Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman was not then met in a considerate spirit. He (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) was not mixed up with the educational polemics of those days, and, therefore, could speak his opinion freely; but he regarded the circumstances at present as analogous to those at the time when the right hon. Member for Greenwich brought forward his project of a Supplementary Charter, and he hoped that a similar mistake would not be now made by setting proposals at naught which were, at least, well-meant, and capable of development and improvement. The hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had taken upon himself to interpret the sense in which the Irish Members were to accept the speech of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw); but he had no warrant for expounding it, any more than he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) had. If the hon. Member for Cork called for a Division, of course, they would all follow him into the Division Lobby; and he apprehended, when that was done, they would, en masse, subsequently vote for the second reading of the Bill. That the hon. and learned Member for Louth had no warrant to speak on behalf of the Irish Members was a fact which might easily have been gathered by an attentive listener. To his speech, and to those cheers which greeted its most salient passages, he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) was an attentive listener. The voice that spoke was that of the hon. and learned Member for Louth, and the cheers were those of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney).

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 257; Noes 90: Majority 167.—(Div. List, No. 192.)

Main Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MAJOR NOLAN wished to express his sentiments with regard to the Bill. He was in the position of a man playing a game of cards whose cards were turned down, and who did not know what they might be. He felt himself exactly in that position, and would not take any part in the Division on the second reading, because he should not know what he was voting for. On the third reading he would probably be better informed. He might say that he had reason to believe that there were a good many other hon. Members who entertained the same feelings as himself with regard to the matter; they did not know whether they would be doing right or wrong in voting for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that he would certainly vote for the second reading of the Bill; but he did so with the clear conviction upon his own mind that the only object of the proposal of the Government was to adjourn the consideration of that question for another 12 months. His reason for that opinion was, that a Bill was really to be framed by a Senate of 36, who were charged to prepare a scheme within 12 months. What would be the result of that? To his mind, it would be impossible to find in Ireland a Senate nominated by the Government, which would, within 12 months, hit upon a scheme which would be satisfactory to those who entertained the same views as the hon. Member for Cork, and to all other hon. Members who entertained different views. The result would be that when a scheme of that kind was drawn up it would be submitted to the Government 12 months hence; but the Bill itself could not be brought into operation during the present Parliament. The whole result of the proceeding, which he looked upon as one of the most adroit proceedings that had ever distinguished the reign of an adroit Government, would be that the question would really and truly be adjourned until after the General Election. In the meantime, the Government would reap the advantage of having taken steps to meet the views of the Irish people. It was not to be taken that he objected to the second reading of the Bill; but he begged to say that Irish Members could see as far into a millstone as others.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON rose for the purpose, not of making a speech, but of proposing a Motion. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) had said that he did not understand the Bill, and he thought a good many other hon. Members were of the same opinion. He did not remember, in the whole course of his Parliamentary experience, ever having seen the House so mystified and obfuscated. The Government, in bringing the Bill from the House of Lords, had really brought in a completely new Bill. That being the case, he did not think that they ought to be called upon to decide upon the merits of the Bill at that time. They knew nothing about it—the country knew nothing about it—and, under those circumstances, he felt himself justified in moving that the debate be now adjourned.

MR. EVANS had pleasure in seconding the Motion, and he should like the attention of the House for a few moments while he explained his reasons for doing so, as that was only the second or third time that he had ever had anything to do with moving the adjournment of the debate. In the last Division he voted with the Government, because he did not approve of the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Cork; but he did agree with what had been said by the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) and the hon. and gallant Member for Galway. He thought that the House had not been fairly treated by the Government on that question; the Government were a long time before they made up their minds whether they should introduce a Bill, and now they had done so they had left the House very much in the dark as to what they intended to do. Up to 11 o'clock, when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his speech, he did not know what the provisions of the measure were that the Government had brought forward. The whole Bill seemed to him to turn upon a clause the substance of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to introduce in Committee. He did not consider that that was the way in which the House of Commons ought to be treated, and he really could not form any opinion as to the way in which he ought to vote upon the question of the second reading. He had not been able to make himself sufficiently master of the proposals of the Bill in the state in which it now was—he said that with perfect sincerity, and not with any desire to cause obstruction, and he was sure that hon. Members would admit that he did not cause obstruction in that House. His reason for seconding the Motion was solely that hon. Members were not sufficiently informed upon the merits of the Bill to be able to vote upon it.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Sir Wilfrid Lawson.)

MR. COGAN could not allow the debate to conclude without giving expression to his opinion with regard to the measure. Some of the speeches that had been made by certain Irish Members, and more especially by the hon. Member for Galway Borough (Dr. Ward), and by the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna), compelled him, in rising, to say that he could not agree with the criticisms that had been passed upon the Bill by them. If it were not calculated to increase the advantages of Collegiate Education in Ireland, he believed that the measure would leave the question in as unsatisfactory a state as ever. For his own part, he sincerely felt that the most important part of University training was the Collegiate life; and he did not think that any proper solution of the University Question in Ireland could be arrived at by the institution of an examining University as was provided by this Bill. To such a University there would be affiliated, on the one hand, a number of endowed Colleges; while, on the other, it would have a number of Colleges supplying its students which possessed no endowments whatever. The students from the Colleges without endowments could not enter into a fair competition for University honours with those who came from richly-endowed Colleges with large staffs of Professors, and libraries, and all the appliances of education. He did not think that a measure which would promote a state of things of that character would be satisfactory; and he could not, therefore, allow the debate to conclude without expressing his entire disapprobation of the Bill, which, in his opinion, would be fatal to the hopes of future Collegiate life for Irish Catholics, and would leave to scattered and small seminaries intermediate schools, and private crammers to provide University scholars instead of having them trained in a great College.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that last year the House had passed an Intermediate Education Bill for Ireland. Some hon. Members did not like that measure. It seemed to him that they should not be asked to pass the present Bill in a hurry. It was only a reasonable proposal, as the Bill had been sprung upon them, that they should be allowed time to consider it.

MR. SHAW hoped that the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) would not press his Motion. It would be quite impossible, at that period of the Session, to press on the Bill, if the debate on the second reading was adjourned. The proper time for discussion would be on the Motion for going in Committee, when the House would be in possession of the Amendments of the Government.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that when the Bill had been read a second time the Government then proposed to put upon the Paper a clause which he had already described. They did not propose to take the Committee for some little time, in order to give hon. Members opportunity to consider the proposals. He could not name any particular day at the present moment; but he would promise that sufficient time should be allowed for the consideration of the clause.

MR. FAWCETT was sure that the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle would not unnecessarily put the House to the trouble of a Division. They did not want to put any unnecessary impediment in the way of the conduct of Public Business by the Government; but he was sure that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would feel, with his usual fairness, that they had been placed in a somewhat awkward position by the course taken with regard to the Bill. The practical difficulty which they felt was not that the Bill was a new one, but that, without any notice, the Bill had been materially changed in its character. There were two points upon which they thought they could freely claim to have further information before accepting the principle of the Bill. Upon those two important points they had had no information at all; but if that information were given them, he should suggest that the hon. Member for Carlisle should not put the House to the trouble of a Division. The points were—first, were they distinctly to understand that the Government did not propose in any way to make it a teaching University? The second was this—as he understood it, the new University was to be constituted mainly from a scheme to be prepared. He thought they had a right to know something of what would be the character of the new University. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not a word of objection to allege against the existing Queen's University; but he considered it was necessary to substitute another University in the place of that institution. Could he give the House any assurance that a certain proportion of the members of the Senate of the existing University would be appointed members of the Senate of the new University? That was not an unreasonable request, for, in the first place, it would be unfair to interfere with men who had been doing good work, and men with whom no fault could be found; and, secondly, it would only be right to give the House an assurance that a proportion of them would be appointed to the new University. He thought the House was entitled to some assurance or to some guarantee as to the character of the proposed University; and as they knew the character of the Senate of the present University, it would give them some assurance of the character of the new University, which was to have the administration of so large an amount of public money, if they knew that a number of those gentlemen were to be upon the Senate.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA trusted the information asked for by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) would not be given on a Motion for adjournment, but at a time when the House would have an opportunity of entering into a discussion of the points raised.

MR. BIGGAR hoped the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) would not withdraw his Motion for adjournment. The Government Bill was really worthless as a means of settling the Education Question in Ireland; while as it was equally clear that it could not pass this Session the time of the House would be wasted by further discussion. If the Motion for the adjournment of the debate should be carried to a Division and negatived, he trusted some hon. Member might move—"That the House do now adjourn." He thoroughly coincided with the view expressed by the right hon. Member for Kildare (Mr. Cogan) that the Bill was most unsatisfactory.

MR. W. E. FORSTER felt, with his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), that the Government had placed the House in a very difficult position by asking them to give a second reading to a Bill, concerning which they appeared to have no settled opinion, and the House knew nothing. It had, however, been stated that a clause would be in the hands of hon. Members tomorrow, which would give some information upon the matter. Now, if the Bill had been brought forward at the beginning of the Session, he thought that an adjournment of the debate might fairly have been asked for; but the House must remember that the question which it dealt with was one that they all wished to get settled, and that there appeared to be a possibility that some settlement might be arrived at this Session, in spite of the exceedingly remarkable manner in which the Bill had been brought forward by the Government. Take the views of hon. Members for Ireland; they were in favour of the second reading of the Bill. It was impossible to disregard the opinion and wish of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) in this respect, who had brought forward his objection to the Bill as it stood, nor that of the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw), who had embodied his objections in an Amendment, but had, at the same time, said—"If that Amendment is not assented to by the House, I hope I may get something corresponding to it in Committee." The hon. Member held out an opinion that the Bill might, in Committee, be so dealt with as to make it a satisfactory settlement of this question. With the exception of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), he thought that most hon. Members for Ireland agreed with that opinion. That being so, it became a serious responsibility upon hon. Members to vote for the adjournment of the debate; for if that Motion were assented to, or if the prospect held out to the House by the hon. Member for Cavan were realized—that if it were negatived it would be impossible to come to a decision that night—he (Mr. W. E. Forster) gathered that the result would be the shelving of the question altogether. That result was one which, in his opinion, the House ought not to contemplate with satisfaction. Nevertheless, he thought all hon. Members had a right to say—"If we assent to the second reading of the Bill to-night, it is in order to give the Government an opportunity of saying what they really mean to bring before the House; but, in doing so, we do not pledge ourselves to the acceptance of any principle whatever." He would not be tempted into dwelling upon the extraordinary position in which the Government had placed the House; but expressed a hope that hon. Members would assist the Government in their endeavour to get the Bill into Committee, with the object of finding out what it was like, and in the hope that it would prove to be a settlement of the question. For these reasons, he trusted that the hon. Member for Carlisle would not press his Motion.

MR. COURTNEY said, the House had heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), only a short time ago, an expression of astonishment that the Chief Secretary for Ireland should expect them to read the Bill a second time without questioning the principles which it involved. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had just said that they could agree to the second reading without pledging themselves to any principle whatever. How, therefore, those two right hon. Gentlemen were to reconcile their views he was at a loss to understand. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford wanted to have this question settled; but there was nothing surprising in that, for a great many people wanted a settlement. The right hon. Gentleman urged the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate because the fag end of the Session had been reached and the question ought to be settled. Of course, it ought to be settled, for a General Election was near at hand. But what had been said by hon. Members from Ireland upon the Motion for adjournment? Why, commenting upon the statement elicited from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the new University would not be a teaching University, the right hon. Member for Kildare (Mr. Cogan), and the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), had both said that Bill could not be a settlement; and the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had previously expressed the same opinion. These opinions were surely of some importance. Again, whose fault was it that the House found itself discussing the Irish University Education Bill at the fag end of the Session? It was the fault of hon. Gentlemen who were now supporting the Government. The Government brought in the Bill at the fag end of the Session, and when they wanted to rush it through Parliament the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford came forward to assist them in doing so, however much it might be believed by hon. Members near him that it would not be a settlement. That being the case, the Chancellor of the Exchequer having declined to answer the Questions of the hon. Member for Hackney, and no Member on the opposite side of the House having shown a disposition to reply, he thought the House ought not to assent to the second reading of the Bill. Nor could he agree with the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford that the House should read the Bill a second time on the understanding that in doing so they bound themselves to no principles whatever. He trusted his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle would adhere to his resolution.

DR. WARD challenged the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), and other hon. Members who opposed the Bill, to show that the ecclesiastical party in Ireland were not willing to go a long way to meet the Government in this matter. On the contrary, they said that there was very much good in the present measure, and were disposed to regard it in many respects as a fair settlement of the question, and one likely to meet, to a considerable extent, the wishes of the Irish people. He felt that a very serious issue was arrived at when it was found that the education of young men in Ireland was to be sacrificed to the exigencies of Party in the House of Commons; and he warned Irish Members not to join the hon. Member for Liskeard, and others who thought with him, in their endeavours to prevent the second reading of this Bill. The House had heard a great deal about clericalism and sectarianism. Why, the hon. Member for Liskeard was the high priest of non-sectarianism and as such proclaimed—"If you do not believe in my doctrines you are heterodox;" and then, forsooth, he must stand up in the House in the name of liberty. The people of Ireland had been befooled too long over this question of education to the injury of the youth of the country—"Hear, hear!"—and the hon. and learned Member for Louth, who said "Hear, hear," would befool it a little longer. The hon. and learned Member would support two things.

was an early supporter of the Liberal Opposition of the day, and an apparent supporter of the clerical element in Irish University Education. When Lord Mayo brought down the best Bill upon this question that had ever been introduced, the hon. and learned Member for Louth had said—"We will give you something more." And what did he now expect to get from the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), and the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), who were urging on this opposition? The House had to decide whether this Bill was to be killed or not. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) said it was to be killed; but he would kill any Bill that was ever brought into the House. He (Dr. Ward) reminded hon. Members who lent their assistance to the killing of Bills of this kind that not merely were they doing an injury to the country and to the reputation of the House, but were gravely compromising the just claims and rights of the Irish people. But he asked the hon. Member for Cavan, and other hon. Members who viewed things in the same light as he did, whether a petty reputation built upon mere obstruction, or, indeed, individual reputation of any kind, was to be compared in importance with the education of the youth of Ireland? They had been discussing this question for years, disputing upon words and compromises, while the best part of the Irish youth had been kept waiting for University Education. He believed that if the Bill brought in by Her Majesty's Government were passed, with such modifications as were proposed in good faith, much good would be done to the Irish people.

MR. SULLIVAN said, the House had just had an illustration of the inconvenience of discussing questions of this kind under present circumstances. The question was one which ought to be discussed in the absence of all heat, and finished, if possible, in the same vein in which it was opened by his hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw). But the House now found itself in a discussion, not upon the merits of this Bill nor as to whether the debate should be adjourned, but upon the relative merits of the hon. Member for Galway (Dr. Ward), an ex-Queen's College student, and the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar). Was the time of some 200 or 300

Members to be wasted in that way, or was the character of the Irish Representatives in the House of Commons to be lowered by the spectacle of two of their number engaged in a personal encounter? He most strongly complained that the House should be asked at the end of the Session, and at that hour of the night, to pass this Bill in a "stand and deliver" sort of way. He need not waste the time of the House by entering upon a detailed reference to his own efforts upon this question; for he believed it was well-known to those around him that, during 20 years, according to his humble opportunities and abilities, he had been the champion of the principles which he had advocated that evening, that, as against both Whig and Tory Administrations, he had held the same line, and that he had defended the right of the youth of Ireland to University Education when the hon. Member for Galway was partaking of the emoluments of the godless system of the Queen's Colleges. It was a thing of every-day occurrence in the religious and moral world to find men trotted out who had undergone conversion; a converted collier would hold forth to-day, and to-morrow somebody else; but it had been reserved for the House of Commons to listen to a converted Queen's College student.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he was no great admirer of this Bill, as would appear from the speech he had already made; for he could not think that, confined to its present limit, it was likely to bring about a settlement. Nevertheless, upon a question like the present, he felt that he ought to follow the advice given by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw), who had been, by the consent of his Colleagues, representing a large proportion of the Irish Members, selected to express their opinions in the House of Commons, and he thought that if any point existed upon which his opinion was to be taken it was surely upon the question of procedure.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON remarked, that several of his hon. Friends had asked him to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate; but after what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), that nobody had any principles with regard to this question of Irish Education, he should go to a Division, in order to give time to hon. Members of one Party or another to find out what their principles were.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS [ADVANCES, &c.]

Considered in Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: When, yesterday, I brought forward the second reading of this Bill, it was found necessary that the Order of the Day should be discharged, and a new Bill brought in. I explained that a Bill would have to be passed for the raising of such money as would be required for loans that would have to be made in the course of the year. The monies at the disposal of the Government are now nearly exhausted, and are not sufficient, I believe, to last out the present week ; so that, probably, those who apply for loans may have to wait a little time before they get their money. It, therefore, becomes necessary to pass a Bill for the raising of a certain sum for this purpose. I propose to ask for very much the same sums as last year—that is to say, £6,000,000 for England and £850,000, or a little more than last year, for Ireland. I propose, also, to re-insert the great bulk of the clauses that were in the Bill which has been for some time upon the Table of the House ; but it is intended to make a slight alteration in the clauses relating to interest, which in the Bill already laid upon the Table of the House stood at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent as the lowest rate to be charged. I now propose that the rate of interest for loans advanced for a less period than 20 years shall be $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I shall feel it necessary to proceed with the Bill as rapidly as the other Business will permit ; and I may mention to the Committee that I feel myself absolved from the promise which I gave some time ago to the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), and others, that the Bill should be brought forward as a first Order of the Day, inasmuch as that promise was made on the understanding that the Bill would be discussed on its merits. Bearing in mind that understanding, I several times waived bringing forward the Bill at a time when I might have done so ; but, yesterday, when the Bill was brought forward, the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), instead of discussing it upon its merits, took a technical objection to it, and thereby delayed the proceedings.

MR. CHILDERS did not agree that the Government had produced any justification for breaking their promise with regard to making this Bill a first Order of the Day. However, that was a matter which rested rather with the hon. Member for Birmingham than with him. The Chancellor of the Exchequer asked the House to authorize advances to the extent of £6,850,000. Now, in the Bill which would have to be considered in connection with the Resolution, a change was proposed which would place local loans to a great extent on the footing of that made to the Irish Church Commission—that was to say, the amounts required, instead of being borrowed on Exchequer Bonds, would be provided from the Saving's Bank balances. He wished, therefore, to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what extent he would use this power, and how much he would borrow in the former manner in the course of the year to meet these loans ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I cannot now say how much I shall borrow ; but I will endeavour to do so before the Bill passes.

MR. DILLWYN said, a most valid objection had been taken to the Public Works Loans Bill by the hon. Member for Burnley, in consequence of which it had been discharged. The Bill came up in one shape last February, and when the second reading was moved on Wednesday it was shown to have been substantially altered. He could not think the valid objection raised to the second reading of the Bill absolved the Chancellor of the Exchequer from the promise made to his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham at the beginning of the Session.

MAJOR NOLAN inquired if the provisions of Clause 4, Section 11, were directed against certain annuities, was a sweeping measure against pa off loans by means of annuities. Did the Chancellor of the Exchequer intend to bring in a clause to that effect?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is, of course, very convenient for borrowers to repay a loan by means of an annuity; but if the loan is spread over a long period it is not by any means so convenient to the lenders. The objection to that mode of repayment is that the generation which profits by the work for which the money is advanced bears but a slight portion of the expense. For short terms, I see no objection to the loans being paid off by annuities; but to loans for long terms being discharged in this way I see considerable objections. At the present moment, I cannot go more fully into this point, which will present itself more conveniently on the general discussion of the Bill.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that the point was a most important one, and he hoped the Irish Members would oppose the Bill in every possible way, as he intended to do, if it were to be the will that no loans were to be paid off by annuities. The provision would affect the properties of all the tenants in Ireland, and would stop many useful works there.

(1.) Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise further Advances out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, or out of moneys in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners held on account of Savings Banks, or Post Office Savings Banks, of any sum or sums of money not exceeding £6,000,000 in the whole, to enable the Public Works Loan Commissioners, and not exceeding £850,000 in the whole, to enable the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland to make Advances in promotion of Public Works.

(2.) Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Public Works Loans Acts.

House resumed.

OCCUPATION ROADS BILL—[BILL 241.]

(Mr. Pell, Sir Thomas Acland, Mr. Rodwell.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. PELL said, at present, there existed great difficulties in the way of persons who willing to maintain and improve certain roads. This could only be effected through the medium of a Private Bill, which was, in itself, a very costly proceeding. The object of the Bill which he asked the House to read a second time was to enable owners to perform this kind of work when they had agreed that it was desirable. He was aware that some Amendments would have to be introduced in Committee. He would put the Bill down for Thursday week, and, in the interval, he should take the opportunity of going further into the question with the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Pell.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH had no objection to the second reading of the Bill, but was obliged to point out that the machinery proposed was of a very complicated character. If the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) would confer with him in the course of the week, it might, perhaps, be cut down into a more convenient form.

MR. DILLWYN was glad to hear that the Bill was likely to be cut down into a form that would enable the House to discuss it this Session, which would be utterly impossible if it was of a complicated character.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS (MONEY) BILL.—LEAVE.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON moved for leave to bring in a Bill for further amending the Acts relating to the raising of money by the Metropolitan Board of Works, and for other purposes relating thereto.

MR. MONK objected to the Motion, on the ground that no Notice had been given, and no explanation offered as to the other purposes proposed to be sanctioned by the Bill.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that when the Notice was called on by the Clerk at the Table he (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) did not know that it was a Government Notice. He was, of course, aware that the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) had power to stop the Bill at this stage, and if that course were insisted upon he should have nothing further to say. He merely pointed out that this was an annual Bill of the Metropolitan Board, giving them renewed powers for borrowing money in accordance with the Acts of Parliament under which their improvements were carried on. The Bill had to be brought in every year by the Treasury, and, in doing so on the present occasion, he was only following the action of his Predecessors in former years, and that taken by himself last year.

MR. MONK said, he opposed the Motion for the first reading, as he had received no assurance that the Bill would not sanction the payment of expenses illegally incurred by the Board, and disallowed by the auditor.

First Reading deferred until To-morrow, at two of the clock.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—SHORT SERVICE—THE ZULU CAMPAIGN.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STRATHNAIRN rose to call attention to the unsatisfactory state of the Army owing to the substitution of short service without pension for long service with pension; also to the neglect of the first and elementary rules of the art of war exhibited in the recent operations in South Africa. The noble and gallant Lord said: My Lords, I will not now say a word which will not be in harmony with the general joy, in which no one shares more sincerely than myself, caused by the good news of the important success in South Africa, gained by a skilfully-combined plan of operations, in spite of serious difficulties of ground and transport, which does great credit to the general officer in command. The importance of the military question to which I solicited your Lordships' attention on the 30th of May, and which I now submit, cannot be exaggerated. For it is the failure—the break down—of the great experiment, the fundamental change of Army organization, the short-service system without pension, and its adjuncts, introduced by the Army Enlistment Act of 1870 by the civil Head of the Army. The military Peers, the Peers with military interests, and nearly the totality of the most experienced officers of the Army, predicted this failure from the first on account of the inherent defects of this system, and of which the chief one is its false and impracticable foundation. A knowledge of the two services, long and short, will facilitate the solution of the question. I beg to submit, therefore, their short history. The Act allowed long service with pensions to continue its recruiting; but it empowered the War Office to regulate the recruiting for both services. The military Head of the Army differed from his civil Colleague in the terms I stated to your Lordships on the 30th of May last. But the Under Secretary of State for War engaged that the short service should not interfere with, but assist, long service. The illustrious Duke the Commander-in-Chief accepted the engagement, saying that provided short service went pari passu with long service he would vote for the second reading of the Bill. Your Lordships will see from the sequel, and regret with me, I am persuaded, the impolicy and want of gratitude with which the long service Army with pension, and the patriotic lower classes who have always recruited it, have been treated—classes whom the Sovereign, both Houses of Parliament, and the Commander-in-Chief, have so often a so sincerely thanked for good and gallant service in every quarter of the globe. The Recruiting Department reported, in 1871, to the War Office that the long service with pension was so popular that it was altogether outstripping short service without pension, which would thus be discredited and swamped. The War Office, on this, in spite of their engagement to the Commander-in-Chief, suspended till further orders the recruiting for long service. This act created serious dissatisfaction and complaints in your Lordships' House, and the long service was released from suspension, but fettered with vexatious restrictions as to the right of the soldier to pensions, which—coupled with the suspension and the unfavourable feeling to pension displayed in Government speeches—shook the confidence of the recruiting classes in the validity of pension and in the good faith of the Government with regard to it. This mistrust was increased by a reduction of the recruiting for the pension service to 25 per cent, and by subjecting the right of the soldier to pension to a double veto, one from his commanding officer and another from the War Office. The opponents of pension did not deny that pension was the best guarantee of the soldier's discipline, but justified the raid on the soldier's pension by the necessity of diminishing the immense cost of the Army. But the truth was, as I said in Parliament at the time without contradiction, that the soldier's retiring pension was sacrificed to pay the officers' retirement, abolished with purchase, and which the Government would have had to pay. Thus encompassed and discredited by its own authorities, it was not possible that a pension Army could continue, and as such it has virtually come to an end. I solicit your Lordships' special attention to the impolicy of shunting a very efficient and successful pension Army, and leaving England and her foreign policy under the guardianship of a short-service Army, which not only has never been tested, but has given proof of unsound foundation by unparalleled desertions, immensely expensive and inefficient reliefs for India, and then afterwards breaking down at home and in South Africa, as is proved officially by despatches, endless Returns, and facts. In the interests of an efficient successor to the present Army organization, I beg to ask your Lordships to listen to the description of the admirable groundwork and principles of the long-service system which short service does not possess. The groundwork is pension—which the united opinion of the officers and the men of the British Army declare to be the best guarantee of the soldier's discipline, good conduct, and esprit de corps. The principles are, firstly, as regards the physique of the recruit. No Company, however great and prosperous, can give a retiring pension to their servants. The Government alone can give a retiring pension to their soldiers; and the pension which saves the soldier from the workhouse has not only rendered recruiting from ancient time popular and a household word in this country, but enables the Government to obtain in the labour market the recruit with the best physique for war and its hardships. The English people, as generous as they are just, have never begrudged the soldier his pension. Secondly, as regards the morale of the recruit—pension has the advantage of obtaining the recruit with enterprising spirit who prefers a soldier's life to a life of labour, and whom discipline makes a capital soldier; and, for this reason, foreign officers consider that an English Army is the most military one in the world. Thirdly, pension and long service lessen the objection of 18 years, our enlisting age, as the recruits can be husbanded for two years till 20, the age of medical efficiency, and be capable of 8 or 10 years' service, according to the terms of their enlistment, in the prime of life. The old pensioner—who is worth all the recruiting sergeants—speaking with the authority of his long experience, tells the adventurous spirit of the village or family who prefers a life of adventure to a life of labour to do as his forefathers did—enlist, make the regiment his home, follow its fortunes wherever they lead him, obey and respect his officers, who, if he be a good soldier, will be his friends as well as his superiors, to hesitate before no sacrifice of his life and health; and tells him that if he should be spared from the casualties of war he will return to home with pension and independence from the workhouse, and with a double welcome from his belongings, one for his return, and the other for his war medals and regimental certificate of good conduct—proofs of the gratitude of his Sovereign and the generosity of his country. When the Duke of Wellington entreated your Lordships' House never to forget the value of old-seasoned soldiers, he had in his mind the pension Army with whom, in a series of immortal victories, he had by the most consummate strategy—a diversion in the Peninsula against Napoleon's universal conquests—saved England and her liberties from invasion, rescued Spain and Portugal from usurpation and military despotism, forced his way through the dangerous passes of the Pyreneean ranges, and established his military power in the South of France in support of the Allied Armies, who, after Russia, by her heroic and patriotic resistance to Napoleon's invasion, had not only expelled his Armies from her soil, but had also enabled united Germany to free herself in 1813 from French conquest and influence by the great victory at Leipsic, and the less important one at Hanau, successes of which the fruits were the invasion of France and the occupation of Paris by the German and Russian Armies. Waterloo, won with the aid of the brave Prussian Army, and the march to Paris, crowned the successes of the Duke of Wellington and of his pension Army. In 1854, the pension Army, under Lord Raglan, in co-operation with our gallant Allies the French, won Alma and the sanguinary battle of Inkerman. In 1857 to 1858 the pension Army, under the unusual hardships and trials of summer and tropical heat, in hard sieges and engagements, saved India. I now venture, my Lords, to consider short service, its groundwork and principles. The groundwork is mixed civil and military employment, in which the civil predominates, with no pension. The principles are—Firstly, short service with the Colours for the first six years, and discharge; secondly, service in the First Class Army Reserve for six years, with a small pay from the Government and wages of civil employment, which the soldier must find to make up the means of existence; and, thirdly, as he has no pension, his future is civil employment for which he has acquired experience and taste. The result is that the short-service non-commissioned officers and privates look on civil service and not the Army as their career and their future. This feeling, the shortness of their service, and the constant transfer of officers and men from their regiments, and more than all, no pension, cause the non-commissioned officers and privates to have no attachment for their officers and regiment, no esprit de corps, and, worse than all, an immense amount of desertion which it was hoped to check by deferred pay—a very questionable attraction, and which has had no effect on the labour market. These military shortcomings naturally engender lukewarmness in the performance of their duties by the non-commissioned officers and men. The non-commissioned officers are generally too young and inexperienced to exercise their authority, and the men generally do not obey with alacrity, but too often with reluctance. It is a dangerous feature of short service that the best men are generally unwilling to be made non-commissioned officers—of which the result is that unfit men are promoted. The noble Viscount (Viscount Cardwell), on the introduction of short service, stated that the Prussian short service lay at the root of all his reforms—that it was his model; but, my Lords, it was an impossibility that he could copy his model and construct English short service on the Prussian model; and at his first start he was stopped by an insurmountable obstacle. The Prussian recruiting is perfectly compulsory and despotic, whilst the English is perfectly voluntary and constitutional; and, therefore, the result is as different as negative and affirmative. The German Government force the whole male population of Germany of 20 years of age to join the Army, and subject them to two searching medical examinations, obtaining thus the flower of the population. But the English Government can only obtain recruits by voluntary enlistment without pension; and therefore, so far from obtaining the flower of the population at 20 years of age, they are forced to take striplings at 18, and literally to take the refuse of the labour market—so much so, that the War Office, to obtain a paper strength, are obliged to shut their eyes to fraudulent enlistment, which crowds the ranks of the Army with boys whom no other employer will engage. The recent official and published Correspondence between Lord Chelmsford, Sir Bartle Frere, and the War Office, proves that the urgent want of the Commander-in-Chief in South Africa was seasoned and well-trained soldiers, and that as the same want of seasoned and well-trained soldiers existed in England, for the War Department were compelled to send 1,000 men of the Sea Forces to re-inforce the Land Forces in South Africa. Under these circumstances, the reflection—than which nothing can be more serious—irresistibly presents itself, that if England had gone to war, two years ago, in defence of British rights, the exposure in Turkey of our military inefficiency, and the lamentable consequences which have occurred in South Africa, would have been the most fatal blow to our military and political influence that has ever occurred. The facts stated in my speech of the 30th May respecting the defects of short service have never been answered. I have now, my Lords, arrived at an aspect of the military question which is a very delicate one; but its importance supersedes its delicacy. It is the attitude of Her Majesty's Government, and more particularly of its most distinguished Premier, from an early date, with regard to short and long service. My noble Friend, together with other Members of both Houses, first supported long service with pension, and then suddenly and unexpectedly made a speech in the House of Commons against it. Others of Her Majesty's Ministers adopted the military policy of their Predecessors on coming into Office. They stated as reasons for doing so that it was necessary to try so expensive and so extensive a scheme. Others said that, having spent so much money, there was nothing for it but to make the best of it. On the other hand, I must observe that the Ministry went farther than that; for they proposed to extend the short service to Cavalry and Artillery, of which other Peers and myself showed the impossibility. But it is common justice that I should say that several of Her Majesty's Ministers are said—and I believe it is so—to be opposed to short service. I do not wish to develop further this delicate subject than to say that I think your Lordships will agree with me that it would be extremely desirable that my noble Friend at the head of Her Majesty's Government should, in the interests of the all-important question now before your Lordships' House, state whether they have retained or modified their present opinion, or returned to their former opinion as to long service with pension and short service without pension.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH fully concurred with the noble and gallant Lord in thinking that short service had been in many respects injurious to the Army; although, no doubt, if a scheme of retirement was properly carried out, it would have the advantage of creating an efficient body of Reserves. He could not speak too strongly in favour of a system of pensions. The loyalty, combined with efficiency, of the Madras Army during the late Mutiny was to be attributed, in a very great degree, to the system of pensions that existed in that Presidency of the Empire in India. He believed that all but the youngest and most inexperienced officers—namely, those on whose opinions commanding officers had been told in "another place" to base their opinions—were agreed that it was absolutely necessary to have a system of pensions concurrently with a certain duration of service, and to continue such a system in respect to both European as well as East and West Indian soldiers, of all ranks, in either Army.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE complained of the manner in which the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Strathnairn) had departed from the Notices which had for some time stood in his name on the Paper. The Notice, as it first stood, was—

"To call attention to the lamentable consequences resulting from the neglect of the first and elementary rules of military tactics and strategy lately exhibited in the recent operations of Her Majesty's Forces in South Africa; and to ask Her Majesty's Government when the recommendation of the Joint Committee of the War Office and the Civil Service Commissioners appointed to consider the question whether the present literary examinations for the Army should be supplemented by physical competition will be acted upon?"

The noble and gallant Lord had kept on the Notices a wholesale indictment against those responsible for the conduct of the recent operations in South Africa. He allowed that Notice to remain upon the Paper up to the last moment, and then withdrew it, and delivered a lengthy statement on a subject which he had only put on the Paper that morning. The Notice, as it appeared on the Papers delivered to their Lordships that morning, was divided into two. The first Question related to the question of examinations for commissions, and the second to short and long service systems and the operations in South Africa. But the noble and gallant Lord never referred to the first, and did not touch upon the second branch of the second Motion—

LORD STRATHNAIRN observed, that he had stated his reason for not bringing forward his original Motion, which showed the want of foundation of the criticism of the noble Marquess.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE, in continuation, said, that he should not then discuss the question of long and short service. Their Lordships had had many discussions on the subject, and the conclusion which was arrived at was this—that the country should have an elastic Army—an Army with a Reserve; but in all his criticisms the noble and gallant Lord had never attempted to show how an Army with a second line could be supplied if we reverted to the old system of long service. The question was now under the consideration of a strong Military Commission. If the short-service system required alteration, that alteration would, no doubt, be made; but he thought it was too late to come to their Lordships and propose that we should revert to the old system of long service with pension.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he must confess that he had experienced the same difficulty as the noble Marquess with respect to the Notice of his noble and gallant Friend. Up to that morning, as the noble Marquess stated, the noble and gallant Lord had had a Notice on the Paper—

Now, it would be obvious to the House that a Notice that had been on the Paper for several weeks must be taken to have contained the expression of the deliberate judgment of his noble and gallant Friend; indeed, the Notice they were now discussing ended with words to the same effect and in very much the same terms. That, then, was the deliberate judgment of his noble and gallant Friend upon the conduct of the operations in South Africa; although, in consequence of the success that had attended our arms, he would now say nothing on the subject, but be content to participate in the general satisfaction. He had only one word to say with regard to our strategy in South Africa. When the Notice that had been so long on the Paper had first appeared he was at a loss to know how to answer the question, if it arose, and had even imagined that it might, perhaps, be necessary for him to renew his acquaintance with Hamley's Art of War. There was only the assertion of the noble and gallant Lord that the elementary principles of war had been neglected; and it was difficult, on the strength of that simple assertion, for him to defend those who were doing their duty in a distant country. It was hardly fair, it appeared to him, that his noble and gallant Friend should have put such a Notice as he had done on the Paper. The noble and gallant Lord was a man whom the country had delighted to honour; he had won the baton of a Field Marshal, and had obtained as the reward of his services a seat in that House. Words of praise or blame, therefore, coming from such a man carried with them a greater sting and more power to wound than if they had been uttered by a person of less distinction. He was glad, he might add, that the noble and gallant Lord had not, on the present occasion, gone into the details on which he founded his opinion as to the want of military knowledge on the part of our Commanders in South Africa; and he would only say upon that point that their strategy had, at all events, been crowned with success, and that—so far as he knew up to the present moment—the plans which had been formed at the beginning of the campaign had been carried to a triumphal issue and the power of the Zulu Forces broken. Their Lordships would share with the noble and gallant Lord the pleasure which he had expressed at that result; but it should be borne in mind that we did not as yet know all the difficulties which had to be encountered; and, speaking, as it was it his duty to do, on the part of the Government, he must deprecate anything like hasty criticism and pay regard only to the solid results which had been obtained. The rest of the speech of his noble and gallant Friend had been chiefly devoted to passing a panegyric on long, at the expense of short, service. The noble and gallant Lord had entered, in the course of his observations, into a great many details which were, no doubt, highly valuable but there was a Committee sitting the subject, before which all the evidence which could be procured with respect to it was being placed, and he now invited the noble and gallant Lord to lay before that Committee his opinions and views upon the question. No man's evidence could carry with it greater authority; and he might, he thought, with confidence, assure him that the officers who composed the Committee would be only too glad to welcome any contribution to the elucidation of the subject with which they had to deal which the noble and gallant Lord might make. The noble and gallant Lord said under 20 was not an age at which soldiers should be recruited; and it was, he (Viscount Bury) supposed, granted on all hands that if that it had been won principally by boys, recruits of maturer years could be secured it would be desirable to obtain them. It should not, however, be forgotten that under our system of recruiting we had to go into the labour market and to compete with all the various trades in the country, which were glad to employ young and active men. If, therefore, we were not prepared to pay the sum of money which would enable the Government successfully to compete with these trades, the only resource which was open was to catch for the Army the best men we could. How to do so was the very crux of the whole matter which was being discussed by the Committee to which he had already referred. The noble and gallant Lord had throughout his speech talked of long and short service; but he, in the same breath, talked of service for 10 years, which, as their Lordships were aware, was not long service. When men were now enlisted for 12 years it was a mere matter of detail whether they remained six years with the Colours and were then passed into the Reserve, or whether they were kept only three years with the Colours. The noble and gallant Lord seemed to think that he had a better plan to recommend; but, if so, why should he not lay that plan before the Committee? His noble and gallant Friend had passed a well-deserved eulogium on the Armies of the Duke of Marlborough and the Duke of Wellington; and he had mentioned battles, such as that of Waterloo, which he seemed to imagine had been won by long-service soldiers. He (Viscount Bury), however, had often heard his own father, who was in that battle, say and that the regiment in which he himself was was composed of boys. So, although the soldiers now in the ranks of our Army might be immature boys, they had yet acquitted themselves like men in Zululand. Of all savage tribes which we had ever had to encounter—he did not, of course, mean to compare them with European Armies—the Zulus seemed to be, by all accounts, incomparably the finest soldiers. Nevertheless, outnumbered many times as they had been, those boys, to whom the noble and gallant Lord seemed to object, had stood steady in the field against an enemy with the prestige of having inflicted on our troops more than one considerable blow, and despite the terror which always accompanied warfare of the kind. They had, moreover, won a victory which proved that, although they might be immature in point of years, they yet had the manhood of Englishmen, and were, in a word, true English soldiers.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, he did not propose to enter into any of the questions which had been brought under the notice of their Lordships by his noble and gallant Friend—on whose opinions he set the highest value—because, to discuss these questions at the present moment would, he agreed with the Under Secretary of State for War, be somewhat premature, remembering that it was being investigated by a Committee whose recommendations might lead to great changes. The views of the noble and gallant Lord were, undoubtedly, worthy of great attention; and it certainly appeared to him that his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War had made a wise suggestion in advising his noble and gallant Friend to go before the Committee, and he hoped his noble and gallant Friend would act in accordance with that suggestion. He had himself given evidence for two hours that day; and the opinion of the noble and gallant Lord might be taken in the same way. As he had before said, he did not think he would be justified in giving any opinion one way or the other on a question which was at present undergoing, as it were, a judicial investigation. Therefore, he hoped his silence on that subject would not be regarded as disrespectful to his noble and gallant Friend or to the House. He could assure his noble and gallant Friend that nothing had given him greater satisfaction since he entered the House than to hear the generous statement of his noble and gallant Friend that he had struck out the latter part of his Notice of Motion, the pressing of which might have had the appearance of some want of cordiality with the men who were now fighting our battles in Zululand. There was but one sentiment of delight and rejoicing at the great success which our arms had achieved in Zululand, and he was sure that no one entered more cordially into that spirit of satisfaction than his noble and gallant Friend.

EARL FORTESCUE observed, that he could not agree that all discussion ought now to be suspended because a Royal Commission had been appointed. It required no Royal Commission to find out that when, as had long notoriously been the case, the mass of recruits enlisted at about 17, if they were passed into the Reserve after six years' service or less, instead of remaining with the Colours for 12 years, a very large proportion of the Army must consist of lads under age, unfit, as the highest medical authorities had repeatedly stated and experience had shown, to face either the fatigue and hardships of a campaign or exposure to tropical climates. The remonstrances of sanitary reformers had obtained a promise that lads under 20 should not be sent out to India. There was more apparent than real economy in the present system; because the expense, not only of bringing back from distant stations men whose term of service had expired, but also of sending out others to replace them, was very considerable. At the same time, it was a great thing to have, at last, created something of a reserve, though at the expense of the present efficiency of the Army, as regarded the general age, not only of the privates, but of the non-commissioned officers, many of whom were now far too young, some of 18 and 19, many of 20 and 21. He was glad a Commission had been appointed; there was much for them to inquire into and consider, and especially the difficult question how our Army could be provided with duly qualified non-commissioned officers and men fitted by age and maturity to undergo the hardships of a campaign or to be sent to tropical climates?

INDIA—CRIMINAL LAW—USE OF TORTURE.—QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY of ALDERLEY asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he would lay upon the Table of the House the judgment of the High Court Judges with respect to the use by Mr. Cox of burning camphor to elicit evidence, Mr. Cox's written statement, and the despatch of the Madras Government on the subject?

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK, in reply, said, a Question on this subject was asked in the other House, and he had no additional information to that given by the Under Secretary. There was no doubt Mr. Cox had been guilty of considerable irregularities; but there was no question of torture involved. No order was made by the High Court; but on the facts coming to the notice of the Government Mr. Cox was censured. He had been seven years in the Service, and there had been no previous complaint against him of any kind. Mr. Cox, during the Famine, had been very active, and it was thought by his Grace the Governor that the conduct of Mr. Cox having been condemned nothing more need be done.

FLOODS) BILL (by Order.)

CONSIDERATION OF LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Order for Consideration of Lords' Amendments, read.

Clause 16a (Provision as to Dock Companies).

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would not detain the House for more than a few minutes by the remarks he wished to make in reference to this clause; but he should not like to see the clause inserted in the Bill, under the circumstances in which it had been placed in the Bill, without saying a few words on the subject. The Bill was one which was introduced by the Metropolitan Board of Works for the purpose of dealing with the prevention of floods, and the present clause was inserted by the Committee of the House of Lords after the Bill left the House of Commons. In the Committee of the House of Commons, of which he was a Member, the Bill was carefully considered, and the Metropolitan Board were successful in keeping the Bill intact, so far as all its main provisions were concerned, and especially in regard to the area of taxation, upon which the great fight took place. There were, however, secondary questions raised, and among them was the question of arbitration. The Bill was opposed by the Corporation of London, by the Conservators of the River Thames, and by various public Bodies—Vestries and wharfingers, and local individuals, who had frontages upon the River. A very large number of counsel made speeches to the Committee, in which they touched upon the question of arbitration raised by the present clause, and the line taken by the Metropolitan Board of Works as promoters of the Bill was that of opposition to all proposals of the kind. They said that they were perfectly competent to undertake all the duties themselves, and the Committee maintained them in that view. He thought that both the opponents of the Bill, as regarded the principle of taxation and the promoters of the measure, were unanimous in resisting the concession of arbitration from the outside, and the Metropolitan Board strongly contended that they, as a public Body, ought to be competent to discharge the duty. But he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) now discovered that, at that very time, the Metropolitan Board had agreed with one set of the opponents represented by counsel—namely, the Dock Companies—to introduce an arbitration clause for their benefit, and that clause was accordingly introduced in the House of Lords, the Committee of the House of Commons not having been informed that such an arrangement was in contemplation. He certainly thought, from what he knew of the opinion of the Committee upstairs, that many Members of that Committee, if not the majority of the Members of it, would have wished to raise the question of arbitration as regarded other public Bodies and individuals, if they had known that the Metropolitan Board of Works were going to give way at all. If the principle was to be introduced into the Bill at all, it ought, at all events, to be considered in the case of every person having a river frontage, and not in the case of the Dock Companies only, who were rich, and fully able to take care of themselves. The persons for whom provision ought to have been made, if it was to be made at all, were not the wealthy corporate Bodies, such as the Dock Companies, but Vestries, Local Boards, and other public Bodies, who had frontages the same as the Dock Companies, but no engineers, in the comfortable position of the engineers of the Dock Companies and the Metropolitan Board. Not only did the Metropolitan Board give way when the clause was before the House of Lords, but he was told that they had absolutely put forth a Whip in favour of it that morning, so that they had not only the Dock Companies who opposed the Bill, but the promoters of the measure itself supporting the clause which had been introduced into the Bill as a matter of arrangement in the House of Lords. He complained of the manner in which the Committee of the House of Commons had been treated in the matter. The Members of the Committee were asked to support the Metropolitan Board in resisting arbitration, when all the time the Metropolitan Board had decided that, so far as the Dock Companies were concerned, arbitration should be introduced. His own view was, that the Metropolitan Board were competent to perform all the necessary works for themselves, as a public representative Body, to the satisfaction of the general public; but if the principle of outside arbitration was to be observed it should be observed in every case. For that reason, he had placed a Notice on the Paper of his intention to move that the House should disagree with the Lords in regard to this particular clause which they had inserted. At the same time, he was informed that the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Raikes) had made up his mind to support the clause, and if that was the case, it would be perfectly useless, as everyone knew, to put the House to the trouble of a Division; and, having stated his objection to the clause, he should not move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. RAIKES said, the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Charles W. Dilke) went somewhat further than he was entitled to go in assuming that he (Mr. Raikes) had made up his mind to accept this clause. One circumstance weighed with him very much before arriving at any positive conclusion on the subject, and he had thought there was a possibility of that circumstance coming out in the course of the debate. If the right hon. Gentleman who was Chairman of the Select Committee to which the Bill was referred had been present in the House, and had risen to support the Motion of which the hon. Baronet had given Notice, he should think that, on the whole, he should have been disposed to advise the House, at all events, to leave open the question for further consideration, because he thought it was a matter in which the House would be inclined to stand by its own Committee. That appeared to him to be a very valuable principle to adopt as a general rule, and if the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee had recommended that course, he (Mr. Raikes) did not think he could, under the circumstances, have dissented from that view; but he was bound to say that, under any other circumstances, it appeared to him that they would not be warranted in acting in the spirit of the statement just made by the hon. Baronet, and in disagreeing to the Amendment introduced by the House of Lords. Perhaps he might be allowed to point out one matter which appeared to have escaped the hon. Baronet, whose statement, as any statement made by the hon. Baronet always was, was generally fair and candid in regard to the whole matter. But there was one point which the hon. Baronet omitted to notice. He stated that the Amendment which had been introduced by the House of Lords was not considered by the Committee of the House of Commons, and that, if it had been, it would probably have been also considered in regard to other opponents who equally desired to have the privilege of arbitration. Now, he (Mr. Raikes) must point out that if the opponents of a Private Bill opposed a Bill on its merits generally in the House of Commons before a Select Committee, they did not usually carry their opposition further, for if they did, they were excluded by the other House from opposing the Preamble of the Bill. This was an important matter in this case, because the Dock Companies could have gone into this clause in the House of Commons if they had not wished to reserve to themselves the right of opposing the Bill in the other House of Parliament. That, he thought, made a material difference in the question. Then, as regarded the Amendment itself, he was bound to say that it seemed to him to be a reasonable Amendment, and, as far as he could judge, it was approved of by both sides. He did not find that there was any objection to the Amendment introduced into the Bill by the House of Lords per se—it was merely argued that other parties ought to have the same advantage extended to them. They had now reached a period in the progress of the Bill when it became impossible for these parties to obtain that advantage; and if the clause was struck out of the Bill it would not help the other frontagers to an opportunity of obtaining the same advantage. If they were able to re-open the question altogether, possibly it might assume larger dimensions, and he was not prepared to say that it might not be well to give arbitration to the frontagers generally. But it was too late to take that course now; and, in the absence of any suggestion from the Select Committee, it would be taking an extreme course if they were not because certain persons had been dis-

pointed in obtaining from Parliament that principle of arbitration which they desired to obtain, to exclude others who, on their own merits, were certainly entitled to it. Before he concluded, he should like to say one word upon the question involved in the clause. These Dock Companies represented a capital of something like £17,000,000. They were incorporated public Bodies, and they employed the most competent engineering skill they could obtain. That being so, they would certainly be exceedingly well advised as to the works it was desirable to carry out on the river so far as their own interests were concerned, and much better advised than individual frontagers and others who had not such engineering talent at their command. It was quite possible that public Companies like these, with a large capital and able engineers to advise them, would have a plan of their own for the construction of works which might be of the greatest possible importance to them, and which they did not wish to have over-ridden by the mere ipse dixit of the Metropolitan Board of Works. That being so, it did not appear to him astonishing that the House of Lords should have attached importance to this clause. It must be borne in mind that a clause similar in effect was accepted by the Metropolitan Board of Works at the time they brought in their Bill in 1877, and was inserted in the measure. That course was not taken on the present occasion. He was not in a position to give an explanation of the reason; but it might be, as a matter of policy, that the Engineer of the Metropolitan Board was not inclined to accept the principle of arbitration if all the frontagers were to have it. But he thought the fact that the principle was not conceded generally ought not to prejudice the right of the Dock Companies. He hoped what he had said would guard him against the imputation of having formed a prejudiced view of the matter; but he did not think the House would be acting in the interests of the frontagers if, on the present occasion, they were to strike out this clause. Under all the circumstances, he hoped the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea would not press the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG, as Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, was anxious to say a word or two before the House came to a decision upon the matter. The hon. Barone opposite (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had already been set right as to the view of the Chairman of Committees; but there was one other point on which he wished to correct the hon. Member. He was not in the least aware of any arrangement with the Dock Companies of any sort or kind to insert a clause when the Bill went to the House of Lords. So far as the feeling of the Metropolitan Board went, they would much rather have the entire responsibility cast upon them. Their engineer was fully competent in every shape and form to indicate what steps ought to be taken to prevent the flooding of the River, and the Board were very sorry to have any arbitration at all. But having accepted this clause in the House of Lords, they felt bound, as men of honour, to carry out the understanding embodied in the compromise between the Dock Companies and themselves. At the same time, he must point out to the House that, in regard to this matter, the Dock Companies stood on a very different footing from other people. All they did was under an Act of Parliament—everything they were entitled to carry out must be done in accordance with the provisions of their Act of Parliament. They were, therefore, usually exempted from outside interference. Take, for instance, the Thames Conservancy Bill, brought in during the present year. In the 49th clause of that Bill, Sections 4 and 7, it would be found that the Dock Companies were specially, in consideration of their being under an Act of Parliament, exempted from the operation of the Act. It was the same in regard to other Acts relating to the conservancy of the River. He quite endorsed what his hon. Friend the Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes) had said in regard to the Bill brought in by the Metropolitan Board in 1877. The Board, no doubt, did agree to insert a clause of this nature in that Bill; but they had not done so in the present measure, because they did not approve of it. But they found it necessary, in this instance, to come to a compromise with the Dock Companies. Upon that compromise, which was made when the Bill was in the House of Lords, the Dock Companies withdrew their opposition; and he certainly did not think that, considering the extent of their capital, and all the interests involved, the Dock Companies could be placed in the same position as the rest of the frontagers, who had a very small interest indeed in the matter. He was glad that his hon. Friend the Chairman of Committees had announced his intention of abiding by the Amendments of the House of Lords. As Chairman of the Metropolitan Board, he had considered it desirable to say a few words by way of vindicating the action of the Board in the matter.

Lords' Amendments agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL.

QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK PERKINS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there was not time for General Wood, after hearing of the disaster to the Prince Imperial, to have sent out on the evening of the same day, and at once, a force to discover his whereabouts, instead of waiting until the following morning?

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY, in reply, said, that the Question was one rather for the Cape authorities than for the Government at home; but that, as it was decided on the evening in question that no immediate steps should be taken, it was probable there was good reason for the decision.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE CAPE COLONY—IMPRISONMENT OF GRIQUAS.

QUESTION.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, With reference to his statement that the Griquas imprisoned at Cape Town are treated as prisoners of war, if he can contradict the statement that many of them were brought in chains from Griqualand to Durban, and from there to Cape Town?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: Sir, my statement the other day was that these Griquas were treated as prisoners of war at Cape Town. So far as I can recollect, I had heard nothing, until the hon. Member gave Notice of this Question, of the way in which they might have been brought there from Griqualand. But it must be remembered that their outbreak was accompanied by murder, by the plunder of property, and by threats of great violence to White women and children, which could not but cause great alarm to the few White residents in their country; and that, being a race of half-breeds, the excuses which might be made for ignorant Natives are scarcely applicable to their conduct. Therefore, it is very conceivable that it may have been thought necessary to place them during their journey under the same restraint as that to which they would certainly have been liable if they had been arrested as criminals. I may add that the wives of these prisoners were left in the occupation of their farms, and have reaped the crops.

GAME LAWS AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is his intention to proceed, during this Session, with the Game Laws Amendment (Scotland) Bill; and why this Bill, which is unopposed, has not been proceeded with since the 5th of May?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON), in reply, said, he did intend to proceed with the Bill referred to, and he had put some Amendments on the Paper, which would probably furnish an answer to the hon. Member's Question in accounting for the delay in proceeding with the Bill.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he was in a position to give the House further information as to the course of Public Business next week?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that at this time of the year it was always very difficult to give any precise and final information as to the arrangements for Business; so much depended on the progress made on particular days. He had, however, already informed the House that he would proceed with the Irish Estimates on Monday, and, as regarded the other Business of the Government, something would depend on the rate of progress they were able to make with the Estimates. There was one point, whi probably in the mind of his right hon. Friend, and which he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had also to bear in mind. Some time ago, he stated that he should be prepared to lay on the Table the Estimates for the South African War, and the Vote of Credit, probably before the end of this month, and Thursday would be the end of the month. Now, the news they had received recently from the Cape enabled them to prepare that Estimate with greater confidence than would have been the case a few weeks ago; and he, therefore, hoped to be in a position to redeem his pledge, and to bring that matter before the House in a form which he might present with some confidence. There were also one or two other matters, more or less in connection with the financial arrangements of the year, which would have to be borne in mind. They had, as the House was aware, to make provision for the payment of certain Exchequer Bonds which fell due in August and September. It would be necessary to take a Vote in Supply, in order to provide the means for paying off those Bonds; and if the House agreed to the Bill now about to be proposed for a loan to India, some provision would have to be made in order to raise the money that would be required for the purpose. He should, probably, on Tuesday, in Committee of Supply, propose a Vote for that purpose, and then on Thursday, in Committee of Ways and Means, as the First Order of the Day, he should propose the steps necessary to provide for the bills which had to be paid off, and also the Estimate that would be necessary for a Vote of Credit. The Government were further anxious to go on with the Navy Estimates on Thursday, if the preliminary statement he had to make would allow sufficient time. If not, of course, it would be necessary to put it off until a later day. So much, however, depended on the progress made with other Business which should have precedence, that he was not able to give more precise information as to what would be taken on particular days.

QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What his intentions were in regard to the Public Works

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Loans Bill? He was aware that the right hon. Gentleman considered himself absolved from the promise which he had given in regard to it; but he trusted he would place it in such a position on the Orders as to insure that it might be fairly discussed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought that, as regarded the pledge that had been given to a particular Member, he had sufficiently redeemed it on Wednesday, when he was prevented from giving effect to it by the course taken by the hon. Member (Mr. Rylands) himself. That, however, was a matter on which he did not wish again to express his opinion, though he thought the step then taken might have been taken equally well three or four months before. Still, he felt his duty to the House required him to see that a full opportunity was given for discussing the Bill.

EGYPTIAN AFFAIRS.—QUESTIONS.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID asked, Whether an opportunity would be given for the discussion on the interference of the Government in Egyptian affairs?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought, considering the great pressure of Public Business upon them, that the hon. Gentleman should find an opportunity himself for bringing the question forward. There would probably be plenty of opportunities between that day and the close of the Session for introducing a discussion on Egyptian affairs.

MR. GOSCHEN asked, Whether any other Business than the Vote in Supply referred to would be brought forward on Tuesday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would repeat that he would take ordinary Supply on Tuesday, and perhaps the Public Works Loans Bill.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID reminded the right hon. Gentleman that he had promised to give an opportunity for discussing the Egyptian question, if private Members wished for it.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the hon. Baronet might find an easy opportunity on the Appropriation Bill.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE remarked, that the Navy Estimates had never, during his recollection, been postponed to so late a period of the Session. They were generally brought on earlier.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EAST INDIA LOAN (CONSOLIDATED FUND) BILL—[BILL 201.]

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Edward Stanhope, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I apprehend that it is now my duty to move that the Bill be now read a second time, and in doing so I will not detain the House by making a long statement on the subject. If any question is raised in the course of the discussion, my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State will be able to give further explanations, and the House will have an opportunity of considering the Amendments which have been placed on the Paper. All I wish now to say is this—we cannot in this country hold ourselves indifferent to the position of Indian finance, although we cannot undertake to control or direct it from this country. As a general rule, the principle upon which we act in regard to India is that she should, to use a familiar expression, “stand upon her own bottom.” That is to say, we recognize that, as far as possible, India should be responsible for her own expenditure, and for the means taken to meet it; and that, although her proceedings are, from time to time, brought under the notice of this House, and very properly so, we should interfere with her affairs as little as possible. We must bear in mind, however, that although India is, in a certain sense, self-supporting, there are some qualifications to that position. When we say that a country should be entirely self-supporting, it seems to me to be a natural condition that she should be altogether self-governing; because, if a State provides her own revenues, it is, of course, desirable and fair that she should have the direction of her own policy, so as to be able to accommodate her expenditure to her means. With regard to the relations between England and India, we cannot say that that is exactly the position of India. The government of India is, in the first place, directed by officers appointed by the United Kingdom; and, in the second place, not only is the administration of Indian affairs in the hands of Europeans, but, to a certain extent, public opinion in England and the action of the English Parliament do influence the expenditure of that country, both in civil and also in military matters. We call upon the Indian Government to undertake great public works, to introduce improvements in education, and in the promotion of sanitary matters in that country, and to undertake other matters which are very excellent in their way. Similarly, the engagements of this country, from time to time, and the entanglements of its foreign policy, affect Indian finance, although we keep it as distinct as possible from English finance, in a way which we cannot view with indifference, and involve India in expense which she would not have incurred if she had been entirely separate from us. It therefore becomes necessary, from time to time, that we should see whether or not we are under any obligation to give assistance to that country. Now, on the present occasion there is, as the House is aware, a state of affairs in India which renders it difficult for the Indian Government to meet all the demands upon it without imposing upon the country burdens which it is undesirable to impose, and which it would be unnecessary to impose, if temporary relief can be given. In these circumstances, the proposal has been made to the Imperial Government that they should come to the temporary assistance of the Indian Exchequer by an advance of money for a limited time to assist her in her financial difficulties. Hon. Members are aware, from the discussions that have already been held, what the condition of the Indian Exchequer is. They know what exertions are being made to reduce the expenditure of the country; and they know, also, the two events which have mainly contributed to derange the Indian Exchequer. One is the war which took place on the North West Frontier last year and the beginning of this year, and which is now, happily, ended; and another, which is also of a temporary character, I hope, is the derangement caused by the peculiar state of the exchanges, consequent on the fall in silver. Well, in these circumstances, the Indian Exchequer has applied for assistance to the English Exchequer, and we have intimated our willingness to propose to Parliament that we should go to the aid of the Indian Exchequer by a temporary loan. The loan is one

£2,000,000, and it is proposed that it shall be made without interest, repayable within seven years by annual instalments. There have been many transactions of a similar kind from the early days of the last century; but in those cases it not unfrequently happened that the loans were made to England by the East India Company, though they were, perhaps, to be regarded rather as payments for the advantages of the renewal of the Charter and the other facilities which the Company obtained. Thus, in 1708, a loan was made by India to England of £1,200,000, without interest. On other occasions loans were made to India by England. In 1773, there was a loan of £1,400,000. In 1810, there was a loan of £1,500,000; while in 1812, there was what was, practically, a loan of £2,500,000—for funded Debt to that amount was raised under the guarantee of the English Government. In addition to these, there have been a great many cases in which money has been advanced by the English Exchequer on account to India, and delay granted for repaying the same, without any charge being made for interest in respect of that delay. But I do not rest this Bill upon any exact precedent; I rest it upon the circumstances of the case; and I think the proposal on behalf of Her Majesty's Government will be considered fair and reasonable on the part of the House. I observe that in one of the Notices of Amendment given upon this Bill it is assumed that the £2,000,000 are a contribution to be made by this country to India on account of the expenses of the Afghan War, and that it represents the share which England takes in the burden of that war. Now, I have never taken that view of the subject, for I shall be glad to remind the House what it was I said at the beginning of the Session, now so far back as the month of December last, for the House has been sitting since December. I said at that time, when we were discussing the operations in Afghanistan, that it was right to consider what the position of India would be with regard to wars beyond, or within, her own Borders. With regard to wars within her own Borders, I assume that India ought to bear the expense; but with regard to wars altogether beyond her own Frontier—wars in distant countries—it was not the duty, or, at all events, it was not consistent with the practice of Parliament, to lay on India any expense in connection with such wars. It had been done in some instances in former times; but it was generally considered that it ought not to be done, and that if Indian troops and resources were used for such wars it should be at the expense of England. But when we come to the case of Border wars, and have to consider wars within what may be called the Indian circle—the regions bounding India—and wars that are undertaken for what may be regarded as Indian objects, it is a matter for adjustment and consideration on each occasion where the burden shall fall. Now, I regard the war which was recently carried on on the North West Frontier of India as being strictly and properly an Indian war. It was as much an Indian war as any other of the Border wars in which India has from time to time been engaged. To a certain extent, it is true that the war may have been precipitated by the action of an European Government, and the possible action of the English Government may have been more or less precipitated by circumstances that have occurred in Europe and other parts; but, speaking directly with regard to the circumstances which led to that war, they were of a purely Indian character. It was of importance to India that she should have a quiet Frontier on the North West, and that she should live on good and satisfactory terms with her neighbours in Afghanistan. In order to attain that end, the object at which the Indian Government aimed was to establish and maintain satisfactory relations with the Ruler of Afghanistan, and, at the same time, to safeguard our interests by preventing his entering into cordial and diplomatic relations with any other Power. Well, when circumstances arose which seemed to show that the Ruler of Cabul was receiving Envoys from another Power, and not from England, it was thought necessary on the part of the Indian Government to take steps to right ourselves, and make it clear to everyone that Russian influence was not to supersede English influence in Afghanistan. The same feeling prevailed in India, that it would be of serious detriment to the peace of India; and, therefore, it became necessary that steps should be taken to counteract the action of Russia. The step we took to insure that was of a very simple and harmless character—namely, to send a corresponding Mission to the Ameer, with a request that it might be received. That mission was not received. It was repulsed under circumstances to which I need not now refer, but, undoubtedly, in a manner which would have tended very much to diminish the authority and influence of the Indian Government on the Borders of the Empire, if such a rebuff had been allowed to pass unnoticed. It was consequently felt necessary by the Government of India to take steps to compel the Ameer of Afghanistan to admit that Mission, and to come to terms with the Government of India. The result was that, after a brief and very brilliant campaign, its object was obtained. A satisfactory peace has, we trust, been concluded with the Ameer; and I hope that the relations now being established between India and her neighbour will be conducive to the peace, prosperity, and tranquillity of India. In these circumstances, it was our duty to consider to what extent, if any, the English Treasury should come in aid of the Indian Treasury in respect of the cost of the war. I have already stated that if it was to be regarded merely as a Border war I thought India might very well bear the expense; but that if it should become complicated by European intrusion into it and should take a wider range, and assume anything of the character of a European and Imperial war, then that it might be a matter in which the Forces of the whole Empire would be called into play, and that in that case we should come largely to the aid of India. Well, Sir, that did not happen. There was no such complication, and, in the circumstances, I think we are doing all that we are called upon to do in making the proposal I have now to submit to the House. We now ask for power to issue this sum, out of the Consolidated Fund, by way of loan to the Secretary of State for India. If that authority is given, our intention is to raise the amount by borrowing it on some proper security; and, in point of fact, I may at once say that it will be advanced to us out of the funds at the disposal of the National Debt Commissioners. We shall borrow from them, and not in the open market. I may also add that repayment will be made annually in equal amounts over a period of seven years. The transaction is of a simple character and capable of being easily understood, and, under the circumstances, I beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. FAWCETT, having presented Petitions from influential inhabitants of Bombay and Madras, Native and European, against the proposal of the Bill, as entailing a disproportionately heavy charge on India, proceeded to move, as an Amendment—

"That, considering that it has been officially stated that the Afghan War was undertaken in the interests of England and India jointly, this House is of opinion that it is unjust to make India pay towards the expense of the war more than seven times as much as will be contributed by England."

The hon. Member said, the principles involved in the Bill were of a most important character. As was evident from the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it divided itself into two portions—first, the form in which it was proposed to make this contribution; and, secondly, the amount of the contribution. These two questions ought to be kept perfectly distinct. To the question as to the form he would very briefly refer, as it could be raised, if necessary, at a future stage of the Bill; but he would remind the House that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) had stated that rather than there should be a loan made to India without interest an adequate sum ought to be paid down once and for all. That opinion had been greatly strengthened by the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He (Mr. Fawcett) wished emphatically to endorse the principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman—namely, that India was bound, as he expressed it, to "stand on her own bottom," and should not look to this country for grants-in-aid, or subventions. What were the precedents as to this question? The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that loans were formerly made by India to England. When was that? Just at the time the East India Company were seeking a renewal of their Charter. Could any worse precedent have been adduced? The proposed contribution was either a gift or subvention; or it was given in discharge of a legal and equitable obligation. If it were a gift, he would be the last to object to its adequacy; but rather than have that fatal gift accepted he would be in favour of imposing increased taxation upon India. If India was to be encouraged to look to this country for grants-in-aid and subventions, the day of sound financial administration was gone for ever. Once proceed on that footing, and there would be no kind of wild enterprize on which India might not enter, and come to England for re-payment. Every guarantee for economy and thrift would be swept away, and full scope given to a career of extravagance. If the question was to be argued as one of gift, he would oppose the Bill in toto, and say that India ought not to receive one penny as a gift. For his part, the motive that had influenced him was that if there was not greater economy the day would come when India would not be able to stand on her own bottom, but would come to England for grants-in-aid. He did not believe that day had come. He did not take so gloomy a view as that. Knowing what could be done by wise financial administration, he thought that India, well-administered, could stand alone, and need not undergo the humiliation of being a suppliant to that House for grants-in-aid. He wished to regard the question as one of legality and equity, and did not want India to receive one halfpenny more than she was entitled to according to the strictest justice; for were she to receive more than she was entitled to it would only be a damnosa hereditas. He thought there could be no doubt as to the legal position of the matter. Lord Derby, in introducing the Government of India Act of 1858—the Act under which India was governed at the present time—said, in reference to the 55th clause, that its object was to protect the financial interests of India, and that it accordingly laid down the principle that if Indian troops should be employed beyond the Indian Frontier in Imperial warfare the cost should be paid by England; but if in Indian warfare, then by India. Lord Derby added that it would be the duty of the House of Commons to see whether such warfare as the clause related to was an Imperial or an Indian enterprize. Now, could there be any doubt as to the character of the recent Afghan War? When it was sought to support the policy of the war the Government taunted their opponents again and again by saying—"You are such parochial-minded politicians that you do not understand the nature of the great Imperial enterprize upon which we are embarking." Such was the language employed by the supporters of the Government inside and outside the House. Now, however, the Chancellor of the Exchequer entirely altered his tone, saying—"Oh, this is purely an Indian war; purely a little Frontier war, or Border dispute; and, consequently, India ought to bear the larger portion of the expense." He would prove that this argument put forward by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was adduced for that particular and special occasion. If there were two men in the world who ought to know what was the real character of the Afghan War better than anybody else they were Lord Lytton, who was responsible in India for the war, and Lord Beaconsfield, who was responsible in England. Well, the former said—

"After several personal interviews with Lord Salisbury (who was then Secretary of State for India) I went to India determined to treat our Frontier relations as indivisible parts of a great Imperial question, mainly depending for its solution upon the foreign policy of the Government."

Lord Beaconsfield, too, amid the cheers of the assembled Peers of England, when it was a question of magnifying the importance of the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and not a question of paying the bill, said—

"It is a mere question of the Khyber Pass, or of some small cantonment at Dacca or Jellalabad. It is a question which concerns the character and the influence of England in Europe."—[3 Hansard, ccxliii. 519.]

And yet, when the Bill became due, the war was reduced by Her Majesty's Government to the dimensions of a miserable Border dispute. Now that he had read these extracts he thought the House would scarcely sanction this plan of blowing hot and cold—of treating the war at one time as a great Imperial enterprize, and reducing it at another to the proportion of a mere Border dispute. He would now consider what, according to the statements of the Government, would be the exact amount of the contributions made towards the war by England and India respectively. The expenses of the war were officially stated to be £2,600,000. Towards these expenses England was to contribute £2,000,000 free of interest. This capital was to be re-paid in seven years, the first re-payment being made at the end of next year. Now, what was the exact amount which England would lose by this surrender of interest on £2,000,000 for seven years? Reckoning compound interest, he found that the amount of England's contribution would be less than £320,000. India, however, would contribute £2,280,000 towards the expenses of this "great Imperial enterprise undertaken for the maintenance of the influence and character of England." In other words, wealthy England would contribute £1 for every £7 contributed by India on a great Imperial question. Besides that, £60,000 per annum was to be devoted to the new Ameer, and India would have to pay every shilling of that sum. Confining himself, however, to the actual financial estimate of the direct cost of the war, he found that the Bill of the Government would virtually cause the House of Commons to sanction this principle—that for every £1 contributed by England £7 should be contributed by India. He did not seek to enforce his case by appeals to generosity and sympathy. What he had done was to argue it on the basis of strict justice and pure legality. This was a consideration that ought to be presented to the House when the question arose as to the proportion in which the cost should be divided between England and India. If there were any doubt upon the matter, the benefit of the doubt should be given to India, and not to England. As it was, however, India would have to pay for the war, whether she liked it or not. The Indian population had no choice in the matter, in that they were not self-governed, as were the English people, who, if the war had concerned them directly, as it did the people of India, would have been able through the agency of Parliament to bring public opinion to bear upon the question. He held, therefore, that those who supported the Government in commencing the war ought also to support him in the Motion which he was about to make, because they held that the war was of an Imperial character and not a mere Indian Frontier war, and ought, therefore, to be willing to put upon the Imperial Exchequer a far larger proportion of the costs than was proposed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer once said that what we required to maintain our rule in India was to be just, as well as strong. Could it be just to impose on poor impoverished India seven times as much as England for a war that was undertaken, he would repeat, not for India, but to maintain the influence and character of England in Europe? He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "considering that it has been officially stated that the Afghan War was undertaken in the interests of England and India jointly, this House is of opinion that it is unjust to make India pay towards the expenses of that war more than seven times as much as will be contributed by England,"—(Mr. Fawcett,)
—instead thereof.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he did not deny that the Afghan War was undertaken in what were supposed to be the interests of the whole British Empire, thereby understanding those of England and of India jointly; but with the deduction drawn by his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) he was unable to agree. Indeed, if the principles on which Imperial expenditure ought fairly to be divided between the different parts of the Empire were to be revised, he was satisfied that India would be called on for a much larger contribution than she now paid. It was hardly going too far to say that while India, the Colonies, and the Mother Country, each bore its own special expenditure, the whole burden of Imperial expenditure fell exclusively on the Mother Country. The amount which thus pressed on the tax-payer of these Islands was enormous. Last year, for instance, not only was our military expenditure very heavy on account of the unsettled state of the East, but there was a special Vote of Credit of £6,000,000, of which, however, India was not called on to pay one penny. It would be remembered, moreover, that our Mahomedan fellow-countrymen in India called on us to interfere for the protection of the Sultan of Turkey; and though Her Majesty's Government did not actually go to war for Turkey, they put our Army and Navy in such a position as they thought would increase their weight and influence.

ence in European Councils, and especially with Russia. The whole of the expense, however, fell on us. Nay, so scrupulous were we that, when Indian troops were brought to Malta, we bore the expense ourselves. Yet our interest in the Eastern Question mainly arose from our Indian and Australian possessions. But for them, we should be no more concerned in it than Germany or France; and he contended, therefore, that it was not unjust to ask India to pay a portion of the expenses incurred for the protection of that country. Moreover, when his hon. Friend complained that this country was, under the Bill, bearing only one-seventh of the cost of the Afghan War, he must remember that the population of India was five times as great as that of these Islands, and if, from British energy and industry, Englishmen were individually richer, they might not unfairly object to bear extra taxation on account of their own industry, though he should not be disposed to press that argument to its logical conclusion. He rejoiced at the successful termination to which the skill and bravery of our soldiers had brought this war in Afghanistan; but, considering the terms of peace, he could but ask himself what would have happened if we had not been successful? Let hon. Members consider the actual arrangements that had been made. First, we were to have an English, instead of a Native, Resident in Afghanistan—and that did not seem to him a very important matter either way; next, certain districts were “assigned” to us; we had not annexed them. Now, “assigning” was a new term, which, as far as he could make out, meant that we were to pay the expenses, and hand the revenues over to Afghanistan; thirdly, we were to keep the Hill Tribes in order; fourthly, we guaranteed the Ameer against an attack by Russia; and, lastly, we consented to pay him an annual tribute of £60,000. And that was the result of a war in which we had been triumphantly successful. But he would not pursue that subject. The immediate question was the mode in which the expenses was to be met. He had already objected to that mode, and would not repeat what he then said, further than to point out that one great objection he had to the Bill was with respect to the mode in which it was proposed to raise the money, because it would introduce additional confusion into the accounts of both countries, and render it more difficult for the people of India to perceive the additional burden thrown upon them by the policy of Her Majesty's Government. But, while disapproving the Bill, he could not support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, because the question must be considered not only with reference to this particular item, but in reference to the general relations between England and India; and, as he had already said, he believed that if the principles on which expenditure was distributed as between India and the British Isles were to be revised it seemed to him that we should be very great gainers. The Expenditure of this country fell under three great heads—Civil, Military, and the service of Debt. Even with regard to our Civil Service Estimates there were some items of which India and the Colonies ought in equity to bear a share. The service of Debt cost £28,000,000 a-year; and, of course, much of our Debt was incurred for purposes in which India and the Colonies had no concern; still there was a large part in which they were interested. Passing, however, over these two items, he came to our Military and Naval expenditure, which last year amounted to £32,000,000. For the mere defence of England probably £10,000,000 would amply suffice, and the rest was required, or supposed to be required, for the maintenance of the Empire; but out of 200,000,000—which was the total number of Her Majesty's subjects—only 34,000,000 contributed to it. Then let them consider our Navy, for instance. Last year it cost £12,000,000, while India for naval purposes only spent £70,000, and the Colonies practically nothing. Our Mediterranean stations were required to keep up our communication with India; but the whole expense, amounting to about £750,000, was borne by us. If, then, the expenses of the Empire were to be revised and equitably distributed, it was clear that India would have to make a very large contribution. That, of course, was not now contemplated. The hon. Member for Hackney complained that India was paying towards the cost of the Afghan War seven times more than England; but, after all, the Frontier question was mainly an Indian question, and the population of India was five times greater than that of these Islands. He did not think that his hon. Friend took a sufficiently wide view of this question. The Afghan War was merely one episode of the Eastern Question; and, taking that Question as a whole, England would have spent at least £10,000,000, as against £1,500,000 paid by India. It seemed to him, therefore, that England was bearing even more than its fair share of the burden; and, in these circumstances, while anxious to treat India not only with fairness, but even with liberality, he was unable to support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney. He must, however, say that, although he was precluded from supporting it, he, and he thought hon. Members generally, would agree, to a great extent, in the speech with which the hon. Member had moved it.

MR. LAING said, that if the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) was as practically conversant with Indian finance as he was with financial matters nearer home, he would have hesitated before making the observation that, as regarded financial arrangements between the two countries, England had to complain of India. He (Mr. Laing) would assert, without fear of contradiction, that owing to the policy forced on India against the advice of her best statesmen, and to the Army organization scheme, which went entirely beyond Indian wants, India was paying at least from £2,000,000 to £3,000,000 a-year more than would be necessary if her own local authorities and Governors General had been allowed to organize her Army in her own interests. With regard to the Mahomedans in India, and the pressure they could bring to bear on public opinion there, did not the hon. Baronet know that they formed but a minority of the population? A subscription had been started in India in support of the Sultan during the late war, and, with a Mahomedan population of 60,000,000 or 80,000,000, the whole amount contributed was under £6,000, and he was informed that £2,000 of that sum was given by two large Mahomedan houses. But the question the House had practically to consider now was, whether the proposal of the Government was a fair apportionment of the expenses of the Afghan War as between England and India? The principle had been stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that in cases of this kind there should be a joint contribution. In purely local wars the right hon. Gentleman said that India ought to pay the whole cost; in wars distant from India, England should pay the whole. Now, in considering whether what was proposed was fair, they should also consider the position of India and her ability to bear the whole cost. The war was stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to have been undertaken almost exclusively for an Indian object. But that was at variance with the statement of Lord Beaconsfield, that the war concerned the character and interest of England in Europe. It was because England had assumed a particular line of policy that the Russian Embassy was sent to Cabul, and so the war originated. In the financial position in which India was, who would have thought of precipitating her into a war for remote and contingent dangers? If either Lord Canning, Lord Lawrence, Lord Mayo, —he quoted his name the more readily because he was an excellent Governor General and a Conservative—or Lord Northbrook had been Viceroy, that war would have been impossible. Neither of those noblemen, being opposed to any idea of the extension of our North Western Frontier, would have undertaken it, which was a conclusive proof that it was unnecessary, and, therefore, unwise. Yet, in the face of all that, we were told that this was a mere Frontier war undertaken for Indian purposes. And now as to the capability of India to pay for the war. The cost of the war stood on the Estimates at £2,670,000. He accepted that estimate, but with considerable misgiving, and he must confess that it would be a most agreeable surprise to him if it should turn out that it was no more. But supposing the expense of the war to be covered by £2,670,000, that was an insignificant part of the cost. We should look to the permanent expense entailed by that extension of the Frontier. His (Mr. Laing's) prediction that the new scientific Frontier would render necessary an increase in the military expenditure of India had been more than realized; for Sir Henry Durand had estimated a permanent addition to the Army of India of 10,000 troops, and to the military expenditure of at least £1,000,000 a-year, as the consequence of exchanging a secure Frontier at one side of the m tains for a scientific Frontier beyo expenditure of that sort in the present financial condition of India was a matter of the most grave importance. He had but one complaint to make of the speech which the Under Secretary of State for India lately made on the financial condition of India; it was so candid a statement, it was so agreeable a surprise, that the Government at last realized the necessity of economy, that criticism was turned into compliment, and many thought the financial difficulties of India were nearly at an end. That was very far from being the case. The Debt of India had increased from £107,000,000 in 1874 to £139,000,000 in 1879, or an annual average increase of £6,000,000 a-year, and the extent of the expenditure by the extension of their territory into Afghanistan had not yet been seen. There was now a net total income of £21,000,000, and an expenditure of £24,000,000, which was an expenditure in excess of income, when, as Lord Beaconsfield said, in order to maintain English influence in India they rushed into the Afghan War. It was only by largely extended economies and a great reduction of military expenditure that India could be saved from bankruptcy, or this country from crushing taxation. Our acquisition of the new "scientific Frontier" of India was to have produced a greater feeling of security, and a more settled state of affairs between England and Russia. This was the contention of Her Majesty's Government and their supporters; but there were other persons who had all along pointed out that the idea was delusive, and he was very much afraid we had not yet seen the end of our military expenditure in Afghanistan. All the distinguished military authorities who had discussed the subject were of opinion that if we extended our Frontier into Central Asia, although we might easily conquer the Natives, the greater would be our feeling of insecurity, the greater would be our actual insecurity, and the greater would be our expenses. Not only that, but we should be very likely to involve ourselves in the shifting quicksands of Afghan policy, and every step we took would only render us more sensitive and nervous as we approached the Russian Frontier. These prophecies were already being fulfilled; for the Russians, alarmed and jealous, no doubt, in consequence of our conquest of part of Afghanistan, were at that moment carrying out an expedition further into Central Asia, and the British Government was all in a fidget lest the expedition should attempt to advance on Merv. No doubt it was said Merv would not be occupied by Russia; but expeditions undertaken by civilized nations against predatory hordes must be followed up, and sooner or later the place would probably be occupied by Russia. Instead, therefore, of being diminished, we should be obliged largely to increase our expenditure on our new Frontier, stationing there more troops to counteract the moves of Russia. Our scientific Frontier would, therefore, cost us more than £1,000,000 a-year. The condition of India with the present deficit was critical and dangerous. The danger to our rule in India lay, not outside that country, but inside it, for the teeming millions of its Native population required more constant care, and were capable of being a more terrible foe than Russia. Let them be treated fairly, justly, and kindly in matters of expenditure and everything else, and our rule over them was safe; but let them be treated in a contrary manner, and our rule over them could not be maintained. Whatever we might think was the effect of our military achievements, the Hindoos placed one quality much higher, and that was our sense of justice. It was simply because our Governors General, and their subordinates, had been more just than the Native Princes that we had gained such a great hold over India; and he trusted that neither a mad determination to keep up a great military expenditure, nor anything else, would cause Englishmen to lose their reputation for justice. The main, indeed he might say the only, chance of saving India, he would not say from bankruptcy, but from depending directly on the British taxpayer, was to get England to endorse and sustain her credit, and by a very large reduction of military and other expenditure. He was afraid, however, that the conclusion of the Treaty with Yakob Khan rendered that more difficult than before. Indeed, he very much feared that in a short time we should be forced to go to the rescue of Indian finances; and, in his opinion, it would be far better not to pass this Bill. His hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) deprecated any part of the Indian charges being thrown on the taxation of England; but he (Mr. Laing) did not agree with him. It was only through the English taxpayer feeling that he must ultimately bear the burden of Indian extravagance in increased taxation that any hope could be entertained of finding a remedy for the present state of things. He believed that temporary loans would have a pernicious rather than a beneficial effect by encouraging extravagance, and that the true policy was to let India, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, "stand on her own bottom." But there was another matter equally deserving attention, and that was the manner in which Indian public opinion had, on more than one recent occasion, been outraged. What, for instance, could have been more damaging to the reputation of England for justice and straightforwardness than the application to alien purposes of the Famine Insurance Fund, the reduction of the cotton import duties—not for the benefit of India, but in obedience to political considerations at home—and, lastly, the gagging of the Native Press? It might be the desire of Her Majesty's Government to govern India for the good of India; but their policy during the past few years, it appeared to him, strangely belied their professions. He very much feared that many persons in this country regarded the Hindoos as people who could be dealt with exactly as their Rulers pleased; but such an idea was a great mistake. There was in India an intelligent and growing public opinion, which could understand and condemn, as distinctly as our own people, any act which violated the principles of justice, and that opinion would, he was convinced, condemn the proceedings of the present Government.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had placed on the Paper the following Amendment, which the Rules of the House did not permit him to move, but which he would read as the text of his speech, seeing that it entirely set forth his views on the subject:—

"That there is no reason for departing from the ordinary rule which places the obligations of India on the credit of India, and not on that of the United Kingdom; but any assistance given to India in respect of the Afghan War should be given from the revenues of the United Kingdom, and not as a loan."

We had, in what had been considered the interests of India, taken means to secure her against the approaches of other Powers; he, therefore, thought that she should be called upon to contribute towards the cost. England bore the major part; it was only proposed to require India to pay the minor portion, and, holding the views he did, he regretted that he could not altogether, on this occasion, agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). He did not take what might be called the sentimental view of our connection with India; and when he came to consider whether the money at present under consideration should be paid by his constituents in Kirkcaldy, or by the people of India, he was inclined to think that a great part should be paid by India. Those who argued to the contrary, on the ground of British entanglement in Eastern complications, must take those complications as a whole, and not in detail; and they would see that, whether right or wrong in being jealous of Russia, we were jealous in consequence of our possession of India. The major portion of the expenditure had already fallen upon England, out of whose Exchequer, of course, the Vote of Credit for £6,000,000 had to be met. He would admit that the people of India were very poor; but he altogether denied that we had imposed a grinding taxation upon them; on the contrary, we had relieved them from many burdens which they bore in earlier times, the only serious burden imposed upon them being the salt tax. If we had not dealt generously with them, we had, at least, done fairly by them. True, we had recently put upon them the licence tax, which was of a somewhat grinding description; but that was not a conclusive proof that the taxation was really so grinding as it was sometimes supposed to be, because he did not think the present Governor of India superlatively wise. He did not take the chivalric view that we were to be unjust to ourselves in order that we might be generous to India, which we had governed for the benefit of its people. He did not so much object to the amount of the assistance that it was proposed to render to India as to the form in which it was to be rendered; and that objection was expressed in the Amendment of which he had given Notice, but which he could not now move. The effect of the course taken by the Government was to shirk the whole question of this obligation, for it was not faced either by India or England. India did not admit that she was obliged to borrow money, and the British Government did not boldly take it from the taxpayers. The forgotten precedents cited by the Chancellor of the Exchequer were outweighed by the fact that, in the present century, in great financial difficulties India had stood alone, even when loans had to be raised at 5½ per cent. The arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have been just as valid in support of a proposal to pledge the credit of England for the whole Debt of India, or in support of a much larger loan by India for the expenses of the Afghan War; but he entirely failed to show that there was any particular reason why this particular sum should be raised on the credit of England. There was no such financial stress as should induce the Government to depart from the ordinary rule. He was driven to the conclusion that it was thought better to postpone facing the charge than to put it upon either India or England—to put it aside for the present, and to leave it to be dealt with by the taxpayers of another generation. How far were we to go in this imprudent course? A man would rather give £5 than put his name to a bill for £50, which would probably be followed by another bill for a larger amount. Surely the credit of that country was good enough, without resort being had to the credit of this. If the policy of Her Majesty's Government were accepted by the House, and this bill were backed by England, in all probability other bills would be forthcoming from the Government of India. With regard to the Afghan War, he was surprised that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have taken the opportunity of pronouncing a eulogy on the operations in that campaign, and thus have challenged discussion on that subject. He, for one, did not share the belief that the Treaty concluded with Yakoob Khan would put an end to all the difficulties connected with the Afghan policy. In this case, the Afghan operations must be followed by increased expenditure, for it was admitted that eight regiments would form the garrison of the Khyber Pass, while as many, or more, would be required at other posts, so that from 16 to 20 regiments would be occupied in holding the newly-acquired territory, while all history rendered it probable that we should be involved in many Frontier troubles with tribes whose trade was plunder.

Sir George Campbell

We should be obliged to make endless expeditions, and incur endless expense, before the Native tribes were reduced to submission. With respect to the Treaty entered into by the Government of India with Yakoob Khan, if the Ameer were able to carry it out he would find no fault with it; but no one who knew anything of Afghanistan could doubt that the Treaty could not be carried out without renewed trouble and great expense. With respect to the question more immediately before them, he feared that Her Majesty's Government had entered upon a very dangerous path and asked the House to agree to a very doubtful principle, and he should, therefore, give his vote against it. With reference to the means to be adopted in reducing Indian expenditure, he quite agreed in the propriety of providing that the Natives should be promoted to higher offices and employment in the Government, as they were paid less than Europeans. They were becoming more fitted for such promotion every day, and it would be not only an act of justice to them, but an act of sound financial policy; further, the Government must be firm in reducing the Army.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, that he rose chiefly for the purpose of deprecating a discussion of the details of the Afghan Treaty. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was, no doubt, a little in fault in leading hon. Members on to that track; but it was clear that no advantage could accrue to the Government, or to the Opposition, from the discussion of that subject at present. They had not, in fact, the materials for that discussion. The Treaty could not be understood without the fullest explanation. As it stood at present, it was a most unintelligible document; but as far as he could make it out, if the despatches to be laid before the House did not put a different face on the Treaty, it seemed likely to prove a calamity to us. He, therefore, hoped the Government would lose no time in the preparation and production of the Papers in reference to it, as he (Mr. Grant Duff) could assure them that nothing was further from the intention of the Opposition than to allow the Treaty to pass without the fullest discussion directly after the despatches relating to it were laid on the Table. With respect to the Bill before the House, looking at it with Indian spectacles, he could not but think that his

hon. Friend the Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing) was too severe in the observations he had made in criticizing the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock). It was his (Mr. Grant Duff's) duty for a period of years to watch the financial relations between England and India; and it was his firm impression that they were very far indeed from deserving the strictures which the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had passed upon them. In fact, if those relations could be tried before some impartial arbitrator, he was not quite sure that the judgment would not be that something was owing by India to this country, and that she ought to pay more than she now paid. That view was held by some persons who had given the longest and the most anxious attention to the subject. He agreed entirely with the first part of the Amendment which had been placed on the Paper by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), and regretted that it could not be moved. With regard to the Bill itself, he was bound to say that he viewed this £2,000,000 to be handed over to India as a mere benevolence, but a benevolence given in the worst possible way. It would form a very vicious and bad precedent, and was one as to which it would be better for India that it never was given at all.

“That it is alike dangerous to the finances of India as of England to make loans to India out of the taxes of the United Kingdom; that it is unnecessary to aid India by loans of this kind if proper economies were enforced, and Indian expenditure restricted to that which ought justly to be charged on Indian revenues; that the expenditure in England, Civil and Military, now chargeable on Indian revenues, but under the control of the Government of England, is susceptible of large reductions to an extent far in excess of the sum which is needed to pay for the interest on two millions; and that the costly organization of the Imperial troops now forced on India by the Government of England is capable of being so modified as to ensure a diminution of expenditure, without diminishing efficiency, as would amount to a sum far in excess of many borrowed millions.”

The hon. and gallant Gentleman said, that no one could consider the precedents which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had quoted in favour of the present measure of aiding the finances of India by temporary loans from the

Imperial Government without looking forward to the like evils to India that flowed out of the former loans. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had even referred to loans which had been made to the Imperial Government, more especially those which related to the renewal of the Charters of the Bank of England and of the East India Company, without a feeling of shame for the manner in which the public and India had been treated by this country. At one time the whole capital of the Bank of England had been loaned to the Imperial Government, and even at present nearly the whole was so lent to the injury of commerce. And in bygone years large sums were also lent or given by the East India Company in order to induce Government to grant a monopoly of commerce. He regretted that it was now proposed to follow the evil example set in former days, for he feared that the result would be to check economy and to encourage extravagance. If any Member would search the financial record prepared by Mr. Chisholm, and laid before Parliament on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, he would there find conclusive evidence of the way in which India was supplied with loans by the Imperial Government in the form of depreciated Exchequer Bills, and repaid by India at nearly their full nominal value. No doubt, the plea was put forward, both formerly and at present, that England provided India with military establishments; but that attempt to manage the affairs of India, instead of allowing India to take care of her own matters, was a great evil, both as respected the costly nature of the management and its bad results. He contended that they were not getting either efficiency or the worth of the money that had been spent on the Indian Army. An hon. Member who preceded him had implied that the work was well done. In answer to that, he wished to state one fact. There was now one battalion under orders for India, which would embark within two months. In that battalion there were 340 soldiers of less than one year's service, and 370 who were under 20 years of age. Would anyone say that those men were qualified and capable to stand in the ranks of the Indian Army? He considered that they were endangering the reputation and the honour of the British Army sending such soldiers into the fi

After reminding the House of the way in which India was treated after the China and Abyssinian Wars, and the acquiring of Ceylon and Mauritius, he would impress upon hon. Members that the steps taken in India with a view to economy were likely to have a contrary effect——when

MR. SPEAKER drew the hon. and gallant Member's attention to the fact that the Question before the House was the East India Loan (Consolidated Fund) Bill.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR remarked, that his object in mentioning the details of bad management was to bear out the statement in the Amendment that if India could be allowed to manage her own affairs that economy and efficiency would certainly be secured.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he wished to put a question to the Under Secretary of State for India. He would be glad if that hon. Gentleman would state to the House what were the present financial relations between India and this country, as regarded the balance of Debt? Supposing that the House should vote the £2,000,000, would that go in diminution of the annual drawings, or would the £2,000,000 be in addition to the present Debt of India? This point, if cleared up, he held, could not fail to have a very important bearing upon the future financial transactions of the Government with India. He wished also to express his opinion that the proposal of the Government to raise these £2,000,000 by way of loan to India was alike shabby and unsatisfactory. It seemed to him that there must either exist, on the part of the Government, a sense that they ought to contribute towards the war—in which case the cost should be treated as expenditure—or a sense that the war was purely an Indian affair, in which case their proposal was, as had been well said by the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff), pure benevolence. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not, however, said that the finances of India were reduced to such a position that it was absolutely necessary that we should make her a charitable contribution of £70,000 a-year, the interest upon £2,000,000. Why, then, was that loan proposed? From the consciousness that the war was not purely an Indian war, and that the Empire ought, consequently, to be called upon to make this contribution. If he was right in that conjecture, he objected altogether to the contribution taking the shabby form of this loan; and the proposal was not only wrong, inconsistent, and shabby, but most dangerous as a precedent for the future. Let expenditure be borne where expenditure had been incurred; let that expenditure appear either in the Indian or the English Budget; but do not let the House indulge in a kind of jugglery in order to ease off a transaction which might not be satisfactory to either country.

MR. E. STANHOPE wished to make an appeal to the House whether, considering the ample discussion that had taken place, and the late period of the Session that had been reached, they were not in a position to decide the point that had been submitted to them? The subject had been debated very fully and with great ability on both sides of the question. There had been the able speech of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), and that of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, representing one view of the question; and the speech of the hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), together with the speeches of other hon. Members, representing another view of it. With reference to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Goschen), he (Mr. E. Stanhope) could assure the House that the proposal before it had not been made in the belief that the war was not a purely Indian war. On the contrary, it was made in the full belief that this was a purely Indian war. The tone of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at the commencement of the war, was precisely the same as it was now. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking when the war began, said—

“We must wait and see what will happen. If this war assumes a wider development, then we must re-consider the whole matter; but if it remains a mere Frontier war, there can be no reason why England should go to the aid of India.”

The war was now over; the cost was comparatively small, and it had retained what he might call a local character. The Government, therefore, put their proposal forward on the distinct understanding that the war was almost entirely a purely Indian war. The reason they made the proposal was this. The Government of India applied to the Government at home to make the advance upon this ground: they said—"We have had this war upon our hands; we have to meet its expense at a time when the remittances which we have to make to England are larger than ever they were before; and, looking to the rate of exchange being so high, it will be hard upon us to make those remittances. Grant us this loan, which will not only enable us to meet the cost of the war, but assist us in the matter of the remittances." It was in direct expectation of this loan being granted that the Government of India estimated at £15,000,000 the amount which they would have to remit to this country in the present year, the estimate being based upon a calculation of the probable rates of exchange. Allusion had also been made to the cost which might be entailed upon India in the future, in consequence of the new Frontier arrangements recently effected in Afghanistan. He was not yet in a position to go into details on the matter; but he might inform hon. Members—and there were some hon. Gentlemen present whose prophecies as to the cost of the war itself had been completely disappointed—that, in his opinion, the extra expense which these arrangements would necessitate would not be anything considerable. Reference had likewise been made to the subject of keeping up large garrisons in Afghanistan. A question on this subject had been put to him the other day. The arrangements which he then sketched out with regard to the Khyber Pass were essentially provisional; but, even if it were necessary to continue such an arrangement as he had indicated, there would not necessarily be an addition to our military Force, but simply a re-distribution of it. He would not go into the question of the general state of Indian finances; but he might say that, looking at them now with the added experience of two months, and the more perfect knowledge of what they had before them, he believed that if he had to make his statement now, instead of two months ago, he should be able to give a much more favourable impression than he had then done. He believed that the pledges they then gave, that if circumstances were favourable they would be able to put their finances upon a sound footing, would be amply redeemed.

MR. CHILDERS observed, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had described the war in which this country had been engaged in Afghanistan as a Frontier war, and, therefore, one the cost of which ought to be defrayed by India. But while the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer omitted to explain why the loan to India had been proposed, the Under Secretary of State for India explained that it was proposed chiefly in order to bring the balances as between India and England into a more satisfactory position. If that was so, he (Mr. Childers) should like to know how the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the war was a mere Frontier affair, the cost of which ought to be borne by the Indian population, was to be reconciled with the statement of the Under Secretary of State that this loan was to be made on account of the war? But the advantage which would be derived, in the most favourable circumstances, by India was so small—being, in a financial point of view, as between English credit and Indian credit, only £52,500—that he could not conceive any sufficient ground for the proposal which had been made, and had provoked so much feeling in Parliament and in the country. Neither could he conceive it right, for such an object as that, to disturb the whole rules of finance. There had been no shadow or pretence of justification in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the proposal to make a large gift from the English Exchequer to the Revenues of India, no record of which would ever be found in the accounts laid before Parliament in such a form as that it could be discussed in Parliament. He hoped, if the House gave a second reading to the Bill, that it would be so amended as to remove some of the objectionable features.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, it was not a pleasant thing to criticize the acts of one's friends; but he would not be dealing honestly if he did not say that he was deeply distressed by this act of the Government. It was at variance with the ordinary system of finance; for in this proposal the Government had introduced something which, in finance, was utterly unknown. It was, in fact, a financial monster, the production of which he could not account for; for a loan bearing no interest was not a loan only, but a gift to the extent of the interest which was forborne. Either English taxpayers were bound to tribute to the cost of the recent Af

War, or they were not. If they were not, where was the object of the Bill? If they were, let them estimate their share of the responsibility and of the contingent gain, and pay accordingly. His hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India had explained that this loan was asked for by India; but he (Mr. Hubbard) should like to know whether it was asked for without interest? [Mr. E. STANHOPE: Yes.] If that was so, the Indian people were very ingenious, and he was afraid had set an example likely to be largely followed. But strange as was the proposal, the reason given for it was even more strange. The Indian Government complained of the loss by exchange upon their remittances to this country, and they desired a loan to mitigate the immediate pressure; and now see how the proposed arrangement would work—of a loan of £2,000,000 without interest, and repayable in seven years by instalments each of nearly £300,000. The interest of the loan, if contracted by England, would be £60,000 a-year; if by India, £80,000. Therefore, instead of paying £60,000 or £80,000 a-year, India was now to pay £300,000 a-year. Obviously, the only reason given in support of the Bill told the other way—it was an aggravation of the exchange difficulty, not a mitigation of it. This loan was intended to be an act of grace to India. Was it not possible to make this act of grace still more gracious? He thought he saw how that could be done. In the stipulations of the Treaty with Yakoub Khan we undertook to pay him £60,000 a-year as a subsidy. That was precisely the amount which this country would have to pay as interest on the loan. Well, then, let the subsidy be an English investment; and, instead of this loan of £2,000,000, let us give India the £60,000 a-year outright. He could vote neither for the Bill nor for the Amendment before the House; but he would readily vote for the proposal of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), if he were able to take the decision of the House upon it.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, he had no doubt whatever as to the vote he should give on the present occasion. He maintained, in opposition to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the Afghan War was essentially an English, and, therefore, an Imperial, and not an Indian war; and he would refer hon. Members to the letters from The Times' Correspondent, in which the writer went on to show that it had shattered one of the finest of our Cavalry regiments, and had played havoc with some of the best Infantry, as well as Native regiments. These had been shattered not by the swords of the enemy, but by the disease which they encountered in the Khyber and other Passes. Such had been the result of this short campaign, which was rather a mere military promenade than anything else, and it was one of the most expensive results that could be obtained. The question of the military expenditure of India was especially forcing itself on the attention of the people of England. Three years ago the expense of the entire Army, Native and European, was £16,639,000; last year it was £17,010,000; and this year it was £18,225,000, of which £2,000,000 were due to the Afghan campaign. If these £2,000,000 were deducted, the cost would be nearly the same as it was three years ago. According to the Commission which sat in 1859, the amount and distribution of the permanent Forces necessary to be maintained in India must be always affected by the political necessities of the country, the railways opened, the military roads, and other similar considerations. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Laing) had told the House that railroads had sprung up over India, and yet we had not reduced our military expenditure. The proportion of Europeans to Natives in the Army of India was, before the Mutiny, as one to three; after the Mutiny it was one to two. His hon. Friend ought to impress upon the Commission now sitting in India that Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House would not be satisfied until they saw very large reductions in the garrisons of India. An Army of 100,000 Natives and 50,000 Europeans would at once create a reduction of 40,000 men.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must say the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken (Sir Arthur Hayter) had carried them over a rather wide field of discussion, into which he did not propose to follow him. The question of the military situation in India was, no doubt, a very important one, which would have to be discussed on a proper occasion. Again, how far he was correct in describing the late operations of the Afghan War as a military promenade was a question upon which he would not then enter, nor would he stay to contrast the views to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had now given utterance with those expressed by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite some months ago, when they said that the campaign would comprise some of the most formidable operations in which England ever was engaged, and that they could only look forward to the most frightful dangers and disasters. All this was beside the question. They must proceed on the data which were before them. The real question was that the Indian Government, finding that in balancing their accounts for the current financial year they were in a position of deficit, caused to a great extent by the operations in Afghanistan, had to consider how that deficit could be met. It might be met by an addition to taxation; but, for reasons already stated in the House, the Government of India considered that would not be an expedient course. It would have involved great pressure on the people of India for a temporary purpose. That being the case, it was necessary, in some way or other, to raise money by way of loan. Then there came the question how best that money should be raised; and, under all the circumstances of the case, the Indian Government made an appeal to Her Majesty's Government to advance a certain sum—£2,000,000—to carry them over the difficulty at the moment, the Indian Government undertaking to provide for its re-payment in seven years, repaying it without an addition to their taxation. His right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) said the loan they proposed to make without interest was "a monster"—he had never heard of a loan without interest; it was a monster so terrible in its shape and form, that he earnestly protested against it. His right hon. Friend said whatever assistance we were bound in justice to give to India should not be given in this way. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) confessed he had some difficulty in following the argument of his right hon. Friend. He could quite understand the argument of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), when he said we had more share in these transactions in India than we were willing to admit, and we ought to bear a greater portion of the burden; he could understand the argument of others who said this was a purely Indian difficulty and India should be left to get out of it as she best could; he could understand, also, the argument of those who said we ought to make this as a gift; but, assuming that this was a proper measure, he could not see the force of the argument against the particular form of the loan. Why was a loan without interest a monster, and why was it not a loan? He confessed, for his own part, he could not see it. Would a loan made below the current rate of interest be a monster? Perhaps his right hon. Friend would say it was. [Mr. J. G. HUBBARD: So it is, in its degree.] In that case, a loan at 2 per cent would be a little monster. In fact, the monster would get larger as the proportion of interest decreased. He confessed he was unable to go into this elaborate study of natural history, and it appeared to him that a loan at 2 per cent, or 1 per cent, or $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, was still a loan; and a loan did not become a monster merely because it was under the current rate of interest. It also occurred to him that the Government were at perfect liberty to take the step which they had taken without incurring the censure which his right hon. Friend endeavoured to cast upon them. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) said this was done in a way to conceal, from those who studied these accounts, the assistance which England was giving to India year by year. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) did not think that would be the case. Year by year they made loans, under the Public Works Loan Commission, to public bodies, at a lower rate of interest than they could borrow them for themselves. The money for this advance to India would be borrowed from the National Debt Commissioners; but it would be placed in an account which would show to everyone the nature of the transaction, and the amount of our contributions during each of these seven years. The 4th clause required that a full account of all receipts, payments, and transactions under the Act should be made up every year and audited by the Treasury. He had formerly explained the course proposed to be taken, and there would be no difficulty in exactly tracing what the nature of the transaction was. It was merely a question of book-keeping, and, therefore, not insoluble. He hoped t

House would feel that, in making this proposal, the Government were not making such a tremendous attack upon national morality as had been supposed. He could not see, when once they admitted the principle that England ought to come to the assistance of India, that there was any difficulty in the matter.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was not surprised that the Under Secretary of State for India was anxious to bring the debate to a close, considering that it was rather a remarkable fact that hardly anybody seemed cordially to support the principle of the Bill under discussion. Objectors approached the Bill from directly opposite points; but they all agreed that the Bill was not one that ought to be adopted. Looking at the number of financial and Indian authorities in the House, it would have been satisfactory if a "stray" Member could have been induced to rise and say that the Bill was, from some point of view, a consistent application of a sound principle in connection with Indian finance. That, however, remained to be proved. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not answered the main point of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) as to the burden that the exchanges would throw on India in making remittances to England. The Government, in fact, had sought to justify the measure by its operation on the present state of the Indian exchange. Let them try it by this test. Every year, up to seven, the Government were going to burden the exchange by the necessity of India remitting home about £300,000; whereas had they left her to raise the loan in the open market, her remittances would not have been £300,000 yearly in respect of this loan, but would have been £70,000. As to the Indian exchange, he did not pretend to say what would be the rate of that exchange 20 or 15 years hence; but, certainly, no person could regard as permanent the state of affairs which now existed. With respect, then, to the proposed limit of seven years, it appeared to him that the proposals of the Government would greatly aggravate the difficulty already existing in the matter of exchange; and when they looked at the question from a point purely of figures, it seemed to him that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had altogether failed to answer the arguments of his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract. His right hon. Friend pointed out that, by the proposal of the Government, they were to give a pecuniary benefit to India amounting to the difference between the rate at which we could borrow and she could borrow—an amount somewhere about £50,000—but, at the same time, they were asking the people of England practically to make a present of something like £300,000 to India. On that ground alone, as a mere matter of finance, this was an extraordinary operation; nor was the description of it as a monster so extraordinary, although it had been criticized very ingeniously by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but it had been the established practice to make use of illustrations from natural history within the region of the stock market; and so the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) was perfectly justified in placing that department of science under contribution for the purpose of illustrating his argument. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not accurately understood the point that they were by this transaction going to lay out between £200,000 and £300,000 yearly of the money of the people of England, and that outlay would never appear in the public accounts, where it ought to appear as part of the public expenditure. No doubt the re-payment of the instalments would be duly recorded, but the expenditure would not appear as such. An important question involved was the surrender of the important principle of the independence of the two Exchequers. He admitted that, as a rule, the cost of an Indian war ought to be borne by India; but the war in question was an Imperial war, due to Imperial policy, and had reference, not to Asiatic Powers, but, above all, to one great European Power. The Government ought, therefore, to have boldly and manfully assumed the responsibility for England. He was prepared to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney, although he did not think he could do so on the Main Question, because there were other Motions upon the Paper which might be more acceptable. The position of the Government was this—the Chancellor of the Exchequer had laid down, in the most distinct manner, the principle that the Afghan War was an Indian war; that it belonged to that class of wars the cost of which ought to be borne by the Indian

Exchequer, and not to that class the cost of which ought to be borne by a mixed contribution.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Not entirely. I said that this had been something rather more than a Frontier war, and therefore there was a certain obligation, but only a small obligation, upon England; but if it had gone to a much larger extent, and a European Power had come in, we should have recognized a much greater liability on the part of England.

MR. GLADSTONE rejoined, that that was not the impression which the right hon. Gentleman had left on those who had heard him. The Chancellor of the Exchequer now said this was not in the first class of wars, but in the second class, to be met by a mixed contribution, though, in his view, it ought to be confined in very narrow limits. But he (Mr. Gladstone) ventured to think they ought not, for any trifling sum such as the difference between the rates of interest at which the Indian and the English Governments could raise money, or the differences on exchange, to depart from the principle of the independence of the Exchequers. A graver financial question could not possibly be presented to the mind of the British Parliament than the assumption of responsibility by England for Indian expenditure. Whatever was done in that way should be from serious cause, and not merely for securing to India the trifling benefit of getting any of the sums now at issue. He was entirely at a loss to know, when once the Government admitted that England ought to bear some portion of the cost of this war, by what consideration it was that they arrived at the conclusion that it should be limited to one-seventh of the cost. He could not conceive, if this were a war having reference, as was admitted, to a policy involving questions of the general balance of power, by what argument the liability of India was fixed at six-sevenths, and that of England at one-seventh. In the points that were now mainly raised with reference to the financial operation of the loan, and the effect on the exchanges, adding to that the argument of his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract, that every operation of the public expenditure should be represented in our accounts as expenditure, Her Majesty's Government had entirely failed to make good any argument for the presentation of a Bill which they admitted themselves had reference to a state of the Indian finance which the Under Secretary of State assured them was now passed away. The finances were, the hon. Gentleman had said, much improved; and, that being so, there could be no justification for the present measure.

[BILL 197.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL rose to object to the Bill, and contended that it could not be sufficiently considered at that stage of the Sitting. There had been no discussion of it, and he wanted some explanation of it. [Cries of "Agreed!"] He was not prepared to agree to a Bill involving millions without some discussion. His opinion was expressed by the Amendment which he had placed upon the Paper; and which, if he had the opportunity, he would submit to the consideration of the House—namely,

"That in view of the difficulties caused by excessive changes in the relative value of gold and silver, advantage should be taken of the proposal of the United States to settle a standard calculated to steady the value of the precious metals, the Government of India undertaking to continue the free coinage of silver if the United States will do likewise."

He admitted that, up to a certain point, the abundance of silver was not in all respects an evil to India; that so long as the rupee did not fall below 1s. 8d. or 1s. 6d. in price the Government of India ought not to embark in heroic measures; but it might be wise, in the event of its falling still lower, to limit the coinage of silver, and so artificially enhance the price of the rupee. India was literally the only country where there was now a free coinage of silver. In America there was a limited coinage of silver; and as England and America were alike interested in preventing an excessive fall in the value of that metal, he urged that terms should be come to between the two countries—namely, India and America—on the subject. The hon. Member was continuing, when——

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till this day.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

CRIMINAL LAW—THE CASE OF EDMUND GALLEY.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT rose to call attention to the case of Edmund Galley, and to move—

"That the innocence of Edmund Galley of the crime of which he was convicted at Exeter in 1836 has been established beyond all reasonable doubts; and that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty graciously to grant a free pardon to Edmund Galley."

The hon. Baronet said, the case had excited considerable interest, and he regretted that the Home Secretary had not thought fit to yield to the general expression of public opinion and the representations of the Lord Chief Justice of England with regard to it. No doubt, a long period had elapsed since the murder of Mr. May; but he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had yet to learn that time sanctioned injustice and wrong, seeing that, in addition to the testimony of the Lord Chief Justice, they had the opinion of other eminent men that the accused had established an alibi, and that he had been improperly convicted. The facts of the case were these:—On the 16th of July, 1835, there was a fair held in the town of Moretonhampstead, situated some 12 or 14 miles from Exeter, and half-way between the latter city and a small village called Dunsford. That fair was attended by a substantial yeoman or farmer named May, who rode into Moretonhampstead, and who, having received various sums of money, set out at night from a public-house on his way home. Just outside the town there was a gate kept by a man named Nosworthy, and this man saw the farmer ride through the gate, perfectly sober. Between 12 and 1 o'clock in the morning two other persons, returning from the fair, saw, a little way up the road, a horse without a rider, and, subsequently, the farmer was discovered unconscious and insensible. He died. At first, suspicion rested on a man named Avery and a woman named Harris; but there was not sufficient evidence to fix the crime upon them, and the latter was eventually discharged, Avery being detained in custody for another offence. Subsequently, statements were made implicating a man named Oliver, who went under the name of "Buckingham Joe," and the man Galley, who at that time was in custody in Coldbath Fields Prison, and who was arrested in consequence of his having lost a tooth, and of his having answered to a description given by the woman Harris. They were apprehended, and tried before Mr. Justice Williams, at Exeter, in July, 1836. Oliver was defended by Mr. (now Sir Montague) Smith; while the case of Galley, who was a poor man, was taken up by Mr. Cockburn, the present distinguished Lord Chief Justice of England. During the trial Edmund Galley protested his innocence, and more than once was heard to say to his fellow prisoner, Joseph Oliver—"You know I was not there, and I don't know you." It appeared that the principal witness for the prosecution was a woman named Harris, who at the time was living with a man named Avery. She swore to meeting Oliver and Galley on the night of the murder near the place where, and about the hour when, it was committed, and recognized the prisoners as the men who jumped from a hedge, and murdered the man May. There was also some other evidence tending in the same direction. Charlotte Clarke, however, swore that Galley was not the "Dick Turpin" who was supposed, with Oliver, to have committed the murder. Galley was not defended; but a witness named Avery swore that Harris could not have seen the murder committed, because she was in Exeter with him at the time, and the murder was committed several miles outside that city. Both prisoners were, however, found guilty, and then Oliver, who had not said a word before in regard to Galley, addressing the Judge, said—"My Lord, you are surely not going to send this innocent man to the scaffold. He was not there, and I never saw him before until we were in gaol together." The strong protest of Galley, and the declaration of Oliver, made such an impression upon the counsel and one or two gentlemen who heard the case, that an effort was made at once to obtain a respite. Only 48 hours elapsed between the verdict and the time of execution; but a reprieve was obtained for Galley, and a Mr. Cherer, the shorthand writer, who took all the notes of the evidence in the case, got up every incident that could be obtained to prove an alibi, came up to London, and had an interview with the late Earl Russell, then Secretary of State for the Home Department, who deputed Sir Frederick Roe, then Chief Magistrate at Bow Street, to inquire into the alibi of the prisoner. Sir Montague Smith had stated that he felt such an interest in the matter at the time that he went down with Sir Frederick Roe to examine into the truth of the alibi, and he returned to London perfectly satisfied that the alibi was made out. In fact, he had written to say—

"I am certainly of opinion, rightly or wrongly, that Galley's case was one of mistaken identity, and that he was wrongly convicted."

A magistrate saw Galley at the gaol, and the prisoner told him that on the day of the murder he was at Dartford in company with two men. Afterwards, Galley said he had recollected that there was a third man. There had been no time to communicate with Dartford; and, in the meantime, a letter came from Dartford stating that Galley, on the day in question, was at that place in company with three men. The evidence had satisfied the Lord Chief Justice, Sir Montague Smith, and others, that the alibi was distinctly made out. It had been suggested that Galley was committing a burglary on the night of the murder; and he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had inquired if that were so, and found that there was no proof of the fact. The result, however, was, that the sentence of death was not carried out, being commuted to transportation for life—Oliver, in the meantime, having been executed—and he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) exceedingly regretted that, in the 19th century, he was obliged to ask pardon for an offence which had never been committed. He had hoped the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill would have been passed this Session. That measure provided for a Court of Appeal, which had long been due to justice, and, when once established, an innocent man would not have to go, hat in hand, to ask for pardon. After being two years in the hulks, Galley was, in 1839, sent to New South Wales, where he had passed his life as a convict. He bore his infliction till 1877, when a letter appeared from him, written to the prosecuting solicitor, pointing out that a man named John Longley had confessed on his death-bed that he was really the man who, along with Oliver, had committed the murder, and asking that something should be done to withdraw from him the stigma of being a murderer. The letter was published in an Exeter newspaper, and the result of it was the memorable and noble letter of the Lord Chief Justice, which had appeared in the public Press. He hoped that no mere adherence to precedent would prevent this case from being re-opened, for he thought his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department ought to feel proud to do an act such as that which was now asked. At all events, he hoped this House would see that a gross act of injustice was no longer allowed to remain without reparation; for, in his opinion, it was inconsistent with what was right that the man should, after all that had occurred, be obliged to have recourse to the Secretary of State for pardon, when, in justice, he was entitled to complete vindication. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. BULWER, in seconding the Motion, said, he had not intended to take part in the discussion, for he was not aware until a short time before he entered the House that the subject was to be brought forward. He would not go over again, either briefly or at length, the facts which had been so well placed before the House by his hon. Friend, but would content himself with a reference to the letter of the Lord Chief Justice, in which he referred to the evidence as excluding all reasonable doubt of the man's innocence, and he hoped the House would set some value on the opinion of so distinguished a man as the Lord Chief Justice. But that opinion did not rest there. It was corroborated entirely by that of Mr. Justice Montague Smith. He could hardly imagine that any Member of the House who had read the case, and had read the letter of the Lord Chief Justice, could entertain any doubt that a very gross wrong had been inflicted. Unfortunately, the mode adopted by his hon. Friend was the only one that presented itself to have this wrong set right; but he trusted that his hon. Friend would be successful, for he felt sure that every Member would recognize the true character of the Home Secretary in the concluding words of the Lord Chief Justice when he said—

“ I commend this case to that high sense of justice and humanity for which your administration of office has been distinguished.”

Of course, the Home Secretary had given his anxious and earnest consideration to the case; but the grounds upon which the right hon. Gentleman grounded his refusal to interfere in the case appeared to be these:—All the facts, he said, before him, and upon which the recommendation of his Lordship was based, were, while fresh, and while Galley was under sentence of death, brought before Lord John Russell and Lord Denman, the Chief Justice of the day; and he said the question for him to decide was not so much whether he being in Lord Russell's position would have arrived at the same conclusion, as whether at this period of time, and so long after the case, he should on the same facts over-rule the solemn decision to which the then Secretary of State, acting under advice, came to. The matter had also been brought before his Predecessors, Lord Aberdare and Mr. Lowe, who had declined to interfere, and he must decline to over-rule their decision. Such were the reasons given by the Home Secretary; and he (Mr. Bulwer) thought the right hon. Gentleman had not, in his own justification, placed the case so high as he might have done, because in the letter of the Lord Chief Justice it would be found that he said—“ The scene created a sensation difficult to describe, and left an impression never to be effaced.” The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, might not unreasonably have supposed, after reading that letter, that the Lord Chief Justice had himself also, when in office as Attorney General, urged upon the Government of the day, but in vain, the duty of redressing this great wrong. Without trespassing longer on the time of the House he hoped that if the Secretary of State for the Home Department felt disinclined to over-rule the decisions of his Predecessors, the House of Commons, with an unanimous voice, would say to the right hon. Gentleman—“ We will in this case relieve you from the responsibility.”

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “ That ” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “ the innocence of Edmund Galley of the crime of which he was convicted at Exeter in 1836 has been established beyond all reasonable doubts; and that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty graciously to grant a free pardon to Edmund Galley,”— (Sir Eardley Wilmot),

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he quite concurred in the opinion expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Bulwer), that there could hardly be a doubt but that there had been a miscarriage of justice in this case. After the strong opinion given by the Lord Chief Justice and Sir Montague Smith—and the facts of the case were such as we could all form an opinion upon—he would ask his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he could feel himself justified in adhering to the determination to which he regretted to hear his right hon. Friend had arrived? The only possible ground on which his right hon. Friend could refuse the appeal of the Lord Chief Justice was that he was bound by the decision at which former Secretaries of State had arrived. He hoped his right hon. Friend would exercise his own clear judgment in the matter; and, if he did so, he would add to the high reputation which he had acquired during his tenure of his present office.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, there had been no contradiction of the statement of facts which had been published on Galley's behalf. That statement had taken, in his (Sir Joseph M'Kenna's) opinion, the case clearly out of all rules based on precedent or official etiquette, confirmed as it was by the testimony of one who was now Lord Chief Justice; and he could not understand on what ground the Secretary of State for the Home Department could refuse a recognition of Galley's innocence. He ventured to say that there was not a Member of the House who had paid attention to the facts of the case who was not convinced that Edmund Galley was an innocent and a wronged man.

MR. A. MILLS said, a largely-signed Memorial was sent to the Home Office from his constituents of Exeter in favour of a cancellation of the sentence of Edmund Galley. That Memorial was signed by leading men of all parties in politics, including the Bishop and the Dean of Exeter. He awaited with interest the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Possibly, they would be told that the House of Commons was not the place to canvass judicial decisions. He (Mr. A. Mills) agreed with that as a general rule; but there were exceptions, and he thought there were exceptional circumstances in this case which should lead them to take it up. When the Lord Chief Justice thought it right to join in the public expression of opinion in reference to this matter, he did not think it could be said that the House of Commons was debarred from taking notice of the case because successive Secretaries of State had declined to re-open the matter. An error had been committed in this case, as there had been in the case of a man named Barber, who was wrongly convicted of having forged a will. Upon a full consideration of Barber's case, compensation was given to him out of the public funds. This matter had been brought before Parliament very fairly and properly; and, though so long a time had passed since Galley's conviction, he saw no reason why justice should not be done. The question here was, whether or not such facts had not come to the knowledge of the Court and the public after the man's trial as led to a change in his sentence, that required further investigation should take place? The advocates of the abolition of capital punishment would find a strong argument in support of their view, if it were to be held that a case of this kind once decided could not be re-opened.

MR. MUNTZ said, they were now called upon, upon mere hearsay evidence, to reverse the proceedings of a Court of Justice 44 years ago, and if the Motion were successful he trusted that it would not be made a precedent, because the Lord Chief Justice of England had written a letter expressing disapproval of the conviction. What would be the result of the House of Commons taking up all such cases? It was peculiarly the duty of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, after consultation with the Judges, to inquire into these cases, and advise the Crown as to the exercise of the Prerogative of mercy, and they should leave it to him. They were asked to set up a dangerous precedent; and unless he heard something more forcible and argumentative than had already reached him he should certainly vote against the Resolution.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON hoped that, although so long a time had elapsed since Galley's sentence, the House would not think that its time had been wasted if, by this Motion, justice should be done to that unfortunate man, who was most unjustly punished many years ago. Galley had clearly proved an alibi, and he asked that the sentence upon him should be reversed, and that his character should be restored to him. If the same facts appertaining to this case were to-day laid before the Home Secretary with reference to a case of recent occurrence there could be but one opinion as to how he would act. Having regard to the old age of the man and his character, he trusted that justice would be done, and that there would be no hesitation in accepting the Motion.

MR. LOWE said, that the judicial theory upon which the House was proceeding was a very singular one. They were asked to consider what was done many years ago upon the evidence then produced, and on which a conclusion was arrived at. They were bound in judicial matters, when considering the guilt of prisoners, to get the best assistance which the study of a life in a laborious profession could give, to hear patiently what could be said, to turn matters every way, and only to decide on the best evidence that could be produced. But what was the course the House of Commons was asked to adopt? The House was now asked to reverse all that was done. An hon. Member rose and narrated what he believed to be the facts; a number of hon. Gentlemen came down obviously with minds made up—[Cries of "No, no!"]—Hon. Gentlemen who cried "No!" might answer for themselves, but not for those who remained silent. [An hon. MEMBER: How can you answer for them?] He answered for them, because before a quarter of the case had been stated they had loudly cheered. They could not have decided upon what they had heard, but must have decided upon consideration beforehand. That was not the way justice could be done. It was no slight matter to overrule the decisions of illustrious Judges upon a narrative which they had never given themselves the trouble to verify. These cases ought not to be decided upon the opinions of any Member of Parliament. That was not the way in which justice ought to be administered. If the House of Commons should be called upon to administer justice, there would be great danger that injustice would be committed. The case was tried before Mr. Justice Williams, a most distinguished Judge, and the verdict of guilty was confirmed by Lord John Russell—no mean authority—after consultation with Lord Denman, Lord Chief Justice of England. They came to the conclusion that there was a doubt which justified the remission of the capital sentence; but was not sufficient to enable them to recommend that the man should be pardoned. Upon that ground the case had stood for 43 years. The prisoner had long since exhausted his sentence; and the question now was, whether it was wise to overthrow the decision of those eminent authorities, not for the purpose of relieving this man from punishment—because he no longer suffered any—but merely for the purpose of allowing him to come to England in order to make it as clear as possible that he had been wrongfully convicted? The question deserved more reflection than it seemed to have received. It was whether the House of Commons would undertake, on the single statement of an hon. Member, and without a particle of evidence, to overthrow the decision of two eminent Judges, given under a sense of the deepest responsibility? It was no pleasure to him to say anything in disparagement of Galley; but the truth was that he belonged to the criminal class. He might or might not have been innocent of the crime of which he was accused; but if he was charged with it, it was because he was a man who belonged to those classes amongst whom they looked for crime. ["Oh, oh!"] The Lord Chief Justice, in his letter, said that the man was a rogue and vagabond, possibly a petty thief, and, besides that, a card-sharper. Even supposing these statements to be true, they furnished no reason why he should have been found guilty of this great crime; but, on the other hand, they supplied a reason why there should not be so much sentimentality on the subject. If Galley had been wrongly convicted, he certainly had assisted very much in his own conviction by the irregular and improper life which he led. ["Oh, oh!"] Everybody knew that when a man was charged with a crime his previous life was looked into; and if it was found to have been an irregular and a wicked life, he was on that account convicted on less evidence than another man would be who had not led such a life. It was something like contributory negligence on his part. Yet now, when the Judge who tried the case had been dead for many years, when most of the witnesses had also disappeared from the world, and when it would be impossible to have a thorough investigation of the circumstances, the House was called upon to reverse the decision which had been arrived at. This was not the way in which justice ought to be administered; and he (Mr. Lowe) deliberately maintained that it was better that Galley should be precluded for the remainder of his life from returning to England than that the House should, in this violent way, overrule the decision of those who gave the most solemn consideration to the case. In his judgment, although clearly in its power, the House would be ill-advised to do anything of the kind. ["Oh!"] He was aware that he was speaking to an audience, nearly every man of which was opposed to him, but that would not deter him from speaking his mind. Still, he thought that by assuming this sort of power in a hap-hazard way they would be doing much to undermine the respect for evidence which was the foundation of all real justice. For some little time he (Mr. Lowe) himself held the office of Home Secretary. He was then asked to go into this case, but he refused to do so. ["Hear, hear!"] He refused because, even if he had come to a decision contrary to that arrived at by Lord John Russell and Lord Chief Justice Denman, he should not have deemed it his duty to interfere after the lapse of so long a period of time, and therefore he declined to go into the question at all. [Laughter.] If hon. Members thought that it was the right and the duty of a Secretary of State, who only held office for a short period, to overthrow the decision of the most respected and most honoured men who had lived in this country, they would be adopting a principle which would render the continuity of administration of justice in this country impossible. Interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litis. If, under these circumstances, persons like himself, who had no claim whatever to any legal acumen, were allowed to overthrow the decisions of great lawyers, they would be vested with a power which they ought not to possess. He should be no party to anything of the kind. Knowing that hon. Gentlemen generally were utterly opposed to everything he had said, he thanked them for permitting him to express his opinion. He could not allow the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department to fight this battle without saying that his refusal to re-open this matter was entirely in accordance with the precedents and the usage of the Home Office, and did the right hon. Gentleman great credit.

MR. A. MARTEN said, he approached the consideration of this question with great anxiety, for everyone would desire to be on the side of mercy when practicable, and still more to give his voice for correcting a wrong, if wrong had been done. But he felt bound to point out that hon. Members were asked to affirm, without preliminary investigation, that the innocence of this man had been entirely established. They were asked to address the Crown in that sense; but it appeared to him that they ought to pause before they entertained such an application. On the present occasion, they were asked to sit practically as a jury to listen to a merely ex parte statement, made after the lapse of many years, and to express, on a sudden, a decision adverse to that which had been arrived at by those who were charged by law to investigate the subject. Alarming consequences might follow from the adoption of such a course, and the injustice that would be perpetrated by means of it would be far beyond any mischief that could be incurred by a wrong decision of the proper tribunal. [Continued cries of "Divide!"]

He ventured to hope that hon. Members would not press for an instant Division, but would allow him to state his views, for he was arguing strictly to the point, and he would promise to trespass very little on the time of the House. It was absolutely necessary that they should consider the character of the Motion, and the dangerous precedent which would be set if it were acceded to. One very great merit of that House was, that they had always most carefully distinguished between the legislative functions with which they were charged and the administrative functions which they intrusted to the Ministers. The responsibility which fell on the Ministers must be discharged by them, and could not be shaken off from their shoulders by anything which occurred in that House. Although, on the present occasion, the application was one for mercy, such applications could not be expected to always be one-sided; and it by no means followed that the next application made to the House might not be an application to reverse, on the ground of undue leniency, the decision of a Home Secretary, and to insist on a more severe judgment being come to. This supposition was by no means extravagant, for the mind of the public, or of sections of the public, was at times as strongly moved towards severity as ever it was towards mercy in the case of a criminal or supposed criminal. In this case, it had been assumed that Galley was either guilty of murder, or that he was absolutely innocent. There was another view of the case, however, which might have been taken by the eminent persons who were charged with the duty of determining what should be done, and which was entirely consistent with the decision they expressed. An alibi was a most excellent defence, but one which it was most difficult to prove, and also one which was absolutely fatal, if it failed to be established. His conclusion was that Lord Denman and Lord John Russell were satisfied, from the facts before them, that the alibi in this case was not established. The chief magistrate of Bow Street at the time was expressly sent down to arrive at the truth of the matter and to inform the Secretary of State upon it; and although they had not that gentleman's report its effect must have been that the alibi

was not established. No doubt, the conclusion of Lord Denman and the then Secretary of State was that Galley, although implicated in the crime, was not the man who struck the fatal blow; and, therefore, they adopted the intermediate course of recommending that his life should be spared. If the authority of the present Lord Chief Justice—and nobody would deny its great weight—was appealed to in this case, on the other hand, the very high authority of the Lord Chief Justice for the time being, who was charged with the responsibility of investigating this very matter, could also be cited. The hon. Baronet who had brought forward this question said that if they had had the Criminal Code they would have had a Court of Criminal Appeal, and the case would have been determined in that way. But if they had had a Court of Criminal Appeal, its decision would have been absolute and final; and, in this instance, they had had a substitute for such a tribunal in Lord Denman and the Secretary of State, who had reviewed the matter at the time. On those grounds, and thanking the House for their patience in hearing him, he hoped that the House would pause before it came to the decision, without any preliminary inquiry, that the innocence of Edmund Galley had been established.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: Sir, I shall say very little about this case; but there are one or two facts with which I am struck. My right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) said the discussion was all on one side. It was all on one side, I presume, because hon. Gentlemen present had heard the conclusive statement made by the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Eardley Wilmot). I am not sure we are competent to decide, or even to call upon the House to decide, whether this man was innocent or guilty. We must, however, recollect that this man Galley was a very poor man. My right hon. Friend says that the Lord Chief Justice declares that he was a card-sharper. Card-sharppers are not usually poor men, I dare say; but it is also said that he was a man of the criminal class. It seems to me that is very much in his favour, because I am quite sure, unless the Lord Chief Justice had the very strongest conviction in favour of the view he took, he would not ask the attention of the Home Secretary to a man who was a criminal and a card-sharper. Galley was a very poor man, and he was tried in barbarous times, at a time when counsel was not allowed to address the jury, and at a time when he had no counsel to defend him; at a time when we had only just passed the practice of putting men to death within 48 hours after the sentence was pronounced. The main witness against him was a woman named Harris—a woman of a very abandoned character. She was then a convict under sentence, and, as I understand, she had a free pardon given to her in the Court in order that she might be able to give evidence. That, I think, does not add to the value of her testimony, but rather tends in the opposite direction. At the time when she says she saw the man it was very late at night, nearly midnight. It must have been dark, and her evidence was not given for many months afterwards. The rest of the evidence, I understand, consisted very much of the testimony of persons of a similar character. Now, what happened immediately after the trial? Doubts have not now arisen for the first time, 40 years afterwards; doubts arose on the very evening of the trial, and the almost universal opinion was that there had been a miscarriage of justice, and that the man Galley was not the murderer. We are told that nobody ought to interfere, and my right hon. Friend spoke of illustrious Judges. Of course, all Judges are illustrious, and I know nothing to the contrary of the Judge who tried this case. I do not even know his name, therefore I do not say a word against him in particular. But the verdict of the jury was rejected by the Home Secretary of that day, because he would not have commuted the sentence of the Judge if he had concurred in it. It therefore can hardly be wrong that a Home Secretary of this day, or the House of Commons, should come to a decision which will be consistent with the honour of Parliament, with the mercy that rests in the Crown, and with the consideration there is in this country for justice rightly administered. We are told that all the facts have been before Lord John Russell when he was Home Secretary. I do not wish to say one word deprecatory of the character of Lord John Russell, or any other Home Secretary; but I say the Office of Secre-

try of State for the Home Department is greatly over-worked, and there are many cases which come before it which cannot be sufficiently investigated. I have known such cases myself, and I have the greatest sympathy for a Home Secretary, and I wonder there should be any man to undertake the Office, with the vast responsibilities upon him of deciding cases of life and death. What has happened within the last 12 months? Four prisoners were sentenced to death on one evening, and I have heard one of the most eminent lawyers of this House say there was not a particle of evidence against one of the prisoners, and there was doubt whether a murder had been committed at all. The same Judge sentenced a man to death who has since been released. I can mention another case of a man who had recently been convicted of murder at Manchester. That man had been sentenced to be hanged; but his punishment was commuted by the Home Secretary, and it was subsequently discovered that he was innocent of the crime of which he had been convicted. [Mr. LOWE: Hear, hear!] Those are matters which ought to make us very careful. My right hon. Friend says "Hear, hear!" and for a very good reason; he has stood upon the dignity of his Office, and has not gone into the case at all after Lord John Russell, Sir George Grey, and possibly, also, Lord Aberdare had refused to re-open it. But if I wanted anything to convince me of the force of the case brought before us it would be the speech which he has delivered. My right hon. Friend has said that the man is now suffering no punishment, except that he cannot return to England. But surely, if he cannot return to England, because he has the mark of Cain on him and the brand of a murderer, it is a punishment which if we can relieve him of we ought to do so. The man himself apparently felt that he was a marked man, and had not even allowed himself to marry till the letter of the Lord Chief Justice had, as it were, purged his character. Hon. and learned Gentlemen opposite, and my right hon. Friend, may talk of precedents and of the danger resulting from the interference of the House in a case of this kind; but it is the case of a poor man who has always denied his guilt, and for whose ignorance all due allowance ought to be made. Besides, the hon. Baronet the Member for South

Warwickshire has conclusively shown that there is a great probability that justice has miscarried. I ask the House what they intend to do? The lapse of time makes the weight of Galley's unjust punishment all the more excessive, and the House ought to encourage the Home Secretary to recommend the Crown not to bring this man back to England, not to take him out of slavery, but to say there has been a miscarriage of justice, and that for the rest of his life there will be taken off from him the dark spot which has so long rested upon him. In that way proof will be given to the world that, whatever may be the failings of our Judicature—and it has many failings, as Courts of Justice in all countries have—whenever its errors are discovered, the Parliament of England, even at the last hour, will do its best to remedy the damage which has been occasioned, and to do justice to an unfortunate, poor, and long-absent man.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was able to assure the House that this was a case that he had considered with the greatest possible care; and he could also assure his hon. Friend (Sir Eardley Wilmot) that he fully appreciated the motives that had led him to bring it forward. He knew that the general feeling of the House would be that if any substantial injustice had been done it should be remedied as quickly as possible. With that feeling he fully agreed. He should regret as much as anyone a miscarriage of justice, if such a case were proved; and whether it had happened recently, or 40 or 50 years ago, he should be the first to come forward and endeavour to have it remedied. But, of course, in all such cases the House, instead of being carried away by feeling, ought to act as a Judicial Court. His faith in the House, however, as a High Court was somewhat shaken when he heard cries of "Divide!" after a two hours' discussion of this case. Hon. Members must remember that this was a case in which a man had been tried for murder, and murder of the gravest kind, and the case had probably occupied days before the committing magistrates, and certainly occupied the Assize Court more than one day; and yet, when an hon. Member, after a two hours' debate, was urging reasons why the favour of the Crown should not be shown, there were cries of "Divide!" [Mr. JOHN BRIGHT said, that hon. Members were objecting to a waste of time.] Waste of time! But the speaker was simply trying to put before the House what had occurred. That was not the temper in which the High Court of Parliament should discuss—if it was going to discuss—questions of that kind. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. John Bright) had made a great deal of the fact that Galley was a poor man, and that, consequently, he could not procure witnesses or counsel; but he was tried before Judges, as many others had been, and he had received every possible leniency and liberty which he could have from the Home Secretaries. He was prepared to say that this man had not suffered one iota from the fact that he was 'poor. That he was tried when he could not have counsel was his fate in common with many other people; but the fact that the law had been changed since was no reason why they should interfere in this particular case. Galley was tried with a man called Oliver, who was afterwards executed; but this man throughout protested not only the innocence of Galley, but his own innocence as well; and in the end, the innocence of Galley having been so frequently asserted, the Judge who tried the case, a most eminent man, thought it right to recommend the Secretary of State to make inquiry into the matter, and it was in consequence of that recommendation that the sentence was respited in order that the inquiries might be made. He (Mr. Assheton Cross) deeply regretted that the name of the Judge had been mentioned in the way in which it had been. The hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had said—

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he had said that Mr. Justice Williams was appointed by Lord Brougham, and had been the junior counsel in Queen Caroline's case.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the object of making that statement must have been to disparage the Judge. ["No!"]

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT rose to explain, but Mr. ASSHETON CROSS refused to give way, notwithstanding that there were loud cries of "Explain!"

MR. SPEAKER pointed out that the hon. Member could explain, if he desired to do so, after the right hon. Gentleman had concluded his observations.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS did not wish to pursue the subject. The hon.

Baronet had made a point of this respite, and had argued that because he was kept alive there was a doubt about the matter; but the respite was in accordance with a well-established rule of the Home Office which existed at the time. That rule was a very humane one, and it was, that once a sentence was respited it was never carried out, because it was thought to be altogether wrong to keep such a fate hanging indefinitely over a man's head, pending the inquiries; and even if the Secretary of State were perfectly satisfied that a prisoner was guilty of murder, that prisoner so respited was still transported for life. Therefore, Lord John Russell did not depart from the usual practice, and the fact of transportation did not prove that there was any doubt. If the man had been hanged, it would have been contrary to all precedent, and the country would not have tolerated it. It, therefore, must not be inferred that Lord John Russell had any doubt in the matter simply because the man was transported. It was the misfortune of the man that he was a thimble-rigger, and he tried to prove that he was at a fair in Kent at the time he was supposed to have committed the murder at a place which he could not have been at. There could be no doubt that the trial excited a good deal of interest in Exeter at the time. But although that was so, still he was bound to say that he did not think the House was the proper place to argue a criminal case. The House was constituted in a totally different manner at that moment to what it was when the hon. Baronet was speaking, and it was impossible that a body composed of various persons at various times could form a judicial opinion on such a matter. The result, however, of that excitement was that a gentleman went down and collected a large amount of evidence, which was thought to be in favour of the prisoner. That was submitted to Mr. Justice Williams, who considered it very carefully. The Secretary of State at the time was Lord John Russell, and he took the course which he (Mr. Assheton Cross) thought all sensible Secretaries of State would have done. Having no more interest in maintaining the conviction of this unfortunate man than he (Mr. Assheton Cross) had, the noble Lord sent the whole case, with the evidence, to Lord Denman, who went into the whole case, and Sir Frederick

Roe was afterwards sent down to examine the witnesses. Sir Frederick Roe reported to the Home Office that the evidence was not entirely substantiated. Sir Frederick Roe expressed no opinion, one way or the other, to the Home Secretary as to what he thought about the case. What more could Lord John Russell have done? He consulted the highest Official on the Bench, who went into the case most thoroughly, and reported that, in his opinion, the verdict was right. Lord John Russell, therefore, refused to interfere. Mr. Aglionby, who was a Member of Parliament, brought the case, in 1838, he thought, before Lord John Russell, who again went into it, and again consulted Lord Denman, who again considered the case, and was of opinion that the verdict was right. No Secretary of State could act against circumstances like that. The man was not sent abroad till 1839, and in 1839 the matter was brought before Lord John Russell again by Mr. Cherer. After giving much attention to the case, Lord John Russell said it did not present any reasonable ground to justify him in recommending a commutation of the sentence of transportation. He (Mr. Assheton Cross) had, he thought, shown that Lord John Russell had taken every possible pains to consider the question, he had consulted everybody he could—the Judge who tried the case, the Chief Justice, and Sir Frederick Roe—and, having done that, he had come to the conclusion which he had stated to the House. That being so, no evidence whatever had been brought before himself (Mr. Assheton Cross) which could tend to prove that there was any change in the circumstances of the case as it had been submitted to Lord John Russell. No new facts of any description had been brought under his notice, or of any of his Predecessors, which it could fairly be said ought to have any effect in altering the decision which had been in the first instance arrived at. He would, therefore, ask the House to consider for a moment the position in which he was placed. He would say at once that, notwithstanding the respect which he entertained for his Predecessors, if any new facts had been brought before him he should not have had the slightest hesitation in giving them their due weight. If he thought an injustice had been done, he would, he hoped, have been one of the first persons in that House to seek to remedy it. But no new facts had been brought under his notice, nor, so far as he was aware, under the notice of Lord Aberdare, or of his right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Lowe). What, under those circumstances, was he to do? Had he a better means of forming an opinion on the matter than Lord John Russell had then? Mr. Justice Williams, Lord Denman, Sir Frederick Roe, and most of the witnesses were dead. Where was he to get his information? Or was it to be supposed that the Lord Chief Justice of the present day had a better opportunity of forming a judgment on this case than had the Lord Chief Justice for the time being? Was there any Judge to whom he could refer who knew the facts of the case so well as the Judge by whom it had been tried? Where was he to obtain the knowledge which would justify him in saying that Lord John Russell had come to a wrong decision? He might add that when Lord John Russell had to deal with the question, he had to consider a very different point from that which was now laid before him, and the noble Lord came to the conclusion that there was no reasonable ground for doubting the justice of the verdict. What he, however, was now asked to do was to give Galley a free pardon, on the ground that his innocence had been undoubtedly proved. But although he sympathized very deeply with the man when he asked that the stigma might be removed from him before he died, he could not, by agreeing to the Motion, endorse the view that the whole proceedings at the trial had been wrong from beginning to end, and that the innocence of the prisoner had been completely established. He could not say that he believed the Judge who tried the man, that the Chief Justice who advised on the case, and the Secretaries of State who pronounced a decision upon it, were all in error. When the case came before him on the letter of the Lord Chief Justice he felt bound to go into the case himself; he had read through every single paper over and over again, and he did not feel justified in advising the Queen to take the course which the Motion proposed. There was no man for whom he had a higher admiration than he had for the present Lord Chief Justice; but he had also a very high opinion of Lord Denman, than whom no man was more careful of the interests and liberty of the subject, and who, if he had entertained any reasonable doubt on the subject, would have advised the Secretary of State accordingly. The present Lord Chief Justice did not speak of this case as a case which had been brought before him as Lord Chief Justice; he spoke of it as one which he had heard when a young man at the Bar, and which he said had made a great impression upon him. The Lord Chief Justice, some 30 years ago, made one of the most brilliant speeches in that House—a speech which raised him to the post of Attorney General. He held that post for some years, and had every possible opportunity of expressing his views to the Government of the day. ["Oh!"] Yes, he had. His hon. Friend who had spoken earlier in the debate said he had not the smallest doubt that the Lord Chief Justice had availed himself of that opportunity when Law Officer of the Crown and had pressed it on the Secretary of State. With regard to that, he had held, and most worthily filled, the office of Lord Chief Justice for many years; but there was not a line to any Secretaries of State which showed that he had brought the case before them, either when Lord Chief Justice or Law Officer of the Crown. Now, if the Lord Chief Justice had such a strong conviction with respect to the case, it was marvellous that he had not brought it before the Government of the day. The Lord Chief Justice said, in his letter, that he was present at the trial, and it would have been impertinence on his part, then a very young barrister, to interfere in a matter with which he had no professional or personal concern. He (Mr. Assheton Cross) said it was as much his duty then, when the matter was still sub judice, to have applied to the Secretary of State, and not to have waited for 43 years, when no inquiry could be made. He had had an opportunity of conversing with barristers who were present, and one of whom was a distinguished Officer of the House, and that gentleman assured him that among a large Bar the opinion prevailed that this man was just as guilty as the other. Well, that being so, and the question having been decided 43 years ago, he did not think he had it in his power to do what the hon. Baronet asked. The Lord Chief Justice said that the man was wholly guilty or wholly innocent; that the evidence of an alibi brought forward at the trial, if it only created a reasonable doubt of the prisoner's guilt, would, in our more merciful administration of the law, procure his acquittal. Now, if they were in that House to discuss the alibi which it might take a week to try in a Court of Justice, he was bound to say that the whole question of an alibi could never be investigated properly unless in the presence of the witnesses. In point of fact, the alibi never was tried. The test of the alibi was in the cross-examination, rather than in the examination-in-chief; and if they, sitting in that House, in 1879, without any power of cross-examination and without seeing the demeanour of the witnesses, could, 43 years after the trial, determine that the evidence on which the verdict of the jury preceeded was wrong, he was bound to say they would inflict a blow on the administration of criminal justice in this country from which it would not soon recover. He had no new facts before him; he had no better opportunity of forming an opinion than those who had preceded him in Office; he had come to the same conclusion as Lord John Russell, and he could not advise the House to accept the Motion.

SIR HENRY JAMES hoped that it was unnecessary for him to make any protestations to the House that he was not going to answer the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department in any spirit of Party criticism. They were asking him to review a decision which, in no sense, could be considered his, but was rather that of his noble Friend, Lord Aberdare. He thought that that was sufficient guarantee that the supporters of the Motion were in no way actuated by Party motives. He had listened to the speeches of his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) and of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department with considerable bewilderment. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London had said it was not the duty of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to consider the facts of the case at all. Though regretting the possibility of a fallible decision by a previous Secretary of State, yet he did not think it the duty of the present Secretary of State to make any inquiry into the case at all. From that opinion the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department entirely differed, saying it was his duty—and he (Sir Henry James) was sure he had conscientiously discharged that duty—to make every inquiry into the facts of the case. But the right hon. Gentleman left the matter there, and asserted that it was not within the province of the House to enter into a judicial inquiry, and that it was impossible for the House to determine whether a man was innocent or guilty. But though he took that course and deprecated discussion, yet, with singular power and great ability, which made him bound to recollect his early training in the Profession to which he (Sir Henry James) belonged, the right hon. Gentleman stated every fact in support of the guilt of the man. While one view of the case had been that stated by the right hon. Gentleman, he trusted the House would forgive him if he (Sir Henry James) stated the view he took of the matter. He quite agreed that it was impossible to demonstrate with absolute certainty the innocence of any man. Then, the right hon. Gentleman said that the Motion asserted the innocence of Edmund Galley as established; he, however, then went behind the words of the Motion, and alleged that his innocence was not established. But might they not say that there were grave doubts as to the guilt of the man, and, therefore, they might take the matter into consideration. If that would meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman, he hoped that the hon. Baronet the Member for South Warwickshire (Sir Eardley Wilmot) would be willing to amend his Motion in that manner. With the permission of the House, he would make one or two observations with respect to the guilt of the man Galley. The charge was made against him under most peculiar circumstances. A man made a communication to a fellow-prisoner, to the effect that he had committed the murder together with a person named Galley. The police, without seeking for a person answering to the description of the other murderer, found a man by the name of Galley and placed him in the dock. A woman of bad character, and a confederate of the first prisoner, identified him, though it was said he was much altered. Upon that evidence the two prisoners were tried together; and it was well-known that if two prisoners, one innocent and the other guilty, were tried together, their cases were considered by the jury as a whole. At all events, the jury did not discriminate the evidence against each prisoner, but convicted them both. Edmund Galley, at the time, stated that he had been brought from a distant part of England and knew nothing of the matter. The other prisoner confessed at the last moment, and said "I am guilty, but this man convicted with me was innocent." Everyone, except the unknown gentleman whose name had never been disclosed, who witnessed that trial, had expressed his belief in the innocence of Galley. A Petition in his favour was signed by thousands of persons. Again, the present Lord Chief Justice, then a young man, was present in Court, and was convinced from what took place at the trial, and subsequently, that the man was innocent. What reply did the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department make to that? He said that they should not set aside the judgment of the committing magistrate. But that had been set aside by his own confession. The committing magistrate now asserted his belief in the innocence of Galley. The right hon. Gentleman said that if any new circumstances could be established which should prove the decision of the previous Secretaries of State to be wrong, then he would reverse that decision. Was he aware of the fact that Sir Frederick Roe, a magistrate of great experience, had expressed himself entirely in favour of the innocence of Galley? Sir Frederick Roe was sent down by the Home Office, not to express an opinion on the case, but to act as a mere scribe and take down the evidence of the witnesses. It was his duty merely to send their depositions to the Home Office. That accounted for Sir Frederick Roe not reporting to the Home Office in favour of the convict. But the right hon. Gentleman must be aware that Sir Frederick Roe expressed his decided opinion to Sir Montague Smith that the guilt of the man was not established. Sir Frederick Roe had merely to examine the evidence, and he was as impartial as could be desired; but he did express to Sir Montague Smith—who gave the Lord Chief Justice authority to make the statement public—his opinion of the truth of the evidence proving the man to be innocent. What answer did the right hon. Gentleman make to those new facts? The right hon. Gentleman said he was bound to listen to the decision of the Judge who tried the case. He (Sir Henry James) wished to speak with all respect of that learned Judge; but he might say that his chief reputation in the Profession was that of being the most comic Judge that ever sat upon the Bench. But he must protest against the doctrine of the infallibility of Judges. The Lord Chief Justice of England, who was most jealous of the privileges of his order, yet did not hesitate to come forward against the decision of one of his body, when he thought that injustice had been done. But, then, the right hon. Gentleman relied on the concurrence of Lord Denman in the verdict after reading the statements of witnesses he had never seen, and he put that judgment against the opinion of Sir Frederick Roe, who had heard and examined the witnesses. Again, the present Lord Chief Justice did hear the testimony of the witnesses upon the trial, and saw the demeanour of the prisoner, and heard the confession that fell from his fellow-prisoner. He was moved by what he saw and heard, and his opinion, supported by that of Sir Frederick Roe, who heard all the witnesses, must have far greater weight than the mere concurrence of Lord Denman in the verdict. He could not help feeling that Lord Denman was asked to review the judgment of a Colleague, and that it was a delicate matter for one Judge to condemn the view held by another. But what did the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department say with regard to the Lord Chief Justice? He was not going to defend the Lord Chief Justice from criticism; it was unnecessary. But the right hon. Gentleman said, why did the Lord Chief Justice not make application to the Government before? He (Sir Henry James) must protest against that doctrine. It was not the duty of an unknown barrister to make representations to the Government. There were about 120 barristers upon the Western Circuit at that time, and he would undertake to say that 115 of them believed Galley to be innocent. But it was said the Lord Chief Justice had brought his mature judgment to bear upon the question, and had neglected at the time to call the attention of the Government to the case. At that time the Lord Chief Justice had no position, and it was not his duty to interfere in the matter, and his opinions now ought not to be criticized because he did not write that letter when he was 35 years of age. There was a great deal more that might be said upon this subject; but he did not wish to detain the House further. They had been told that the House should not enter into a consideration of that question in a judicial spirit. He, however, hoped that hon. Members would look at that matter in a judicial light, and vote according to their convictions, and not from any Party stand-point. Let them consider the position of the unfortunate convict. He was asking for something more than money—he was asking for the opinion of the House that there was so much doubt as to his guilt that he was entitled to be relieved from the odium under which he had been so long suffering. By establishing the innocence of Galley no injury would be done to the reputation of any Minister, nor to society, and he hoped that the House would, at last, do justice to a man who had so long suffered from a grievous miscarriage of justice.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, with regard to this matter, he could, perhaps, give more evidence than any other Member of the House, the man whose life having been one of his father's tenants. He was returning from Moretonhampstead fair to Dunsford when the supposed murder was committed. He (Sir Lawrence Palk), being at that time very young, could, therefore, speak with no more certainty than belonged to hearsay; but the report at the time was that the man was not knocked from his horse, but fell from it, and was afterwards plundered of the money in his possession. It was true that there was the evidence of a woman of very bad character, who said she saw the murder committed; but, from his personal knowledge, although the present features of the locality might not be exactly the same as they were formerly, he ventured to say that it would be almost impossible for a person to have lain hidden from observation, and yet to have seen the murder committed, for this reason—that at the spot where the supposed murder took place there was a dense copse on both sides of the road. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department had said that the reason why Galley was respited and transported was that there was a certain doubt as to his guilt, and that having been once respited he could not be executed. But he (Sir Lawrence Palk) believed that the reason of his transportation was, that in the minds of almost all the public in those days—and it was to be remembered that they were talking of circumstances which occurred many years ago—there existed very great doubt as to whether or not the man Galley was present. Such, at all events, was the impression which he knew to have always prevailed in the county. But he wished to say a little more than this. When the man Galley was asked if he had anything to ask the witnesses—and reading it now with a thorough knowledge, or rather recollection, of what had taken place, he was the more forcibly struck by its significance, he replied—

“My Lord, what questions can I ask them? I know nothing of the matter; I know nothing of the people; I never was down in these parts in my life; how should I know what questions to put to them?”

Of course, he could not know what questions to ask. The part of the country in question was extremely hilly and woody, and this would render it impossible for a stranger to ask a single question as to the locality in which the murder was supposed to have been committed. Passing to the statement of the man convicted, it was very much in favour of Galley. He said—“My Lord, you are not going to send an innocent man to death?” and then added, looking down, as he (Sir Lawrence Palk) well remembered, as if in pity and scorn at the little man opposite—

“My Lord, do you think when I was going out to do a deed like this that I should have a weak little fellow like this for my companion?”

Galley, as far as his information went, was utterly incapable of knocking from his horse a man like May. No doubt, two men sprung from the side of the road, but it was, in his opinion, very doubtful whether any blow was inflicted that caused his death; on the contrary, he believed that the man fell from his horse, that he was rendered insensible, and afterwards plundered. On that part of the matter there was, he thought, no doubt. But, rightly or wrongly, the man Galley had suffered a very severe punishment; and although he could not agree in any censure being passed upon the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, or his Predecessors; although he believed that the man had had every consideration paid to him; and notwithstanding his firm belief that justice had been done, yet he (Sir Lawrence Palk) thought there was a doubt as to the fact of his guilt. If that doubt did exist, he urged the House to step forward, in the character of mercy, and forgive this man. The House, he thought, could hardly be asked to vote—

because it was utterly impossible for any man to say that; but it might very properly agree—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty's gracious pardon for Edmund Galley.”

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he could assure the House that he exceedingly regretted that anything which he had said in the course of the narrative of facts in this case should have been looked upon as reflecting upon Mr. Justice Williams. He had purposely avoided making any mention whatever of the learned Judge who administered justice in the case. With regard to the suggestion of the hon. Baronet the Member for East Devon (Sir Lawrence Palk), he was willing, with the permission of the House, to amend his Motion by substituting, instead of it, the words—

“That as reasonable doubt exists as to the guilt of Edmund Galley of the crime of which he was convicted at Exeter, in 1836, an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty graciously to grant a free pardon to Edmund Galley.”

He would, if the House would allow him, move that Amendment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, my hon. Friend (Sir Eardley Wilmot) places the House in some difficulty by proposing, at this period of the evening, to change the Motion which he has submitted to the House. I cannot think the House will accept the change which he proposes, and before the House comes to a Division upon the Motion actually before it I wish to say, without attempting to go into the merits or details of this particular case, that what we are now called upon to do is to take upon ourselves the responsibility of re-trying this man. We are asked voluntarily, and of our own accord, to do that which the House of Commons has never been called upon to do before. We have no evidence before us upon which we can form an opinion for ourselves; and we have, therefore, no opportunity of cross-examining witnesses. We have not even the advantage of being a Court which has sat continuously during this discussion; because, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department has reminded us, many of us who are present now were not present during the entire period of this discussion. But does not that fact show how impossible it is for a Court like the House of Commons to undertake the review and reconsideration of a case like the present? In these circumstances, I feel that the House will not come to a decision with a full sense of the responsibility attaching to them.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY felt the extreme difficulty of the House of Commons sitting as a Court of Appeal to decide the guilt or innocence of persons convicted in the Criminal Courts. But he had been very much struck with the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), that Sir Frederick Roe, who was sent down to take evidence, was impressed with a conviction of the truth of the alibi which he was sent to investigate. He could not believe that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had been aware of that fact, or he would not have put before the House the statement which he made. But in the case of his not having been aware of the circumstance, he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) maintained that these were grounds for asking him to come forward spontaneously, and state to the House that facts of which he was before ignorant having come to his knowledge, if this Motion were withdrawn, he would take the matter into consideration. If that were done, he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) should certainly not vote for the Motion of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Eardley Wilmot), because he felt strongly that the House was not competent to say whether or not the man Galley was guilty. If it was desirable to ascertain that point, surely the proper way would be for the Secretary of State to refer to some of the Judges, or other persons, who, by their experience in such matters, could advise him if he were in doubt. But he thought it was impossible to abstain from voting on this question as long as the right hon. Gentleman said he would take up his position without knowing anything of the facts, and that he would not move.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, the statement he had made was that Sir Frederick Roe, who was accompanied by Sir Montague Smith, inquired into the truth of Galley's statement. He had authority for saying that both he and Sir Montague Smith were satisfied of the truth of Galley's statement, and that the alibi was true.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID appealed to the Government to allow the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) to amend his Motion, as a matter of common fairness. He used the term common fairness, because, as the Motion then stood, the House was asked to express a quasi-judicial opinion that this man was innocent. Now, there were many hon. Members who entertained the opinion that they could not fairly do that, but who could say with safety that they believed there was more than great doubt in this matter, and that the time had come when the Home Office should consider that mercy might well be exercised. He therefore hoped the Government would not stand in the way of the hon. Baronet, but allow him to amend his Motion so as to meet the wishes of the majority of the House.

MR. LOWTHIAN BELL said, there was no doubt that by adopting the Motion of the hon. Baronet as it stood the House would be constituting itself a Court of Appeal, and that, in his opinion, was a position which the House would not wish to occupy. He could not, therefore, support the principle involved in the Motion; but would suggest that, as doubt appeared to exist as to the guilt of Edmund Galley of the crime of which he was convicted at Exeter in 1836, an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty graciously to direct that further inquiry be made into the case of Edmund Galley.

MR. J. S. GATHORNE-HARDY said, it would be more than unfair towards hon. Members of the House, by any technical objection to the wording of an Amendment, to prevent them coming to a fair and distinct opinion upon the question before them. He earnestly hoped that no advantage would be taken upon the mere wording of the Amendment to evade discussion.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the only Petition which had been presented to him from this man, who was, as far as his information went, at that moment perfectly happy, and undergoing no punishment whatever, asked that he might have a declaration of absolute innocence. That was also the Motion of his hon. Friend (Sir Eardley Wilmot); but to that Petition and that Motion he could not assent, inasmuch as by doing so it would be declared that the whole of the proceedings which had taken place had been wrong ab initio.

MR. BIRLEY would suggest that the first sentence of the Resolution should be withdrawn, and that the House should confine itself to declaring—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty graciously to grant a free pardon to Edmund Galley.”

MR. CALLAN hoped the suggestion of the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Birley) would recommend itself to the favourable consideration of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Upon the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, “that Galley was living in perfect happiness,” he (Mr. Callan) would remind the House that the Lord Chief Justice, in his letter, stated that “the man had worked for many long years as a slave upon the public roads.” His present position would, therefore, seem to be a change from public to private slavery.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he was willing to accept the suggestion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Birley) to drop the first part of his Motion, and simply ask that a free pardon be granted.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Baronet was, doubtless, aware that no portion of the Motion could be withdrawn without the consent of the House.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, the House had got into a muddle by being asked to express an opinion as to the innocence of the person in question, and would stultify itself still further by adopting the course now suggested. The hon. Baronet had better be advised by him, and move the adjournment of the debate. If not, he (Sir Edward Colebrooke) would propose to withdraw a Resolution which, in his opinion, would throw discredit upon the whole of these proceedings.

MR. HALL said, it seemed to him that the proposed Amendment to the Motion of his hon. Friend (Sir Eardley Wilmot) might very readily be accepted. All that was wanted was that the man should get a free pardon. The House did not want to express any reason why the pardon was granted, because they desired to guard themselves against interference with the decision of a Court of Law.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Question proposed, “That the Amendment, by leave, be withdrawn.”

MR. ASSHETON CROSS wanted to have the matter quite clearly understood both by the House and the country. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Warwickshire (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had had his Motion upon the Paper for a long time, and it contained an absolute assertion of the innocence of this man. That was the only way in which the case had ever been presented to him, either by Petition from Galley himself, or his friends. He desired it to be quite clear that if the Address were assented to the assertion of innocence was withdrawn. He must have certain assurance on that point. He asked the House not to come by a round-about way to the conclusion they did not mean to arrive at. The hon. Baronet had moved that it was clearly proved that the man was innocent. He (Mr. Assheton Cross) said it was not, and that it was wrong to come to that conclusion.

MR. SPEAKER: I wish to point out to the House that the Question before it is, whether this Amendment shall, by leave, be withdrawn? The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department has been allowed to make an explanation on that point; but a second speech on the Question is certainly not in Order. Is it your pleasure that the Amendment be withdrawn?

MR. COURTNEY thought it was very much to be desired that they should come to a clear conclusion on this matter. The hon. Member opposite (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had withdrawn the opinion expressed in the first part of the Resolution; and it was, surely, unnecessary that they, as a body, should express any opinion on that subject. That was a thing from which they shrank as a body; but, of course, each Member of the House was at liberty to retain his own opinion, and the hon. Member (Sir Eardley Wilmot), amongst others, to retain his. The Secretary of State for the Home Department did claim that this Motion was not to be made the foundation for any claim on the part of Galley himself; but that man, from the first, had protested his innocence, and he, surely, must be allowed to remain in the same belief. All that was now asked of Her Majesty's Government was, that it would permit the House of Commons, acting from many different motives, to agree to this Resolution, "That the Royal Prerogative of the Crown should be exercised," an opinion in regard to which a vast majority of the House were clearly of one opinion. Therefore, he hoped that Her Majesty's Government would allow the hon. Member (Sir Eardley Wilmot) to withdraw his Amendment and propose the latter half of it. He did not wish to add any more; but if Her Majesty's Government persisted in refusing to allow it to be withdrawn, they could then act upon the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Birley). They could, on their own Motion, negative the Motion to go into Committee of Supply, and then alter the proposal of his hon. Friend as they chose. He hoped, however, they would not be driven to that necessity.

MR. MELDON wished to say just one word, in order that they might not be led astray by the statement of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The issue the right hon. Gentleman seemed to raise between the House and himself was that what they were about to do was to make a declaration of the innocence of this man, while what they really sought to do was to have this man put in the same position as if there had been a verdict of acquittal by the jury. It was unnecessary to prove his innocence to entitle him to that acquittal. If a reasonable doubt was raised in the mind of the jury as to the proof, the onus of which was on the prosecution, he was entitled to an acquittal, no matter how suspicious the case might be, and though he might fail altogether to prove his entire innocence. What they wanted to do was to deal with this question of his innocence exactly now as if no such verdict had been given. It was admitted now that the respite was granted because there were not only reasonable doubts, but very substantial doubts, thrown upon the conviction at the time. What was sought to be done was really to give proper effect to the respite, and they could do that by giving the man a free pardon, without going into the question of whether his absolute innocence had been proved or not. He hoped they would not be led astray by the false issue raised by the right hon. Gentleman.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that she will be graciously pleased to grant a free pardon to Edmund Galley,"—(Sir Eardley Wilmot),—instead thereof.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had no objection to this part of the Amendment. ["Order, order!"] The conduct of hon. Members in thus interrupting did not say much for the judicial spirit of the House of Commons. He assented to this Motion only on this distinct ground that the House had declined to express an opinion as to the man's innocence. ["No, no!"] He did not wish to interfere with the private feelings of any hon. Members; but the House had declined to express an opinion. ["No!"] The feeling of the House was, though not expressed in a judicial spirit, that having compassion for this old man—["No, no!"]—well, at any rate, it was true—that the House feeling very much compassion for this old man—he did not know what the feeling of the old man might be; but that was the feeling of the House generally. Hon. Members might vote as they liked; but that was how he should accept the Amendment for himself. The question now presented had never been presented to him before. No Petition had ever been presented to him for mercy; but the man had declared his innocence, and, as he understood, the House had declined to express that opinion. He was now prepared, therefore, as far as that was concerned, simply as a matter of mercy to recommend this old man to a pardon.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: The matter stands a little differently from the view in which the right hon. Gentleman puts it. I am not going, in the least degree, to find fault with anything he has said; but it seems to me, after the declaration he made, that he himself, looking over the Papers, could not affirm that Galley was innocent, he was quite right in saying that it was out of his power to recommend to the Crown that a free pardon should be granted to the man on the ground of his innocence. If he had come to that opinion, it is quite clear he could not take any other course, and it is also quite clear that the House could not compel him to take that course without consequences that his Friends around him would be very sorry to see. But I must say that it would not be true to say that the great preponderance of opinion was not in favour of the hon. Gentleman who introduced this case (Sir Eardley Wilmot) that there had been a miscarriage of justice. Many hon. Members did not hear that statement; but I confess I was never more impressed by any statement I heard in this House, and I think it would be a great misfortune, and something like cruelty, if a miscarriage of mercy should go to this man in his far-off home, accompanied by an expression that, after all, the House did not believe he was innocent. I think the preponderance of opinion of the House is that he was innocent, and that the doubts that were raised at the time of the conviction show that it should not have taken place. Let us, indeed, if we are going to recommend this act of mercy, let us not send it across the sea under conditions which shall strike out of it all that is merciful, and leave the idea that we are really doing it for an old man, and that it does not matter very much what becomes of him. The right hon. Gentleman has taken a very wise course in accepting this Motion, and I hope none of us can say anything to make it appear that we wish to continue the charge and the bonds by which the soul of this man for 45 years has been troubled.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bright) had declared that the preponderance of opinion was in favour of the innocence of this man. If that was so, why had the Motion been withdrawn? He must say, he thought the Secretary of State for the Home Department had been treated with very little generosity in this matter. Everyone who had heard his speech must have seen the manner in which his heart was moved in regard to this man; but his strong sense of justice and the patient inquiry he had made had forced him plainly to the conviction he had declared. He had listened without prejudice to the statements on both sides of the House, and when the right hon. Gentleman declared his readiness to accept the Motion for mercy, and stated at the same time that he could not say he was convinced of the man's innocence, it was treating him with very scant courtesy to behave towards him in the way they were now doing. In his opinion, nothing could be worse than for the House of Commons to constitute itself a Court of Law, and to pass an opinion upon facts not existent at the present moment, but facts which existed upwards of 40 years ago. Besides, he did not like the practice of bringing forward a Motion and not putting it to the test of a Division, and then afterwards declaring that it expressed the opinion of the preponderance of the majority of the House. It was not generous to appeal to his right hon. Friend for mercy, and, when he gave it, to turn round on him in this manner and throw it back in his face.

MR. SULLIVAN was of opinion that it was very undesirable to misrepresent intentionally, or unintentionally, the motives which had actuated the House to ask for the withdrawal of the Motion. He took it that they were acting on very intelligible grounds. They did not think it was well to declare this man innocent, as if they had been a Court of Appeal, and they were substantially satisfied that justice would be met by a free pardon. He appealed to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who on every occasion when life, death, or liberty had been in issue had shown a most kindly and careful spirit to do this act as graciously as possible, and not to wound the feelings of an old man by saying he acted merely as a matter of compassion. The time was past when they could remit anything from this man's sentence, and what he wanted really was a reparation to his conscience, and that he hoped would be given as graciously as possible.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I hope this conversation, for it is really only a conversation, will not be prolonged, and especially that it will not become of an acrimonious character. I shall just make this remark. A Resolution of this House, and especially a Resolution implying an Address to the Crown, is always a matter of gravity; and it must be taken to express on the part of the House something which the House agrees to express, and that something must be indicated in the language of the Resolution, and not by what may be in the minds of hon. Members. Now, Sir, the first Resolution proposed was one which would have made an affirmation which my right hon. Friend, after giving careful consideration to the case, declared it was impossible for the House to accept. Under those circumstances, it lay with the House, if it chose, to persevere with that Resolution, and to put it to the test of a Division, in spite of the declaration of my right hon. Friend that he could not accept it. For whatever reason we need not now inquire, the hon. Baronet the Mover of the Resolution proposed to withdraw it, and the House unanimously agreed to its being withdrawn. Therefore, that has put an end to it. In place of it is substituted an Address, which my right hon. Friend is ready to concur in adopting. That Address is an Address praying the Crown to grant a free pardon to this person; and my right hon. Friend is perfectly prepared to be a party to the House passing that Address, and, no doubt, such an Address will receive proper consideration. I understand that, in the event of anything being done upon that Address in the nature of a free pardon, a free pardon will be granted, not accompanied by conditions such as appear to be contemplated or suggested by the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Birmingham. [Mr. JOHN BRIGHT: No, no!] Well, then, I will say such as were protested against by the right hon. Gentleman opposite.

Mr. Sullivan

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I was only hoping that it would be an exact description of the feeling of the House. I presume that the pardon will go in the ordinary form.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The pardon will go in the ordinary course, no doubt, and it will be one which I have little doubt will be in accordance with the feelings and wishes of the House. But I think we should be pursuing an entirely mistaken course, if we were to carry on a conversation which is very painful, on a matter which, I hope, has been closed by the statement of my right hon. Friend.

Question put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to grant a free pardon to Edmund Galley.

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON asked the House to resolve itself into a Committee of Supply, in order that some small progress might be made in the Estimates. He believed the Notices on the Paper did not lead to any contentious matter; and he would remind the House that, at that time of the year, it was almost absolutely necessary, in the interests of the Public Service, that they should lose no opportunity they could possibly obtain of advancing Supply.

IRELAND—REPORTED APPEARANCE OF THE COLORADO BEETLE. QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he had a Question he ought to have put to the Chief Secretary for Ireland. There was a report in the "Morning Post" that the Colorado beetle had appeared in the County of Cork, and he wished to know if the report were true? The right hon. Gentleman must be informed by this time if the report were true, and he should be glad to know what steps had been taken for the destruction of this insect?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I do not happen to have seen the newspaper report to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman refers. When he kindly gave me Notice of his Question to-day I telegraphed over to Dublin to know if anything had been heard of the matter, and the reply I got was to the effect that no information other than that obtained through the ordinary channels of information had reached Her Majesty's Government; but that steps had been taken to insure these insects being examined to discover whether it was the formidable insect to which reference had been made. I will take care to inform him of the result of these inquiries, and I hope it will turn out there is no truth in it.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL hoped the Government would undertake that the next Order of the Day (the Indian Loans Bill) would not be proceeded with.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Certainly not.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

AGRICULTURAL DEPRESSION (IRELAND).—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he did not propose, at that late hour, to go on with the Motion which stood in his name; but he desired to correct an impression which was current in this country. He had proposed to call attention to the severe agricultural distress now existing in Ireland, and to move—

"That the power of landlords to exact by eviction in times of scarcity the rents imposed upon tenants in prosperous times is a fertile source of discontent and dissatisfaction, and a gross violation of natural justice and equity."

County after county in Ireland had placed on record, by great public meetings, its sense of the imminence and seriousness of the crisis; and, accompanying these protests, had been declarations in favour of a reduction in rents. It had been represented in this country that the demand of these meetings was in favour of the abolition of rents and the non-payment of rents. He was not going into the question; he only wished to place on record his emphatic testimony—which was also the emphatic testimony of many Irish Members—that no such cry was being raised in Ireland. In England, reductions of rent, to the honour of landlords, were taking place, while in Ireland that was only happening to a very limited extent. An idea was abroad that Communism was prevalent in Ireland. He only wished to say again that no such thing had been mentioned at public meetings, and that all the tenant farmers asked and pleaded for was a just reduction of rents in some proportion to the severe and exceptional crisis.

MR. P. MARTIN said, he wished to correct a misapprehension which appeared to exist as to the extent and nature of the demand made by Irish tenants for fixity of tenure. If Englishmen moved amongst the farming class in Ireland and attended their meetings, as he had done, they would find no desire existed amongst the farmers as a class to become the possessors of property by unfair means. They simply claimed legal protection and safety of tenure in their holdings, and an adjustment of rents on fair and equitable terms. Various causes peculiar to Ireland rendered it necessary that legislative protection should be given against capricious or arbitrary rent-raising by giving the tenant the power of appeal in the matter of rent to some important tribunal. The justice and expediency of this had been conceded in principle by many Members who, though opponents of the measure brought in by the Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) had themselves, in this very Session, introduced Bills which professed to prevent the landlord from arbitrarily imposing on a tenant such conditions in respect to his holding as the landlord thought fit to impose. It was idle to attempt to represent the claim thus made as communistic in its character. It was but too true that strong and uncalled-for expressions had been used by the Chief Secretary for Ireland; but he (Mr. P. Martin) could not believe that the sentiments of the Chief Secretary had the assent of the Government, and they were certainly at variance with the expressed opinions of many Members who sat on his own side. Indeed, so far as related to the Land Question in the Province of Ulster, there had been presented already by Conservative Members, obedient to the command of those who occupied the Ministerial Benches, a succession of Tenant Right Bills, which, if they meant anything, were Bills to settle, on equitable bases, the grievances under which the tenant farmers suffered. Actual support was given by the Government to a Bill to create tenant right in the Northern Province at the expiration of, and notwithstanding the contract created by, lease. It was high time for the House to give a fair consideration to the demands made by the tenantry in the other Provinces in Ireland. If it was imagined that there was a general outcry for the abolition of rents in Ireland, the House was utterly deceived, and any man who asserted it was giving false information. What the farmers had asked in their meetings was the same thing as that stated over and over again in that House. What they wanted in the other parts of Ireland was the extension of the Ulster custom in its pristine integrity. In Ireland a totally different state of things existed, as compared with England. In Ireland they had not a resident gentry to aid their tenants in times of difficulty; but in too many instances they had completely absentee proprietors, who looked only to the amount of the rent-roll. The tenants, he admitted, had prejudiced their interests by over-bidding for land; but how could that be helped, when the land was the only resource to which they could look? In Ireland they had no manufacturing pursuits, and so they were compelled to over-bid for land. It was all very well to praise freedom of contract in the abstract. But the question was, having regard to the circumstances and past history of Ireland, and the tenure of land in that country, was that principle to be permitted uncontrolled power in regulating dealings in land? On the contrary, over and over again, it had asserted that it could not. He heartily believed that if the House would carefully and diligently search out an equitable adjustment of this difficulty, the great number of those speeches preaching disaffection to British rule would be at an end, and the Irish people would see that Parliament was anxious to arrive at the true solution of the difficulty. Tenant right had created the prosperity of the North. Why not, then, boldly extend it to the rest of Ireland? Was it likely to spread content that the Government should sanction a Bill which caused in the Northern part of the Island tenant right to spring into existence, despite contract, and to leave in the other parts of Ireland the tenant at the mercy of the landlord? Why, then, should not one law be applied to the whole country? Let similar principles in respect to tenant right prevail over the entire country. The Bill of the noble Lord the Member for the County Down (Lord Arthur Hill-Trevor) gave a convincing proof of the esteem in which the Ulster custom was held; and he trusted the Government would extend, perpetuate, and strengthen that custom, not merely in the North, but over the entire country.

Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS VI.—SUPERANNUATION AND RETIRED ALLOWANCES, AND GRATUITIES FOR CHARITABLE AND OTHER PURPOSES.

- (1.) £22,150, to complete the sum for Merchant Seamen's Fund, Pensions, &c.
- (2.) £23,100, to complete the sum for Relief of Distressed British Seamen Abroad.
- (3.) £395,000, Pauper Lunatics, England.

MR. RAMSAY called attention to the annual increase in this Vote. He had suggested to the Secretary to the Treasury, on a previous occasion, that any further increase in this Vote should not be allowed, and that a fixed sum should be paid, averaged on the payments of the last three years. Unless the Government would determine to stop this increase, he should consider it right to make a strong objection to the grant, and to obstruct the Vote.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he could not give the definite pledge asked for by the hon. Gentleman. So long as the principle was maintained that the rate per head should be contributed by the Government, so long, he thought, it would be fair to ask for this Vote. He was quite aware there was a possibility that cases might be brought into the asylums which would not be there but for this Vote. [MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: No, no!]

Mr. O'Donnell

His right hon. Friend said that was not the case, and that the grant was not treated in that way; and he could only conclude, therefore, that the increase was a proof that lunacy was on the increase in the country. He thought it was only fair that the Government should assist the localities in keeping up these asylums; and, under these circumstances, he trusted the Committee would accept the Vote.

MR. RAMSAY said, the hon. Gentleman was labouring under a mistake in assuming that the number of lunatics was on the increase. He denied that there was any foundation for such a statement. This increase was caused by the introduction of persons who properly should not be the recipients of curative treatment. Only such persons as there was a prospect of curing should be in the asylums. His opinion was borne out by the whole of the evidence taken before the Select Committee which sat upstairs; and if that were so, what justification could there be for permitting the annual increase of this grant? It was quite true that Parliament had sanctioned this grant per head; but that was no reason why it should be made permanent, and it was to its permanence and unnecessary increase that he objected. There should not be this annual increase without some corresponding advantage to the community. He admitted that it was the will of Parliament that it should be so; but he thought the principle was unsound on which the contribution was based.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH could not admit for a moment that the state of these lunatics was not the subject of constant and earnest attention on the part of himself and his officials. So far as his observation and judgment went, it was not the fact that lunatics were detained in public asylums who ought not, by law, to be so. In the opinion and judgment of some hon. Members, there were many persons who would be better elsewhere; but according to the law and practice of England, on which the lunatic asylums were established, these persons had a right to be there, and they could not be removed without a change in the law. They were sent to the asylums by the authority of the magistrates, and there was not the slightest reason to suppose that any collusion or malpractices prevailed.

MR. WHITWELL said, the number of lunatics was clearly increasing, and in Scotland, especially, there was a constant increase. This year, the increase was 1,500. He hoped it would not be the case next year, too; but if it were, right hon. Gentlemen ought to feel it almost absolutely necessary to make some special Report on the matter. It was most unfortunate this large Vote was to be taken and passed at 2 o'clock in the morning, on a subject which required great consideration. But he was afraid, under the circumstances, they could not do otherwise than pass it.

MAJOR NOLAN thought this contribution by Government to the cost of asylums most admirable, and he had very little doubt that the whole of the Irish Members would always support such a Vote. He did not believe there was an increase in the number of lunatics in the country. The apparent increase was due to the fact that the lunatics went from the cottages to the asylums, which was a very good thing. They were very much out of place in the poor dwellings of their relatives. They were much happier in the asylums, and it was much pleasanter for their friends.

MR. A. MOORE said, he had no doubt that this was the true explanation of the increase in the numbers. These poor creatures were taken from their own homes, where they could not possibly be attended to, and placed in proper institutions. He demurred entirely to the statement that only cases which could be cured should be placed in asylums. What was, then, to be done with incurable lunatics? He might point out that while there had been a positive decrease in the number in Ireland, and only a small increase in the number in England, there had been an increase of eight times the number in Scotland.

MR. RAMSAY said, all these statements justified his belief that there was no absolute increase in the number of lunatics, but that people were getting their patients off their hands by sending them to these institutions, where they were locked up. He did not confine his remarks to England, but made the same complaint as to Scotland. The same causes were in operation there. As long as this system was permitted to continue, so long would they find this grant increase. Whatever hon. Members might say, he believed that incurable lunatics were much better in private houses than when confined in asylums.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £71,760, Pauper Lunatics, Scotland.

MR. RAMSAY said, he had some remarks to make on this Vote. [Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh, but he believed they laughed simply because of their ignorance of the importance of the subject; and he said that with the greatest respect for those who took an interest in this matter. He maintained that the great increase in Scotland showed that there was something wrong in this Vote. ["Agreed, agreed!"] Indeed, he was by no means agreed, and if he were troubled with these remarks of impatience he should take the first opportunity of moving to report Progress.

MR. P. MARTIN said, he admired the adroitness with which Scotch Members appropriated so large a portion of public money and took care to be the first to complain when they thought they could be with justice assailed. Therefore, no doubt, his hon. Friend the Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay) knowing well that a long standing Irish wrong existed which had been inflicted by the authorities in Scotland in sending over to Ireland each year Irish-born pauper lunatics, often dangerous, and obliged to be kept in chains during the passage, was wisely the first to criticize this Vote. The cruelty and illegality of this practice on the part of the Poor Law authorities in Scotland had been condemned over and over again in the Reports of the Irish Local Government Board. He trusted the remonstrances made would not be without effect. If any further instances of these illegal and cruel deportations come to his knowledge he would next year move to reduce the Vote.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £22,095, to complete the sum for Pauper Lunatics, Ireland.

MAJOR NOLAN asked whether any Bill was to be brought in to deal with the appointment of governors? Four years ago it was complained that the system was unsatisfactory by which the Lord Lieutenant appointed to these offices. That was hardly a good system; and though he knew it could not be done this Session he hoped if there was another Session the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would bring in a separate Bill proposing some other arrangement.

MR. J. LOWTHER was understood to say that either a separate Bill would be brought in, or the matter would be dealt with in the Grand Juries Bill.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. A. MOORE said, the Vote was for hospitals and infirmeries under the control of the Board of Superintendence; but one portion of the money was entirely outside the control of that body. It was the last item—£500, for the Female Orphan House. He wanted to know why the Vote was placed before Parliament in a manner which was not candid and not straightforward. He was not speaking of the present Administration, for the Vote had gone on for many years; but he wished to point out, however, that this money was voted as being administered under the Board of Superintendence, whereas this institution was not under the control of that Board.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, this contribution had been made ever since the Act of Union, and he hardly thought the hon. Gentleman would like to disturb the arrangement. This formed a separate Vote at one time; but many years ago it was added to this Vote. He believed the institution thoroughly deserved support.

MR. A. MOORE said, the right hon. Gentleman could not mean to say he was going to laugh out the question in a manner like that. This Vote was placed before the country as being under the authority of the Board of Superintendence, whereas it was not so.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he would inquire into the matter.

MR. GRAY asked some Member of the Government to tell him where this House was, and what it was?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the House was in the Circular Road, Dublin. It was supposed to hold about 200; but the number had since been limited to a smaller number. The Vote was begun in 1800, and had gone on ever since.

MR. GRAY asked, whether the institution was devoted to any exclusive denomination? He knew most of the charitable institutions of Dublin, but could not recall this one to his recollection. The only one he remembered was one in South Richmond Street, outside which were most offensive placards with regard to the Catholic religion. That could not be the institution referred to. Was there any distinction on account of creed made at this House?

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the only distinction he knew of was that males were not admitted.

MR. P. MARTIN said, they were not to be cajoled in that way. His hon. Friend (Mr. A. Moore) had clearly hit a blot, and from this great reticence of the Government a suspicion was springing up in his mind that there was something wrong about this Vote. He should require some further information, or he would move to reduce the Vote by that amount.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, perhaps he did not give the Committee so much information as he might have done; but, at any rate, he gave it all the information he possessed. This Female Orphan House was established by the Latouche family in 1790, and it was incorporated by Statute in 1800. The original buildings were erected by private subscription, and there were Votes to it from various grants from Parliament between 1815 and 1817. Very nearly £4,000 was voted for alterations. The House was situated in Circular Road, Dublin, and originally held 200; but the Government limited the number to 160. But the number in the House in March, 1878, was only 71. The children were instructed in reading, writing, the simple rules of arithmetic, geography, history, plain and fancy needlework, laundry work, and other things, for the purpose of fitting them for situations as servants, in which capacity they were always apprenticed.

The income consisted of the interest on securities, £380; the nation's subscription, £200; annuities, £117; church collections, £240; and sundries, £30; making in all, £967. In the annual grant-in-aid of £500, the Vote was £1,675 till up to the years 1834-5; from then till 1848-9 it was £1,000; and after that date it sunk to £500, at which it had remained ever since. This Vote was then a Vote by Committees up till 1856-7; afterwards it was placed on the Estimates, where it remained until the formation of the general Estimate now under consideration, and it was then put among the other hospitals and charities.

MR. A. MOORE thought it would be a pity to divide; but he had no doubt this was a very old and respectable job, and it was time it was looked into. He was not prepared to charge the people who received this money with proselytism; but he did know this Vote was strictly sectarian, and that only children of one religion were admitted. If the Government would undertake to bring this institution under proper inspection, so that they might have security that the money was not being wasted, he would be satisfied; but without some such assurance as that he should certainly divide.

MR. GRAY said, the Vote could not be passed in its present form, for this institution was assuredly neither an hospital nor an infirmary. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had probably overlooked the question whether this institution was confined to members of any particular religion. He was curious to know whether the Charter confined it to any particular denomination. He tolerably well understood now what sort of place this was, from the description given.

MR. CALLAN said, the statement in Thom's Directory was, that this was a Female Orphan House for destitute female children. It accommodated 120 children. Orphans from any part of Ireland were eligible. Besides being lodged, clothed, and maintained, they were provided with religious instruction. He would like to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland the nature of that religious instruction—whether it was exclusively sectarian, and whether the place had proselytizing tendencies?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. GIBSON) said, he did not think it was any part of the duties of the Attorney General to know the teaching of every orphan school in Ireland. If, however, the chaplain was the Rev. Digby Cook, whom he knew to be a Protestant clergyman of high character, he assumed that it was mainly a Protestant institution. He did not know whether, by its constitution, it was confined exclusively to the children of Protestants; but he believed it was very well managed, and he was not aware it had ever been mixed up with proselytizing tendencies.

MR. CALLAN asked, whether any similar institution of strictly denominational character received a public grant of money? They had heard a good deal about giving money to public institutions not subject to inspection; and he thought it would be far better that this Vote should be postponed till the ordinary Irish Estimates next week, in order that this might be inquired into. He himself was under the impression that the Irish Votes were not to be taken till next week.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that had never been stated from that Bench.

MR. CALLAN thought he had heard something to that effect.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON was in the recollection of hon. Members that he distinctly said he would take non-contentious Votes, and that Irish Votes would be taken on Monday. He maintained that the Government had given very full and distinct information about this Vote, and there could be no mistake from its being put under this head. It was the object of the Treasury in preparing Estimates to get them into distinct classes, and it would be hardly worth the trouble to treat this one sum as a separate Estimate.

MR. RAMSAY thought the suggestion that this orphanage should be under inspection in some way was worthy attention. He, however, thought, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that this might be an excellent institution and very well managed. He begged to point out that while all this money was given to Ireland no corresponding grant was made to Scotland. That statement would relieve some of his hon. Friends of the feeling that Scotland was seeking what she was not willing to give to Ireland.

Mr. Callan

MAJOR NOLAN observed, that hon. Friend was wrong. This was guaranteed under the act of U and Scotland enjoyed similar under her Act, although they did run in the same way.

MR. J. LOWTHER could not that by placing this Vote in this there had been any attempt to in the Committee; but he would propose to look into the matter, and, if necessary to remove the Vote to another place.

MR. A. MOORE said, the Committee had been misled, because it was suggested that this money passed through the Board of Superintendence which did not. This being an institution for children, it could not be called a hospital or an infirmary; but it might be put under the head of "Industrial Schools." However, as the Government had promised to look into the matter, they might very well let the Vote stand.

MR. GRAY could not understand how a school could properly be described as a hospital. [An hon. MEMBER: Ch. The title was misleading; and it was also a mistake to set this Vote for subject to the Board of Superintendence.]

MR. P. MARTIN pointed out that this Vote was stated as an entailment of monies to be expended and accounted for under, and pursuant to the provisions of the 19 & 20 c. 110, s. 16. But it was now clear that this was a mistake. The institution was not one of those contemplated by the Statute, or under the control of the Board thereby appointed. It was established and maintained for the instruction and education, apparently, of those orphans willing to be brought up and trained as Protestants. The Committee had been given no valid reason why this exclusively denominational grant should be continued. He asked the right hon. Gentleman whether, on the question of fairness, he could proceed with this Vote or whether he would not postpone it until they had more full information about it.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, this all seemed to him very like a storm in a tea-cup. What were the real facts? By a clause in the Act of Union, the United Kingdom was bound to provide a sum which had formerly been granted by the Parliament of Ireland. Amongst the institutions which the Parliament of Ireland had supported over on this condition to the Estiwas this Female Orphan House. When, as far back as 1866, these Votes, which in the old days appeared separately, were collected together in one particular Estimate, and that, he ventured to say, was as fair a way as any that could be suggested. The description of each particular Vote clearly showed to any impartial man that the total was absolutely expressed in each one of the sub-heads, and the Vote was very fully explained.

MR. RAMSAY begged to point out, with regard to the remarks of his hon. and gallant Friend (Major Nolan), that the amount given to the Colleges and Universities of Scotland under the Act of Union was paid in consideration of property which those institutions possessed, and which was taken from them.

MR. BIGGAR moved to report Progress. They were promised that no contentious Votes should be taken, and this was a very contentious Vote. The only thing they could do was to go home. It was very irregular to vote large sums of money at that time in the morning.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Biggar.)

MR. CALLAN said, he found that this was an estimate of the amount required in the year ending 31st March, 1880, for charges connected with hospitals and infirmaries in Ireland under Act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 110, s. 16. He apprehended they were bound by that previous Vote. Now, on referring to the Act named, he found it was an Act for the better regulation of houses of industry, hospitals, and other places in Dublin supported wholly or in part by Parliamentary grants, and he found that Section 17, by which this Vote was legalized, was to the following effect:—

"In case the Board of Superintendence shall neglect to make such General Rules for the space of three months after being required to do so by the Lord Lieutenant, it shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant, by writing under the hand of the Chief or Under Secretary for Ireland for the time being, to make such General Rules, and from time to time to repeal, alter, or add to the same."

Where in all this was there any authority for the Vote to the orphanage? Either this Vote had been placed where it was in ignorance, or it had been placed there by the assistants who had prepared it, for the purpose of misleading the House. It must be one of these two things. It was either then through ignorance, or for a worse purpose. However, he would only say, as far as these secretaries were concerned, and he would protect himself under no privilege in stating it, that he believed nothing was beyond their capability. He would certainly support the Motion to report Progress, for he thought it was only respectful to Parliament that the Chief Secretary should make some further inquiries.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, assuming this orphanage to come under the description of a hospital, the section was clearly wide enough to include it. It was a question of fact whether or not this particular orphanage was under the control of the Board. [Mr. A. Moore: It is not.] Did the hon. Member speak of his own knowledge? [Mr. A. Moore: There is a Parliamentary Paper on the subject.] He would put this Vote on broad grounds. It was obliged to be on the Estimates in consequence of a usage handed down to them from old times, beginning at or before the Act of Union. The institution was well managed, and was not in the slightest degree proselytizing, and if any further information were wanted it should be forthcoming frankly and freely.

MR. GRAY pointed out that the specific direction that all these hospitals should be placed under the Board of Superintendence was not complied with. Section 18 also directed that the Board should make a special Report upon each charity, which should be submitted to Parliament. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Gibson): Except when the Charter is inconsistent.] Clearly, at any rate, the Act was not complied with.

MR. A. MOORE said, he had spoken to a member of the Dublin Hospital Board, and asked him why they did not report on this institution, and the reply was that they knew nothing about it. The money did not go through their Office, and that they had, therefore, nothing to report upon.

MR. MELDON asked for the ruling of the Chairman on a point of Order. It was stated that this Vote was asked for under the authority of an Act of Parliament, and the Committee had no power to vote a single farthing unless it was to be spent under that Act. The Act which had been read provided that certain money which had been granted should be spent upon certain institutions under the control of the Board of Superintendence. Assuming that this was a hospital, and assuming everything else, except the one point which had been proved that this hospital was not under the control of the Board of Superintendence, he would ask, whether it was in the power of the Committee to vote this money? He certainly submitted it was not.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. SALT): There is no question before the Committee as to the legality of the Vote. It has been put in this way for many years, founded upon an Act of Parliament and custom, and I can see that it is perfectly legitimate that the Vote should be put before the Committee as it is drawn up in the Estimates.

MR. MELDON said, it had only now been pointed out, for the first time, that this Vote did not come under the Act of Parliament, and that this money was not under the control of the Board.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, assuming that this institution was covered by the definition of an hospital, and assuming that it got the money appropriated by Parliament, it would certainly come within the terms of this Act. It was another question whether the provisions of the Act were complied with; but that would not, in the slightest degree, impair the accuracy of the description at the head of the Vote. He would suggest to hon. Members that it was only reasonable they should allow this Vote to pass now, and on the Report either he or the Chief Secretary would be prepared to state exactly how the Vote stood.

MR. RAMSAY was going to make the same suggestion in order to facilitate Business.

MR. O'DONNELL had no objection to this Vote in consequence of its denominational character; for he did not see how an institution could be properly called educational, if religion were excluded. He did not, therefore, at all object to the item on that ground, even although there was no corresponding institution for Catholics; but he quite agreed that they should know whether the money was expended properly and under proper control.

MR. P. MARTIN said, that was the real point. Was this Vote under the control of the Board, or was it not? It was conceded now it was not. He did not consider the Committee had been given the information they were entitled to demand. If the Vote was not postponed, he trusted the Motion would not be abandoned.

MR. J. LOWTHER thought that it was better to postpone the Vote for the present.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £123,944, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, to make good the sum by which the interest accrued in the year ended 20th November 1878, from Securities held by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, on account of 'The Fund for the Banks for Saving' and 'The Fund for Friendly Societies,' is insufficient to meet the interest which the said Commissioners are obliged by Statute to pay and credit, during such latter mentioned year to the trustees of Savings Banks, and to Friendly Societies respectively."

MR. E. W. HARCOURT: Sir, before this Vote is allowed, I think it should be considered from what source the money which is asked for comes, and whether the transfer of this money is for the benefit of the people. I think this question is a social question of great importance, and social questions are apt to be put too much out of sight at present. All questions of this sort, which involve the well-being of great masses of the people, must be of great interest to every one of us. I will, therefore, ask the Committee to bear with me for a short time, while I attempt to lay the present position of Post Office Savings Banks briefly before them; and if that indulgence is granted, my grateful thanks will be due to the Committee, as I am aware the subject is a very dry one. All those who take any interest in encouraging thrift amongst the working classes must thankfully acknowledge that the Post Office Savings Banks are doing a great work in the country. What we wish to argue is that that work is capable of great extension. The Post Office authorities have laid down that Post Office Savings Banks can only be established where Money Order Offices exist. The consequence is that many places are permanently excluded from the benefit of Post Office Savings Banks. It would be impossible now to enter into any general statistics; but I will take the example of Cambridgeshire, which represents a fair average of the counties in England. In this county, we find that there is a Post Office in every 7 square miles, and a Post Office Savings Bank in every 22 square miles; that the places where there are Post Offices and no Post Office Savings Banks are as 81 to 38, rather less than two to one—that is to say, that one-third of the population are without Post Office Savings Banks. In 51 places there are no Post Offices, and the ratio of persons enjoying the advantages of Post Office Savings Banks are 11 to 7. 117,095 persons have Post Offices and Post Office Savings Banks; 58,338 have Post Offices, but are from 1 to 6 miles from a Post Office Savings Bank; 16,600 have no Post Offices, and are from 1 to 6 miles from Post Office Savings Banks. The sizes of places having Post Offices but no Post Office Savings Banks vary very much; and 2 may be named which, having populations each of over 2,000 people, are 4 and 6 miles respectively from Post Office Savings Banks. Many places, also, with Post Offices are smaller than those without them. Now, it is quite true that individual benevolence and individual energy often supply the wants that are created by the Post Office. I say created, because I think that sins of omission are as great as sins of commission. My contention is, that to depend upon individuals is not satisfactory. I could, if there were time, give instances of cases where the best intentions have been thwarted by want of capacity, want of order, want of business habits, and untrustworthiness of agents. I know of one collector who received 2s. 6d. on each subscription. The consequence was that, when £1 was offered him, he requested the donor to give him 5s. at a time, so that he might receive 2s. 6d. on each 5s. Another collector, who was parted with because it was supposed that he collected more than was required, set up for himself, no doubt, very much to his own advantage. I am well aware that the objection taken by the Post Office is a financial objection, and they say they are perfectly satisfied with the supplementary work which is being done for them by the public. It is very certain that where no Money Order Offices exist a different class of Postmasters can be employed; and, of course, any alteration would involve the payment of higher salaries. It is quite true that an old woman with 50s. per annum, and of average honesty, may be quite competent to pack letters and sell stamps, although she would not be fit to manage the affairs of a Post Office Savings Bank. In passing, I may remark that even officers employed by the Government to superintend the Post Office Savings Banks are often very much underpaid, and the consequence is they sometimes shift for themselves. They lend to the poor at a higher interest than is given by the Post Office Savings Banks, and cases of repudiation are not unknown, whereby great discredit is brought upon the whole system. It ought to be a rule that all such traffickers should be dismissed at once and for ever from the Public Service. The remedy, I take it, for the financial difficulty is to be found in the employment of peripatetic officials. An office where a Post Office Savings Bank exists might send out to villages within a certain radius, one evening in the week, a clerk, at a small additional pay, to conduct the Savings Bank work for a couple of hours; and, I think, in localities where the want of such a convenience is felt, persons might be found who would be willing to guarantee any extra expense for the first year or two. If the principle is accepted, it might be worked out progressively, according to the experience of the Postmaster General, and I think there need be no displacement of those old ladies at 50s. per annum, who seem so dear to the Post Office. I do not think, either, that it is unfair to suppose that, as the Post Office is now making a profit of £150,000 per annum out of the Post Office Savings Bank, simply by the difference of interest given and received, and through not giving interest upon sums below £1, that an extension of business would bring an increase of profits. I know I shall be told that the Post Office has already tried the experiment of peripatetic officials; but I contend that their experiment was no fair test—it was only made for a short time upon a shifting population of navvies, and we all knew that habits of thrift take time to grow, and I think the experiment was worthless. Well, now, what is done with the profit of £150,000 per annum which is made upon Post Office Savings Banks? Why, it is used to bolster up the Old Savings Banks, and to enable them to pay a higher interest than they can afford; and it is also employed as a means of pensioning the old actuaries. I hold this to be a very unsound proceeding. I know that the Post Office cannot escape at once from its liabilities respecting the Old Savings Banks; but if the Post Office Savings Banks are encouraged, and if they are established wherever Post Offices exist, the Old Savings Banks would in time be absorbed by them; for even now difficulty is found in obtaining fresh trustees as the old ones die out. Where the object is to encourage thrift the means must be taken to the very doors. Those who know anything about it know that the poor will not trudge three, four, five, or six miles after it, particularly when that very attractive mode of investment, the public-house, is close at hand. Sir, I do not think it is Utopian to hope that a great Department, making large profits, should either of its own energy, or by the force of public opinion, be induced to enlarge its border, and to embrace under its operations a large and important part of the community which at present it professedly ignores. Sir, it is not enough for a Public Department, which has the power, if it has the will, to fold its arms and to say that sufficient good is being done privately. I have already contended that private enterprise is not satisfactory. The Post Office may rejoice over the labours of others, but it cannot claim it as its own work. Such supineness is not creditable, and will not be treated with either respect or patience by the public. The Post Office can and ought to open a Post Office Savings Bank wherever a Post Office exists. It cannot shove off its own responsibilities on to the shoulders of others. The assistance to local penny banks given by the Post Office can only be looked upon as a makeshift; such is the system of registered letters, whereby sums may be transmitted to distant Post Office Savings Banks. This does nothing to improve the security, and I hold that the Post Office is bound to give to investors that security which no private enterprise can offer. The issue of invitations to invest by the Post Office is well intended; but the fact is that villagers seldom read such documents, and still less seldom are influenced by them. It is impossible for me now to open the whole question of Post Office Savings Banks. Many improvements are urgently required; but at present I shall content myself with urging the one point respecting the opening of Post Office Savings Banks wherever Post Offices exist. I am well convinced of the possibility and expediency of this measure, and if I do not now succeed in convincing the Postmaster General, I do not despair of doing so at some future time; at any rate, my efforts will not cease until I have obtained my object, and with a view of bringing on a discussion on the subject, I now move, Sir, that the Vote before the Committee be reduced by a sum of £10,000.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, as his hon. Friend (Mr. Harcourt) was anxious to have a discussion, and, looking at the hour of the night, he would move to report Progress. ["Go on, go on!"]

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

MR. BRUEN hoped the Committee would take notice of the fact that the hon. Member who moved the count had himself gone out.

MR. CALLAN wished, as a matter of fact—["Order, order!"] He was rather anxious to call attention to a remark which had just been made. Surely, it was most unjust to object to the fact that the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), after moving a count, should leave the House. Of course, to leave the House would be one of the modes of obtaining the object he had in view, and it was most unjust to try and make a marked man of him in that way.

MR. MELDON suggested that the Vote should be withdrawn, and that they should go on with the rest.

MR. GRAY said, there was no desire on the part of the Irish Members to discuss the other Votes; and, therefore, if this one was postponed, the Committee would get through the others in a few minutes and save time.

MR. MONK thought they ought to support Her Majesty's Government in the Motion just made. It was rather too late to go on voting money.

MR. WHITWELL also hoped they would report Progress. The hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Harcourt) had brought up a very important and interesting subject, and the Vote was nearly £130,000. There was no one on that side of the House to support it.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 6; Noes 40: Majority 34.—(Div. List, No. 195.)

Original Question again proposed.

MAJOR O'GORMAN, addressing the Chair from his seat, and covered, said, the hon. Baronet who moved that Progress should be reported voted with the Noes, and therefore voted against his own Motion. It was quite true; he would ask the Chairman for his decision upon it, if he pleased.

THE CHAIRMAN (MR. SALT): I do not understand the hon. Baronet to challenge the decision.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: The hon. Baronet moved that you report Progress, and then voted against the Motion himself.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Not when the Question was put.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: When the Question was put from the Chair, before the Division, I did not challenge it.

MR. CALLAN: It is the rule that when a hon. Member moves any Motion that he shall vote for that Motion, and especial notice has been taken of Members of this House which Members have voted against a Motion which they have themselves proposed.

MR. MELDON: I understand, Sir, you have given your decision on the point of Order.

MR. BIGGAR: I do not know what the Government mean to do. They do not know their mind on any subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed just now about to rise, and then he changed his mind and did not do it. I do not know whether the Government intend that we should report Progress after moving it themselves.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I beg, most respectfully, Sir, to suggest that you do your duty.

MR. MELDON: I think the hon. and gallant Member is out of Order in moving that you do leave the Chair with no Question before the House. The proper course is to put the next Vote, when it will be open to the hon. and gallant Member, if he should think fit, to move it.

THE CHAIRMAN (MR. SALT): There is a Question before the House which is a Motion for a Vote, upon which some discussion has already taken place, and during which discussion a Motion was made to report Progress. I did not understand the hon. and gallant Member to move that I do leave the Chair.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: Will you have the goodness to understand it now, Sir? ["Order, order!"]

MR. CALLAN begged to second the Motion on these grounds. The Government, through the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, had moved that Progress be reported, and then, in consequence of some inexplicable reason—unprecedented during his (Mr. Callan's) previous experience—they did not ask leave to withdraw the Motion, but they absolutely voted against it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Major O'Gorman.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: There can be no doubt that the hon. and gallant Member is perfectly in his right in his Motion. With reference to what has just passed, I will point out what the real facts are. There seemed to be, or, at any rate, the Government were under the impression, that there was a desire on the part of the Committee to go on. We were not at all desirous to keep the Committee sitting against the wish of the majority of hon. Members, and, accordingly, my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury moved that the Chairman do report Progress. When that Question had been once put there was no power to withdraw it, and it had necessarily to be decided. But there happened, what so often happens. It appeared from the general conversation, and especially from observations made by the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Meldon), and the hon. Member near him (Mr. Gray), and some others, that it was the desire of the large number of Members to make some Progress. Of course, we are quite ready to sit, and we thought it was the wish of others to do so; but the course proposed is that we should postpone the Vote, and then, if the Committee are willing to take the next two Votes, we should be glad to do so. Perhaps, the hon. and gallant Gentleman will withdraw his Motion.

MR. CALLAN said, that at 20 minutes to 4 he thought they ought not to raise an important discussion, and, therefore, he did object to take these Votes. Personally, he should be very glad to facilitate Business; but on the next Vote he wanted to raise a discussion he could not raise at that hour.

MR. MONK said, he was not at all aware why he had been called upon as one of the Tellers for the Ayes. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury had been guilty of a great irregularity; and they had had, in consequence, a very disagreeable scene in the Committee. The hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Harcourt) was in possession of the Committee, when the Secretary to the Treasury rose, and interrupted him by moving to report Progress; he was entirely out of Order in so doing. The hon. Member for Oxfordshire, when it was decided that there was a full Committee, was in possession of the Committee; and, therefore, it was irregular for the hon. Baronet to move that Progress be reported. But having made that Motion, and given his voice in favour of adjournment, it was certainly a great irregularity on his part to vote against his own Motion. The Leader of the House had certainly not in any way mended the matter by the explanation he had just given. He (Mr. Monk) and his hon. Friend the Member for Kendal voted against going on with the Committee, because they did not think Votes of this amount and of this nature ought to be brought on at half-past 3 in the morning.

MR. GRAY said, there was a very decided and unanimous expression of opinion that two Votes, which would involve no discussion, might be taken, and it was entirely due to the suggestions made by himself and his hon. Friends that confusion had arisen. Especially, he was concerned to be a party to making the suggestion, and he was very sorry it had involved the confusion which had arisen.

MAJOR O'GORMAN begged to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next;

Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS (NO. 2) BILL.

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—SLAVERY.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: My Lords, on the 11th of July of last year, I put a Question to the Lord President of the Council in these words—

“Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty’s Government, on assuming the occupation and administration of Cyprus, to maintain or suppress, as has been done in Her Majesty’s dominions in India, the system of slavery now existing in the Island?”

And to this Question I received the following Answer:—

“I have to state that Sir Garnet Wolseley leaves this country to-morrow for Cyprus; and when he arrives there it will be his duty to make full inquiry and investigation into all the institutions of the Island and everything connected with them. When that is done he will make a Report to Her Majesty’s Government as to the state of things he has found in Cyprus; and having received such a Report from him, Her Majesty’s Government will then be in a position to state the course they intend to take.”
—[3 Hansard, ccxli. 1224.]

I venture to repeat the Question because a whole year has elapsed and no Report from the Governor of Cyprus has as yet been laid on your Lordships’ Table. Now, the Question is of importance, not only as touching Slavery in general, but as to the alleged fact that it is existing in Cyprus under British rule. I know perfectly well that no Slave Trade openly exists, and that no such thing as a slave market is to be found in any part of the Turkish Empire. That system has long been abolished. But the sale and purchase of slaves are still carried on extensively by private agents and in private houses; and, indeed, constituted as Turkish society is, Slavery is as necessary and indispensable to the Empire—especially among the wealthier classes—as is the Sultan himself. Now, as Cyprus was for centuries under Turkish rule, the probability is that a similar system prevails, and that it is fed by large importations of slaves from East Africa and the Red Sea—for which latter traffic Turkey is specially responsible, as it is mainly conducted at Jeddah, a port in the Red Sea belonging to the Sultan of Turkey. From all quarters there are imported, as I am informed, some 70,000 slaves every year. None are imported for prædial or agricultural purposes. The women are imported as servants for the harems, and the men for other duties, for which they are previously fitted by the most cruel and disgusting mutilations. There is also a large and equally disgusting traffic in white slaves in the very centre of Turkey itself. Circassian slavery was put down by the Russians; but the Circassians who immigrated into Turkey have maintained their old habits, and sell their sons and daughters to the highest bidders among the sensualists of Turkey. Now, this domestic Slavery may prevail in Cyprus. If Cyprus be still under Turkish law, it is highly probable—certainly possible. I trust, therefore, to learn from Her Majesty’s Government whether, as Cyprus has now passed under British rule, they will not, following the precedent of the law enacted in India in 1843, decree the total and immediate abolition of Slavery, whether external or domestic.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, the promise referred to by my noble Friend who has just addressed the House was given by my noble Friend behind me (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) last year during my absence from this country. I really did not know that such a Report had been promised, and it has never been drawn up by Sir Garnet Wolseley. With regard to a general Report on the subject, there would be no objection to its production if any had been sent home; but I have received the most distinct and categorical statements, both from Sir Garnet Wolseley and Colonel Biddulph, that involuntary servitude does not exist in Cyprus. It is stated so positively by persons who must know that I think there can be no doubt that the fact is as they state. If my noble Friend recalls to his mind for a moment the state of the legislation in the Turkish Empire, he will see that, wherever the Turkish law is honestly enforced, Slavery is not likely to exist. It is, unfortunately, a fact that the cases in which it is so enforced are very rare. The White Slave Trade to which my noble Friend has alluded was abolished by a Decree of the Sultan in 1854, and the Black Slave Trade was abolished in 1857. Every person who landed in the Turkish Empire after those dates in a state of slavery became free by the action of the law. My noble Friend has justly stated that Slavery in Turkey has been almost entirely confined to, or connected with, harem life. It is obvious that men treated in the manner which my noble Friend glanced at are not likely to be long-lived; and as there has been no legal importation of them since 1857, it is probable that there are not many of those slaves now in existence. As to the women, they are of little value when they become old; and as it has been the custom in many parts of Turkey, and I presume in Cyprus, to manumit slaves when they get old, and as all who were imported after 1857 became free, I do not think that, at the present time, there is any person suffering servitude in Cyprus. With respect to the rest of the Turkish Empire, I agree with my noble Friend that there is reason to fear that the state of things—especially at Jeddah—is deplorable. We have made the most earnest remonstrances to the Turkish Government to employ Governors who shall honestly carry out the Turkish laws, and put a stop to the horrible traffic which goes on across the Red Sea. We have very nearly concluded a Convention which will give us a right of search at the Red Sea, and which, but for the present Ministerial crisis in Constantinople, would, I think, have been already signed. We shall spare no efforts to carry out the Convention, and put a stop to that which, I believe, is now the sole supply channel of Slavery in the Turkish Empire—or, at all events, the main one. With respect more particularly to Cyprus, I can only repeat the assurance that Slavery does not exist there. When I saw the Notice of my noble Friend on the Paper I thought he might have some facts which might show that the contrary is the case; and I am very glad to find that he has nothing of the kind. The oppressed in all parts of the world find their way to the noble Earl; and if there were the slightest indication given to us which should induce us to believe that any person is kept in servitude in Cyprus against his will, we should act without hesitation, and without delay. My noble Friend may be quite satisfied, however, that nothing of the kind exists.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: Does the noble Marquess really say that there is no importation of slaves into Turkey at the present time?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: No, there is an illegal importation to an enormous extent into Turkey; but it was absolutely prohibited by the Firman of 1857. This is only one of many instances which show that, if the Turkish law were properly carried out, matters would go on very fairly in that country; but the neglect of the Administration to carry out their own laws gives rise to the present evils.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: Should her Majesty's Government discover, upon further inquiry, that there is anything of the sort in Cyprus, will they proceed to introduce the Indian legislation, in order promptly to put it down?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Certainly.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (POWERS OF SCHOOL BOARD) BILL—(No. 153.)

(The Lord Steward.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Steward.)

EARL FORTESCUE hoped that the Home Secretary would refuse, under the powers conferred upon him by this Bill, to diffuse expenditure of a temporary character over a long period of years. In the case of the reformatory ship which had been extravagantly fitted up by the London School Board, the cost of the carpets and furniture, and he had heard of a piano also, had been borrowed, and spread over a long series of years. Such an example, if sanctioned, would be a direct encouragement to extravagance. He hoped that nothing would be placed against the capital that was likely to be worn out in the course of those years.

EARL BEAUCHAMP admitted that there was a considerable expenditure on this head beyond what there ought to be; but he trusted that the conspicuous example of extravagance mentioned by the noble Lord would be the means of preventing similar cases in future. The object of the Bill was simply to enable school boards to start or contribute to the support of industrial schools.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

The Marquess of Salisbury

INDIA CORPORAL PUNISHMENT IN INDIAN GAOLS.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that he regretted having to take up the time of the House with another case of illegality; but he had waited on the Secretary of State at the India Office in reference to this matter, and his noble Friend had said that he was unable to do anything. The Brahmin Gaya Pershad was imprisoned on the 3rd of November, 1874, for seven years for forgery at Jubbalpore; here he was set to work at the hand-mill, but this work was found to be too hard for him. At the end of three months, Mr. Morris, the Chief Commissioner, came to the gaol and sent him from there to Nagpore, though Dr. Rogers said he was unfit to travel. In Nagpore Gaol he was flogged 10 or 13 times on the pretext of his having tampered with the warders, and obtained tobacco and sugar. In England, to have flogged a burglar on these grounds would have been illegal. The case might be left here; but as it was in human nature to feel more sympathy for a deserving person than for an undeserving one, he would say a few words about Gaya Pershad's case. He was a man who had received certificates from Sir Richard Temple for his services to the British Government during the Mutiny; the late General Sleeman had been a constant visitor of his father's, Behary Lal. Gaya Pershad had lent money to a Raja Bulwunt Singh, whose affairs came into the Court of Wards, and Captain, or Major, McLean had charge of that case. Gaya Pershad sued for his debt of about 100,000 rupees, including interest, and obtained a decree in his favour; the other side appealed, and he again obtained a decree in his favour. There had been a dispute between Gaya Pershad and Mr. Morris, a younger brother of the Chief Commissioner, who was a tenant of Gaya Pershad's, on matters connected with the tenancy. Mr. McLean asked Gaya Pershad to reduce his claims on the Raja's estate by 10,000 rupees; he declined. He then asked him to reduce it by 6,000 rupees; he again declined taking less than his decree. Mr. McLean then said he would see if he could not make him do so. His papers and vouchers were then examined, and a receipt for about 200 rupees, written by one Lall Charran Dass, an agent of the Raja, and bearing the Raja's seal, was said to be a forgery. Whilst the papers were in the hands of Mr. McLean another stamp was put upon the Raja's seal so as to obliterate it, and he was convicted by what appears to have been fabricated evidence. Prima facie, it was improbable that a man in Gaya Pershad's position, and with a claim of about 100,000 rupees, would have forged a receipt for about 200 rupees. The friend of Gaya Pershad, who endeavoured to obtain relief for him from his ill-treatment in prison, failed to get a hearing, and was driven away with ignominy from the houses of the officials he attempted to see. About January, 1877, a Petition was sent to the Viceroy, in the names of the wife and son of Gaya Pershad, praying for a commutation of his sentence; but the only reply given was that the Chief Commissioner, Mr. Morris, had reported unfavourably upon it. Her Majesty's Ministers speak so little in this House, that we are driven to what are called their extra-Parliamentary utterances in order to ascertain their minds. On the 16th of July last the Secretary of State for India said that West Kent had never been polluted by the representation of a Liberal. He (Lord Stanley of Alderley) had not sufficient experience of electioneering speeches to know if that was according to the usual amenity of language; but he feared that other people, in other places, would apply those words of the noble Viscount to those who sat in the seat of justice. On the 25th of July, at Cooper's Hill, the noble Viscount said that England had given to India "Justice and honesty in high places, and pure Courts established for carrying on litigation." He hoped the Secretary of State would make these words good, and inquire into this case.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, that he knew nothing of this case, except what had been communicated to him a few days ago by the noble Lord. According to the statement of the noble Lord, this man had been convicted of forgery in 1874, had since been undergoing his sentence, and had been flogged a certain number of times by the warder. He (Viscount Cranbrook) did not know whether this statement was true or not. He was without information on the subject; and in the most recent Reports with regard to Indian gaols, which came down to 1877, no names of the prisoners were given. Whether this person was still undergoing sentence he (Viscount Cranbrook) had no means of knowing. He could only say that if this man was suffering any wrong the remedy should be sought in India; and he had no doubt that if the friends of this man applied to the Viceroy he would order inquiry to be made.

QUESTIONS.

RUSSIA — TREATMENT OF RUSSIAN CONVICTS—DEPORTATION TO SAGHALIEN.—QUESTIONS.

MR. J. COWEN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the Government have received any information as to the manner in which Russian subjects, on mere suspicion of political offences, are being driven by thousands into slavery in Siberia; if they have been informed that 700 persons, mostly men and women of education, have been packed in the hold of a small ship bound for Saghalien, without light or sufficient food or air, that 250 of them died on board, and 150 were landed in a dying state; further, whether it is true that large bodies of Cossacks are being forcibly ejected from their houses and homes, and compelled to settle in Colonies from the mouth of the Usuri river to Vladivostock, for the purpose of establishing a chain of military posts against the Chinese; and, whether, since remonstrances were addressed by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of Naples against the treatment of Poerio and his colleagues in 1855, and to Russia, against her treatment of the Poles after the insurrection in 1861, to Turkey in 1876 against the action of Cheket Pasha and others in Bulgaria, these cases do not furnish precedents for remonstrating with Russia against such treatment of alleged political offenders?

MR. BOURKE: In regard to the first Question of the hon. Member, I have to state that various accounts have reached the Foreign Office as to numerous arrests for political offences which have taken place within the last two months in various parts of Russia. Deportation has followed upon these arrests. I am not in a position officially to say what is the destination of the persons so arrested. With regard to the second Question, respecting the particular ship mentioned by the hon. Member, I have to state that accounts have reached the Foreign Office that this vessel was specially fitted for carrying prisoners from the Black Sea to Saghalien, and we are informed that the arrangements for carrying the prisoners were as humane as possible consistently with a proper guard being kept upon the prisoners on board the vessel. It has also been alleged that there were no political prisoners on board of her, but that her cargo consisted of between 600 and 700 convicted prisoners. The vessel passed through the Canal into the Red Sea some weeks ago. As to the next Question, relating to the Cossacks, I am not in a position either to affirm or to deny the facts. Then the hon. Member asks whether the cases he mentions do not furnish a precedent for a remonstrance on the part of Her Majesty's Government? All I can say in answer to that is that it is not the practice of Her Majesty's Government to interfere in cases of this kind unless they have good reason to suppose that the remonstrances which they make will be attended with beneficial or practical results.

MR. MUNDELLA: Will the hon. Gentleman kindly say whether it is true that, on the arrival of the ship, 250 of these people were found to be dead and 150 were in a dying state?

MR. BOURKE: We have not received any information of that kind; and if the hon. Member will look at the Question, he will see it was impossible for us to receive any information of that sort consistent with the facts, for the vessel only passed through the Red Sea three or four weeks ago, and, therefore, we have not heard of her landing any prisoners, or, indeed, of her touching at any place after she left Suez. We have heard of her in the Red Sea, where she was at anchor; but we have not heard that she touched at any place.

NAVY—MARINE OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he has had a medical survey on the five Marine officers who were unable to go with the battalion to South Africa, and if the result has been to retire only three of them, and to retain two on the active list; whether, as regards foreign service such as the South African, these two are suffering only from temporary disability, or whether they are for the future fit only for home service; and, if it be the fact that one of these two has been allowed to gain a lieutenant colonelcy through the compulsory retirement of another of the five surveyed?

MR. W. H. SMITH: It is true that a medical survey was held on five officers reported unfit. The Medical Board reported three as unfit for general service, and two as fit. As regards one of the two officers, there can be no doubt his disability was not of a character to render him unfit for general service, but was of a temporary character only; and as regards the second officer the discrepancy between the report of the medical officer who declared him to be unfit and the Medical Board who declared him to be fit will be matter for further investigation and consideration. Pending the decision of the Board of Admiralty, the promotion of the second officer to the lieutenant colonelcy will not be made.

NOXIOUS GASES BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. LOWTHIAN BELL asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, looking at the period of the year, it is really the intention of Her Majesty's Government to proceed with the Noxious Gases Bill?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that owing to the opposition with which the Bill was threatened, and the advanced period of the Session, it was his intention to withdraw it.

DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—THE MULCAIRE DRAINAGE SCHEME.

QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Lords of the Treasury have considered the Memorial presented by Tenants in the county of Limerick of Lands affected by the failure of the Mulcaire Drainage Scheme; and, whether their Lordships are prepared to afford the Memorialists any relief?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: The Memorial was only received at the Treasury on the 24th instant. It has been referred to the Board of Works in Ireland, and until their Report has been received it is impossible for the Lords of the Treasury to form any opinion upon the matter submitted to them in the Memorial.

BUILDING SOCIETIES ACTS—BORROWING POWERS.—QUESTION.

MR. ISAAC asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the statement is correct that Building Societies established under the 6th and 7th Will. 4, c. 32, and not since incorporated under "The Building Societies Act, 1874," have the powers of borrowing money set forth in the Act of 1874?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR JOHN HOLKER): The 15th section of the Building Societies Act, 1874, does not confer such borrowing powers on those Societies, unless they have been incorporated under the Act of 1874. In an answer I recently gave to a similar Question, I ought to have pointed out more distinctly than I did that the Building Societies to which the 15th section of the Act of 1874 applies are Societies which have obtained certificates of incorporation under that Act, as provided by Section 2 of the Building Societies Act Amendment Act, 1875.

EXHIBITION COMMISSIONERS OF 1851
AND THE THE ROYAL HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.—QUESTION.

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is aware that the whole of the £50,000 advanced by the debenture holders to the Royal Horticultural Society, in addition to £25,000 from the Society's own funds, was spent upon buildings and other permanent works on the property rented by the Society from the Royal Commissioners of the 1851 Exhibition; and, whether this money was spent under the direct supervision of an "Expenses Committee," upon which the Royal Commissioners retained the power to appoint, and did actually appoint, a majority of the members, thereby keeping complete control over the expenditure of the money advanced by the debenture holders?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The money which was advanced by the debenture holders to the Royal Horticultural Society was, I understand, expended in the erection of conservatories, laying out terraces, and other works suitable for public gardens, which were of no advantage to the Commissioners in disposing of the estate. The expenditure, I am informed, was not made directly or indirectly under the supervision of the "Expenses Committee." I may point out that an action is now pending which will give occasion for the discussion of any claims which the Royal Horticultural Society may consider themselves in a position to make, and that, as I think, it would be more convenient that questions of this sort should not be discussed in this House whilst that action is pending.

INDIA—THE NORTH-WEST FRONTIER
—THE ASSIGNED DISTRICTS.

QUESTIONS.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Under Secretary of State for India,

The Attorney General

Whether the Government of India has explained to Her Majesty's Government the reason why they omitted to send home, with their despatch of the 2nd June last, a copy of the Schedule annexed to the Treaty of Peace concluded between the British Government and the Ameer of Affghanistan, which defines the limits of the districts assigned to the British Government; and if he will communicate such reason to the House; and, if he can state whether the omission will be rectified, so that the document in question may be laid upon the Table of House before Parliament rises for the vacation?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I believe the reason why the Schedule has not been sent home is because the limits of those assigned districts had to be demarcated by a mixed Commission; but as soon as we receive it we will lay it on the Table of the House.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: The Under Secretary of State has not answered the Question, whether the Indian Government had stated the reason they gave for not sending the Schedule when they sent the Despatch?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I have already stated the reason. I know of no other.

THE MAHARAJAH DHULEEP SINGH
QUESTIONS.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any Papers can be laid upon the Table in reference to the application that has been recently made to the Secretary of State for India in Council by Maharajah Dhuleep Singh for an increase in the allowance annually made to him out of the revenues of India, so that the House may have an opportunity of expressing its opinion on the subject before any decision is arrived at to grant the increased allowance asked for?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I have consulted my noble Friend (Viscount Cranbrook), and I have to say that it is not the intention of the Government to lay on the Table any Papers on this subject at present. As I informed the hon. Member the other day, certain points have been referred for the opinion of the Government of India. When an answer has been received from India the whole matter will be very carefully considered by the Secretary of State in Council.

MR. FAWCETT: May I ask, Whether, in the event of the reply of the Government of India not being received before the Session closes, Her Majesty's Government will undertake that no decision will be arrived at to give the increased allowance in question until next Session?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No, I cannot give such an undertaking; and as to the Correspondence, it is very unusual to give any part of a Correspondence while it is still going on.

MR. FAWCETT gave Notice that this Session he would take the earliest opportunity he could secure, on going into Committee of Supply, of calling attention to the matter, and moving a Resolution to the effect—

"That, in the present condition of Indian finance, which rendered it expedient that efforts should be made to reduce the expenditure, the House was of opinion that the increased allowance asked for should not be granted."

MR. ONSLOW, in consequence of the answer of the Under Secretary of State, gave Notice that he should take the earliest opportunity of asking him, If no Papers regarding an increased allowance to Maharajah Dhuleep Singh can be laid upon the Table of the House during the present Session, he can state the reasons why the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India is prepared to reopen the question, considering the present allowance to his Highness was fixed after the fullest consideration by the Government of India and the Home Government?

LAW AND JUSTICE—CIVIL ASSIZES AT MANCHESTER AND LIVERPOOL. QUESTION.

MR. RATHBONE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that, under the arrangements made by the judges for holding Civil Assizes at Manchester and Liverpool, only nine days were allowed at Manchester for a cause list of ninety-five cases, including thirty-eight special jury cases; that in consequence of the impossibility of concluding the business within that time, the judges suggested that cases unlikely to be reached at Manchester should be put down for Liverpool; and that this has been done to such an extent as to threaten to occupy much of the time available for Liverpool; whether he is aware that it has been proposed to have no October Civil Assizes for Lancashire, practically reducing, as regards Liverpool, the three Assizes, which the Judicature Commission considered inadequate for the work to be done, to little more than one; and, whether he will consider what steps can be taken to remedy this state of things, and to make impossible in future such disregard of the interests of suitors?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Taking the last Question first, I am quite sure the hon. Member for Liverpool does not intend to charge the learned Judges who went this Circuit with having neglected the public interests, but that his Question applies to the general arrangement of the Circuit.

MR. RATHBONE: I did not wish to allude to the Judges who went the Circuit, but to the Judges who fixed the Northern Circuit.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I was quite certain the hon. Member would not have a word to say as to the Judges who went the Circuit. In regard to the second Question, I am informed that ample time was believed to have been given for the trial of the ordinary cases in Lancashire, and I have been furnished with a statement of the arrangements. Of course, the hon. Member knows that I have nothing to do with these arrangements; but the arrangements were so made that Lancashire should have its full share of the services of the learned Judges who went the Circuit. With regard to the first Question, I think the hon. Member is labouring under a misapprehension, and I will state generally what the arrangement was. Eleven days were allotted to Manchester, commencing from the 14th, which was the commission day, and ending on the 26th. A larger entry of cases was, however, made than ever occurred before, so that it was found that the list could not be tried out within the period fixed. The learned Judges, however, offered to take over to Liverpool all the cases that remained untried; but that they might not take precedence of the Liverpool cases, they required the parties to enter them in the Liverpool district, taking their chance as to when they would come on. There were 114 cases entered for trial at Liverpool, only seven of which came from the Manchester district. The learned Judge who gives me this information goes on to say that he does not know what is meant by the time available for Liverpool. Liverpool being the last place, trials go on until the list is exhausted; and he does not know of any remanets ever having been left there.

MR. RATHBONE: Did not those 11 days include Sunday?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: No; 11 working days were allotted to Manchester—from Monday, the 14th, which was commission day, until Saturday, the 26th, inclusive.

CYPRUS — ADMINISTRATION OF THE ISLAND—CIVIL POLICE FORCE.

QUESTIONS.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, as the Government has abandoned its proposal of a Vote for the maintenance of a Military pioneer regiment in Cyprus, and has proposed a Vote for a body of civil police in the same Island which is estimated to cost £26,000 a-year, he will lay upon the Table of the House, before the Vote is taken, any Report showing the necessity for such a large expenditure for police in the island, and also any Report and Financial Statement showing the inability of Cyprus to bear the burden of its civil expenditure?

MR. BOURKE: No Reports of the nature alluded to by the hon. Gentleman are in the possession of Her Majesty's Government. It will be my duty, in a few days, to move the Vote alluded to by the hon. Gentleman, and I shall take that opportunity of making a short statement to the House upon the subject. If, after hearing that statement, we are not fortunate enough to obtain the support of the hon. Gentleman, I feel, nevertheless, quite sure that the arrangement proposed is an economical one, and that it will be assented to by the House of Commons.

MR. DODSON asked, If the Under Secretary of State could now state when the Government would be prepared to lay on the Table an account of the Revenue and Expenditure of Cyprus?

MR. BOURKE said, he did not think he would be quite justified in answering that Question without Notice. He was aware that the subject had been mentioned before, and, therefore, the subject was not being lost sight of. Some of the accounts, however, had not yet come home, and therefore he had to ask the right hon. Gentleman to repeat the Question on some future day.

CRIME (IRELAND)—CONSTABULARY EXPENSES.—QUESTIONS.

MR. FRENCH asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has seen a paragraph, which appeared in the Dublin "Evening Telegraph" of the 21st July, in which Mr. Stephen Seed, Crown Solicitor for the County Kildare, addressing the Grand Jury at Naas, is reported to have spoken as follows:—

"There was, he was sorry to say, a good deal of undetected crime in the county. The county inspector had made a return of twenty indictable offences committed since last assizes, but of that number one-half was undetected. This was a bad state of facts, and amongst the causes which contributed to it was a rule of the constabulary force prohibiting, under pain of instant dismissal, any constable being refunded the expenses he was out of pocket in bringing offenders to trial;"

and, whether, if such a rule exists, he will, seeing it is one which is likely to discourage constables in the detection of crime, take steps, in the interest of justice, to have it abolished?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I am afraid it must be admitted that there is a certain amount of undetected crime in the County Kildare, as well as in other parts of Ireland. I find that in that county there were several cases of sending threatening letters, and charges of that description, which have been undetected; but I think that is not due to the cause indicated by the Crown Solicitor. It appears that formerly a practice prevailed under which the Crown Solicitor disbursed sums of money practically on his own authority in the form of fees to constables engaged in tracing certain cases. That was a practice which did not work well; and a new rule was made to the effect that no constable or other police officer was to receive any money except through the local official chief of the force. That has been a great improvement on the course which formerly prevailed, though it may not have appeared in that light to the Crown Solicitor, who previously had the patronage in his own hands.

Mr. Assheton Cross

MR. CALLAN: Sir, I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, If he will inform the House under what peculiar circumstances it was that the Crown Solicitor was obliged to take this most unusual course of addressing the Grand Jury at the Assizes, and whether the Mr. Stephen Seed, who adopted this course, was the same gentleman who, with reference to the packing of jury panels in the County Meath, told the sub-sheriff "to leave that in his hands, and he would do it effectually?"

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I have not heard of the matter just alluded to; but I understand that, from time to time, this gentleman has made use of some strong statements. I do not know anything of the circumstances referred to.

DOMINION OF CANADA—SUPERSESION OF M. LETELLIER DE ST. JUST.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that the Governor General of Canada has superseded M. Letellier de St. Just as Lieutenant Governor of Quebec; whether this was by advice of Her Majesty's Government; and, when he will lay the Papers upon the Table?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I think the statement is probably true, although I have received no official confirmation of it. Papers will be laid on the Table as soon as I have received them from the Governor General of Canada, which I expect will be in a few days, and then the hon. Member will be able to see exactly what has been done.

ARMY—ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT—CLAIM OF MR. LYNALL THOMAS. QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, since statements have been made on behalf of the Government that the system of heavy ordnance now in use in the service was originated in the Government factories, he can explain how it occurred that the jury gave a verdict in the case of Thomas against The Queen in favour of Mr. Lynall Thomas, for a sum of £6,500, for the expenses incurred by him in the production of the first heavy rifled guns?

LORD EUSTACE OECIL, in reply, said, he had made inquiry at the War Office, but was unable to obtain any explanation of the extraordinary verdict which the jury had come to in the case referred to. He had no doubt that his hon. and learned Friends the Attorney General and Solicitor General might be able to throw some light upon the matter, as they represented the Crown on the occasion of the trial. He had, however, been informed of a fact of which, perhaps, his hon. and gallant Friend was ignorant—that the Judges of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court had come to the unanimous conclusion that the verdict should be set aside. One of the allegations was that the weight of the evidence was entirely against it. They would appear to have been as greatly surprised at the verdict as his hon. and gallant Friend was.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, that in consequence of the answer which he had received, and which did not entirely agree with the facts, he should ask a further Question on the subject hereafter.

NAVY—FLOGGING IN THE NAVY. QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it be the fact that a meeting of petty officers and seamen was held at Portsmouth to protest against the way in which the opinions of the men of the Navy, on the subject of flogging, had been misrepresented by certain Naval officers in Parliament; if Admiral Fanshawe issued a memorandum to captains of ships pointing out that such meetings were subversive of discipline; and, if Admiral Fanshawe has issued any memorandum to officers cautioning them against making public misrepresentations directly provoking to such breaches of discipline?

MR. W. H. SMITH: There is no doubt, Sir, that a meeting was held at Portsmouth, at which petty officers and seamen were present, and the punishment of flogging was discussed; and it is the fact that Admiral Fanshawe, as Commander-in-Chief at Portsmouth, issued a memorandum cautioning the men from attending such meetings. He did so on his own responsibility, but with the entire subsequent approval of the Admiralty, as it is clearly the duty of officers in his position to warn men against being led into acts which are subversive of discipline and are breaches of the Queen's Regulations. The statements which the hon. Member alleges on his own authority to be misrepresentations, having been made in Parliament, do not come under the cognizance of the Commander-in-Chief at Portsmouth, and I apprehend it would be a breach of the Privileges of this House if he were to take notice of them.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, What was likely to be the first Order on Wednesday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Probably, Supply—the Educational Votes—but it is rather difficult to say at this stage. The East India Loan (£5,000,000) Bill will be taken at a convenient time.

MR. CHILDERS understood that the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed on Thursday to make a statement as to the financial arrangements in connection with the Vote for the Zulu War, and asked, Whether the right hon. Gentleman would lay on the Table a day or two before Thursday the Estimate for that war, so that Members might have an opportunity of considering it before the Vote came to be discussed?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am not quite sure that it would be the most convenient course to lay the Estimate on the Table before Thursday. There will, of course, be plenty of opportunities for discussing it after I move the Vote. I propose, tomorrow, to take, as the first Order of the Day, the adjourned debate on the second reading of the Banking and Joint Stock Companies Bill, and later in the evening to take a Vote in Supply to pay off the Exchequer Bonds, which will be maturing during the autumn. On Thursday, I propose, in Committee of Ways and Means, to move Resolutions authorizing the Treasury to borrow the £2,000,000 in Consols which is to be advanced to India, and to borrow also the money required for paying off the Bonds. On that evening I will lay on the Table the Estimate for the expenses of the Zulu War, and explain what the position of the question is, and I think that possibly it will be more convenient that serious debate on the subject should be reserved for a later day.

MR. CHILDERS: Then the House will not be asked on Thursday to Vote the expense of the Zulu War, either in form or in substance?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No.

PRIVILEGE — (TOWER HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE (METROPOLIS) COMMITTEE).

The Sergeant at Arms, on being called upon by Mr. Speaker to inform the House what course he had taken in order to serve Mr. Speaker's Warrant upon Charles Edmund Grissell, reported as follows:—

That, on receiving Mr. Speaker's Warrant to take into my custody Charles Edmund Grissell, I sent a Messenger of the House to Boulogne-sur-Mer to obtain information respecting him. The Messenger has returned and reported to me that he has seen Mr. Grissell, who is still at Boulogne-sur-Mer, beyond the jurisdiction of this House, and residing at the Hotel Bordeaux under the name of Graham.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

[Progress.]

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. SHAW said, he had, at the desire of his hon. Friends around him, a request to make of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was that the two Votes which stood first upon the Paper, and had reference to the Queen's University and the Queen's Colleges, should be postponed. If the Government would consider the request he had made they would see its reasonableness. It was well known that the House had before it a Bill dealing with another department of this great question, and that the two subjects—the Bill and the Votes—were so dove-tailed that it would be impossible for them to discuss the one without discussing the other. He suggested the postponement in order to facilitate the Business of the House, because he was afraid that if they entered into a discussion of all the questions which would crop up upon these Votes they would occupy a good deal of time unnecessarily; whereas if they postponed the Votes they would get through a good deal of Business before the night was over. He did not, by saying this, in any way mean to threaten the Government. Nothing of the kind was meant; but the question was of such importance, the bearings of the Votes on the University Bill were so intimate and numerous, that, as a matter of necessity, if they discussed them, they must occupy an immense deal of time; and, moreover, the same ground would have to be traversed when considering the University Bill. He, therefore, hoped the Government would, before any further step was taken with respect to these Votes, decide to postpone them until some progress was made with the University Bill. It was hoped that that Bill would emerge from Committee a better Bill than it was when it went into Committee; and they were not without hopes that the Government would continue that process of equitable legislation which was the system of the present day. Some concessions had already been made with respect to Ireland; and, in the end, they would probably make a very fair Bill out of the one recently introduced. At the present moment, however, he earnestly trusted that the Government would yield to the proposed postponement. They were quite ready to discuss the Votes—they were not afraid to discuss them; but they must necessarily repeat themselves when discussing the Bill. He would not occupy the time of the House further; for he thought he had made out a good case, and had given reasons which ought to have weight with the Government. If the Government did not yield to his request he was prepared to move a substantive Motion, which would occupy some time in deliberating.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there could be no objection on the part of the Government to put off the Queen's Colleges and University Votes in order to go on with the other Votes, if that was a course which was most agreeable to hon. Gentlemen. But, on the other hand, it must be clearly understood that they did not accept the suggestion of the hon. Member for Cork that they should put off the Votes until after the discussion on the University Bill. They would not enter into an engagement of that kind; but they were prepared to postpone the Votes for the present, and go on with the discussion of the other Votes, in the hope that such a course was most likely to save time.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER was very reluctant to interpose, because he had not had the advantage of knowing that it was the intention of the hon. Member for Cork to make his request to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It now appeared, however, that he had made his request to postpone the Votes on a distinct ground. The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied that he would postpone the Estimates, though he did not recognize the ground. He would, therefore, ask the hon. Member for Cork what he gained by the postponement? If they put the University Bill out of all consideration, the present was as good a time for discussing the Queen's Colleges and University Estimates as any other; but it was because the Bill of the Government stood in the way, and because the Estimates were to be considered in connection with that Bill, that his hon. Friend asked for the postponement. The manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had met the request was uncandid; and he appealed to the Government to say whether they saw anything really objectionable in the ground on which the hon. Member made his request?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL submitted that whatever was taken first—the University Bill or the Votes—it was most desirable, for the information of English and Scotch Members, that the Government should state whether they proposed to maintain the full Vote now given to the Queen's Colleges, in addition to the Vote proposed to be given to the Queen's University. If that were so, his and other hon. Gentlemen's views of the matter would be very considerably changed. He believed it would also make some difference in the view the Irish Members would take.

MR. SHAW did not think it would be convenient that they should enter into a general discussion on the question. Of course, he would have preferred very much that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had acceded to his entire request; but he could not say that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the right hon. Gentleman had acted unfairly. They would take their chance in the matter; but they hoped the Government would see the reasonableness of connecting the two questions together, so that they might save time.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

(1.) £110,644, to complete the sum for Public Buildings, Ireland.

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

(2.) £22,340, to complete the sum for the Chief Secretary for Ireland Offices.

(3.) £1,522, to complete the sum for the Charitable Donations and Bequests Office, Ireland.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. A. MOORE said, he had an Amendment on the Paper against this Vote; but he had no wish to detain the Committee more than a few minutes. There were very important questions connected with the Local Government Board in Ireland which, some time ago, he thought it his duty to bring before the House at great length. He understood that during the last year a very eminent official had been promoted to the head of this Department; and at the beginning of his period of office he should be very sorry to cast any reflection upon the manner in which the office was conducted which might prejudice him in his career of usefulness. He only wished to observe that the workhouses in Ireland were built at a time when there was much pauperism throughout the country, and built for the accommodation of young and old, and for a large number of persons who could not obtain any means of livelihood. The latter class of paupers had now disappeared, and the workhouses had become almost exclusively the home of the young and the old; and, therefore, he thought it proper that, in considering the conduct of the Poor Law administration, their attention ought to be directed to the practice of making these houses suitable for the comfort and happiness of those classes. He could not see why, in Ireland, the French system should not be adopted. Some system of the kind had been adopted in England, and it was proposed to be adopted in Scotland—namely, that old married couples, who had attained 60 years of age, should live together in the workhouse as man and wife. There could be no possible objection to permitting this, and it would only be an act of kindness on the part of the Local Government Board. There was another very great grievance to which he wished briefly to direct the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and that was the question of the hospitals. There was no doubt that the workhouse hospitals in Ireland were managed upon an exceedingly unwise principle. Lately, the Report of a very eminent Commission on Poor Law had been presented; and one of the Poor Law Inspectors, on giving his Report to the Commission, drew attention especially to the question of nurses in hospitals. In many of the Unions in Ireland, simply with a view to economy, proper nurses were not employed to attend the aged poor and the young children. At a small cost of a few additional pounds per annum the attendance of one regular nurse might be had to attend the sick. As was distinctly stated in the official Report presented to the House, at the present time women of the worst grade were made use of to attend to the sick. This was a most scandalous thing; and if it continued next year, and he had the honour of a seat in the House, he would be persistent in endeavouring to bring about a reform.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that the question as to the treatment of aged paupers had been inquired into before a Commission. He regretted that, owing to causes connected with the course of Public Business, upon which it was unnecessary for him to dwell, the Government had not been able at present to take action upon the various matters dealt with in the Report of the Commission; but this would be done as soon as it was possible; and, therefore, he trusted that the hon. Member would not find it necessary to bring this question forward another year.

MR. A. MOORE, in consideration of the recent appointment to the head of the Local Government Board in Ireland, did not wish to press his Motion to reduce the Vote by £4,000. He thought it only right that when a new official came into power he should have a fair and open field for his labours. The only other question to which he wished to call attention was the habit of overcrowding the occupants in some rooms of the workhouses, while other compartments remained empty. For instance, at Cavan, the conduct of the Guardians deserved the reprehension of every fair man.

MR. SHAW said, that the Local Government Board in Ireland was, no doubt, a most respectable Board; but he had been for some time watching their movements, and he could not understand by what principles they were guided, especially in respect to their interference with Boards of Guardians. Of course, he admitted that, in many cases, interference with Boards of Guardians was necessary, because the tendency of Boards of Guardians was to cut down expenditure wherever the poor were concerned. There ought to be some authority to compel the Guardians to do their duty towards the poor, and to this extent he approved of the intervention of the Local Government Board. But it could not be denied that orders were issued by the authorities in Dublin making all sorts of changes involving taxation, and the Guardians were coerced, whether rightly or wrongly, to carry out those orders. If the proceedings of the Local Government Board were manifestly wrong, it seemed to him that there ought to be some authority to whom the Guardians could appeal. This ought to be particularly the case in questions which involved taxation. Of course, he was told that appeal could be made to the Chief Secretary; but, then, he was a Member of the Local Government Board, and though he did not attend much to its duties he would be prejudiced in favour of its decisions. He had known cases occurring in the West of his county, where the Local Government Board had been corresponding for some time with the Poor Law Guardians concerning the establishment of a new dispensary. The establishment of such an institution was against the opinions of the Board of Guardians and the rate-payers of the district, and the action of the Local Government Board had left the arrangements of the dispensary district in the greatest possible confusion. That was only one of a large number of cases of undue interference. In the case of one town in his county, the Local Government Board carried on a correspondence with the local authorities for months with the view of compelling them to become a Local Board of Health. When, if they had looked into Thom's Almanack they would have seen the population of the place was below the required number. In other instances, the Local Government Board had interfered most irrationally. The present state of things was most unsatisfactory, and ought to receive attention at the hands of the Government. It struck him very forcibly that there ought to be some central authority to which the decisions of the Local Government Board could, if requisite, be referred. He did not see why Poor Law Guardians should not be able to appeal to the Judge of Assize. At present, the mouths of the Guardians were closed. Sealed orders came down by which, in one district, the taxation had been increased by something like 5*d.* in the pound. There was not the slightest need for it; yet there was no power of appeal.

MR. P. MARTIN trusted they would have this subject inquired into. He himself had received remonstrances from several Boards of Guardians, who considered that they had been unfairly treated by the Local Government Board. He was of opinion that the Local Government Board of Ireland, in many respects, conducted their business admirably; but, notwithstanding that opinion, he thought there should be some controlling power, so that in cases where Guardians saw fit to contest their decisions they should have the means of doing so. The Government could not, in justice, object to a power of revision and appeal being vested in some impartial body, which, sitting in the locality from which the complaint came, would investigate and determine what ought to be done. It was rather for Government than private Members to suggest the constitution of such a body; but, in his judgment, the appeal ought to be made to a more popular tribunal than the Judge of Assize. The Chief Secretary was necessarily absent for lengthened periods, and could not give the personal supervision required on the part of the Board for the more efficient working of the system; and many of those matters in dispute between the Board in Dublin and the Guardians required an examination to be had open to the public. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would listen to the remonstrances now made, and give some assurance that the grievance would be remedied.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked how it was that the English Local Government Board acted so differently towards Boards of Guardians to the Irish Board; how was it that, unlike the Irish Board, it worked in perfect unison with the wishes of the people? It was because the English Board was amenable to the House of Commons, while the Irish Board was not. The English Board was represented by a gentleman whose sole duties were connected with the Board; and in the case of Ireland the Local Government Board, and all the other Boards, were thrown on the shoulders of one man, and the Local Government Board was perfectly independent of the House of Commons. He fully agreed that there ought to be the power of appeal against the decisions of the Board, but believed that an appeal to some more popular tribunal than the Judge of Assize was necessary. They wanted an appeal to this House; and the way to give that appeal was to take the charge of the Local Government Board away from the present Chief Secretary, and place it in the hands of a gentleman who would have no other duties to perform. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) had referred to instances in which the Local Government Board in Ireland had overruled the wishes of Boards of Guardians. In the part of the country from which he (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) came this was a matter of constant occurrence. Some time ago, an addition was about to be made to the salary of the chaplain attending the large workhouse at Limerick. It had been resolved, by large majorities of the Board, to make the increase; but the Local Government Board positively refused to sanction it. In respect to the proposal to constitute the Judge of Assize a Court of Appeal, he might observe that he had always found that the tendency of the Irish Judicial Bench had been to uphold the authority of subordinate officials in Dublin. For this reason, he should certainly prefer that the appeal should be made to the House of Commons; and this could be done by a re-organization of the responsibility of the Irish Departments. He only desired to say, further, that in the confusion which prevailed with regard to the Votes for the Queen's University and Colleges several very important Irish Votes were passed, and amongst them was that for the Chief Secretary's Office. He had an Amendment on the Paper to reduce that Vote by £4,000, which he should have great pleasure in moving on Report.

MR. SYNAN did not agree with the remedy which the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) had proposed. He could understand the wisdom of appeal against the decisions of the Local Government Board; but the proposal to appeal to the Judge of Assize in matters of administration appeared to him simply incomprehensible. The root of the evil was that the Local Government Board in Ireland was not represented in the House of Commons. It was absurd for the Chief Secretary to tell them he represented the Local Government Board. It was impossible that he could attend to the administration of five Departments at one time. It was difficult to comprehend why it was that it had never occurred to the Government of this country to have such a Board as the Local Government Board of Ireland, representing all the local administration in Ireland, directly represented in the House of Commons by some Gentleman to whom appeal could be made in case of irregularity or illegality. There was no doubt that the manner in which local bodies in Ireland were treated was intolerable. Such treatment would not be tolerated by any body in England; why, therefore, should they be subjected to it in Ireland? Because they had no appeal; because there was no one to whom the Irish Members could appeal. If they appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, they found that he knew nothing about the matter. When he was asked questions he had to confer with the Local Government Board in Ireland. If they wanted the present state of things remedied, the Local Government Board of Ireland must be represented in this House, like the Local Government Board in England.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he had a Motion on the Paper having reference to the Irish Board of Works; but, probably, it would be better if he took this opportunity of mentioning to the Chief Secretary and to the House some matters of importance connected with the subject. The Local Government Board and the Board of Works in Ireland had between them the actual material government of Ireland. The Local Government Board, of course, was composed of Commissioners; and he would suggest to the Government that they should adopt, in respect to it, a course similar to that adopted in regard to the Board of Works—namely, to appoint a Departmental Committee to investigate the operations of the Board. In that way they would get a body of reliable evidence, and the public would know what the Board was doing, and what it intended to do. The recommendation which had found some favour was that the Local Government Board and the Board of Works should be so fused together that they would have one responsible head in the House of Commons. If they had a Minister in the House responsible for these Departments they would be able to ascertain what was being done, and to obviate evils which now arose without the possibility of remedy. The Local Government Board, for instance, on its own motion, had the power of fixing the qualification of Poor Law Guardians. In some districts the qualification was very low—from £7 to £8—but in other districts it was very high. In the very poorest districts in Ireland—namely, in the West—the Local Government Board was pleased, nearly 20 years ago, to raise the qualification to a higher figure than that of any other district in Ireland; and this was done because it was said that there had been some corruption about tenders for supply. Whether that was true or not he did not know; but he knew what was alleged to have happened a generation ago. The people in the neighbourhood had begged the Local Government Board to reduce the qualification to the ordinary amount in other parts of Ireland. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had himself taken a great deal of pains in this matter. Before Sir Alfred Power resigned his position on the Board he saw him on the subject, and he promised to take it into serious consideration. Nothing, however, had been done. The object of the increase of the qualification was perfectly plain. It was that the Guardians should consist only of a certain number of rich, and, principally, Protestant gentleman. This was enough to make any people discontented, and, therefore, he hoped the Chief Secretary would give the matter his serious consideration. Another matter there was which was of importance, owing to the great alterations introduced into sanitary laws of late years. The Board of Works in Ireland performed the functions of the Exchequer Loan Commissioners, and had to inquire into the security offered for any loans advanced for sanitary purposes; and the Board of Works had also the function—which, on the whole, they discharged very well—of advancing loans of money for material improvements in various parts of the country, and, for this purpose, had at their disposal an engineering staff. When the Sanitary Act was passed the Local Government Board claimed to be the authority to determine the loans for sanitary purposes. It was unwilling to have its authority trenched upon, and was unwilling to strip itself of any authority which it claimed inherently or secondarily. But the Local Government Board had no engineering staff to examine the plans submitted by applicants for loans for sanitary purposes, while the Board of Works had an engineering staff. There was thus a difficulty here; and then followed a long correspondence, and then the Local Government Board referred the point to the Treasury in London. The Treasury, after hearing the quarrel between the Boards, came to this decision. The duties of the two Boards—the Local Government and the Board of Works—in regard to sanitary loans, were decided to be the Local Government Board to recommend the loans after ascertaining the utility of the project, and to enter into the engineering merits and sufficiency of the plans, but, at the same time, to have resort to the advice of the Board of Works, who had the engineering staff competent to do the work; and to the Board of Works was allotted the duty of inquiry into the security offered by the applicants. The Local Government Board got leave to supplement their staff with an engineering officer, but they did not avail themselves of it; but it happened they had a clerk who, at some time of his life, was supposed to know something of engineering, and it was made part of his duty to examine the plans. But this examination was never carried out.

MR. J. LOWTHER explained, that an engineer had since been appointed to the Local Government Board.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY continued. That was just the point brought forward by the Committee, and it was their Report that brought these facts to light—that the Sanitary Laws were construed in the most absurd way, and many of them were utterly useless, and largely owing to the neglect of the Local Government Board. To go into the subject would be to disclose a most extraordinary state of things. The Local Government Board never examined the plans at all when loans were applied for; and, further than that, they objected to share the responsibility. They said—"We are not responsible for the loans; we are not responsible for the plans advised by the local engineers;" and yet they had been told by the Treasury they were responsible, and they themselves claimed the responsibility. When it was asked of them—"Suppose the first instalment has been advanced, and the applicants come forward for a second instalment, what security have you that the first instalment has been properly laid out?"—a sum, perhaps, of £10,000 or £20,000—"Oh," the answer was, "we have no security; we never examine into the question whether the money has been properly laid out; we assume it has been, and the locality, having got the first instalment, when it was asked for got the second instalment also." It might seem unreasonable to take up the time of the Committee with more details; but if hon. Members would take up the Report of the evidence they would find it showed an extraordinary state of things; and it was just those details that were at the bottom of half these Irish grievances. It was of no use giving support here and there, unless, in giving that support, Government would take into consideration the material advancement of the country. References were made from one Board to another, not one of which had sympathy with the popular requirements, who neglected their duty, and were responsible to no one. What responsibility was it to the Treasury? The Secretary to the Treasury was, perhaps, the hardest-worked man in the House; and with his utmost attention, and with all his grasp of mind, he could not master all the questions relating to sanitary loans; and he submitted that a case had been made out for inquiry into the constitution and administration of the Local Government Board in Ireland.

MR. VERNER did not think that either of the two propositions which had been put forward—namely, an appeal to a Judge, or an official directly responsible for the Board in that House, would remedy the matters complained of; nor did he believe it would be advisable to accede to them. The Local Government Board often did what he disapproved of, and he had been nursing his wrath for some time against it on account of some flagrant misdeeds; but after hearing the complaints from the other side of the House, some of them being directed against the Board for following in certain cases a policy which he (Mr. Verner) agreed with and considered to be the right one, he said that there were undoubtedly two sides to the question, and that the Local Government Board had a very hard task before them, which, in the main, was creditably and satisfactorily fulfilled. With regard to the proposal to send another Irish official to sit on the Bench below him, he thought that, looking at the life led by the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General for Ireland, proverbially brave as Irishmen might be, an Irish gentleman would hesitate to accept such a position.

MR. CALLAN hoped that the same course would not be followed in reference to the Local Government Board as was adopted with the Board of Works two years ago. He was himself invited to go before that Departmental Committee; but, knowing something of such inquiries, he refused, and the result had justified his apprehensions. The Committee took a large amount of evidence, and they made their Report; but the Government had done nothing upon the

commendations of that Report, and absolutely the time occupied in giving evidence was wasted public time, and money had been expended without result. He hoped that any mode of dealing with the Local Government Board would be shorter, sharper, and more decisive. With reference to raising qualifications of Poor Law Guardians, there was a sliding scale provided in the Act; and he, for one, would move the qualification for Guardians being placed much higher than it was at present. He should say the qualification of voters should be reduced, and that of Guardians raised. He should like to hear the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) explain whether, the Unions to which he had referred, was the practice to admit, as ex-officio Guardians, men who had no qualifications? There were too many instances of this, and it conducted very much to the encouragement of jobbery. He did not think that any moderate man would like to see the qualifications for Guardians reduced at present. With reference to the Local Government Board, he hoped the re-constitution of the Board of Works would be an example to follow. At the head of the latter an Irishman had been substituted for an Englishman, a change which had given much satisfaction. In the action of the Local Government Board in refusing to accede to the desire of Guardians to have salaries there was much reason to complain. There had been a wave of passion all over Ireland, and in the Union of Dundalk the Guardians had most unanimously decided to reduce the salaries of their officers all round some 7½ per cent. But the proposition was refused, and the Board in Dublin declined to give a deputation any reason for the refusal; they simply declined to allow any of the salaries to be reduced. In the same county another Board of Guardians went to the Local Government Board; but, perhaps, because they made the application in more humble terms, it was acceded to. In Dundalk, however, in the face of an almost unanimous vote, it was refused. This was a point upon which there should be some explanation, some reason assigned as guiding the Board in its decision. But in not having a representative of the Local Government Board in the House, it would be a most unfortunate arangement. Such an official would be much better employed doing his duty in Ireland than in sitting in the House and voting en bloc with the other Members of the Government. It would be of great advantage if, during the winter Recess, the Chief Secretary for Ireland went over and attended some of the meetings of the Local Government Board, with a view to make himself acquainted with the manner in which business was conducted. He was certain that if the right hon. Gentleman did so his natural sense of justice would compel them to exercise a wise controlling power, and give reasons for the decisions which he was obliged to uphold in that House.

MR. GRAY said, he was not aware of any reasons for retaining the existing qualifications for Guardians of the poor. The qualification formerly required of Members of that House had been abolished; and if they had abolished it in one case he did not see why they should retain it in another. But with reference to the Local Government Board, it was a question that had engaged attention for years past. For four or five years Irish Members had been pleading for an inquiry into the constitution and management of the Board. For a long time they had urged the same thing with regard to the Board of Works, and the same reasons for resisting that inquiry were made as were now made in regard to the Local Government Board. The Departmental Committee which at last inquired into the Board of Works did its work admirably. It was a most useful Committee, and no blame attached to them because their recommendations had not been carried out by the Government. They had collected an amount of evidence which must be valuable when the re-organization came. He was convinced that equally good reasons could be shown for re-organizing the Local Government Board; and there was no reason why inquiry should be deferred Session after Session. This Board possessed the most extensive and arbitrary powers. It really had a power of veto over every sanitary authority in Ireland. The entire administration of the Public Health Act—which was one of the most important Acts ever passed for any country—was subject to the ulterior supervision of the Local Government Board, which had a veto upon every action of every sanitary authority, and also had the power of initiating, if the sanitary authority did not think fit to carry out certain measures. But the Local Government Board had not a third as much knowledge of sanitary matters as the authorities over whom they exercised control, and sometimes issued the most ridiculous directions. For instance, during the small pox epidemic in Dublin, they insisted that the Dublin authorities should provide extra conveyances, although the latter showed that they were not required, and would not be used. However, they were obliged to submit to a compulsory letter, and cabs were provided at a cost of £100 to the ratepayers, and were not used twice. In many other cases the powers of the Board had been exercised in an arbitrary and a ridiculous fashion. How was the Board constituted up to three months ago? Its President was the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and an ex-officio member of the Board was the Under Secretary. These they might take as two ornamental members of the Board, who did that duty admirably; but neither of them took any very active part in the administration of the Board, and, in fact, they could not be expected to do so. Then there was the Vice President of the Board, Sir Alfred Power, an officer who had done good work in his day; but who, it was admitted, had become incapable of discharging the duties, and, in fact, had only retained his office until he had secured his son in a lucrative position. That having been secured, he retired, and it would have been better had he done so 10 years before. He had served for 40 years, and during the last six or eight years of his tenure of office was unfit to be the head of the Department and for the duties intrusted to him. He was assisted by another member of the Board—the Hon. Mr. Bellew—but who did nothing but sign formal documents and draw his salary. Then there was the Medical Commissioner, Dr. Croker King; but what effective work had he initiated in sanitary reform? The real work of the Board, then, was vested in the Vice President. He acknowledged that the successor of Sir Alfred Power was a gentleman thoroughly competent for that position. He did not think that the Government could possibly have made a better appointment than that of Mr. Robinson, and he had no doubt that that gentleman would discharge the duties admirably; but even with his advice and assistance the Board was not strong enough to have the public confidence, when they held the power of veto over the Dublin Corporation, and other local authorities in whom the public had every confidence. They might make a good appointment now and again; but there never would be a satisfactory system until the Board was made responsible to the public. The Chief Secretary could do no more than, when questions were put to him, send to Dublin for replies and act as the mouthpiece of the Board. Why, a Secretary to the Treasury could do this quite as well. In the first place, to command confidence, the Board should be composed of gentlemen of high position; and, in the next place, it should be directly represented in the House. This was not merely his own view, but the opinion of the majority who had thought upon the subject in connection with the administration of the Public Health Act, and in view of the appeal made year after year there certainly ought to be an inquiry into the Office. Only after such an inquiry would public confidence be created by the re-establishment of the Board in a position and under a system to facilitate useful reforms. The result of the inquiry into the Board of Works justified a similar inquiry into the Local Government Board.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Vernon) was very much mistaken in supposing that it was suggested, or in any way wanted, to add to the number of Her Majesty's Ministers another, charged with the duty of looking after the Board. There was an Irish Lord of the Treasury, the Member for Enniskillen (Viscount Crichton), who had nothing whatever to do; and it was supposed that, in order to occupy his leisure, he would be given charge of the Board of Works—probably at the Greek Kalends. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had shown the communication between the two Boards. Now, what was to prevent the noble Lord the Member for Enniskillen taking charge of these two Boards, and coming to the House responsible for its action, and prepared to explain it? This was a way of remedying the grievance, without adding another to the existing number of Irish places. If they wanted to make these bodies really useful, what they ought to do was to give them an elective character; but, in the absence of this, the best thing they could do was to make use of the noble Lord whom they were keeping in petto here.

MR. MELDON said, that the general complaint was not that the Local Government Board had too many powers, but that it exercised the powers it possessed in a very arbitrary manner. There was nothing more demanded of Irish Members than that they should insist upon a reform of this power. It not only put aside, in the most peremptory manner, the wishes of all who were carrying on the work of the Poor Law, but it actually endeavoured to set itself above the law. For instance, while the Public Health Act of 1878 was before the House, a question arose as to the insertion of certain provisions. Sir Alfred Power strongly objected to these, and fought out his case with the late Chief Secretary and the Attorney General. But the House, after giving full consideration to the matter, approved of the statements made by himself and other Irish Members, and inserted them in the Act. There were two things of which great complaint was made. First, the mode of payment of medical officers, which was by scale, the result being that men got exactly the same whether they had no duties, or whether all their time was taken up. That was very irregular, and very wrong, yet Sir Alfred Power wished to adhere to that provision; and, though he was beaten, he refused to alter the scale of payment or to carry out the provisions of the Act. Now, he wished to know whether the Local Government Board, under its new Vice President, would still insist on thus setting the law at naught, and acting on the provisions of the Act of 1874, which had been repealed. There were one or two other points in which he took great interest. First, there was the Vaccine Department. He had brought this question before the House in 1874 and 1875, when he pointed out that although, for the purposes of the Vaccine Lymph Institution, the Local Government Board in England had a Vote of £20,200, in Ireland but £600 was voted. He admitted that, owing to persistent agitation, the £600 had been now doubled; but even that was a very small sum, and complaints were frequent that the supplies of lymph in Ireland were not sufficient, that the means for vaccination were inadequate, and that the number of applications refused were considerable, as they had recently had an epidemic of small-pox in Dublin; and, therefore, he hoped that this matter would be attended to, and that in future, at any rate, the supply would be unlimited, and that every medical man would have all he required. Beyond the £20,200 given to England for the gratuitous distribution of lymph, £16,000 was given by way of bonuses for successful vaccination, and the consequence was that in England the system had been brought to great perfection. There was no public vaccinator in England who did not do what he could to prevent small-pox. No similar sums were given in Ireland. It was surely as important to prevent small-pox in Ireland as it was in England, and he asked how they could account for the marked disparagement in the different grants? They had received a promise that the new Vice President would look into this matter, or, otherwise, he certainly should have felt inclined to move a reduction of the Vote. The matter deserved the immediate attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, the Government had this Session introduced a Bill which they were most anxious to pass dealing with the question of vaccination in Ireland. The hon. and learned Gentleman had an Amendment against that Bill, which he very considerably withdrew, and if others imitated his example he believed they would be in a fair way of getting their Bill. However, if hon. Members availed themselves of their right to move Amendments, it would not be the fault of the Government if the measure did not pass into law. As regarded the medical officers, he believed a satisfactory arrangement had been concluded. His experience as Secretary of the former Poor Law Board of England would not justify the comparisons which had been drawn between the administration of local government affairs in England and in Ireland, and it frequently happened in England that the central authority did run counter to the decisions of the local Boards of Guardians. The President of the Local Government Board, like his Predecessor, the President of the Poor Law Board, was the head of the Office, and those influential gentlemen whose names figured as belonging to the Board did not exist for purposes of administration. The President had his secretary and staff, and was, for all practical purposes, the Board. Then, it had been said that the Chief Secretary was merely the mouthpiece of the Board in Dublin. Well, first of all, it had been said that the Board in Dublin did not exist, and then that he was merely its mouthpiece. He would remind the Committee that it was his duty, when inquiries were made, to represent the Department in Parliament, and very often, where he had no personal knowledge, he could not make statements to the House unless his information were derived from the Department in Ireland; and that information, in turn, was derived from references to localities in different parts of Ireland. To that extent he was the mouthpiece of the clerk collecting the information. Nevertheless, as he was President of the Local Government Board, he considered himself responsible for that Department. Then it was said the Board was arbitrary. Well, it was true that they did object to children suffering from cutaneous diseases being placed together in one bed; and when their attention was called to a matter of that kind they did think it their duty to make representation to the local authorities. Again, they thought it was a very undesirable system to transport small-pox patients in ordinary hackney carriages; and when they were asked about it the Board did think it was a very proper matter to represent to the local authorities. As to sanitary works, the Local Government Board had recently appointed an engineer, who was a gentleman of some eminence in Ireland; and though he would not forestall the discussion on the Vote for the Board of Works, it would be found, when it came on, that a general re-organization was contemplated.

MR. A. MOORE said, that the right hon. Gentleman had given no assurance that he would look into the case of the local hospitals.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the discussion had taken so wide a turn that he had overlooked the question of the hon. Member. He had done so quite unintentionally, and he could assure the hon. Gentleman the matter should have his best attention.

MR. SHAW said, he did not believe any change could be made in the Local Government Board which would be satisfactory. It did not matter what head was put on it, if its body and whole constitution remained the same. If, however, the new Vice President, who was to investigate it, were to enlarge it in some directions, and limit it in others, they might get a really good Board. The right hon. Gentleman had not said whether he would grant the Commission of Inquiry. He was himself no opponent of Parliamentary representation of Departments, because it brought those Departments under the control of public opinion; but he did not believe that that House was a very good place for the redress of grievances which arose in the administration of Local Government Boards. They were too far off the people of Ireland in that House to hear the voice of their complaints; and even if it reached them there they could not interpret the complaints to the House, and even if they did the House would not take it as the public voice of Ireland. The things referred to might seem small; but they were very considerable matters to the ratepayers, and they interfered very greatly with the working of the Boards and of the Poor Law Guardians. They caused constant and endless irritation and friction, and they brought about a waste of time and correspondence which ought never to be initiated. He suggested that there should be some mode of appeal—some outside body—to whom the Guardians, if they thought they were aggrieved, could go in matters of discussion. He did not, as a general rule, like lawyers; but when barristers did come to be Judges they somehow managed to put off a great part of the evils which beset them during their career, and became, on the Bench, men of remarkable common sense, and with great knowledge of the country. He suggested, then, that there should be some power given to make a presentment to the Grand Jury; and, if they endorsed it, that the matter should come before the Judge. At any rate, if the right hon. Gentleman would not accept this, he hoped he would institute some sort of outside body to which the Guardians could appeal.

Mr. J. Lowther

MR. MELDON pointed out, that the Vaccination Bill which the Government had introduced had nothing whatever to do with the question he had raised. Here, in England, medical men were paid from 1s. 6d. to 3s. from the local rates; while up to the present time in Ireland the uniform fee was 1s. Besides this contribution from the local rates, there was a grant from the Imperial Exchequer of £16,000, which also was given to the medical officers. He might be told, of course, that that was done under an Act of Parliament; but he did not see why the Chief Secretary could not introduce a similar Bill for Ireland.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN remarked, there was not one of them who, when they went home to their district, did not hear of some differences which had arisen in the Poor Law administration which had been referred to the Local Government Board, about which great discontent had arisen. He would put it to the Government whether, when such a feeling existed, they should not attempt to remove it in the fairest possible way by full, complete, and independent inquiry? He could conceive nothing more desirable than to remove the sense of grievance widely spread among the people, even although there was no grievance to justify it. As to what had been said with reference to Sir Alfred Power, he had had the honour of enjoying his friendship for many years; and though he did not say he was infallible, yet, having watched his action on the Board for many years, he did believe that the people of Ireland owed him a debt of gratitude for his care in the administration of the Poor Law, and his desire to do what was right and just to all classes of society.

MR. GRAY explained, that he made no attack on Sir Alfred Power, and what he had said did not prevent him agreeing with the remarks of the hon. Baronet (Sir Patrick O'Brien). He thoroughly recognized his services, and believed he was an admirable Poor Law administrator for a long time; he did not think it was any imputation on his character or ability to say that, after serving 35 years in a very laborious office, he might, with advantage to himself and his office, have retired. He might, if he had chosen, have retired long before; and what he maintained was that Sir Alfred Power kept his post in order to get his son nominated to a very lucrative office. Since that was done he had retired, and he believed that was why he had not retired before.

MR. RYLANDS, without interfering in the discussion, would just remark that Irish Members had not a monopoly of grievance with regard to centralization, and that this complaint of the central administration over-riding local boards was by no means creating irritation in Ireland alone; it was creating great irritation in England also, and it was a matter which the House of Commons would do well seriously to consider, whether, in some way or another, there could not be a system of decentralization adopted which would secure in these localities the exercise of public spirit, and the fulfilment of public duties by many gentlemen who at present shrank from office in consequence of the interference of the central body. It seemed to him that the request for an inquiry into the complaints of the Boards of Guardians was not an unreasonable one. He gathered, from the statement made by his hon. Friend (Mr. Gray), that the inquiry into the management of the Board of Works had had the effect of bringing under the notice of Government some important information; and he should, therefore, certainly be disposed to support his hon. Friend in urging the Government to inquire into the administration of the Local Government Board.

MR. J. LOWTHER could fully endorse what had been said with regard to the important services rendered by Sir Alfred Power. During the great Famine crisis, as was well known, he rendered signal services to the country, and he was very glad that it should go forth that there was only one opinion as to the extent to which they were indebted to him. It had been suggested that an inquiry, analogous to that which took place in regard to the Board of Works, might be held with regard to the Local Government Board. He thought, however, that the circumstances of the two Departments were very different; and as a new Vice President of the Local Government Board had just been appointed, he would ask him at once to turn his attention to the various matters of which complaint had been made, while the effect of an inquiry would merely be to hang the whole matter up for a very considerable time. Instead of waiting for an inquiry outside the Department, therefore, it appeared to him that the Government should conduct an inquiry itself, and the result of the consideration of those matters had already been that improvement in certain directions had taken place—for instance, the appointment of an engineer, which would enable them to exercise a far more efficient superintendence over the advances to Local Boards than was formerly the case. Various minor grievances had also been engaging his attention, and he hoped they would be satisfactorily dealt with. A general revision of the respective duties of the two Boards had also occupied attention, and he would not forestall the discussion by stating all that was proposed to be done. The appeal from the Local Government Board to some unnamed tribunal did not appear to satisfy anybody, and it only showed the difficulty of forming such a body, with reference to which he might point out that there was no such tribunal in England. He was induced to agree with the remarks of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) with regard to decentralization. He was himself very shy of interfering with local self-government, and never approved of so doing whenever it could possibly be avoided. He hoped, however, that the Committee would not, on an Irish Vote, propose to go into a general discussion on a subject of that sort. If there were any practical abuses they were prepared to deal with them, without the assistance of any Committee of Inquiry, which assurance he trusted would satisfy the Committee.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN did not intend to go into the question of decentralization, but wished to say that he did not agree with the action of the Government in making a departmental inquiry. What they wanted was that a full, searching, and public inquiry should be made into the allegation that the people were hardly treated. He did not say that they were so treated; but what he wanted to impress upon the Government was that the case was such that a general and independent inquiry should have been made. He hoped the Chief Secretary would consider whether an inquiry of a public character could not be carried out.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the remarks of the Chief Secretary did not contain any satisfactory answer to the complaints that had been made. At the same time, he admitted that there was very great difficulty in suggesting any scheme which would meet the want. The question was—what was to be the appeal from an important Department of that sort? The appeal could only be to Parliament. There was really no other body which could decide upon appeals from so important a Department as the Local Government Board. But those appeals could not come to that House, because the vast majority of the Members were so utterly out of harmony with Irish opinion, and were necessarily so ignorant with regard to local circumstances in Ireland, that the appeal must be quite nugatory. He would not enter on the Home Rule question by a side wind; but they could not shut their eyes to the fact that there could be no appeal worthy attention from that Department, except to Parliament. While there could not be an appeal from the Board to the Imperial Parliament, because this House had neither the faculties nor the power, to say nothing of the inclination, to deal with these local affairs. They could, therefore, have no appeal except to an Irish Parliament, which was the only solution of the question. Hon. Members, before long, would be taxing their ingenuity how to provide a proper body to which appeals might be made on matters of Irish local interest; and he did not care what they called their plan, as they would have to come to the scheme of an Irish Parliament in the long run. He had a very grave complaint to make as to the decision of this Irish Department, and he was compelled to bring it before that House, although it was notoriously incapable of dealing with the subject, and they knew the opinion of that House was not worth the turn of a halfpenny, and that the vast majority of the 658 hon. Members did not know too much about England and Scotland, to say nothing of Ireland. He was obliged to take the only course open to him, and was obliged to raise this very important question on this Vote. He was quite aware that nine-tenths of the Gentlemen listening to him did not know anything about it, and did not want to know anything about it, and that when he had done the Chief Secretary would not be much wiser than he was at the present moment. The Chief Secretary depended on a number of officials for his information, these very officials being the gentlemen against whom he was appealing. It was all very well to talk about obstruction; but just look at the way in which his business was obstructed. He was bound to bring this matter forward, although his clients would get no satisfaction whatever, and the Office in Dublin would go on unrebuked, unchecked, and unconvicted. It would be a legislative farce, and yet he must go through the farce. He complained of the Department for refusing to grant a fuller and more impartial inquiry when the first inquiry was challenged on the very strongest grounds. He should, therefore, propose to reduce the Vote by £700, the salary of the Inspector of whom he complained. That gentleman, Mr. Hamilton, recently conducted an inquiry into a disputed election in Cardendonogh, Inneshowen, in the county of Donegal. There were two candidates, Mr. B. O'Doherghy, and Mr. Ackland. The result was to return the former by a large number of votes. Complaint was made that the majority was fictitious, and that of a very large number of votes entered there was not the least guarantee that they were given. Mr. Ackland had been the member for several years; he was a general favourite, and a careful and economical Guardian; and they had every reason to believe he would be re-elected. The Local Government Board ordered an inquiry, and Mr. Hamilton was sent down. He certainly gave satisfaction to a very considerable extent, for he struck off a great number of votes; but it was contended that he conducted the investigation in such a manner that, notwithstanding the deductions, he still allowed many invalid votes to remain. It was pointed out that in several of the cases where pluralist votes had been wrongly given, instead of condemning all as illegal, he would strike one or two off out of the number, although, surely, if a vote was illegal, the whole paper was necessarily invalid. It was utterly incomprehensible how Mr. Hamilton was able to discriminate between these votes. In a lot of six, for instance, he would eliminate two, and not invalidate the other four. Again, a large number of illiterate votes were objected to, because they were illegally marked, and the Inspector allowed some to be illegal, but permitted others to remain. It was very clearly and distinctly provided that in the case of illiterate votes a mark must be placed on the paper and attested by a witness. In a multitude of these cases no such attestation had been made. Yet Mr. Hamilton, in the most extraordinary manner, allowed some of the votes, but also refused to allow some of his own mistakes to be corrected. Again, other witnesses showed that the marks had been entered in their absence, and without their consent, yet Mr. Hamilton refused to hear those protests. There were other circumstances of this kind, all of which showed that a further inquiry was necessary, and he could not at all understand why it had been refused. This complaint had created great public indignation in the county, and had excited much attention, but he did not suppose hon. Members cared about it one penny. It was, of course, a solemn sham to bring this matter before the House of Commons; but as long as the present system continued, he was obliged to do so.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £4,200, for Salaries of Inspectors, be reduced by £700."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

MR. J. LOWTHER said, in reply to the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), that Mr. Hamilton, who conducted the inquiry to which attention had been called, was a very able member of the staff of the Local Government Board. The hon. Member had said that the same amount of disappointment would be felt by a person who was unsuccessful in his endeavours to obtain the appointment of Poor Law Guardian, through the decision of Mr. Hamilton, as would be felt by any gentleman who might unsuccessfully aspire to Membership of the House of Commons. The answer to that was that the gentleman selected to inquire into this election was in every way fitted for that duty. There was no doubt that every attempt had been made by him to arrive at a just conclusion, and that substantial justice had been done in this matter. He had no objection to the hon. Member bringing before the House any matter with which it was competent to deal; but he thought it desirable that the Committee should confine itself to questions of general supervision. The Petition for the re-hearing of the case referred to was, in his opinion, uncalled for.

MR. BIGGAR thought the reply of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was unsatisfactory, inasmuch as it did not, in the slightest degree, go into the merits of the case, nor explain upon what grounds the action of Mr. Hamilton was to be defended. He (Mr. Biggar) regarded it as a matter of very serious importance that persons should have denied point blank that the signatures to the voting papers were not theirs, and that Mr. Hamilton had not attempted to find out the names of the parties whose names appeared upon those papers as witnesses. He had known of a case of election as Poor Law Guardians, in which certain persons were prosecuted and severely punished for forging the names of persons on the voting papers. For these reasons, he could not help thinking, that if the statements of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) were correct, Mr. Hamilton had thoroughly neglected his duties in the matter of the Cardendonogh election of Poor Law Guardians, and he considered the hon. Member was bound to divide the Committee on his Motion, unless some satisfactory explanation were forthcoming. The point raised by the hon. Member was a vital one, and ought not to have been decided by an irresponsible person. And if the allegation were true, that the person whose name appeared on the voting paper declared that he had not signed it, the Government should certainly not attempt to screen the guilty parties.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he intended to take a Division upon this Vote, although he knew that he should be opposed by an overwhelming number of hon. Gentlemen who knew nothing, and cared nothing, about the Poor Law election in Cardendonogh. The Chief Secretary for Ireland himself knew nothing about it, and, very naturally, had given no answer whatever to the complaint made. If such a case had occurred in England, and, upon reference being made thereto in the House of Commons, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had returned an answer similar to that which had just been given by the Chief Secretary for Ireland—namely, that the officer whose conduct had been complained of was a very valuable member of the staff—such a fire of indignant eloquence would have followed as would have perturbed that singularly calm and composed official. Even if the Chief Secretary for Ireland knew more than he did about the case in question, his observations upon it would be thrown away upon the hon. Gentlemen by whom he was surrounded. He felt that in dividing the Committee the division would be taken in the dark; that not five Members would understand anything about the point raised; and that his Amendment would be thrown out in a way that would be typical of all legislation relating to Ireland. He would remind the Committee that the satisfactory working of legislation as a whole depended upon the proper working of its parts; and that, although the complaints brought forward by him might be sneered at by hon. Members as microscopic, the Government which was not fitted to endure microscopic examination was undeserving of support. He was almost inclined to hope that he should get no following into the Lobby, because that would be a result typical of the utter uselessness of bringing before the British Parliament complaints which it was never constituted to deal with.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 8; Noes 141: Majority 133.—(Div. List, No. 196.)

MR. BIGGAR reminded the Chief Secretary for Ireland of a Question which he had addressed to him on a former occasion with regard to the contracts for coals made by the Local Government Board; and suggested that if the right hon. Gentleman would undertake to send down an Inspector to inquire into the circumstances complained of, he (Mr. Biggar) would not trouble the Committee with any further remarks upon the subject of the coal contracts. Failing that assurance, he would be obliged to take a Division with regard to this question.

MR. J. LOWTHER, upon general grounds, thought it desirable to remove any suspicion which might exist concerning the contracts for coal, and would, therefore, promise that an Inspector ould be sent down to inquire into the subject.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question processed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £23,007, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Public Works in Ireland."

MR. MITCHELL HENRY regretted that he would be compelled to move the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £1,500, being the salary of the Chairman of the Board. The subject he was about to deal with was a large one; but he would endeavour to be as brief as possible in the remarks which he had to make. First of all, he would express his regret that the Forms of the House left no other course open to him than to treat this matter, to a certain extent, as a personal one. But he was bound also to state his honest belief that so long as the present Chairman of the Board of Works remained in office it would be impossible that the Department should be efficiently and satisfactorily administered. The Irish Board of Works had been the subject of discussion in the House of Commons for many years; and, owing to the great number of duties which it had to perform, nothing analogous to it existed in this country. Unlike the Board of Works in England, it acted as a body which advanced money for all kinds of works in Ireland; it discharged duties relating to Exchequer loans, and the planning and surveys of railways, as well as numerous other functions. It had also under its control an annual expenditure of no less than £200,000, and furniture of the value of £500,000. Without going into the history of the Department at any length, he would remind the Committee that the Board of Works had grown in a very extraordinary manner since it was first originated, in 1831. The Irish Parliament had been alive to the importance of improving the inland navigation of the country, and the English Government also took up the subject in 1831, and appointed a Board of Works with very large powers, consisting of three Commissioners and a staff to perform duties with regard to fisheries, and the very extensive public works then going on in Ireland. The Committee had heard of the Shannon Commissioners, a body that was perfectly separate and distinct from the Board of Works, and who, to some extent, had improved the inland navigation. Now, the Shannon Commissioners having reported that their works were nearly at an end, Parliament, in 1846, dissolved that body, and merged them into the Board of Works. That point was very important. One of the Shannon Commissioners was appointed a member of the Board of Works, and two Commissioners of the Board were appointed to see to the conservancy and maintenance of the Shannon. Everyone knew that there had been an enormous amount of trouble connected with the navigation of that river, which was constantly overflowing its banks and inundating large tracts of the adjacent country; and that the works to be executed by the Shannon Commissioners were laid down by Act of Parliament, after an expensive process of inquiry, by English and Irish engineers. But he asserted that those works were never carried out in the way directed by the Act; and that, in some instances, deviations were made of the most injudicious character. The greatest deviation, however, was that the works had never been completed. The Committee would recollect that every two or three years complaints had been made with regard to the state of the River Shannon; and that hon. Members who had to put them forward in the House could never get any satisfactory answers to these complaints, because of the impossibility of fixing any body with the responsibility for what had occurred. The Board of Works into which the Shannon Commissioners merged, in 1851, said truly—"We had nothing to do with the drainage of the Shannon; we are not responsible; and we will not give any information as to whether these works have been properly executed or not." The Shannon Commissioners, in the most adroit manner, evaded their responsibility by constantly making a separate Report, distinct from that of the Board of Works, although they had been dissolved by Act of Parliament. The fact was, that in all the complaints made to the House of Commons Parliament had had to do with a phantom Commission. Originally, the Board of Works consisted of five Commissioners, which number at length sunk down to three, the minimum according to the Act of Parliament. In 1864 the Chief Commissioner — Sir Richard Griffith — a very distinguished man, and who had recently died at the age of 90 years, retired from office; and whilst he was in retirement there remained only two Commissioners on the Board, a number insufficient to fulfil the requirements of the Act of Parliament. In order, however, to keep within the letter of the law, Sir Richard Griffith was made an 'honorary Commissioner; and since that time, whenever complaints had been made in the House of Commons as to the inability of the two Commissioners to discharge their duties, and as to there being no Board meetings, the answer of the Chief Secretary for Ireland had always been that — "The Board had the inestimable advantage of the opinion of Sir Richard Griffith, that distinguished man who knows everything, and takes an active part in the duties of the Board." Would the Committee believe that Sir Richard Griffith, although he had been vouched for by the Chief Secretaries for Ireland as taking an active part in these duties, had never, since the day of his retirement in 1864, entered the Office, and that he had never been asked a question, or in any way consulted by the Commissioners of the Board of Works? Of course, he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) knew that the Chief Secretary for Ireland of the time thoroughly believed in the truth of his statements to the House in this respect; but the facts were elicited in evidence before the Committee of 1877, that Sir Richard Griffith had never entered the Office since the day of his retirement, and that he had never had one single point put before him. One of the consequences of this was that the Board of Works kept no minutes of its proceedings, for it was found out by the Committee that no minutes had been kept by the Board Secretary for nearly 14 years. When the Chairman of the Board of Works was asked about this, he said that he had never known of any minute book ever having been kept; while the cross-examination of the Secretary as to what had become of the minute book was of the most amusing description. The fact, however, was that, as long as the Board was properly constituted, minutes were kept by the Secretary, and duly signed by him and the Commissioners on the Board;

but for some years after the retirement of Sir Richard Griffith they were kept very irregularly, being in some instances not signed at all. Since then the Board had never acted as a Board of Works; no minutes had been kept; and the Commissioners themselves were actually ignorant that there were any minute books. The Committee was familiar with the complaints made against the Board of Works two years ago, and with the fact that the Chief Secretary, who was himself very much dissatisfied with the state of affairs, had, in consequence of these complaints, promised that a Committee should be appointed to go thoroughly into the question of this administration. Accordingly, in 1877, a Departmental Committee was appointed by the Treasury, consisting of the noble Lord the Member for Enniskillen (Viscount Crichton), the hon. Member for Carlow County (Mr. Kavanagh), the Hon. Charles Freemantle, Deputy Master of the Mint, Mr. Herbert Murray, Treasury Remembrancer in Ireland, and himself (Mr. Mitchell Henry). The Treasury also appointed, as Secretary to this Committee, Mr. W. E. Hamilton, with whose ability he believed every Member of the Committee was deeply impressed. It might, naturally, be supposed that he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had not entered on the proceedings of that Committee with a strong impression that much good would result from the inquiry; and owing to the official element in it being so large, he certainly did think that there would be difficulty in making the investigation as thorough as he wished it to be. But he believed that never had there been a Committee composed of men more anxious to elicit truth than that Committee. The hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) had spoken, some little time ago, very slightly of the labours of the Committee, and, amongst other things, had charged them with having wasted a good deal of public time; but, certainly, no such charge could be fairly brought, for the Committee sat for considerably less time than three weeks, day by day, and all day. The hon. Member was one of those who were most loud in their complaints against the Board, although he hinted at more than he stated concerning it; but when the Committee, as a first step, asked for the assistance of hon. Members who made complaints, they could get no answer at all from the hon. Member for Dundalk, who would not come forward. This circumstance was referred to in the Report of the Committee in the following terms:—

“We should mention that we specially invited two Members of Parliament, who had taken a prominent part in those discussions last Session, to come forward to assist our inquiry; but one declined our offer, and the other took no notice of it.”

Therefore, he thought that no notice should be taken of what was stated by the hon. Member for Dundalk. The Report of the Committee was produced in June, 1878; and although they were now in July, 1879, nothing whatever had been done in this matter. Hon. Members had stimulated the Government by Questions, and they had been informed that the subject was coming on; but he was convinced that nothing would be done unless the House put some pressure upon the Government. This was not the first inquiry which had been held upon the Board of Works, for in 1871 the Government now out of Office appointed a Committee of Inquiry, at the head of which was Lord Lansdowne, and that Committee made a very important Report. But what became of that Report? That would be seen from the Report of the Committee, of which he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) was a Member, which said—

“In the course of our inquiries we had occasion to make frequent reference, as was contemplated in our instructions, to the Report made by Lord Lansdowne's Committee in 1872, and we must express our surprise at the way in which it was dealt with by the Chairman. Though your Lordship's instructions respecting it were communicated to the Board in a formal printed minute, which was made an official record, yet the Report itself, upon which the minute was framed, and without which it could hardly be properly understood, was retained by the Chairman as a confidential document. We found that the Report had never been communicated by him to the Assistant Commissioner, or any of the officers of the Department, and that, as regards the general administration of the Office, it has, for all practical purposes, remained a dead letter. We cannot think that this was the intention of your Lordships, or that the course taken by the Chairman has been conducive to public interests.”

That was the way in which the Report of Lord Lansdowne's Committee was dealt with. But the House had been further bamboozled over this Report; because when it became known that this important Committee had reported, Questions began to be asked about it in the House of Commons, and the Secretary to the Treasury, in answer to one of them, said—

“That the Report examined a very wide field, and had been referred to a Committee, owing to a difference of opinion between the Chairman of the Committee and the Chairman of the Board. . . . but that the Treasury had now come to a decision on the subject, and it was on the point of being carried out.”

That recommendation had never been carried out at all; it had never even been communicated to the Colleagues of the Chairman; and it had never been communicated to the noble Lord in his Office; and it was found out, by the Committee of 1877, that the Report in question had been allowed to remain a dead letter, and, he must add, treated in a very contemptuous and improper manner, by being put into the pocket of the Chairman and allowed to remain without any notice whatever being taken of it. Under those circumstances, and in view of a great many other points which came before them, the Committee found it to be their duty to make a recommendation, which he was obliged to refer to at some length. When the Committee remembered of whom the Committee was composed, they would see that it was not at all likely that any direct recommendation would be made for the retirement of the Chairman of the Board of Works, unless under a sense of deep responsibility. The Committee, therefore, wrapped up the intimation as delicately as they could at the end of their Report in this way—

“We hope that the recommendations already made will more effectually secure to the public the advantages intended by the Legislature; and that they will, in great measure, remedy the defects in the administration of the Board. At the same time, we feel that the Head of this important Department should possess unusual administrative abilities; that he should command your Lordships' entire confidence by a vigorous and comprehensive grasp of the subjects with which he is called upon to deal; and that he should be able, both in his recommendations to the Treasury and in his communications with the public, to enforce his views with authority. Nothing can be farther from our intention than to deprecate the merits of the present Chairman, or detract from the value of his long and (we may add) distinguished public services. Nothing can exceed the zeal with which he has applied himself to his work, or the conscientious industry which he has brought to bear upon it. It is possible, however, that after so long a period of service, rendered peculiarly arduous in consequence of the incomplete constitution of the Board, he may now feel unequal to the strain which our view of the responsibilities, if approved by your Lordships, would necessarily entail, so as to enable him to do full justice to himself, as well as to the Department; and, if so, while regretting that the Board should be deprived of the advantage of his great experience, we think that he should be afforded an opportunity of retiring, and that a special pension should be secured to him."

Such was the delicate recommendation that the Chairman should quit office. This portion, however, of the Report was dissented from by the noble Lord the Member for Enniskillen (Viscount Crichton), who appended to the Report the following statement:—

"I regret I am unable to concur in the recommendation contained in paragraph 324 above, which I cannot but regard as equivalent to an intimation that the retirement of the Chairman is desirable. While I have not hesitated, in the course of the Report, to join in the censure passed on the action of the Board in certain respects, and for which Colonel McKerlie, in his capacity as Chairman, must be regarded as responsible; still, on the whole of the evidence submitted to us, I cannot see sufficient grounds to warrant such a reflection upon his management of the business of the Board, and I should be glad to think that the advantage of his great experience and intimate acquaintance with the duties of the Office should be preserved to the Department in the future."

The Treasury, in his opinion, should have taken into account the persons from whom this recommendation in favour of the retirement of the Chairman emanated; and he thought that the Treasury ought by that time to have read their evidence, and to have ascertained whether or not there existed good grounds for intimating to the Chairman that he should retire. For his own part, he was fully convinced, though he regretted to say it, that the Board could not be efficient if the present Chairman was not succeeded by some officer who would take a wider view of his duties. The present Chairman was precisely one of those men who ought not to be at the head of the Board of Works; he was a man who insisted upon the smallest letter, and the smallest minute, passing through his hands; in short, he insisted upon doing everything himself, and was, therefore, without that most essential power in public men of making use of other people. The greatest hardship, inconvenience, and cruelty had been inflicted upon individuals, and upon localities, in consequence of the physical and mental impossibility of the Chairman attending to all the duties which he insisted upon performing. He could not understand why Her Majesty's Government had determined upon keeping things in their present state. They had not even appointed the three Commissioners required by the Act of Parliament, and the Board was, in consequence, at that moment absolutely illegal in its constitution. It was now necessary for him to give some example to show that the Committee were justified in their complaint. The inland navigation of Ireland cost £5,000,000, and the works were now almost useless, for two reasons. First, they had been very much superseded by railways; secondly, they were useless, because they were not connected with each other. Moreover, they had been imperfectly finished, and hardly one of them was in a fit condition for navigation. The Committee would see, by the instance he was about to refer to particularly, how the public money had been squandered in Ireland. The Ballinamore and Ballyconnell Canal passed between Lough Erne and the River Shannon. The works were undertaken, in conjunction with the arterial drainage of the district, under the Act of 1842. They were executed between 1846 and 1859, at a cost of £228,652, of which £198,652 formed a charge upon the public funds. Now, in 1860 the Board reported that this canal was complete, and handed it over, in the usual way, to trustees, who would have to maintain it, while the inhabitants would have to repay the amount of the loans expended thereon. The trustees, who were gentlemen in the district, after receiving the notice that the canal was complete, unfortunately took possession of it; and—this was the point—afterwards desired the county engineer to examine the works, and to report upon their condition. This Report had been duly forwarded to the Board of Works within a few weeks of the so-called completion of the works; but it was concealed by them, and was only ferreted out by the inquiry of the Committee of 1877. And this was what the Report said—

"The absolutely useless condition of the canal, indeed, was only made clear in the Report of Mr. Pratt, the county surveyor of Leitrim and engineer to the trustees, immediately after the transfer had taken place. That Report was duly forwarded to the Board of Works; but the facts disclosed in it, which are tolerably conclusive, have never been made public till now.

The Report shows that at the time the banks were giving way, and had been improperly sloped, which was causing a considerable deposit of mud—that the towing path had been badly made—that some of the locks had been so defectively constructed, that the masonry was forced out and the sides leaked—that the gearing and uprights of some of the sluices had worked loose; that the approaches to most of the bridges had subsided; that the lock houses were crumbling down; and that the articles of property handed over, such as dredges and barges, were old, rotten, and worn out."

One member of the Board of Works, on behalf of the Government, had made a great deal of the fact that not only had they handed over the works, but also the dredges and barges to the trustees, and said that this was an act of great liberality. Innumerable complaints had been made to the trustees of this state of things; but the canal, to that day, remained simply a mass of mud and vegetable matter. He would now pass to another subject—namely, the Hind River drainage, which, after many complaints had been made to the Board of Works, was found to be perfectly useless. After tremendous pressure had been put upon the Government, an Inspector was directed to go down and examine this particular work. The Board of Works sent down their assistant engineer to see what was the cause of the obstruction, and he very promptly reported that the works had never been thoroughly executed; that there was a great quantity of back water; and that the Board of Works, having undertaken the work and received money for it, were bound to remedy the existing evils. On the return of this officer to Dublin, the Chairman himself went down to look at the works, and, without taking any measurements, or doing anything but walking about, with his umbrella in his hand, made a counter Report, which left the evil without any redress at all. Subsequently, he might add, the Treasury interfered, and took some steps. Another important matter was with respect to an Act which had been passed, as was well known, with the object of providing for the erection of dwelling houses for the poor. What had been done with respect to that? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland ought to direct his particular attention to the subject; because it had been found that lodging houses for the labouring classes in Ireland had not been erected, as had been expected. It had been found that the cause for that had been the action of the Board of Works, or, rather, of the Chairman of the Board, for that gentleman had refused to carry out the Act, because he did not approve of its policy. The reason which had been alleged by the Board for not interfering in that matter was that the applications made were not for a benevolent, but for a remunerative purpose. One man had expended a good deal of money for the erection of lodging houses, and when the Act was passed he asked for a loan from the Board, but it was refused; and it turned out that the only ground for refusing it was that the Board considered that the erection of these lodging houses would produce some profit to the builder. If the matter had been brought before any Board, such an absurd construction of the Act could not have been arrived at; but the Chairman took upon himself to construe the Act of Parliament exactly as he liked, and, in consequence, the Act had become nearly a dead letter. Numbers of cases equally as absurd, and equally cruel, and, in some respects, more ludicrous than the one to which he had drawn attention, had occurred. There was another matter to which he would allude—there was an architect connected with the Board of Works. What happened as regarded him? A loan was applied for to enable dwelling houses to be erected in Belfast; but the architect said that he knew Belfast very well, and that there were too many houses there already. He declined to examine the locality, and simply reported to the Chairman that no grant ought to be made for the erection of lodging houses in Belfast. Another point arose in connection with the architect—but he would not go into it if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would give some information as to whether anything had been done with regard to it—namely, the architect was the head of a building society. The architect held a most anomalous position in advising the Board as to grants of money for the erection of lodging houses, while, at the same time, he was connected with a large building society which granted money for the very same purposes. That was directly contrary to the instructions of the Treasury; and in the Report the Commissioners drew the attention of the Treasury to that fact. He thought that the Treasury ought to take some notice of it, and should take care that it did not occur again. These matters caused enormous irritation in Ireland; and he believed that they were the cause of half the discontent that existed in that country. He would not go further into these matters; but he would distinctly ask what the Government was going to do with the Board and with the Chairman, and whether the various recommendations of the Commissioners, for the better administration of the Board, were to be carried out? Would the Committee believe that the Board of Works had about £500,000 of furniture under its care, and that it had no inventory of it! Since the Report, it was said that something had been done; but he could not speak with certainty. He could not imagine any Board as negligent as the Board of Works in Ireland. In bringing forward the Motion they directly impugned the management of the Board of Works, and the conduct of the Chairman; and in asking the Government whether they insisted upon retaining the Chairman in his present office, with the experience that had been brought out in the Report, he might say that they were thoroughly convinced of the integrity and ability of the subordinate officers of the Department. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by the amount of the salary of the Chairman.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

COLONEL COLTHURST wished to bring before the notice of the Committee one point in connection with that matter. He agreed with the general question brought forward by the hon. Member for Galway, and thought that, as the Board of Works was at present organized, nothing could be expected from it. That was abundantly proved by the evidence brought before the Committee. The point which he wished especially to urge upon the notice of the Treasury was a suggestion that had been made, to the effect that power should be granted to the Board of Works to enable it to make advances to the managers of industrial schools. Up to the close of 1876 over £160,000 had been expended by the managers of industrial schools in buildings. There were no powers in the Irish Act enabling grants to be made to the schools. Some powers had been given to the local bodies in England, and recently to make advances for furnishing and building those schools, and school boards had also facilities for getting money from the Treasury, spreading the re-payment over a number of years. What he would ask the Government now to consider was the feasibility of extending to the managers of industrial schools in Ireland the power of obtaining loans from the Board of Works, and, in fact, granting them the facilities that were afforded by the Glebe Land Act. That would enable the Board of Works to make advances to the extent of two-thirds for the building of industrial schools. He would not press the Government for an answer on that occasion; but he wished the subject to be considered.

MR. A. MOORE said, that for the last two or three years he had pressed the Government to permit loans to be made to these schools in Ireland. The proposal fell through, because the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, after consulting the Treasury authorities, stated that he had come to the conclusion that it would be impossible to do it, because they could not obtain proper security. Of course, if security could not be given, loans could not be expected. But there were many cases where very ample security could be given. In some cases 100 statute acres or more of land were possessed within three or four miles of a large town, and the value of that land for building purposes must be very great. There would be no difficulty, he felt sure, as to the security, if the Government would take the power to grant the loans. Of course, if people could not find security, they could not expect loans. But there were many cases where it could be found; and he thought it would be wise in those cases to grant money to be spent in works of so useful a character.

MR. ERRINGTON said, that there was no Department of the Public Service in Ireland which was so much in want of proper organization as the Board of Works. His hon. Friend the Member for Galway had touched upon various points into which the Commission had inquired; but there was one point excluded from that inquiry. He did not think that anybody who had been upon the Committee alluded to by the hon. and gallant Member for County Cork (Colonel Colthurst) could help being struck by the remarkable evidence that was given on that subject. They were not inquiring into the efficiency of the Board of Works, but the question came before them indirectly. The carrying out of the Land Act was intrusted to the Board of Works; and it had been shown that the whole action of the Board in respect of it had been most destructive and most useless, and, in fact, of so detrimental a character that it was impossible to find Parliamentary language in which to express his opinion of it. It was shown that, although the Board of Works kept minute books, yet more than one Commissioner was never known to sit. Many curious things of that sort came out in respect to the Board. It seemed to him that the most serious charge which had been made by his hon. Friend the Member for Galway was, that since the Report of the Commission, the Government had done nothing to carry out its recommendations and reform the Board of Works. The object of the Commission was to ascertain and point out those abuses which existed; and unless some assurance were given that the recommendations of the Committee would be carried out upon a comprehensive scale, they could not be satisfied. He hoped that his hon. Friend would elicit some statement from the Government as to what was going to be done in the matter. They would not be satisfied merely with some small insignificant changes of detail, for a thorough re-constitution of the Department was required. He would ask the indulgence of the Committee to state, with reference to a Vote passed in the earlier part of the evening, when he was not in the House, that he should not have thought it his duty to vote for the Amendment, because the Government was willing to agree to the Queen's Colleges Estimates being taken at a later period.

MR. P. MARTIN thought that they were very much indebted to the hon. Member for Galway for the exhaustive speech in which he had brought that matter before the notice of the Committee. The Report to which he had drawn attention had been before the Government since June, 1878, and he regretted to say that not one single step had been taken to carry out the recommendations contained in it. He could understand it might be alleged that the difficulties which no doubt existed in determining the future organization and constitution of the Board of Works was an excuse for the singular inactivity on the part of the Government, so far as respected the re-constitution of the Department. But it had been very clearly shown that the action of the Commissioners had been much obstructed by the various Acts of Parliament which directed the operation of the Board and controlled its actions. Those Acts of Parliament were of a most complicated character, and many of them were contradictory; many had been long since repealed, and others substituted for them, and the Report had recommended that they should be consolidated. Those interested in the progress of Ireland not unjustly complained that not one single step had been taken since June, 1878, in respect to the consolidation or amendment of any of those Statutes. No Board more widely affected the welfare of Ireland than the Board of Works. The duties of the Board of Works concerned every part of Ireland; and it was incumbent upon the Government to make the law, by which the action of the Board was regulated and controlled, as plain and simple as possible. Was it not a matter in which they, as Irish Members, had cause to complain that, in consequence of the lethargy of Her Majesty's Government, they had been deprived of the benefit of the Drainage Acts in Ireland, inasmuch as they were wholly and entirely unworkable? If the Drainage Acts were properly worked a good deal might be effected in Ireland towards the reclamation of waste land, and very great good might be done for the people. The result of the inquiry instituted by the Commissioners named by the Government was made known so far back as June, 1878; yet since that time no step had been taken to carry out their recommendations. Was it wonderful, under those circumstances, that there should be the widespread demand in Ireland for Home Rule, when they found the English Parliament unable to grapple and deal with those matters which affected the welfare of Ireland? The suggestions which had been referred to had been made by gentlemen appointed by the Government itself, and they were of importance to the farming classes, the landed classes, and to every rank of people in Ireland; but they had, nevertheless, been left wholly neglected. He trusted that the entire subject would engage the early attention of the Government; and that they would be prepared not only to give effect to the recommendations in the Report, but to submit some bolder and more comprehensive scheme, as had been so properly suggested to the House, early next Session.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that the Government had been charged with neglecting to carry out the recommendations made by the Committee appointed a year ago. It was said that it was a scandal that the recommendations of the Committee should have been left uncared for, particularly when, if the Drainage Acts had been carried out, very great benefit might have resulted to Ireland in the present state of affairs. He hoped to be able to satisfy the Committee that the Government were not so much to blame as they had been represented. When the Report of the Committee came into his hands he need scarcely say that, although it was by no means a short document, he made it his duty to ascertain and to examine the recommendations which it embodied. With regard to the recommendations as to the consolidation of the Acts dealing with the administration of the Board of Works in Ireland, the Treasury at once instructed gentlemen competent to deal with the matter to prepare a codification of those Acts. Since that time, a codification had been in course of preparation; but numerous Statutes had to be gone into, and the labour of codification was very great, and could not be done at a moment's notice. So far as the work of codification was concerned, he hoped that the Government, before long, would be enabled to put before the House a complete and sound codification of those Acts. That, no doubt, was a very important item of the recommendations made by the Committee; but there were various smaller items, and to those attention had also been given. With regard to the case of the Galway Mills, an inquiry into the matter had not, at the present moment, been commenced; but a gentleman had been appointed for the purpose of making the inquiry, and would commence his labours in a short time. There was another point which had been dealt with in the recommendations, and which would also form the subject of the earnest consideration of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, as to the necessity for further inquiry, by Royal Commission, into the navigation system in Ireland. That Commission had been delayed in consequence of some further matters which his right hon. Friend wished to be inquired into. He thought he might fairly say that the Commission would be issued before very long. But, perhaps, the gravest charge that had been brought forward by the hon. Member for Galway was that the Government had done nothing to carry out the recommendations of the Committee with regard to the re-construction of the Board of Works. Although he (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) quite admitted that, to any one who had gone so thoroughly into the question as his hon. Friend, it might seem a very simple matter, yet the recommendations of the Committee appeared to the Government to embrace a very wide and difficult field. The questions raised extended not only to the Board of Works itself, but went into other subjects affecting the Local Government Board and other bodies in Ireland. His right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had postponed the matter with the view of himself making an inquiry into the whole system, and with a view of seeing whether a large part of the duties at present performed by the Public Works Office in Ireland might not be much more properly intrusted to the Local Government Board. The Public Works Office in Ireland performed a great many more duties than the corresponding Department in England. Many of those functions might, it was thought, be very properly transferred to the Local Government Board. Therefore, it was not desirable to make any alterations in the Board of Works until it was absolutely decided whether it should be retained in its present form. In his humble judgment, the time would have been lost in the settlement of the question by their not having dealt with the matter in a hurry. Under those circumstances, a new history in local government in Ireland might be created, and the local works in Ireland might be brought under the control of the Local Government Board. No doubt the Local Government Office would have to be strengthened, in order to enable it to carry out those additional duties; and the Board of Works would continue to look after buildings, furniture, and kindred details. The staff of the present Office of Works would be transferred to the Local Government Office, and in that way the scheme contemplated by his right hon. Friend would not involve greatly increased expenditure. That was the excuse which the Government offered for not having as yet interfered to carry out that particular recommendation of the Committee. There was one other question which the hon. Gentleman the Member for County Galway approached at great length, and he hoped that he would pardon him if he stated that he could not agree with his opinions. The hon. Member had pointed to the Chairman of the Board of Works, and to the Report of the Committee upon him. The recommendations of the Committee were certainly made in very discreet and courteous language; but those recommendations pointed to nothing less than the retirement of Colonel McKerlie. He would point out that Colonel McKerlie was an officer who had done very great public service, and was a most indefatigable and most energetic functionary. Numerous Acts of Parliament which had been beneficial to Ireland in their results had their origin in his suggestions. After the most careful consideration of the evidence adduced before the Committee and of their Report, he could not help thinking that the suggestion with regard to Colonel McKerlie's retirement was made under a misapprehension of the facts. Colonel McKerlie was placed in a position of great difficulty, from the Board which he was supposed to superintend having been, practically, destroyed. Additional duties had been imposed upon the Board of Works, and therefore upon him, and they had accumulated to an extent which made it utterly impossible for him efficiently to carry them all out. Many of the complaints as to the administration of the Office of Works in Ireland he attributed really to that fact. The Commissioners were originally five in number; two of those Commissioners very shortly left the Office, one dying, and another being appointed to another office. The Treasury of the day on each occasion of a vacancy refused to allow it to be filled. Another Commissioner, on his retirement, was asked to continue an ornamental member only; he did so, but, of course, he took no active part in the work of the Board. The Treasury had at length appointed an Assistant Commissioner; and for some time two Commissioners had done the whole work of the Board. But the work of the Board had increased so enormously within the last two years, that it would be impossible even for the two Commissioners to do the work properly. The whole blame had been thrown by the Committee upon the unfortunate Chairman; but it was his opinion that that gentleman had always endeavoured to carry out his duties to the best of his ability, and that there was no real cause of complaint against him. He confessed that, looking to the past history of the Board, and looking to the way in which the work had been carried out during the whole time of his appointment, he should be somewhat inclined to agree with his hon. Friend that the Chairman had been anxious to do everything himself, and not to allow any other man to assist him; but he thought that arose from having no one to assist him, and that he had really undertaken what no man could be expected to carry out. If the proposed alteration with respect to the functions of the Board were carried, he ventured to think that Colonel McKerlie would be thoroughly competent to discharge the duties of his office. He trusted that the Committee would not endorse the recommendations of the Report with regard to the Chairman of the Board. He ventured to think that what he had submitted to the Committee was a justification for the postponement, by the Government, of any action in respect to the recommendations of the Committee, and that it would be seen that those recommendations had not been neglected, and that the Government were taking steps to carry them out.

proposed to abolish that system. He believed the Irish people were very strongly in favour of its continuation, for it worked very well, and its abolition would stop a great number of works altogether. He would like to know whether this was only an idea of the Treasury, and on what grounds the change was based?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, there had been no such reports as those suggested by the hon. and gallant Gentleman from the Office in Ireland, and in the Bill before the House there was no intention of altering the way in which these loans were made. The clause of the Bill affected another class of loans altogether. As to the question of loans for industrial schools, which had been touched by one or two hon. Members, he could quite understand there would be considerable advantage in the alteration of the law, and that it would be an encouragement of purposes he had always been anxious to assist. He would look into the case to see if any alterations could be made which would give such facilities as had been suggested.

MR. SHAW remarked that there was a little matter of administration which he had once before brought to the notice of the Financial Secretary. In the case of third-class clerks, referred to on page 66, owing to the promotion of the second-class clerks, their prospects of promotion had been entirely stopped. It had been proposed to bring forward a Bill to enable these loans to be made; but up to the present he had heard nothing of the matter. He was sure that the extension of money to the Board had hindered very much by the action of the Office. He knew in his own county that farmers had been at 6 per cent rather than at 5 per cent from the Board of Works. He did everything in his power to induce them to be at their own interests; but it was so round and so many returns were required that they only got a small amount when they applied for, and then they were referred to get the money at 2 per cent more. There had been a great deal of re-construction of this kind, and sooner the Government should pass a small Bill to carry it out, the less it was the cause of much obstruction in Ireland. However, before they carried any such changes, either in the departments or amalgamations, they would put them before the House, and allow them to be discussed. He did not wish to do anything against the Board, but a very simple piece of business would be to release them once. He had been asked to give facilities to the farmers, their money. Happening to be in Dublin, he went in to see the Board. He heard what they had to say, and then he put on his hat and went out, determined that he would say no more, for that to talk to them about the matter was perfectly useless. They did not want in Ireland another Board like that. They wanted to bring public opinion to bear on its action, and to mix up with the paid officers men who would be representatives of public opinion. There was no reason why the County Boards or the Poor Law Unions should not elect representatives yearly to go to Dublin and examine the claims of cases which might come before them, as to which they would be guided and assisted in deciding by the officials in matters of scientific knowledge. He did object, however, and he always should object, to pay two or three engineers, shovelling them into a room, and there leaving them to administer the affairs of the county of lending money for public health and building artizans' dwellings, and so on, without anybody overhauling them. He hoped some attention would be given, and some desirable alterations made.

MR. BRUEN, after the observations of the hon. Member, thought it right to say that he had had some experience of this Board, having had communication with it for several years, and he was bound to say his experience of the Office and its working was diametrically opposite. He had frequently gone there, and he had always received the most business-like information on all matters; and, as far as his own experience went, he had no single complaint to make. Though he had not always been successful in his applications, when he had failed, good, fair, and plausible reasons had been advanced why he should not succeed. He was aware that to say the Board had been business-like in one case was not a sufficient answer to another case where they had not been; but he might say, also, that many of his friends who had had business transactions with the Board had had the same experience. He had never heard any complaint.

MR. PARNELL thought the Government should give some answer to the question of his hon. Friend the Member for County Cork (Mr. Shaw) as to whether they intended to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee, which seemed very valuable recommendations for increasing the facilities for carrying out the "Bright Clauses" of the Land Act. This matter had acquired considerable importance lately, owing to the great agricultural distress existing at the present moment in Ireland. Those clauses authorized the Board of Works to advance two-thirds of the purchase money to the tenants of estates which came into the Landed Estates Court, but they were also clauses which prevented alienation without the consent of the Board. The effect had been to prevent a second charge being placed on the property coming after the charge of the Board of Works; and the result was that when estates came into the Court, half the tenants had made arrangements with the Board of Works for an advance of two-thirds of the purchase money. They were forbidden to make arrangements with any other lender to make an advance of the remaining part. He could not imagine any reason for that. The Board of Works, as owners of the first charge, would not be prejudiced by a second charge; and if the tenants could get banks or other people to lend them money as a second charge, the result would surely be that the Board of Works would have a better security, and, so far from their being injured, the value of their security ought to be increased by this fact. But the result of the clause was that the tenants were not able to borrow money; and, as a consequence, they had not sufficient capital to start their farms, and so forth. The difficulty might be got over very easily. The Act allowed the Board to sanction a loan if it thought fit; but, at present, the Board always opposed it. He had even known instances where landlords had been willing to let the third stand out as a second charge, and to collect the interest from the tenants; but the Board of Works refused their permission, and the consequence was that the matter had to be done in a roundabout way, and the tenants were obliged to give bills, and so on. This was all a very vicious principle; and the Chief Secretary surely might give directions to the Board of Works in future not to oppose the placing of the second charge on estates. The recommendations of the Select Committee went further than that, and wished to make it imperative on the Board of Works to do away with the

should confine itself to questions of general supervision. The Petition for the re-hearing of the case referred to was, in his opinion, uncalled for.

MR. BIGGAR thought the reply of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was unsatisfactory, inasmuch as it did not, in the slightest degree, go into the merits of the case, nor explain upon what grounds the action of Mr. Hamilton was to be defended. He (Mr. Biggar) regarded it as a matter of very serious importance that persons should have denied point blank that the signatures to the voting papers were not theirs, and that Mr. Hamilton had not attempted to find out the names of the parties whose names appeared upon those papers as witnesses. He had known of a case of election as Poor Law Guardians, in which certain persons were prosecuted and severely punished for forging the names of persons on the voting papers. For these reasons, he could not help thinking, that if the statements of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) were correct, Mr. Hamilton had thoroughly neglected his duties in the matter of the Cardendonogh election of Poor Law Guardians, and he considered the hon. Member was bound to divide the Committee on his Motion, unless some satisfactory explanation were forthcoming. The point raised by the hon. Member was a vital one, and ought not to have been decided by an irresponsible person. And if the allegation were true, that the person whose name appeared on the voting paper declared that he had not signed it, the Government should certainly not attempt to screen the guilty parties.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he intended to take a Division upon this Vote, although he knew that he should be opposed by an overwhelming number of hon. Gentlemen who knew nothing, and cared nothing, about the Poor Law election in Cardendonogh. The Chief Secretary for Ireland himself knew nothing about it, and, very naturally, had given no answer whatever to the complaint made. If such a case had occurred in England, and, upon reference being made thereto in the House of Commons, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had returned an answer similar to that which had just been given by the Chief Secretary for Ireland—namely, that the officer whose conduct had been complained of was a very valuable member of the staff—such a fire of indignant eloquence would have followed as would have perturbed that singularly calm and composed official. Even if the Chief Secretary for Ireland knew more than he did about the case in question, his observations upon it would be thrown away upon the hon. Gentlemen by whom he was surrounded. He felt that in dividing the Committee the division would be taken in the dark; that not five Members would understand anything about the point raised; and that his Amendment would be thrown out in a way that would be typical of all legislation relating to Ireland. He would remind the Committee that the satisfactory working of legislation as a whole depended upon the proper working of its parts; and that, although the complaints brought forward by him might be sneered at by hon. Members as microscopic, the Government which was not fitted to endure microscopic examination was undeserving of support. He was almost inclined to hope that he should get no following into the Lobby, because that would be a result typical of the utter uselessness of bringing before the British Parliament complaints which it was never constituted to deal with.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 8; Noes 141: Majority 133.—(Div. List, No. 196.)

MR. BIGGAR reminded the Chief Secretary for Ireland of a Question which he had addressed to him on a former occasion with regard to the contracts for coals made by the Local Government Board; and suggested that if the right hon. Gentleman would undertake to send down an Inspector to inquire into the circumstances complained of, he (Mr. Biggar) would not trouble the Committee with any further remarks upon the subject of the coal contracts. Failing that assurance, he would be obliged to take a Division with regard to this question.

MR. J. LOWTHER, upon general grounds, thought it desirable to remove any suspicion which might exist concerning the contracts for coal, and would, therefore, promise that an Inspector should be sent down to inquire into the subject.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. MITCHELL HENRY regretted that he would be compelled to move the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £1,500, being the salary of the Chairman of the Board. The subject he was about to deal with was a large one; but he would endeavour to be as brief as possible in the remarks which he had to make. First of all, he would express his regret that the Forms of the House left no other course open to him than to treat this matter, to a certain extent, as a personal one. But he was bound also to state his honest belief that so long as the present Chairman of the Board of Works remained in office it would be impossible that the Department should be efficiently and satisfactorily administered. The Irish Board of Works had been the subject of discussion in the House of Commons for many years; and, owing to the great number of duties which it had to perform, nothing analogous to it existed in this country. Unlike the Board of Works in England, it acted as a body which advanced money for all kinds of works in Ireland; it discharged duties relating to Exchequer loans, and the planning and surveys of railways, as well as numerous other functions. It had also under its control an annual expenditure of no less than £200,000, and furniture of the value of £500,000. Without going into the history of the Department at any length, he would remind the Committee that the Board of Works had grown in a very extraordinary manner since it was first originated, in 1831. The Irish Parliament had been alive to the importance of improving the inland navigation of the country, and the English Government also took up the subject in 1831, and appointed a Board of Works with very large powers, consisting of three Commissioners and a staff to perform duties with regard to fisheries, and the very extensive public works then going on in Ireland. The Committee had heard of the Shannon Commissioners, a body that was perfectly separate and distinct from the Board of Works, and who, to some extent, had improved the inland navigation. Now, the Shannon Commissioners having reported that their works were nearly at an end, Parliament, in 1846, dissolved that body, and merged them into the Board of Works. That point was very important. One of the Shannon Commissioners was appointed a member of the Board of Works, and two Commissioners of the Board were appointed to see to the conservancy and maintenance of the Shannon. Everyone knew that there had been an enormous amount of trouble connected with the navigation of that river, which was constantly overflowing its banks and inundating large tracts of the adjacent country; and that the works to be executed by the Shannon Commissioners were laid down by Act of Parliament, after an expensive process of inquiry, by English and Irish engineers. But he asserted that those works were never carried out in the way directed by the Act; and that, in some instances, deviations were made of the most injudicious character. The greatest deviation, however, was that the works had never been completed. The Committee would recollect that every two or three years complaints had been made with regard to the state of the River Shannon; and that hon. Members who had to put them forward in the House could never get any satisfactory answers to these complaints, because of the impossibility of fixing any body with the responsibility for what had occurred. The Board of Works into which the Shannon Commissioners merged, in 1851, said truly—"We had nothing to do with the drainage of the Shannon; we are not responsible; and we will not give any information as to whether these works have been properly executed or not." The Shannon Commissioners, in the most adroit manner, evaded their responsibility by constantly making a separate Report, distinct from that of the Board of Works, although they had been dissolved by Act of Parliament. The fact was, that in all the complaints made to the House of Commons Parliament had had to do with a phantom Commission. Originally, the Board of Works consisted of five Commissioners, which cient time had not been given for so large an inquiry.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(6.) £4,425, to complete the sum for the Record Office, Ireland, agreed to.

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(7.) £65,521, to complete the sum for Law Charges, Ireland.

MAJOR NOLAN pointed out that a great many jurors in Ireland had to travel long distances—in some cases as much as 75 miles—to the places where their services were required, and that they neither received payment for their travelling expenses, nor compensation for the loss of their time. Amongst these persons a strong feeling existed that they ought, at least, to be paid for their expenses out of pocket, and many also thought that their time should be paid for. Complaints also were made that the system of arranging the juries was not good, and that a larger number of jurors than necessary was brought from long distances to Quarter Sessions. He had looked into the arrangements, and found, for instance, that the people of Ballinamore had to travel 80 miles by rail and then 60 miles by road up to Galway, and this continually occurred from the coupling of two Sessions together. The alternate Sessions were duce a Bill to deal with Ireland. Moreover, the Bill had been tried in the past but had not been found to be of much use; and the Commission was, undoubtedly, one; but it would be a propriety when it became present a new Jury Bill.

MR. CALLAN commenced by asking for more information was abstract with regard to what was to be found in the Bill that no information was as to the expenditure of the sum that purpose in the various parts of Ireland. The Committee, therefore, unable to discuss the merits. He held that the Bill should know the amount for each county and at each Session not have the whole placed as a lump sum. He had no objection to make with regard to the Bill of the Law Officers of the Crown, but he was in the recollection of that they had given a Bill from the Grand Jury Council, and that last Session he had promoted to make a Bill from Kilrush to the Grand Jury. This year a much more important Bill came before the Committee of the Privy Council from the Grand Jury of Wicklow. With reference to the Bill now asked the Attorney who made complaints, they could get no answer at all from the hon. Member for Dundalk, who would not come forward. This circumstance was referred to in the Report of the Committee in the following terms:—

“We should mention that we specially invited two Members of Parliament, who had taken a prominent part in those discussions last Session, to come forward to assist our inquiry; but one declined our offer, and the other took no notice of it.”

Therefore, he thought that no notice should be taken of what was stated by the hon. Member for Dundalk. The Report of the Committee was produced in June, 1878; and although they were now in July, 1879, nothing whatever had been done in this matter. Hon. Members had stimulated the Government by Questions, and they had been informed that the subject was coming on; but he was convinced that nothing would be done unless the House put some pressure upon the Government. This was not the first inquiry which had been held upon the Board of Works, for in 1871 the Government now out of Office appointed a Committee of Inquiry, at the head of which was Lord Lansdowne, and that Committee made a very important Report. But what became of that Report? That would be seen from the Report of the Committee, of which he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) was a Member, which said—

“In the course of our inquiries we had occasion to make frequent reference, as was contemplated in our instructions, to the Report made by Lord Lansdowne's Committee in 1872, and we must express our surprise at the way in which it was dealt with by the Chairman. Though your Lordship's instructions respecting it were communicated to the Board in a formal printed minute, which was made an official record, yet the Report itself, upon which the minute was framed, and without which it could hardly be properly understood, was retained by the Chairman as a confidential document. We found that the Report had never been communicated by him to the Assistant Commissioner, or any of the officers of the Department, and that, as regards the general administration of the Office, it has, for all practical purposes, remained a dead letter. We cannot think that this was the intention of your Lordships, or that the course taken by the Chairman has been conducive to public interests.”

That was the way in which the Report of Lord Lansdowne's Committee was dealt with. But the House had been further bamboozled over this Report; because when it became known that this important Committee had reported, Questions began to be asked about it in the House of Commons, and the Secretary to the Treasury, in answer to one of them, said—

“That the Report examined a very wide field, and had been referred to a Committee, owing to a difference of opinion between the Chairman of the Committee and the Chairman of the Board. . . . but that the Treasury had now come to a decision on the subject, and it was on the point of being carried out.”

That recommendation had never been carried out at all; it had never even been communicated to the Colleagues of the Chairman; and it had never been communicated to the noble Lord in his Office; and it was found out, by the Committee of 1877, that the Report in question had been allowed to remain a dead letter, and, he must add, treated in a very contemptuous and improper manner, by being put into the pocket of the Chairman and allowed to remain without any notice whatever being taken of it. Under those circumstances, and in view of a great many other points which came before them, the Committee found it to be their duty to make a recommendation, which he was obliged to refer to at some length. When the Committee remembered of whom the Committee was composed, they would see that it was not at all likely that any direct recommendation would be made for the retirement of the Chairman of the Board of Works, unless under a sense of deep responsibility. The Committee, therefore, wrapped up the intimation as delicately as they could at the end of their Report in this way—

“We hope that the recommendations already made will more effectually secure to the public the advantages intended by the Legislature; and that they will, in great measure, remedy the defects in the administration of the Board. At the same time, we feel that the Head of this important Department should possess unusual administrative abilities; that he should command your Lordships' entire confidence by a vigorous and comprehensive grasp of the subjects with which he is called upon to deal; and that he should be able, both in his recommendations to the Treasury and in his communications with the public, to enforce his views with authority. Nothing can be farther from our intention than to deprecate the merits of the present Chairman, or detract from the value of his long and (we may add) distinguished public services. Nothing can exceed the zeal with which he has applied himself to his work, or the conscientious industry which he has brought to bear upon it. It is possible, however, that after so long a period of service, rendered peculiarly arduous matter, because they were not unnaturally influenced by a feeling of kindness towards their neighbours, and looked upon the rights of the Dungarvan fishermen as being of secondary importance. But the question was a very serious one for those poor men. Some time ago, the fleet of fishing boats belonging to the town numbered 150, and something like £1,000 was earned per week. There was now, however, only a wretched fleet of 20 boats, and the fishermen were reduced to a state of the greatest destitution. Now, if the law were only fairly carried out, that condition of affairs would, he believed, steadily improve. He would not press the matter further on the attention of the Committee on the present occasion, for he was sure the Government would see the necessity of taking some steps to provide that the fishery regulations should be properly enforced.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, he would communicate with the Inspector of Fisheries in Ireland on the subject.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to call the attention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to another point connected with the Irish jury system—he meant the inconvenience which was caused by summoning jurors to serve at considerable distances from the localities in which they reside without any necessity. In his own county very considerable inconvenience was the result of the present system. The town of Tuam was situated about 25 English miles from Galway, and the town of Ballymore was 20 miles from Tuam, and 45 miles from Galway. Now, it was scarcely reasonable, he thought, that jurors should be summoned from Ballymore to attend the Sessions, both at Tuam and Galway. Where the districts were very large some arrangement ought, in his opinion, to be made, providing that the jurors only of the district in which the Sessions were held should be summoned; and if that were done, in the case of the County of Galway, the jurors residing in Ballymore would not have to go beyond Tuam. In Ireland, he might add, jurors were generally summoned by the relieving officer, who was not the sort of person who would be anxious to secure a good jury, and who was not placed directly in communication with those whose object it was to do so. But the whole jury system in Ireland required to be thoroughly looked into; and, meantime, matters might be materially improved if some such alteration respecting the summoning of jurors, such as that which he had just suggested, were made.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, that in 1876, when the present Secretary of State for the Colonies was Chief Secretary for Ireland, an arrangement had been made for the drawing up of a general list of jurors to be summoned to Quarter Sessions. That arrangement had, however, been found to work inconveniently, and a change had since been introduced, enabling the Chairman of Quarter Sessions or the County Court Judge to define the area from which a jury should be summoned, which, he believed, had been found more satisfactory. He would, however, look into the matter, and see whether something could not be done to remedy the inconvenience of which the hon. and gallant Gentleman complained.

MAJOR NOLAN remarked, that the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions were not always the best persons to adjust geographical details, and expressed a hope that the matter would not be lost sight of by the Government, inasmuch as a great deal of time and trouble would, he thought, be saved if some alteration, such as that which he had indicated, was adopted.

MR. A. MOORE said, that much of the difficulty connected with the working of the present system of summoning jurors in Ireland arose from the fact that the relieving officers, who controlled the preparation of the jury lists, had no object in securing the attendance of good juries.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. O'DONNELL said, he thought the Vote should not be allowed to pass without a protest against the mode in which Election Petitions were now tried. Having no wish to cast undue reflections on individuals, he yet felt that he was not mistaking or exaggerating the state of public feeling in Ireland, when he said that the Irish people were profoundly distrustful of the trial of those Petitions by single Judges. It was said that the Judges in Ireland were notorious for their freedom from bias, and their action in civil and criminal trials was pointed to as a reason why they should be trusted to try Election Petitions. There was, however, he ventured to think, no force in that argument, because the political partiality which was attributed to the Irish Judges had very seldom occasion to rouse itself in civil and criminal trials, which turned usually upon questions of fact, which had rarely, if ever, anything to do with politics. To contend, therefore, that a man must show perfect impartiality in a political trial, because he did so in trials of a non-political character, was to argue quite beside the real point at issue. As a matter of fact, some Judges in Ireland who were believed to be the most incapable of controlling themselves on political trials—such as the trial of Election Petitions—were most favourably known for their admirable administration of the law in civil and criminal cases. At all events, entertaining the views on the subject which he did, he could not allow the item of £220, contained in the Vote for expenses connected with the trial of Election Petitions, to pass without comment, and without offering to it his strenuous opposition. But apart from the general question, and taking into account the fact that no Election Petitions had been tried in Ireland last year, he could not see on what ground a sum of £140 was asked for in the Vote for the reception of Judges in connection with those trials. If there were no trials, there could not, he supposed, have been any Judges to receive, and how the £140 was to be expended he could not, therefore, understand. But setting aside all microscopical criticism, he must say that he had the strongest possible objection to having Election Petitions tried by single Judges; and, if only for the purpose of impressing on the Government his conviction that if, in making any attempt to amend the law on the subject, the decision of Election Petitions were still left in the hands of a single Judge, they would provoke the most profound dissatisfaction in Ireland, he would certainly take a Division against the item of £220 which he had just mentioned. It was very easy to prove that the Irish Judges were political partizans—the proofs were abundant. There were, in Ireland, several highly respected Judges—men who, when discharging the functions of their office, outside of politics, were admirable Judges; but who, when they came to deal with burning questions—such as the law relating to the land—all at once revealed themselves straight out, sometimes in their addresses to the Grand Jury, as political partizans, undisguised and undisguisable. How was it possible, then, that when they came to try an Election Petition they could divest themselves of their political feelings? He was arguing against the voting of public money for those trials. In Ireland, in an especial manner, appointments to the Judicial Bench were made for political reasons; although he was glad to see that, in that respect, there had of late been an improvement, which would, he hoped, be carried still further. It was still true, however, that the prizes of the Irish Bench were made the reward of political services rendered by political lawyers; and it was perfectly impossible to persuade any constituency in that country that a distinguished lawyer, who had attained to the ermine by his brilliant defence of this or that political personage, could forget all the circumstances of his life when he was called upon to preside at a trial in which the interests of a member of the political Party with which he had always been intimately associated were involved. Those were general objections to the present system of trying Election Petitions with a single Judge. But there were several objections. The Committee knew that a judgment delivered by the late Judge Keogh, in the case of the Galway Election, when he unseated the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major Nolan) and gave the seat to his opponent, had provoked the widest dissatisfaction in Ireland. They also knew that at the very next election the hon. and gallant Gentleman, who had been rejected by the Judge, had been placed at the head of the poll, and that his opponent, whom the Judge had made a Member of that House, did not dare, on that second occasion, to show his face to the electors. In a word, the overwhelming verdict of the constituency scattered to the four winds of Heaven the judgment of the learned Judge. In his own case, at Galway, Mr. Justice Lawson had unseated him, on the ground that he had been illegally elected. What was the consequence? That his dear bosom Friend and College companion (Dr. Ward), the present Member for Galway, was elected in his place, not only because of his own high personal qualities, but as a protest against Mr. Justice Lawson's judgment; and so completely was that judgment rejected, that the other candidate, Mr. Joyce, did not venture to oppose Dr. Ward when he came forward in his (Mr. O'Donnell's) place. In Ireland, not one man in ten could be found who would say that the judgments either of the late Justice Keogh or of Justice Lawson were to be relied upon in those cases. Those Judges had acted and spoken as partizans; and had the Bill of the Government relating to Corrupt Practices at Elections been proceeded with, he should have felt it to have been his duty to bring all the circumstances connected with Mr. Justice Lawson's judgment under the notice of the House. If the Government persisted in their intention to intrust the trial of Election Petitions in Ireland to a single Judge, and thus continue to the Judges the power of quashing the votes of whole constituencies, he should certainly go carefully into that judgment, by which he was personally disqualified from seeking re-election, for reasons which nobody could understand; while, as he had said, his bosom Friend was elected, and that only three weeks after the judgment was delivered. In Ireland the Judges owed their ermine to partizanship, and they could not divest themselves, in the class of cases of which he was speaking, of their political feelings. The late Justice Keogh was an excellent Judge in that department of his office in which he acted properly as a Judge; while Mr. Justice Lawson was also an admirable Judge in the discharge of his ordinary duties. But neither Mr. Justice Lawson, nor a dozen other Judges whom he could name, could have any portion of the trust of the Irish people where the trial of Election Petitions was concerned. He would take, then, a Division on the important item to which he had called the attention of the Committee, in order that that Division might serve as an instruction and a warning to the Government—he did not wish to use the words in any offensive way—that if they proposed to continue the power of a single Judge in Ireland to over-ride the decisions of the constituencies, such a proposal would be received by the majority of the Irish Members as one which it would be their duty strongly to resist. He felt perfectly satisfied that it entirely depended on a Judge who tried an Election Petition in Ireland whether a Member who had been elected by a constituency was unseated or not; and he need scarcely say that to expose a Judge to the unnecessary odium which such a state of things implied was a result which ought to be avoided by any wise Government. In the interest of the Judges, as well as of the constituencies, it was quite impossible that so informal a power in the hands of a single Judge could long be maintained. It ought not, in his opinion, to be maintained in England or Scotland; but the objections to it applied with ten-fold force in the case of Ireland. If English and Scotch Members were willing to subject themselves to the uncontrolled dictum of a Judge, they could, of course, do so; but Irish constituencies were entirely opposed to anything of the kind. They had as fairly high an opinion of the character of their Judges as any other people; but they knew that it was idle to expect any one to be exactly supernatural, and that it was ridiculous to suppose that a political partizan could cease to be a partizan on a political trial directly appealing to partizan instincts, although he might be, in the main, a perfectly upright Judge. The cases of the county of Galway and the borough of Galway judgments were cases in point. They were judgments delivered by partizan Judges—he did not use the word in any unnecessarily offensive sense—which inflicted very severe loss on the individuals concerned, but which was indignantly scouted by the constituencies which they affected, and which resulted in injuring the authority and the character of the Judicial Bench. He hoped, therefore, the Government would take the necessary steps to remove the Irish Judges from the chances of so much odium, and would give the Committee some assurance that a system which worked so disastrously, and in which, practically, no one in Ireland had any confidence, would not be continued. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £220, the sum asked for to defray the expenses of the trials of Election Petitions by single Judges in Ireland.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, every Member of the Committee must be aware of the great amount of attention which had been given to the question raised in the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, during the last four or five years. More than one Committee of the House had made recommendations on the subject; and a Bill dealing with it was, at the present moment, under consideration, some portion of which, at all events, he hoped would, before long, become law. That Bill would deal with a good many of the topics which had been brought under the notice of the Committees to which he had referred, and would, perhaps, to a large extent, meet the views of many hon. Members. He wished, however, to point out, in reference to the observations of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), that it was impossible that the Judges of any country should not have some kind of political complexion; and so long as Irishmen were Irishmen they would, he supposed, continue to take a somewhat active view of the leading political questions of the day. But, be that as it might, his own experience of the Judges in Ireland was that while they were exceptionally able men, as compared with the Judges of other countries, they were, at the same time, men of singular fairness of mind. There were many of them from whom he differed in politics; but if any question involving his character or property was about to be tried, he should be quite satisfied to have it tried by any one of them, quite regardless of the political opinions which he might entertain. It was impossible, he might add, that the decisions of Judges by whom Election Petitions were tried could give satisfaction to everybody. On one side there must always be, not only disappointment, but keen disappointment; and when a decision came to be delivered in the very town in which the election had taken place, and where great warmth of feeling must prevail, it was quite obvious that the interest in the proceedings of the trial must be not only keen but excited. No doubt, that was so in the case in which the hon. Member for Dungarvan himself was concerned. Having said thus much, he might be allowed further to observe that there was a Bill before the House which would, he thought, deal, in a reasonable and satisfactory way, in many respects with the trial of Election Petitions, especially in the matter of appeals. Under the Judicature Act, at present, the trial of such Petitions was committed to three Judges, who were placed on the rota, whose selection, he believed, commanded confidence, for it could not fairly be contended that there was anything like undue selection. There was to be a further provision, that the junior Judge of the Queen's Bench—that position being at present occupied by Mr. Justice Barry—should be under the necessity of going into the Common Pleas for the purpose of deciding on appeals; and he could not conceive any tribunal more satisfactory than a tribunal composed of four Judges selected in that way. He had only to say, in conclusion, that the item to which the hon. Member for Dungarvan objected was a very small one; and as there were several Petitions relating to municipal elections, and means must be had to meet any trials of Election Petitions, he hoped the Committee would not assent to the Motion for the reduction of the Vote.

MAJOR NOLAN said, there was a great difference between the practice which existed in England with regard to the trial of Election Petitions and that which prevailed in Ireland. Those Petitions were tried in England by the Puisne Judges, and here it was the custom to appoint to Puisne Judgeship lawyers who had not taken a prominent part in politics. The English Attorney General or Solicitor General was very seldom made a Puisne Judge; but in Ireland the Puisne Judges, as well as the Chief Justices, were chosen exclusively from the leading political lawyers of the day. There was, therefore, in that respect, a broad distinction between the position of the two countries. But he objected to the present mode of trying Election Petitions altogether. A popular Assembly could not, in his opinion, properly divest itself of the right to try its own Election Petitions, and the House could, at any time, resume the power to do so with which it had parted. In Ireland there could be no doubt it was believed that the present system was not impartially carried out, and that great partiality had been displayed, especially in the cases in which he himself and the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had been unseated—the one as Member for the county, and the other for the borough, of Galway. The result showed what was the real feeling of the people in Ireland, the aristocracy having gone one way, while the people struggled to go in the opposite direction. He hoped the hon. Member for Dungarvan would press his Motion to a Division, because the majority of the people of Ireland had no trust whatever in some of the Judges—he would not say in all—so far as the trial of Election Petitions was concerned.

MR. CALLAN was sure the Committee must have heard with satisfaction the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, as to the junior Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench being appointed to assist in the trial of Election Petitions. There could be no objection to Mr. Justice Barry acting in that capacity, although it was generally the case that the junior Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland was a man who had taken a very active part in politics. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, however, had also stated that the Judges in Ireland were placed on the rota in such a manner as to preclude the possibility of any undue or unfair selection being made. There had, nevertheless, been such an undue selection made. After the General Election, in 1874, there was a Petition against the return of the present Member for Drogheda (Dr. O'Leary). Now, the senior Judge on the rota was not sent down to try that Petition; but, by some sleight of hand, things were so manipulated that he went to Galway instead. He had made the same charge of unfairness a few years ago, and he now repeated it, in the hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland would either meet it with a denial or explain it. It could not, however, be met with a denial, for the facts were beyond dispute. A Petition was lodged against the return of the hon. Member for Drogheda. That Petition was not tried by the senior Judge, Mr. Justice Lawson, as it ought to have been; and it was at the time commonly rumoured in Ireland that that learned Judge had been reserved for the trial of the Galway Election Petition, with the avowed purpose of unseating the present Member for Dungarvan. The Drogheda Petition was tried by the junior Judge, Mr. Justice Barry, Baron Dowse being, he believed, the other Judge on the rota. A difficulty arose in the case, and Mr. Justice Barry reserved the point for the decision of the Court of Common Pleas; and the ultimate result of the Petition was that the Election was held to be valid. Had the senior Judge on the rota, however, been sent to Drogheda, it was felt that the present Member for the borough would have been unseated, and that the seat would have been given to the candidate by whom he was opposed. As it was, Mr. Justice Lawson went to Galway, and unseated the present Member for Dungarvan, who, it was fully believed in Ireland, would have retained his seat had the Petition against him been tried, as it ought to have been, by Mr. Justice Barry. How, under such circumstances, could such a tribunal as that by which Election Petitions were now tried in Ireland be regarded with anything but distrust? For his own part, if a Petition was lodged against his own return—should he be returned at the next General Election—and that Justice Lawson was appointed to try it, he should not defend his seat, so sure was he of what the result of the trial would be. As to the item in the Vote for the reception of Judges, he would observe, in answer to what the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had said about the necessity of providing for the case of municipal elections, that there were no expenses incurred for the reception of Judges in those cases; and when he found in the Vote a sum of only £100 set down for the reception of Judges next year, he at once came to the conclusion that the Government did not intend that there should be a General Election, otherwise they would have asked for a larger amount than £100. He perceived, he might add, that the sum of £140 was asked for last year, when no Election Petition had been tried; and how, therefore, that sum could have been spent on the reception of Judges he could not understand. It seemed that £305 had been spent last year in connection with the performance of duties in the discharge of which there was no work done; while £240 were asked for this year to be expended, for all he could see, in the same way. He hoped those items now appeared in the Estimates for the last time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) wished to say a few words in reply to the charges which had been brought very freely, in the course of the discussion, against he did not know how many Judges. [Mr. CALLAN: Only Mr. Justice Lawson.] But the charge could not very well rest on only one Judge, because a man could not be in collusion with himself alone; and if the statement of the hon. Member with regard to the trials of the Drogheda and Galway Petitions were correct, Mr. Justice Lawson must have been in collusion with Mr. Justice Barry.

MR. CALLAN said, everybody knew how these matters were decided by the Judges; and he had no hesitation in saying that Mr. Justice Lawson had reserved himself for Galway, and sent the junior Judge on the rota to Drogheda. That was a charge which he was prepared to make anywhere against Mr. Justice Lawson, as freely and fully as he now made it in that House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, the hon. Member seemed to suppose that Mr. Justice Lawson had ordered Mr. Justice Barry about as if he were a waiter at a hotel, instead of a Judge having inordinate jurisdiction. To insinuate, with respect to two distinguished Judges, that of two ways open to them one took the honourable and another the dishonourable way, was a course of proceeding which he was sure would not find acceptance from the Committee. The hon. Member spoke of common rumour; but was the character of a Judge, he would ask, to be taken away on common rumour and general impressions in the public mind? Hon. Members opposite had, of course, a right to entertain their own opinions with regard to particular decisions given at the trials of Election Petitions, and affecting themselves or their friends; but it was neither fair nor reasonable that they should cast reflections on the honour of the Judges by whom those decisions were pronounced. A Judge could not decide both ways, but must decide in favour of one side and against the other; and there was not, he believed, a single Judge in Ireland who would not be delighted to be relieved of what was to them a most disagreeable duty in connection with Elections. But, passing from those exciting topics to the small details of the Vote, he would point out to the Committee that a portion of the money asked for was to cover the expenses of the extra work which might be thrown on the officers of the Court of Common Pleas, who had a good deal to do in connection with municipal as well as Parliamentary Elections. He did not see how the whole amount of the item to which hon. Gentlemen opposite so much objected could fairly be regarded as being at all excessive; and the expenditure appeared to him, he must say, to be calculated upon a very moderate footing.

THE O'CONOR DON thought the discussion to which the Committee had just been listening served to bear out the views of those who objected to having the duty of trying Election Petitions imposed on the Judges of the land. Whether the statements which had been made that evening were correct or not, every hon. Member must admit that it was an unseemly thing that the conduct of the Judges should be so frequently impugned in that House. He quite concurred with the right hon. and learned Member who spoke last that the Judges in Ireland would very gladly be relieved from what they regarded as a disagreeable duty; and he, for one, had always been opposed to the transference of that duty to them from the House itself. The debates which had constantly arisen on the subject since the change had been made fully bore out his views, and that of some other hon. Members, as to the inexpediency of making it; and if his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan went to a Division he should certainly vote with him; but, in doing so, he did not wish, in any way, to be supposed to express his distrust of any particular Judge. He simply wished, acting in accordance with the views which he had always held, to record his opinion that the duties of trying Election Petitions ought not to be thrown on the Judges of the land, and that the House of Commons, in those cases, ought to maintain its jurisdiction over its own Members.

MR. P. MARTIN said, the duties in question had been imposed on the Judges contrary to their own wish; and he was quite aware that the transference to them of those duties had been strongly objected to by some of them, and by no one more vehemently than the present Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in Ireland. That learned Judge had pointed out the evils which would result from the transference, and the soundness of his view was illustrated by what occurred from year to year. The fact was, that the trial of Election Petitions was totally unsuited to the office of Judge, which could not be mixed up with political matters in Ireland without being more or less soiled by the contact. It might be impossible to induce the House to revert to the old practice, which, in his opinion, was much better than the present system; but he would suggest to the Government that they ought to take into account the Report of the evidence of the witnesses who were examined before the Election Commission on the subject. Lord Chief Justice Morris, and other witnesses of eminence and great experience, had clearly and emphatically stated that the trial of Election Petitions ought not to be left to a single Judge; and due attention ought, he thought, to be paid to the opinion of that learned Judge, as well as of the other witnesses. It might be said in England there were not a sufficient number of Judges to admit of more than one being spared for the trial of an Election Petition; but that was an argument which did not apply to the case of Ireland, where two Judges could be very well spared for that purpose. What had been the result of the operation of the present system in Ireland? In the case of the Galway Election, it had led to a universal feeling of indignation being roused among the Roman Catholics in that country. The judicial impartiality of another learned Judge had been frequently and vehemently assailed in the Irish Press and in that House. It could not be denied that, unfortunately, the consequence had been to lower and degrade the judicial office in the public mind. And when, in the course of their ordinary duties, political matters came for decision before these Judges, the confidence of the public in their integrity and impartiality was much impaired and weakened. The question was not whether these charges thus publicly made against the Judges were well-founded or not, but what was their inevitable effect on the public mind. He might, perchance, individually say the action of the judicial body was not to be judged from the consideration of the conduct of one man, or that many statements had been made as to the action of the Judges in which he could not agree; but the very fact that charges were so repeatedly made against them in that House ought, in his opinion, to be quite sufficient to impress on the Government the expediency of having two Judges to try Election Petitions instead of one. [An hon. MEMBER: Three would be better than two.] He would not object to that for Ireland; but the law ought to be, he thought, the same for England and Ireland. And he thought it would be said there was not a sufficient number of Judges to discharge that duty in England. However, if the responsibility was committed to two, public confidence would to some extent be restored, and the alteration would, he believed, remove many of the evils which arose out of the present system. If two Judges had, for instance, been engaged in the trial of the celebrated Galway Petition, there would not, he felt confident, have been such an exhibition of feeling as, unhappily, took place. He knew very well, from some experience at the Bar, how, both by members of the Profession as well as by the public at large, the judgments in such cases were challenged; and it was somewhat of an anomaly, he could not help thinking, that while upon the trial of a question, involving a mere matter of, perhaps, £30 or £40, four Judges might be called upon to sit in solemn array, a question affecting the honour, and position in life of a Member of that House, the interests of a constituency, even the constitution of the House itself, should be left to the decision of a single Judge. The question was one not merely affecting the Irish Judges, many of whose decisions in those matters were far superior to those of the English Judges. But when dealing with Election matters it should be borne in mind the Judge acted not merely in the discharge of his ordinary functions but also as a juror. Not unfrequently his previous training and habit of thought rendered him unfitted to consider facts from a practical common-sense point of view, and consequently some of the Election Judges took various fanciful views, and arrived at conclusions very unsatisfactory to either the legal mind craving a settled standard of law, or the lay mind seeking a practical guide of conduct.

MR. CALLAN said, that with reference to the observation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, that no person should bring charges against a Judge upon mere rumour or general impressions, he wished to say that he had only supplemented the charge he had made by stating the general impression which ran through the public mind on the subject. What was that impression? It had been officially stated that the Judges who were selected to try Election cases were placed upon the rota by seniority. They were either placed upon the rota by seniority, or they were not. He believed that, by the Act of Parliament, the Judges were placed upon the rota by seniority. In 1874, Mr. Justice Lawson, Mr. Baron Dowse, and Mr. Justice Barry were the Election Judges. The senior Judge was Mr. Justice Lawson, and the junior Mr. Justice Barry; and had the Galway Petition been tried by Mr. Justice Barry his decision would have given universal satisfaction. If a decision of the other Judges had given equal satisfaction, there would have been no such outcry as had taken place. The outcry had arisen in consequence of the case being tried by Mr. Justice Lawson, who, he repeated, was the senior Judge. At that time, there were two Petitions pending, one arising in respect of the General Election, and the other with regard to a bye-Election, which took place immediately after. If the Petitions had been tried by the Judges according to seniority, Mr. Justice Lawson would have taken the case of the Drogheda Petition. He supposed, however, that the senior Judge had the choice of the Circuit, and that Mr. Justice Lawson selected Galway. By seniority, he ought to have gone to Drogheda; and the result of his going to Galway was the unfair decision that was given in that case. It was the general impression of the public that Mr. Justice Lawson had selected Galway for the purpose of unseating the Member petitioned against. It was unfortunate that there should be such an impression; but it was, nevertheless, the fact that it existed. He must express his opinion that Mr. Justice Lawson was guilty of gross partiality in the trial of the Galway Petition.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY observed, that the practice of questioning the decisions of Judges was a very objectionable one; but it was well known to anyone who followed Irish affairs that there were some Judges in Ireland who interested themselves to a much greater extent in politics than was done by the Judges in England. There were one or two Judges who entertained very strong opinions upon political questions in Ireland. One Judge might entertain very strong political bias in favour of one party; and when they found such a Judge trying an Election Petition it was only natural that some distrust should be felt. It might be true that such a Judge might be as impartial as a man could be, and as free from bias or prejudice of any kind as it was possible for a Judge to be; but the public would never believe that that was the case, for they were unable to disassociate a Judge from his political opinions, and that was more than usually the case on the trial of Petitions in Election cases. Whether the public impression were right or wrong, it, nevertheless, existed; and to enforce a due respect and estimation for the Bench it was necessary to avoid the possibility of its occurring. In common with some other hon. Members, he very much regretted the change that had taken place in transferring from that House to the Judges the decision upon Election Petitions. The House would have done well to retain its power to declare whether an Election was pure or not. He knew that there were very great objections to the Committees of that House, which were formerly charged with the trial of these cases. When the majority of the Committee was of one opinion there was no doubt as to the result of the case. Still, he did not think that that often occurred, for if it did public opinion would have most certainly condemned it. They knew that upon no matter was opinion in that House stronger than with regard to the conduct of Elections. He believed that they could have come to a time when a number of gentlemen could have been found to sit upon those Committees without any feeling upon the matter at all. But even if there were any objection to the Committees from any suspicion of partiality, the decision of so important a matter as the representation of a constituency should not have been left to a single Judge. Let them look, for one moment, at the case of the Galway Petition. In that case it was tried before a Judge, who was well known, at one time, to have had very strong political opinions. Yet his decision alone not merely unseated one Member, but actually seated another. Thus, it was in the hands of a single Judge to take the representation from a large majority of voters and to give it to a minority. The decision of that Judge placed in the House a Gentleman who was supported by a very small minority of the voters. He remembered its being said in one case—"That man calls himself my Member; but I am one of the majority, and I never voted for him." That was a scandal; but it was one which might occur any day under the present system, although not to so marked an extent as it had done. Perhaps it would be absurd to return to the old system; but they might prevent the decisions in cases of Elections being left to depend upon one single Judge, who might be influenced by political feeling. That could readily be remedied by putting the decision in the hands of two—if not three—Judges.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that if there was any class of public functionaries who ought to be safe from discussions of that kind it was the Judges who sat upon the justice seat. Nothing was more injurious than to have discussions of that character raised upon the Judges who administered justice; and, therefore, he thought it peculiarly unfortunate that political trials—as Election Petitions were—should have to be tried by one Judge, and especially in a country like Ireland. There could be no doubt that some most regrettable discussions concerning the partiality or impartiality of some of the Irish Judges with regard to Election Petitions had arisen, and principally, perhaps, from the great distinctions between England and Ireland. He did hope that they were going to have a better future; but, hitherto, it had been notorious that the appointments to the Bench in Ireland had been made from political lawyers; whereas in England, for a long time past, it had been equally notorious that men were appointed to the Bench because of their professional eminence and personal fitness, irrespective of Party considerations. To take the case of the last appointed Judge in England—Mr. Justice Bowen—he might observe that he never had a seat in that House at all. In Ireland Judges were appointed wholly for political reasons; and, as a rule, no man had been elevated to the Bench unless he had done Party service, either inside or outside of the House. He would remind the Government of a discussion which took place in respect of the very last appointment to the Bench in Ireland. Mr. Justice Fitzgibbon, than whom no better man could have been appointed, was no sooner raised to the Bench than the Conservative journals began to ask—Did he pay £10 to the Constitutional Club? Was he not suspected of Liberal opinions? He thought that kind of talk was a reproach to justice in Ireland. Instead of saying that the new Judge was a man eminent in his Profession—as he undoubtedly was—and that he was a man of unblemished integrity, and of the highest character, the journals only fixed upon a question of Party subscriptions to see whether he had qualified himself. Let them look at the other Judges—he would not mention names, feeling that it was only in extremities that the names of Judges should be mentioned upon the floor of that House, because they could not be heard in their own defence; he had never hesitated to express his opinion of the Judges in Ireland, where they could lay hands upon him—but he would not abuse his privileges in that House. A man who was most sure of attaining to the Bench in Ireland was the man who was most strongly a Party man; but, nevertheless, there was no other country which could produce a Judiciary of, with occasionally a few exceptions, a higher character, or of greater ability, than Ireland. There was no doubt of the integrity of the Irish Bench in issues between man and man; but the moment they began to try Party issues suggestions were raised as to Party motives, and the strong opinions that were delivered lost their force, because the impartiality of the Election Judge was doubted. The famous Galway case was naturally referred to. In that celebrated case, which had aroused the feeling, even in England, that there was a necessity for a second Judge, it was undoubted that the Judge was one of the strongest of partizans. The language of his judgment was rather suited to the political platform than the Judicial Bench. He would press upon the Government, for the sake of the Judges, and for the sake of the Judicial Bench, to take the decision of Election cases from one Judge, and to place it either in the hands of two or three Judges. He should prefer also that, if necessary, there should be an appeal to the Court. When they had a General Election in Ireland, if one Judge only tried the Election Petitions, let not the House of Commons be surprised if unfortunate suspicions were raised against Judge A, or Judge B, or Judge C. He would appeal to the Government to rescue the Judges from those suspicions—it was due to the character of the Irish Judiciary—that they should cease to have in that House those unhappy discussions with regard to the partiality of the Irish Judges.

MR. PARNELL hoped that before the next General Election the desirability would be seen of appointing more than one Judge for the trial of Election Petitions. He did not suppose that Parliament would ever go back to the old plan of trying Election Petitions itself. So far as he could see, there were many advantages in not having Election Petitions tried by Parliament, where Party considerations must come into play, but rather by the Judges of the land. But it was essentially necessary that they should adopt such a system of trial as should avoid any possibility of a charge of partizanship, or Party, or religious bias, being brought against the Judges who tried the case. In Ireland, it had, unfortunately, happened that that had not been the case. All the Petitions that had been tried in Ireland, with one exception, had shown that the Judges had not been above Party considerations. If they went back to the celebrated County Galway trial by Mr. Justice Keogh, that trial made the name of the Irish Judiciary infamous throughout the world. Even in America, where the Judges were not celebrated for their purity, that decision was considered a perfect monstrosity of judicial decisions. It was said that they wanted to be above clerical interference, and therefore it was necessary to select Judges who would properly perform their duty; but they did not carry out their object in that matter, for all their attempts in that direction had recoiled only upon themselves. It was too late to attempt to convert the Irish people by Act of Parliament, or by persecution. All attempts to convert the Irish people to the religion of England had only resulted in the fact that the Irish people were more devotedly attached to the Roman Catholic religion than any other people on the face of the earth. England had far better leave those matters to the good sense of all the parties concerned, instead of adopting a system according to their ideas, in order to meet certain difficulties that might or might not exist in Ireland. It had better leave all those questions to be settled by the good sense of the parties concerned. Interference would only lead to results that were not anticipated; and, instead of being calculated to remedy the evil supposed to exist, it would only increase it. A question had been put by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, as to whether Mr. Justice Lawson himself chose to try the Galway Petition instead of trying the Drogheda Petition, which was first on the list? The Galway Borough Petition was one which arose from a bye-Election; but the Drogheda Borough Petition arose from the General Election. According to the statement of the Attorney General for Ireland the Judges tried those Petitions according to seniority; and the Galway Borough

Petition ought, therefore, to have been tried by Mr. Justice Barry, when the Drogheda Petition would have fallen to the lot of Mr. Justice Lawson. What happened was exactly the reverse. It was evidently seen by the authorities, who made arrangements in those matters, that the Galway Borough Petition was of such a character that there was a very great chance that if an unscrupulous Judge was sent down to try it a favourable decision might be arrived at; whereas, on the other hand, the Drogheda Election Petition was of such a character that it could not possibly make much difference who tried it. Therefore, Mr. Justice Lawson was sent down to try the Galway Petition, and Mr. Justice Barry was sent to try the Election Petition in Drogheda. That was wrong, for they ought to have stuck to the rota; and if that had been done they would have avoided the unfortunate scandal which had occurred. The Irish Judges were not like the English Judges; the whole system had been deliberately designed, in order that it might be made use of as a powerful instrument against the march of the country. The Bar in Ireland formerly gave the Government a considerable amount of trouble; and it was, therefore, arranged, as a part of the programme, that a system of offices should be instituted of such a character that there should be one Government place for every two lawyers in Ireland. Every other man, when he went to the Bar, was taught to look to Government authority as the "end all and be all" of his career. He did not, as in England, go to the Bar to learn the law and to work his way up in his Profession, step by step, and, perhaps, eventually to attain the Bench or high office; but he went to the Bar in Ireland with the deliberate intention—particularly if a young man of inferior ability and indifferent application, with the idea of obtaining an inferior place, either as a County Court Judge or assistant barrister, or something of that kind under Government. Then if such a man got into Parliament, and, after a few years, the political Party of which he was a supporter succeeded to power, he succeeded to the Office of Irish Attorney or Solicitor General, and all his professions of patriotism vanished. The next step was that he was made a Judge, and was found trying Election Petitions, and sentencing political prisoners. This was the system against which he and his Friends in that House desired to protest, on the present as on other occasions; and in so protesting they wished to place on record their opinion that the political and social circumstances in England and Ireland were so different that the system which might work well in the former was utterly useless in the last-named country. It was out of the question to say that a satisfactory trial of an Election Petition could be got in Ireland, if it was to be tried by one Judge as in England. In fact, he was surprised that the Government should attempt to maintain the present state of things in Ireland; and he hoped that, before the General Election, the Government would remove this great scandal and reproach from the Irish Bar and Bench, and provide that Election Petitions should be tried in that country by three Judges, instead of by one as at present.

MR. BIGGAR hoped that, whatever was done, it would never again be possible for Judge Lawson to sit as sole Judge in the hearing of any Election Petition. Within his recollection, the only Judges hearing Election Petitions in Ireland who had proved needlessly corrupt were Mr. Justice Lawson and Mr. Justice Keogh.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that such a direct charge as the hon. Member brought against a Judge was one which could only be constitutionally brought in the form of an Address to the Crown, praying for the removal of the Judge whose conduct was impeached. The hon. Member was incurring a grave responsibility in using the terms he had just used.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not suggest that either of the Judges he had referred to had been actuated in the course they took by any desire to obtain money from either of the parties to the Petitions; but he did maintain that they had acted in a most frightful manner, and that Justice Keogh had distinguished himself particularly in this respect in his conduct while trying and giving judgment in the Galway Election Petition trial. That judgment was, in his opinion, utterly dishonest, for the language in which it was couched was such as no gentleman—to say nothing of the fact that he was a Judge—ought to have used. It was now known that when the Judge ended his days he was insane; and it was, therefore, possible that when he pronounced the Galway judgment he was either under the influence of insanity or strong drink. Whether this was or was not the case had never been cleared up; but it must be perfectly obvious to anyone that his judgment was an outrage on justice. During the time that Justices Keogh and Lawson were colleagues they went the same Circuit together, and the one was always perfectly ready to endorse the other's opinion, whenever questions were raised by counsel.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that this was not relevant to the Vote before the Committee.

MR. BIGGAR bowed to the decision; but contended that if the public had no confidence in Judges when they were trying general issues, they were not likely to have that confidence when Election Petitions were being tried by the same learned gentlemen, whose decisions might place Members in that House who, in no adequate manner, represented the views of the constituencies whom they, nominally, represented.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he was not desirous to prolong the irrelevant debate which had sprung up; but he must protest against the personal attacks which had been made upon certain learned Judges—one of whom was now dead—who had, he believed, honestly discharged their duties. A legitimate opportunity of expressing adverse opinions as to the mode in which Election Petitions were tried would occur when the Bill relating to that question was before the House. If the Business of Parliament had gone on smoothly this particular measure might have been proceeded with in the present Session.

MR. SHAW said, he should vote for the proposal of the hon. Member for Dungarvan on principle, and not on account of the personal attacks which he and some other hon. Members had made on certain Irish Judges; because he did not think there were any Judges on the Irish Bench who would wilfully act in a corrupt manner. At the same time, he thought there was room for an improvement in the existing law in respect of the manner in which Election Petitions were tried in Ireland; and he hoped the Attorney General would, before the next General Election, endeavour to hit upon a plan by means of which a remedy could be found.

MR. O'DONNELL said, it was from no feeling of personal resentment or disappointment that, in the course of the debate, he had felt it his duty to make charges against certain Irish Judges; but he felt bound to repeat that Justice Lawson had given judgments directly contrary to the evidence before him, and, if an opportunity was given to him by the Government, he would prove the truth of this allegation. This was particularly the case in reference to the Galway Petition, when Justice Lawson said that he (Mr. O'Donnell) had held a meeting of butchers in order to terrorize over the constituency. There was no evidence before the Judge in support of this view; but there was evidence to show that the tradesmen and freemen of Galway had a right to hold meetings, and to vote, and that the butchers in question were not a mere body of roughs, as suggested by the Judge, who had taken part in a movement whose sole object it was to intimidate the meeting which had been called, unless that meeting was favourable to his (Mr. O'Donnell's) views. There were 20 points on which he could have proved that the judgment of Mr. Justice Lawson was wrong; but he was unable to do so, because the Judge imputed to him the personal stain of having directly communicated with the butchers in question, and induced them to take the part in the meeting which he alleged against them. Reference had been made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland to the Government Bill in reference to Corrupt Practices at Elections; and he ventured to say that that Bill would have the distinct effect of worsening the existing state of thing.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the hon. Member was not in Order in discussing the provisions of a Bill which was before the House.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he was bound to defer to the ruling of the Chairman; but it seemed somewhat hard that he could say nothing as to a Bill which had been referred to as likely to remove the grievances complained of, and which he did not believe would have any such effect.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Chief Secretary for Ireland did not refer to the provisions of the Bill, but simply mentioned the fact of its existence.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he would, then, be content with repeating his opinion that there was a consensus of opinion in Ireland in opposition to the present mode of trying Election Petitions in that country.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he had for many years enjoyed the honour and pleasure of being acquainted with Mr. Justice Lawson, and he wished to express his opinion—as that learned Judge had been attacked—that there was not on the Bench in any European country a more high-minded, conscientious, and pains-taking Judge than Mr. Justice Lawson was. The statement that he had voluntarily suppressed or invented any evidence was as void of foundation as any statement made in the House. It was the duty of every Irish Member to defend a Judge who had been so frequently and so unmercifully assailed in that House as Mr. Justice Lawson had been.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought the statement of the hon. Member for Dungarvan must be taken notice of apart from his Motion. The statement in question did not embody the manner in which the character of one of the Judges of the land ought to be dealt with, either in that House or elsewhere. The hon. Member for Dungarvan had said that he would prove the charges he brought against Mr. Justice Lawson if the Government would give him an opportunity of doing so; but he would point out to the hon. Member that he could make that opportunity for himself, by putting on the Paper a Notice of his intention to move an Address to the Crown praying for the removal of the Judge from the Bench. This would be a fair and legitimate way of dealing with the matter; but to throw imputations broadcast was unfair in itself, injurious to the administration of justice, and contrary to the practice and Constitution of this country.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he agreed with the general principle which had been laid down by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just addressed the Committee; but he would remind the Committee that he was debarred from taking the course suggested by the line pursued by Mr. Justice Lawson, in the first instance, which shut him out of the House altogether. He should certainly take preliminary steps in the direction suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford; and if he received support on that occasion he should proceed to the further step which was suggested by the hon. and learned Member.

MR. GRAY said, he did not propose to enter into the question of the merits or demerits of any particular Judge. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had said that the proper time to discuss this question was when the Corrupt Practices Bill came before the House, and he had intimated that the Bill must be passed before the Elections took place. The late Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) took the deepest interest in this subject, and for three Sessions to his (Mr. Gray's) knowledge, and possibly longer, he impressed on the Government the necessity of such a Bill. Every Session he was met by a promise to introduce a Bill in the following year; but every year he was put off. A Bill had been introduced this year; but it had been kept back so long that it could not now be passed into an Act, and he (Mr. Gray) feared that there was no real determination on the part of the Government to pass such a measure before the General Election.

MR. O'CONOR said, he took very great interest in this subject; but he had not addressed the Committee in regard to it, because he thought it would be out of Order, in discussing on this Vote a Government Bill. As regarded, however, what had been said by his hon. Friend, he would remind him, even if the Government Bill passed, they would be in the same position as before in regard to this matter.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 182: Majority 156.—(Div. List, No. 197.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(9.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. PARNELL said, this Vote involved many questions not yet discussed this Session, and the discussion of which had been postponed for a variety of reasons. It was considered desirable, when the Votes for the Scotch and English Prisons were before the Committee, that they should wait until they had the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the conduct of prisons. That Report had been only printed and distributed among Members that morning, and they had not had an opportunity of considering it. The question of prison flogging was postponed from the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill until they could reach those Votes, in order not to delay the progress of that Bill. As there were a number of questions with reference to these Votes which could not be dealt with at that hour of the night, he trusted the Government would agree to postpone it until to-morrow, and proceed with some other Business, when they would be able to take the second reading of several Bills. He begged to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Mr. J. LOWTHER observed, that the hon. Gentleman had recently been occupied with another matter, which, although connected with the representation of the people, had necessitated his absence from his place upon a recent occasion; and he, therefore, was apparently not aware that this Vote had been under discussion for more than an hour. [An hon. MEMBER: But at 3 o'clock in the morning.] This Vote occupied a considerable amount of discussion, and other questions, besides those mentioned by the hon. Member, were raised, especially with reference to the medical staff. At that time, after the discussion, a proposition was made that the Vote should be postponed on account of the lateness of the hour; and in order to meet that feeling it was postponed. They had now devoted another whole night to the Irish Estimates, having previously withdrawn two others in accordance with the wish of Irish Members; and he really thought it would be very unreasonable at that hour which, at this period of the Session, was a comparatively early hour. It was the last they had to pass that night; and he did hope, under all circumstances, especially as the Vote had already been largely discussed, the Government would be allowed to take it.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER begged to remind the right hon. Gentleman that the discussion to which he had alluded was principally whether the Vote should be postponed or not, and though there was some high conversation there was no general discussion of the Vote itself. The Committee had now been very hard at work all night; and it would be quite as well if they could pass on to other Votes, especially as they would probably make quite as much progress in that way as by going straight on. He merely suggested that, and was not going to press it on the Government; but he thought there was a great deal of force in what the right hon. Gentleman had said about the period of the Session. Still, they did not want to go on with their work in the dark, and no one would wish to pass Votes until they had been fairly debated.

MR. PARNELL said, of course, he was very sensible that they should yield to the Government as much as possible at that period of the Session; but there were points of the utmost importance on this Vote which must be discussed. ["Go on!"] It was all very well for hon. Members to say "Go on!" but after working in the Committee since a quarter to 4 he considered they had done a good day's work. For his part, he felt absolutely unable to do justice at that time, and under the circumstances of the case, to the very important questions raised by this Vote. Let him remind the Committee what those points were. First of all, there was the question of the rules to be adopted under the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. When this matter was before the House of Commons on the Prison Act the Home Secretary gave him a distinct pledge that the prison rules he would adopt for untried prisoners should be extended to prisoners arrested under any suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. What was the real fact? The Home Secretary, by the way in which he had drawn his rules, had distinctly excluded prisoners arrested under any suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act from the benefit of the exceptional and lenient rules which he had adopted for untried prisoners. They were, therefore, left in the same position in which they always were, as regarded prisoners arrested under any suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. If the Government should choose to suspend that Act again, a proceeding they might always resort to at a moment's notice—last time, he believed, it was done on a Sunday—they would be left without any rule for the treatment of the prisoners arrested; and it was on the last occasion, according to the testimony of a distinguished medical man in Dublin, worse than that endured by persons undergoing a sentence of penal servitude. Then, next, they had the question of prison flogging. Now, they had no flogging in their borough gaols, though it existed in the convict prisons, where it was of a most brutal and horrible character. He saw, the other day, the sister of a man named Tiernay, or O'Conner, a political prisoner, who was flogged in Spike Island for attempting to escape. He received four dozen lashes. He was put in irons. He was kept in irons for eight months, and he had solitary confinement for 21 days, on bread and water. This might happen again, for the management of Spike Island was simply infamous, and he wished to have the opportunity of exposing that management. Then there was the question of imprisonment in solitary cells. That was indulged in to a very large extent, merely at the option of the gaoler, and without the order of the Visiting Justices. There was no report made of any such punishment, or of the reasons why they were inflicted, or of the offences for which they were inflicted. There ought to be these reports; and yet they were now asked to vote this money to the Government without making any provision of that sort. It was impossible that he could do justice, at that hour of the night, to the questions which he wished to raise. If the Government were desirous of appearing to get through the Votes, he was willing that they should do so on condition that they gave him a fair opportunity on Report of raising the questions which he wished to raise with regard to this Vote. Those questions were of the utmost magnitude; and he could not allow the Session to pass without having an opportunity of bringing them properly before the House of Commons. The new prison system was admittedly experimental; and a number of subjects had to be considered in connection with it which had hitherto not been touched upon. The question of flogging was one which he had distinctly postponed until the present Vote came on for discussion, in order that the Government might carry the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill in time for it to be passed by the House of Lords; and he would be failing in his duty if he did not secure discussion of this important matter at the time when he had the power of doing so. He, therefore, trusted the Government would agree to the postponement of the Vote.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON agreed that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) should have an opportunity, on Report, of discussing the questions to which he had referred; and, therefore, if the Vote was allowed to be taken then, he should be willing that the discussion should take place to-morrow, when the Government proposed to report all the Votes which had been taken. If, however, there was not time on Report for the proposed discussion, he would take care that an opportunity should be given on another evening.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. RYLANDS desired to call the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to items of increase—in salaries, £2,002; victualling, £1,865; fuel, light, and water, £1,945. These items required consideration. With respect to the victualling of prisons, unless there had been a large increase in the number of prisoners, he was quite unable to understand how this large additional sum had been incurred, especially as there had been a considerable fluctuation in the price of all kinds of food, which, in the case of the Vote for Lunatic Asylums, had resulted in a very material reduction of charge during the past year. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to give the Committee some explanation with regard to these items.

MR. SULLIVAN inquired if any arrangement had been made with respect to the medical officers of prisons, mentioned a few days previously to the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that the question of the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) raised a number of points which he had not had time to deal with since the conversation took place. The increase in the items referred to by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) was, in a great measure, due to the changes which had taken place in the prison system.

MR. RYLANDS could not agree that the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman was the right one. The change of system had been recommended to the House as a means of economy; but the Committee were now informed that the change had led to an increase of expense. He had a strong impression that the taking over of the prisons by the Government was likely to lead to an excess of expenditure, not only in England, but in Ireland and Scotland.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that as hon. Members were aware, an Inspector had to be appointed under the Act of Parliament, and the item of salaries would, in consequence, be increased. There had also been an increase in the fees connected with the Prison Board, in consequence of the new appointment. There had, he was sorry to say, been an increase of 234 prisoners; and he might observe that the sum of £18,000 under sub-head P was insufficient to defray the cost, even if no increase in the number of prisoners had taken place.

MR. RYLANDS called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that the charges for the Board of Inspectors did not come into the item to which he had alluded. If the right hon. Gentleman would look, he would observe that the items A, B, and C were those which had reference to the Board of Inspectors, while those he alluded to were for the salaries of the officers of the gaols. The addition of some 200 prisoners would not account for the great increase of charge occurring under this head. His object, in putting these questions, was to show the necessity which existed for some supervision, in order to control this increasing expenditure. At present, he did not know whether the Secretary to the Treasury took any trouble to look into the accounts of Irish prisons, or whether he thought it sufficient to look after the English and Scotch prisons only; but he would do well to examine the Estimates; because he (Mr. Rylands) was clear that under this Vote there was a tendency to greatly increased expenditure. Again, the Estimate did not include any expenditure on account of the manufacturing department, nor for the farming and garden work; but he saw, by a note at the end, that this would be deducted from the receipts, and that anything over would be paid into the Exchequer. That was a new mode of keeping accounts, but it would, he thought, be better to have an Estimate taken of the amount required, and then to set-off what was returned, so that the Committee might have a clear view of the result. The Home Secretary being now in his place, he took the opportunity of saying that there were grounds for complaint that in the first year that the Irish prisons came under the new management a very considerable increase had occurred in several items for which there appeared to be no justification, and that he hoped the next year would show the effects of greater economy.

MR. GRAY believed he could elucidate the increase in the cost of victualling prisons. When the prisons were under the old system the Boards of Superintendence of the various districts gave away all their contracts by public contract to the lowest tender; the remodelled Prison Board, however, did nothing of the kind; and the contracts were now constantly given away upon tenders which were very much above the lowest in amount, although the persons who sent in the lowest tenders were of good position, and capable of giving the fullest security for the execution of their contracts. This would probably account for the increase in the victualling expenditure more correctly than the explanation offered by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and would, doubtless, be accepted by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) in that sense. He thought if the Treasury would devote some attention to this subject, and say that where a man could give security for the performance of his contract his tender should not be excluded, that it would be conducive to public economy and to the credit of the Administration. Amongst other items, he saw in the Vote that the Chairman received £1,200 a-year; the Vice Chairman, £1,100 a-year; and "another member" of the Board, £1,000 a-year. He wished to know who was the other member, and whether he was a relative of any of the members of the Board? With regard to the victualling of prisons in Ireland, he wished to point out that, although the charge for this item had increased, considerable discontent existed with regard to the food supplied to prisoners. It would probably be remembered that, some little time ago, he had asked a question with reference to the verdict of a Coroner's Jury in the case of Patrick Grimes, who had died in Armagh Gaol. It had been stated that the withdrawal of the milk before given to prisoners, without the substitution of a corresponding amount of nutriment, rendered the diet of the prisoners insufficient to sustain life. The jury in the case attached to their verdict an intimation to the same effect, and forwarded a Memorial on the subject to the Lord Lieutenant. The question put to the right hon. Gentleman caused a considerable amount of laughter to be elicited by his reply, to the effect that a number of prisoners were upon the jury who had, naturally enough, an objection to the kind of food allowed them. However, according to his information, the Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant was signed by 12 individuals who were householders in the town, and not prisoners; and, in any case, a certificate was signed by the prison surgeon, testifying that sufficient food was not given to the prisoners to sustain life. This was a serious matter; but it had been passed over with a jocular answer, and no steps had been taken. Under this reformed Board they had—first, an increase in the cost of victualling; and, next, a reduction in the amount of nutriment supplied to the prisoners. Then came the fact that tenders of the lowest bidders were not accepted, as under the old system. These facts spoke loudly as to the diminution of real efficiency under the new system; and he agreed with the hon. Member for Burnley in saying that the sacrifice made by the local bodies throughout the country to relieve the rates would have no such effect, and was only a further step in the direction of centralization.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, there had, undoubtedly, been an increase generally in the expenditure, in consequence of the debits for the salaries of warders, governors, and so forth, rendered necessary by the new system, while the increase in the number of prisoners had also increased the charge for victualling.

MR. GRAY asked, whether the Chief Secretary for Ireland would give some assurance that in future contracts would be given to respectable persons upon sufficient security? Because his contention was, that the increased cost of victualling was due to the fact that, under the Prisons Act, a system had been initiated in Ireland of not giving contracts upon the lowest tenders. The feeling which existed in Ireland was that a political tinge was given to all these matters. His view was that, in affairs of public finance, a low price from respectable people, and upon good security, should be accepted. He did not mean to say that the lowest tender should be accepted in all cases; but that there should be good reason for its being refused. The right hon. Gentleman, he thought, should give an assurance that, as a general rule, the lowest tender should be accepted, and that intimation would, no doubt, be respected by the Board.

MR. J. LOWTHER could not accept the general principle that the lowest tender should be accepted; but promised that inquiries should be made into the subject. The third member of the Board referred to in the Estimates was Mr. O'Brien.

MR. LOWTHIAN BELL remarked, that the more the Vote was explained the less satisfactory it appeared. He should have imagined that the greater the amount spent in alterations the greater ought to be the economy. He was, therefore, quite unable to understand the great increase of nearly 30 per cent in the charge for fuel, light, and water.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that although, in the first place, there had been a considerable outlay, as must naturally be expected during a period of transition, the alterations, it was to be hoped, would eventually lead to economy and saving of expenditure. The item required for alterations, repairs, and buildings, was for works that would be executed during the present year.

MR. RYLANDS said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had fairly enough admitted that the taking over of the prisons by Government had resulted in increased expenditure. But what had the Government said on a former occasion? Was not the House told that there would be great economy effected by the prisons being taken out of the hands of the local authorities? The Secretary to the Treasury knew very well that the Government had said the change would be an economical one; but he (Mr. Rylands) ventured to say that there had since been an increase of charge in every item in which an increase was possible. He could only say that the Committee had a right to complain of this expenditure; and that if it went on next year at the same rate the right hon. Gentleman would find that hon. Members were prepared to move the reduction of the Vote. It was to be hoped that pressure would be brought to bear upon the officials in Ireland who had the control of this expenditure, in order to insure more economy in this Department.

MR. BIGGAR said, that the grievance of the prison chaplains was that they got only £100 a-year salary, no matter what might be the number of prisoners. If the right hon. Gentleman would turn to page 216 of the Estimates, he would find that the pay for a chaplain of the same class in England was from £100 to £200 per annum. In addition to that salary, a prison chaplain in England was granted an allowance for a residence. It was very clear, therefore, that the pay of an Irish prison chaplain was very much less than that of a gentleman in the same position in England. He would ask, was it right or proper that a prison chaplain in Ireland should not be paid at the same rate as prison chaplains in England? The gentleman to whom allusion had been made complained that the Protestant chaplain got £20 a-year more than he did, although there were fewer Protestant than Roman Catholic prisoners. He was disposed to rest the case for the increase in the salary upon two points—first, that it was an improper salary, as compared with other chaplains in Ireland; and, secondly, that it was less than was paid to English chaplains.

MR. J. LOWTHER remarked, that there was no distinction in respect of pay between chaplains of various religious denominations; they were paid on exactly the same scale, and without any reference to their religion. With respect to the adoption of the same scale of pay for prison chaplains in Ireland as for the same class in England, it was a branch of a larger subject, and he could not then enter into it.

MR. MELDON wished to draw attention to the case of a warder, named Kearney, formerly employed in the Richmond Penitentiary. He served for nearly 10 years in that prison; but at the commencement of the 10th year of his service he was afflicted with disease, and at the end of the 10th year was dismissed from his employment by the Board of Superintendence, on the ground that he could not live more than a few months. He was given a certificate of having completed 10 years' service, and that he had, during that period, always conducted himself with the greatest propriety; he had obtained rewards on different occasions from the Metropolitan Police, and had been complimented upon his conduct. The governor of the gaol where he was employed granted him a certificate of having served 10 years. But the Inspector General of Prisons alleged that the man had not been in the employment of the Richmond Penitentiary for 10 years. In point of fact, he wanted some five days to complete his 10 years' service. He was kept on some time, in order to complete the service; but the Inspector General said that the certificate was inaccurate, and that he was not entitled to obtain his pension for 10 years' service. He, therefore, refused absolutely to give the man his pension calculated upon 10 years' service. Some doubts were raised when the matter came before the Judge for adjudication; and as the man was not then in a fit state to enable him to appear the matter was decided against him. It was believed by many that that adjudication was erroneous. The Inspector General contended that the man was not entitled to any pension, but only to a small gratuity. Contrary to expectation the man got better, and was now tolerably well, and likely to live some few years. His case had been brought under his (Mr. Meldon's) notice, and he had suggested a Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant; for, so far as he could see, the Inspector General had acted in an utterly illegal manner. The man had received a certificate from the governor of the gaol in which he had served that he had completed his 10 years' service, and he only left the prison a few days before the end of the year owing to the state of his health, and it was also owing to the state of his health that he could not bring his case before the Judge. If those facts were established, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would grant the man the pension of which he had been deprived in the way he had described.

MR. J. LOWTHER promised to inquire into the case. If, as the hon. and learned Gentleman said, the man was only five days short of the 10 years' service, he was inclined to endorse the opinion which the hon. and learned Gentleman had expressed. He would most certainly look into the case.

MR. P. MARTIN said, that before they passed from that Vote he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the case of the prison surgeons. He understood the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to say that prison surgeons were not to have their salaries reduced if they refused to compound medicines. But it had been stated that notwithstanding the Prisons Board had issued circulars, insisting that surgeons, who were appointed before the Act came into operation, should undertake the office of compounding medicines, or otherwise they should forfeit a portion of their salary. He thought that system was a bad one which forced a surgeon to compound medicines at all. He would not, however, go into the matter, because it had been fully discussed, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had promised to take the matter into his consideration. He wished to remind the Chief Secretary that under the new Prisons Act a very considerable increase of duty had been thrown upon surgeons; they had now eight or nine new returns to make, and a large amount of their time was occupied; they had to make 52 weekly inspections, and four quarterly inspections during a year; and to discharge their duties properly they were obliged to occupy many hours of their time. It was an unreasonable thing to ask any prison surgeon either to compound medicines or to forfeit a portion of his salary. But it would be a grievous hardship and injustice to extend that rule to surgeons appointed before the Act. The general rule ought, on the contrary, to prevail, and all surgeons to receive extra pay for the new duties imposed on them under the provisions of the recent Act.

MR. MELDON remarked, that it would not give satisfaction if the prisons surgeons received the same salary at present as they had before the Act came into operation. The threat held out to them was that if they did not compound medicines they would be left in receipt of their present salaries. The threat was held out by the Prisons Board, in order to make surgeons comply with their requirements. He did not think it was right to make a surgeon do 10 times the work, and yet receive the same pay. He begged, again, to say that, in his opinion, the Chief Secretary would not meet the merits of the case, if he left the salaries of the prison surgeons at the same amount as at present.

MR. J. LOWTHER remarked, that if the hon. and learned Member had been in the House when the subject was under discussion on the previous occasion, he would have heard his statement that, in consequence of representations made to him by hon. Members and others, and also in consequence of the discussions which had taken place, he had put himself in communication with the Prisons Board, and was investigating the matter with a view to a satisfactory settlement.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

EAST INDIA LOAN (CONSOLIDATED FUND) BILL—[BILL 201.]

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Edward Stanhope, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Order for Committee read.

MR. FAWCETT said, that after the Division which took place on Friday he would venture to make a somewhat unusual appeal to the Government—namely, whether they could not make some other arrangement than they had done in the Bill? He had been looking into the provisions contained in the Bill, and more especially with reference to the respective amounts which India and England were to be called upon to contribute to the expenses of that war, and he did not think so large a proportion should be thrown upon India. He found that, out of 137 Members who voted for the second reading of the Bill no less than 29 were Members of the Government. Taking those from the majority, the result would be that the Government was in a minority of 17, in the opinion of independent Members. As there had been, practically, no attempt to place an Amendment with regard to the Bill on the Paper, he hoped that the Government would not proceed that night, but would, before taking the Bill, be able to make an announcement which would, to a certain extent, meet the views which had thus been so distinctly expressed.

MR. RYLANDS remarked, that he had voted against the second reading of the Bill; but he did not vote in favour of the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney. Many hon. Members who voted against the second reading of the Bill did so on various grounds which had relation to the manner in which the Government proposed to deal with the matter. They voted against the Government because they believed that the mode in which the Government was dealing with the question would form an objectionable precedent, and, therefore, they would rather that the Bill did not pass. He did not, however, take the same views with regard to the Bill as those which had been expressed by his hon. Friend. After the Division, the Government was perfectly justified in proceeding with the Bill notwithstanding the late period of the Session.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that he abstained from voting upon the second reading of that Bill; but he thought that if money clauses were to be put in the Bill they ought to vote against it. He did not think that they had anything to do with the Afghan War; and, for his own part—and he believed many hon. Members concurred with him—he did not see why a place, for instance, like the West of Ireland, should be made to pay for wars for the benefit of India. He should certainly vote for putting the whole of the expenses of the war upon India.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was disposed to agree with the view taken by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), that after the Division which took place the other day, when a majority was in favour of proceeding with the Bill, that it ought to be proceeded with. He did not think that the whole of those hon. Members who voted in the minority took the same view as the hon. Member for Hackney, although a proportion might have done so. The question was one upon which he did not think that the Government should change its mind. The proposal made by the Indian Government had been accepted by the English Government early in the Session, and arrangements were made for carrying it into effect. Various objections were brought forward to the proposal, and they had a discussion the other day upon the subject. Although the majority in favour of the Government was not a very large one, yet the House did decide to go on with the Bill, and the Government could not undertake to propose any alterations in it. If they did as the hon. Member for Hackney desired, he did not think that there would be any chance of passing the Bill. In his opinion, they must go on with the Bill in its present shape.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Temporary advance of £2,000,000 out of Consolidated Fund to Government of India).

MR. CHILDERS wished to make a suggestion to the Government and the Committee upon this clause. The proposal was one which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) strongly advocated the other evening—namely, to make loans with interest on the ordinary conditions of loans, and that the interest should be re-paid by the Government of India to the Consolidated Fund. That would not disturb the loan account, for the amount would be borrowed on the one side and lent upon the other. The matter would then appear in the Consolidated Fund charges, and it would be effected in accordance with the ordinary rule. Very few words would introduce that provision into the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER did not think that there was any reason for adopting the proposal, and that the transaction would be quite apparent. They proposed to keep the monies borrowed for that purpose outside the credit, and to make it appear that the amount received from India was the amount in payment of the loan and interest. He did not see the advantage of making it in three re-payments.

MR. CHILDERS thought that the debt from India should be charged the Consolidated Fund every year, and he would suggest an Amendment in the Bill accordingly.

MR. COURTNEY remarked, that no time was mentioned in the Bill at which the re-payments were to begin. He understood that the first instalment was to be made in the year after this; it would, therefore, be necessary to provide for seven annual instalments, and he would suggest that this should be inserted in the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it would be better to leave the clause as it stood. The intention was that seven annual instalments should be made, beginning in 1881. He did not think it would be desirable to tie up the hands of the Government in this matter.

MR. CHILDERS moved to add the words, "but the interest so received shall be re-paid to the Government of India."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. FAWCETT understood the Bill to contain nothing which would prevent the money being re-paid in five or six annual instalments. He would, therefore, suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had said the intention was that it should be paid off in seven, that some words should be introduced to make that intention perfectly clear.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that no doubt the intention was to have re-payment by seven annual instalments, beginning next financial year; but he saw no reason for tying up the hands of the Indian Government, who might, perhaps, agree to make the re-payment within a shorter period.

MR. COURTNEY pointed out that, according to the strict interpretation of the clause, re-payment would be made in eight annual instalments.

MR. CHILDERS said that, undoubtedly, strictly speaking, there would be eight instalments; and this might give rise to difficulty, seeing that the clause provided for equal annual instalments.

MR. FAWCETT said, it would not be desirable to give an opportunity to the Government of India to defer re-payment; such a plan would introduce confusion into the accounts. He would suggest that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should re-consider the question before Report.

Mr. Childers

MR. E. STANHOPE thought great inconvenience might result from not allowing the Indian Government to arrange the most convenient time for re-payment. At present, certain annual instalments were provided for, and that arrangement would be carried out, unless something were to arise to make it desirable to adopt another course. He presumed there would be no objection to earlier re-payment than in the period mentioned in the clause.

MR. RYLANDS said, under the system which seemed to be favoured by the Government, it might possibly happen that in three, four, or five years, the Indian Government might drop the whole thing; whereas, if they began to pay year by year, the instalments would be regularly kept up.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER would confer with his noble Friend the Secretary of State for India upon the matter.

LOCAL COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND) [SALARIES, &c.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of salaries and pensions of officers, and of compensation to them for loss of emoluments; also in the event of the Honourable Stearn Ball Miller becoming the remaining Judge of the Court of Bankruptcy, of the payment to him of additional salary in consideration of additional duties which may be imposed upon him under the provisions of any Act of the present Session for the establishment of Local Courts of Bankruptcy in Ireland."

MR. MELDON called attention to the circumstance that, under the proposed Bill, the interests of the two messengers of the Bankruptcy Court had been entirely neglected by the Government. Not only was the position of these officers one of great importance and responsibility—their duties being to travel to all parts of the country, and to take possession of the property of bankrupts—but they were men of education, refinement, and superior social position. Their salaries of £250 a-year were increased by fees for travelling, over and above their actual expenses. Now, it was proposed to do away with these latter emoluments; and there was, seemingly, no provision whatever for recompensing the officers in question. He could not understand why these gentlemen should be left out in the cold, unless it was that, from their title of “messengers,” it was wrongly inferred that they were merely subordinate officers. Nor did he approve of passing the Bill into law in its present shape. There was, certainly, no reason why these gentlemen should be deprived of emoluments amounting to 15s. a-day over and above their salaries.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, this question would be more properly raised in Committee. The clauses of the Bill had been very carefully drawn.

Resolution agreed to; to be reported To-morrow.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND) [REPAYMENT OF ADVANCES.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, of any deficiency in the Pension Fund which may arise in the repayment to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt of any Advances made by them for the purposes of any Act of the present Session for improving the position of the Teachers of National Schools in Ireland.”

MR. CHILDERS said, a question of considerable interest arose in connection with this subject; and although it was too late to enter upon its discussion he should only be doing right to call the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury thereto. It was proposed to charge this deficiency upon the Consolidated Fund. The Bill supposed that there should be formed a compensation fund, out of certain monies coming from the Irish Church Fund, to the extent of £13,000, and that certain contributions should also come from the salaries of the National School teachers, and upon the fund so created should be charged pensions to the school teachers, according to a scale set out in the Act. The Resolution was necessary to enable any excess of calls upon the pension fund to be defrayed, from time to time, out of the public funds. But he wanted to point out, assuming that the proposal was sound—and upon that point he did not think it right to express any opinion on that occasion—that it was, in his view, essential that the actual expenditure for these pensions should in form be charged in the Votes of Parliament. It would be altogether abnormal and incorrect that gentlemen who had been school teachers should receive pensions except out of the same fund in form from which their salaries came. The Estimates should contain the whole charge for Irish National Schools—salaries, contingencies, and pensions. The same course ought to be followed in this case as was followed in the Greenwich Hospital Act, relating to seamen of the Navy—that policy being perfectly sound and exactly analogous to the present proposal. It was on that occasion arranged that the pensions should, in substance, be charged upon the Seamen's Fund; but in form they were charged upon the Votes of Parliament, re-payment being made out of the fund to meet the Votes. He, therefore, thought that the Resolution should be “that the deficiency should be charged on the Votes of Parliament.”

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON would rather postpone the Resolution to another day, in order to consult with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had had the question under his consideration. He quite saw the force of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. COURTNEY hoped, if any deficiency occurred in the pension fund, that when the question came to be discussed the House would be furnished with more exact information upon subjects concerning which they were now completely in the dark.

SHIPPING CASUALTIES INVESTIGATIONS (RE-HEARING) BILL.

(Viscount Sandon, Mr. J. G. Talbot.)

[BILL 262.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

VISCOUNT SANDON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that shipping casualties were now tried by a considerable variety of tribunals ; some cases were tried by the stipendiary magistrates, and some by the Wreck Commissioners. The objection which existed to the jurisdiction at present was that there was no power to obtain a re-hearing, and the only thing that could be done was to refer the matter to the Board of Trade. He had known many cases to be referred where fresh evidence had come out, or other reasons had made it apparent that there had been a miscarriage of justice. As he had stated, the only mode at present to meet those cases was by the authority of the Board of Trade ; but he did not think it right that the decision of a Court should be set aside by the Board of Trade. The decisions in these cases were of the greatest importance to the masters of the vessels concerned, for the suspension of their certificates meant the ruin of their prospects in life. There was a very strong feeling that there ought to be some alteration ; and he would, therefore, ask the House to allow him to take the second reading of the Bill, the object of which was to provide that, in cases of miscarriage of justice, there should be power to order a re-hearing. He believed that the provisions of the Bill would remedy the grievance to which he had referred. The 2nd clause of the Bill took the appointments of the assessors from the Judge, and placed them in the hands of the authorities in London. That would remedy a grievance that had long been felt in the Merchant Service.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Viscount Sandon.)

CANAL BOATS ACT, 1878.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that he rose to ask a Question on a subject of some interest. It had been ascertained that no fewer than 100,000 persons were living in canal boats, and in 1877 an Act was passed with the view of improving the sanitary and educational position of these people. It was now said that, whereas a great deal had been done under that Act to improve the sanitary arrangements of the boats, the educational part of the Act of 1877 had not yet been carried into effect. There was, of course, a great difficulty in regard to the educational portion of the subject. The Act provided that the children on the boats should be considered as belonging to the local board district at which the boat was registered ; but it was no easy matter to catch those children, because, if you tried to find them at one place, you would discover that they had moved off somewhere else. It was, therefore, to be feared that very little progress had been made in their education. It would be satisfactory to learn that vigorous efforts were being made in respect both of the sanitary arrangements of the boats and the education of the children, who were numbered by thousands. He, therefore, begged to ask the Lord President of the Council, Whether there is any objection to laying on the Table of the House a Report of the proceedings which have been taken since 1877 under the provisions of the Act 40 and 41 Vict. cap. 60, for the registration of canal boats used as dwellings and the education of the children dwelling therein?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON admitted that the subject was one of great importance. The annual Report of the Local Government Board for last year had been presented, and would shortly be in the hands of their Lordships, and would contain an account of the proceedings taken under the Act relating to canal boats. It must be remembered that that Act was passed in 1877, but only came into operation last year. Prior to that date the Local Government Board had issued regulations regarding the registration of the boats in respect of their number and of the number of persons whom they were to accommodate, and also defining the authorities who were to have charge of the work of registration and the districts in which the boats were to be registered. The number of districts was 99. Boats had already been registered in 62 out of these 99 districts. The total number of boats registered was 4,964, and that of the persons for whom there was accommodation 22,206. Therefore, as regarded registration, very considerable progress had been made by the local authorities in giving effect to the Act. Of course, when such a large number of persons were concerned, and with interests of such considerable magnitude, it was impossible that the provisions of an Act which only came into operation last year could be as yet carried out. With regard to the education of the children, the Act provided that the children should be registered where the boats were registered, but that if the parents could show to the school authorities that the children were receiving sufficient instruction in other places it should be taken that the Act was being complied with. The Local Government Board had not yet received Reports as to the effect of the Act in respect of the education of the children; but the local authorities must have been much occupied up to the present time with the necessary and preliminary step of registration. When that object was accomplished he hoped that, before the end of the present year, the Local Government Board would obtain from the local authorities statistics as to the results of the Act in the matter of education. As soon as possible, after those Reports were obtained, they would be laid on the Table; but it would be impossible to produce any detailed information on the point at the present moment, though the local authorities had shown every disposition to carry out the Act of Parliament by what they had done in the way of registration. He now begged to lay on the Table the Returns received by the Local Government Board with regard to the registration of the boats and the numbers to be accommodated on board. (Parl. Paper No. 167.)

THE NAVAL AND MILITARY FORCES —CORPORAL PUNISHMENTS.

ADDRESS FOR A RETURN.

THE DUKE OF BUCOLEUCH (for the Marquess of LOTHIAN) moved—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Return of the number of persons in Her Majesty’s Naval and Military forces who have been punished by flogging during the five years ending the 31st of December, 1878; the Return to state the number of lashes in each case and the crime for which the punishment was inflicted.”

His noble Friend believed that very erroneous impressions existed in the public mind on the subject of flogging in the Army and Navy, and that the production of such a Return as he now moved for would show that flogging was only seldom resorted to.

VISCOUNT BURY said, with regard to the Military Forces there was no objection to the Return. Of course, he could not speak for the Naval Forces; but he did not think there would be any objection to it in their case either. The Return would be a satisfactory one, because, as his noble Friend had surmised, it would show that flogging was very rarely resorted to—never, except on active service.

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—INCIDENCE OF EXPENSES.

QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he can inform the House in what proportion the cost of the Zulu War will be borne by the Exchequers of the United Kingdom and the Cape Colonies respectively; and, whether any estimate has been formed of the entire cost of the war up to the present time?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have given Notice that on Thursday I propose, as the First Order of the Day, to move a Vote of Credit with reference to this War, and I shall then take an opportunity of making such a statement as I am enabled to make with regard to it.

NAVY—THE ROYAL MARINES—SERGEANTS.—QUESTION.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, after consulting with his colleagues as promised, he has been able to make any, and, if so, what improvement in the pensions and pay of the sergeant majors, staff and other sergeants of the Royal Marines, so as to place them upon an equality with those who hold similar rank in the Army; whether he will take into consideration the propriety of extending to the Royal Marines the advantages of the Warrant rank recently given to the Army; and, inasmuch as sergeants of the Royal Marines are called upon to provide drill instruction for Militia Regiments, whether he will take steps to throw open to them the appointment of Militia quartermaster?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the question of assimilating the pensions of the non-commissioned officers of Marines to those of the Army is still under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government; but I am unable to say whether it will be possible to communicate to the House before the end of the Session the result arrived at. With regard to pay, and to the question of placing the Marines on an equality with the Army, I can only say that the two Services differ on very many points in regard to which the advantages are by no means wholly with the Army; that it is not intended to apply to the Marines the same rank and pay that may, from time to time, be given to the Army, as it is not possible to place them on precisely similar conditions of service. The latter part of the right hon. Gentleman's Question is a matter for the War Department.

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND)
(No. 2) BILL—10 GEO. IV. CAP. 7.

QUESTION.

MR. P. J. SMYTH asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If Section 16 of 10 George 4, c. 7, has been repealed; if not, to what extent, if any, the working of the University Education Bill might be affected by it; and, if, having regard to said Bill, it is his intention to introduce a Bill for the repeal of the Penal Clauses of the Catholic Emancipation Act?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON): Sir, the section of the Catholic Emancipation Act referred to has not been absolutely or entirely repealed; but it has been largely qualified by subsequent legislation. Thus it has been expressly repealed as to the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham by 34 & 35 Vict., c. 25, s. 8, and is virtually repealed as to the University of Dublin (except as to the Divinity School) by 36 Vict., c. 21—known as Fawcett's Act. In my opinion, this section will not interfere with the working of the University proposed to be created by Charter under the provisions of the University Education Bill.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—PASSENGER STEAMERS—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to a relation in the "Times" of July 24th of an accident resulting in the loss of life of a stoker named Weeks, of the passenger steamer "Albert Edward," plying between Folkestone and Boulogne, in the attempt to save a suicide; whether the means of rescue by boats are, in his opinion, adequate as regards the number of passengers licensed to be conveyed in the steamers crossing the Channel; and, whether he is satisfied that the condition of and means of lowering the boats in case of collision or other accident are such as they should be?

MR. J. G. TALBOT: Sir, our attention has been drawn to the subject of the hon. Baronet's Question. An inquiry has been ordered by the Board of Trade into the circumstances of the melancholy loss of life on the occasion to which he refers, and until a Report has been received of that inquiry I should not like to pronounce an opinion upon the condition of the boats in the Channel steamers. With regard to the number of boats carried in each steamer, I think I answered a Question earlier in the Session, and I can only repeat what I then said—namely, that the Merchant Shipping Acts do not compel passenger ships to carry boats and rafts sufficient to accommodate the whole of their crews and passengers; that such a number of boats would seriously interfere with the management of the ship and even if they could be provided for on board ship it would be almost impossible to lower them in case of emergency. I may add that, as regards boats, their number and contents are settled by Statute according to the tonnage of the vessel.

VACCINATION PROSECUTIONS—DEWSBURY UNION.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is aware of the large number of persons, consisting of batches of from forty to seventy at a time, against whom, in some cases previous convictions have been recorded, proceedings have lately been taken in the Dewsbury Union for not having had their children vaccinated; whether such proceedings are not contrary to the spirit of the instructions of the Local Government Board in the Letter of the 17th September 1875 to the Guardians of the Evesham Union, and in defiance also of a Resolution in the Minute Book of the Dewsbury Guardians; and, whether he will consider if the system of paying the vaccination officers by fees ought not to be put an end to, as affording undue encouragement to legal proceedings?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, I am aware that proceedings have been taken lately against a large number of persons in the Dewsbury Union for neglecting to cause their children to be vaccinated, and I fear they may have been encouraged in that course by those who are intrusted with the administration of the law. Proceedings are taken under three heads—1st, for a penalty for neglect to have the child vaccinated; 2nd, there may be a summons to show cause why an order should not be made for the vaccination; and, 3rd, there may be a summons for a penalty for non-compliance with the order. The vaccination officer has written to me, stating that in no single instance has he taken proceedings under the third head against a defaulter previously convicted under the first. That being so, his conduct has not been contrary to the instructions of the Local Government Board, nor to the spirit of the letter to the Evesham Guardians. No doubt, it is contrary to the resolution of the Dewsbury Guardians; but that resolution, as they have been informed, is illegal, and, in fact, a nullity. There seems to me no ground for putting an end to the system of payment of the vaccination officer by fees, which has been generally adopted and works well; nor is it found to encourage prosecutions. The fees are not regulated by the number of prosecutions, but by the number of cases of successful vaccination.

INDIA—THE CIVIL SERVICE.

QUESTION.

MR. PLUNKET asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether Government are prepared to take any action upon certain representations recently made to the Secretary of State for India, in favour of modifying the rules now in force, as to the preparation and presentation of Joint Memorials by members of the Civil Service of India?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, a letter containing certain proposals for the modification of these rules was handed to me by my hon. and learned Friend. It has been laid before the Secretary of State in Council, and it has been decided by them to send a despatch to India making certain suggestions on the subject for the consideration of the Government of India. Until they have had an opportunity of considering them, my hon. and learned Friend will understand that I am unwilling to go more into detail on the subject.

GAS COMPANIES AND THE ELECTRIC LIGHTING—REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. CHADWICK asked the Chairman of Ways and Means, Whether, in any Private Bills passed this Session, the monopoly and powers of any gas companies in regard to gas have been extended to electric lighting, so as to give gas companies, in case of their undertaking being purchased by any public body, a claim to be paid for any such extra privilege or monopoly; and, whether he will Report to the House, before any such extension of monopoly rights are allowed in any Private Bill, whether opposed in Committee or otherwise.

Mr. Selator-Booth

MR. RAIKES, in reply, said, that the Question was one of some importance with regard to the various measures which had been introduced in the House during the present Session by various public bodies, with the view of obtaining powers to use the electric light. As many as 35 such Bills had been introduced altogether during the present Session. It would be in the recollection of the House that a Select Committee was appointed to consider the question of lighting by electricity, and he stipulated with the promoters that in the event of their Bills being allowed to go forward all the clauses which related to electric lighting should be struck out; but that if the Committee reported in favour of such powers being given to the promoters of such undertakings, clauses to that effect should be introduced at a subsequent stage. The Committee having reported adversely to the extension of such powers to gas companies, those companies were not allowed to insert clauses relating to the electric light in any of the Bills promoted by them; but it had been open to corporations to adopt such clauses as might be found to correspond with the recommendations of the Committee, and in three or four cases they had done so. In no case, however, was power given to a gas company to make use of the electric light. With regard to the second part of the Question, he did not think it would be in accordance with precedent to make a formal Report to the House of the cases in which the extension was proposed; but, if he should continue to hold his present Office, he would not fail to mention the matter to the House if any such Bill came on for second reading.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND)—THE ABBEY PARISH BOARD, PAISLEY, AND SCHOOL FEES.—QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Lord Advocate, If he will state the grounds on which the Abbey Parish Board of Paisley refused to grant the usual order to pay the school fees for the children of a widow named Smith, said widow being at the time in receipt of parochial relief; and if he will object to furnish the Correspondence between the Board of Superintendence and Mr. Archibald Macdonald; between the Board of Superintendence and the Abbey Board; Copy of the Notes of Mr. M. M'Lean, the inspector, and of the signed declarations made to him, together with Copy of the letter by which the Board of Superintendence conveyed their decision to the Abbey Parish?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON): Sir, I made inquiries in regard to the refusal to pay the fees of these children, and, so far as I can judge, the decision of the parochial board was based on some questions that were raised in regard to the creed register. This point, as it seems to me, was raised somewhat unnecessarily. There was no need to decide the point at all, and, in so deciding it, it seems to me the Parochial Board overlooked the plain intention of the Legislature in passing the Education Act. Accordingly, I have communicated both with the Parochial Board of Paisley and with the Board of Supervision, requesting that the matter should be reconsidered. That being so, I think I need hardly produce the Papers.

CYPRUS—THE PAPERS, No. 4.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the short series of Papers, Cyprus, No. 4, laid upon the Table in print on the 4th of July, and ordered to be delivered in full on the 5th of July, will be in the hands of Members; and, who is responsible for the delay which has occurred?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, he had made inquiry at the Foreign Office, and had been informed that a series of Papers referred to by the hon. Baronet had not been delivered; but he would take care that they should be in the hands of Members in a day or two. The delay in issuing them was, no doubt, due to some inadvertences.

PRIVILEGE — OMISSION FROM THE VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. CALLAN wished to direct the attention of the House to a matter of Privilege in connection with the Sitting on Friday night and early on Saturday morning last. The Chairman of Committees was in the Chair on Friday night and up to half-past 2 o'clock on Saturday morning, when the Chair was taken by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt). On that occasion the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Harcourt) was addressing to the House a very exhaustive speech with regard to savings' banks, and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) directed the attention of the Chairman to the fact that 40 Members were not present. The Chairman having counted, and 40 Members having been found to be present, the Business went on as usual; but so anxious were the Government to report Progress that, interrupting the hon. Member for Oxfordshire, the Secretary to the Treasury took the most unusual course of moving "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." The glass was accordingly turned, the bells were rung, the doors were closed, and the Question again put to the Committee. At the request of some party—he believed, certainly, not at the request of the hon. Gentleman himself—two hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House were named as Tellers for the Government Motion; and, what seemed an unprecedented thing in the annals of the House, when the Division was taken it was found that the Secretary to the Treasury voted with five Cabinet Ministers against his own Motion. Attention was afterward drawn to the matter by the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford (Major O'Gorman), who then stated that the hon. Gentleman who moved to report Progress voted against his own Motion. It was said that an indictment was being prepared against certain hon. Members for wilful and deliberate obstruction of the Business of the House, and one of the clauses in that indictment, it was believed, was to the effect that the hon. Member for Cavan had voted against a Motion which he had supported in his speeches, or something of that kind. It was, therefore, essential, as a safeguard, that it should be stated in the proceedings of the House that an official Member of the Government—the Secretary to the Treasury—proposed "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again," and within five minutes afterwards voted with the entire Government Bench against his own Motion. That, at all events, was a remarkable circumstance; but it was not all. The Motion to report Progress appeared in the proceedings of the night in question in the Parliamentary Votes, but without the name of the Secretary to the Treasury as Mover of it; and to that fact he wished particularly to direct the attention of the Speaker of the House. He had examined the Records of the House in the Library, and he could say that from the first week of the present Session up to the present day there had not been an omission of a single name from a Motion of the character of that moved by the Secretary to the Treasury. No similar case had been recorded this Session, and he wished it to be considered by the House that, whereas the name of Mr. Parnell had been inserted, the name of the Secretary to the Treasury had been left out from Motions with reference to reporting Progress. It might be that the omission was accidental; but if no correction was made there would be no opportunity for appealing to the Records of Parliament in case of an indictment for wilful obstruction being proceeded with. He did not bring this subject forward yesterday, because he had thought it better to wait and see whether the correction would be made in to-day's Votes. Seeing that that had not been done in the ordinary way, he now appealed to Mr. Speaker to see that the mistake was rectified. He thought he had fulfilled his duty in directing the attention of the House to the extraordinary omission, and he hoped the Clerk would be empowered to make the necessary correction.

MR. SPEAKER: Until the hon. Member rose, I was not aware that the name of the Secretary to the Treasury had been accidentally omitted, as the hon. Member has stated, in the Votes delivered yesterday morning. It was, I am assured, a pure accident; and, having ascertained that the name was accidentally omitted, I have given directions that the sheet of the Votes containing the error should be cancelled, and that the proper entry be made in the Votes.

MR. GRAY said, he thought it only right to say that he had called the attention of the Clerk to the matter that morning before public attention was directed to it, and he had undertaken to rectify it. As he was concerned in the matter, he wished to say a few words in regard to it. There was considerable confusion at the time when the Division was called, and when the hour-glass was turned in the interval which elapsed during the running of the sand he (Mr. Gray) and some other hon. Members suggested to the Secretary to the Treasury (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) that two or three Votes which they believed were unopposed should be taken before Progress was reported. That hon. Gentleman, believing as he (Mr. Gray) believed, that those Votes would provoke no discussion or opposition, did not challenge the Vote when the Question was again put. Other hon. Members, however, did challenge the Motion, it being in the possession of the House, and it was that, and that alone, which he believed led to the confusion and the rather extraordinary scene which followed. He merely desired, as he had a small part in bringing about the confusion, to explain that it was a pure misunderstanding, for which neither the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury nor anybody else was to blame. That had nothing to do however with the real question as to the completeness of the Parliamentary Record. The Motion was made to the House, and, not being withdrawn, was in possession of the House, and a Division being demanded upon it the name of the proposer of the Motion was not given. He did not think that the explanation which the Speaker had received, that the matter was due to accident, was strictly accurate, because the name was omitted in two places—first, in the Journals of the House, and, secondly, in the Division Lists. He was inclined to believe that if the matter was still further investigated it would be found that the name was deliberately omitted because of the confusion which arose at the time the Motion was put.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, perhaps the House would allow him to explain what really seemed to be an extraordinary act on his part. He thanked the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray) for the explanation he had just given, and which really constituted his excuse for the course he had taken on the occasion referred to. Hon. Members would recollect that when the discussion was going on, after he had moved to report Progress, a strong feeling was expressed that the Committee should proceed for a short time longer in order that certain Votes might be taken. In these circumstances, when the Motion was put by the Chairman, he did not challenge a Vote, because he believed it was the unanimous opinion of the Committee at the time that they should go on. One or two hon. Members did challenge a Division; and he took a course which, perhaps, he ought to have hesitated to take, and which, had he had a little time to think of it, he probably would not have taken. It was not the only instance, he believed, in which the same thing had been done; but if he had thought about it he would perhaps have come to the conclusion that he should be acting more wisely in not voting at all. He was sure the House would believe that he had no wish or desire that there should be any concealment in the matter. He was only too happy to hear from Mr. Speaker that an accidental error in the records of their proceedings, which might possibly mislead, would be rectified; and he trusted the House would believe that what he did was done with no wish or desire to confuse the Business of the House.

MR. MONK said, he wished to make a personal explanation.

MR. SPEAKER said, if the hon. Member desired to make a personal explanation no doubt the House would hear him; but he must point out that any further discussion with no Motion before the House would be out of Order.

MR. MONK wished to explain how he came to be named as a Teller. After the Secretary to the Treasury had moved to report Progress the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt), who was then in the Chair, named the Government officials as Tellers for the Motion. Thereupon it appeared that objection was raised on the Treasury Bench to the Government Whips being Tellers, and the Chairman turned to the Clerks at the Table, at whose suggestion he (Mr. Monk) and the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell) were named. Had Mr. Speaker been in the Chair on the occasion referred to, he (Mr. Monk) would have challenged his nomination as a Teller for the Motion.

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, that irregularities occurred in the best-regulated families; and, seeing that Her Majesty's Government, who were, or ought to be, a well-regulated family, had been guilty of an error, he hoped they would be charitable when private Members committed irregularities.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE WAR—NEWSPAPER CORRESPONDENTS.

QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, that as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was now in his place, he would ask him the Question which stood first upon the Notice Paper—namely, Whether newspaper correspondents at the seat of war in South Africa are permitted to take an active part against the enemy, otherwise than in self-defence; and, whether the attempt to shoot a fugitive Zulu scout, which the special correspondent of the "Standard" records that he himself made, as may be seen in the "Standard" of July 17th, is a matter which calls for any notice from the War Office?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, in reply, I beg to say that I conceive any officer who permitted a newspaper correspondent to take an active part against the enemy would act in a manner which I should characterize as unjustifiable. In reply to the second part of the Question, I have to say that I have looked at the paragraph referred to, and find that the correspondent states that he twice attempted to fire at a Zulu, but in neither case did his rifle go off; and it does not appear that he either hurt the Zulu, or even frightened him. If it were a general practice at the seat of war for persons not connected with the Service, and not on duty, to take an active part against the enemy, I should consider it my duty to address some communication to the General Officer; but as there is no evidence of the existence of the practice beyond that contained in the letters of the correspondent to whom attention has been drawn I do not intend to notice the matter further.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. E. JENKINS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether in the constitution of the Royal Commission on Agricultural Distress, as it is expected that several landlords and tenant farmers will have places on the Commission, regard will be had to secure the presence on the Commission of some person or persons fairly representative of the views and interests of the agricultural labourers?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the question of having upon the Royal Commission on Agricultural Distress a representative of the views of the agricultural labourers had been under the consideration of the Government; but they did not see their way to overcoming the difficulties which presented themselves.

MR. E. JENKINS subsequently asked, with the view to prevent any misunderstanding, Whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer meant that there was an objection to placing an agricultural labourer, or any person who represented that class, upon the Commission?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, several communications had been made to the Government with a view to have an agricultural labourer, or a person connected with agricultural labourers, upon the Commission. Those representations had been carefully considered, and it had not been found possible to overcome the difficulties which suggested themselves to the mind of the Government.

MR. E. JENKINS asked, Whether, if some other person, not an agricultural labourer, were suggested, the Government would consider the matter?

[No reply was given to this Question.]

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. CHILDERS said, he understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in answering at an earlier stage a Question put to him by the hon. Member for Hackney, to say that on Thursday he would propose the Vote for the expenses of the Zulu War, whereas he had understood the right hon. Gentleman to say on the previous day that he would not ask the House to pass the Vote on Thursday.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had not meant to state that he would ask the House to pass the Vote on Thursday, but only that he would lay the Estimate on the Table, and make a statement.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Is it the intention of the Government to take the Education Estimates as the First Order to-morrow?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes.

THE O'DONOGHUE: Might I ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will say when the Committee on the Irish University Bill will be taken?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am not able at this moment to fix a day, and it will be impossible to do so this week.

MR. RYLANDS wished to know when the Vote for the enlargement of the Reporters' Gallery would be taken?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER suggested that the hon. Gentleman should give Notice of his Question.

In reply to Mr. PRICE,

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the Navy Estimates would be proceeded with on Thursday.

PRIVILEGE—(TOWER HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE (METROPOLIS) COMMITTEE). PETITION.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE: Since I came into the House I have received from the Sergeant-at-Arms an envelope containing a Petition from Mr. John Sandilands Ward, who is now in the custody of the Sergeant. It contains, also, a letter addressed to myself, expressing the hope that, as I was Chairman of the Committee that tried the Breach of Privilege question, I should give the Petition my careful consideration, and that I should not consider it inconsistent with my duty to bring that Petition under the notice of the House. I have read the Petition over, and I find that there are certain things in it which ought to be considered. I find that the petitioner entirely submits himself to the House. He expresses his unfeigned sorrow and regret for what has occurred. Under these circumstances, Sir, I think it only right and proper to lay this Petition upon the Table of the House, and to move that it be printed and taken into consideration to-morrow, immediately after the assembling of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Petition to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [App. 1.]

Petition to be taken into consideration To-morrow.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

BANKING AND JOINT STOCK COMPANIES BILL—[BILL 126.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Cross, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [22nd July], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. W. HOLMS said, that last week he, in common with several other hon. Members, opposed the second reading of the Bill. He and they did so because they believed that Scotland had been unfairly treated in connection with that measure. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had evidently thought it impossible to carry the Bill as originally proposed, and had, therefore, come down to the House with a proposal to the effect that Scotland and Ireland should be excluded from the provisions of the Bill. That was a proposal which was eminently unsatisfactory both to Scotch and Irish Members; but now that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had decided upon withdrawing the 8th clause, and to include Scotland and Ireland within the scope of the Bill, he, for his own part, should withdraw the opposition he had offered, and as he thoroughly approved of the principle of the Bill he should give it his hearty support.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, that the declaration that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made when he moved the second reading, supplemented by the other declaration that Scotland should be put on an exact equality with England, was satisfactory so far as Scotland and Ireland were concerned; and he could only express his regret that the Government should ever have allowed themselves to be induced to introduce a clause which practically would have had the effect of turning all the Scotch business out of London. He regretted that the Government should have adopted such a course, he believed only in deference to a section of the banks in London, which, no doubt, had put strong pressure on the Government; because he believed it was recognized by the public in London that whatever might be the case as to Scotch banks in Scotland their advent to London had been very advantageous to the business of that City. He thought, however, that the Bill required some further consideration in the public interest before it was proceeded with. He believed that some great principles were involved in the passing of that measure, which was brought forward apparently in the interests of the public, but really in the interests of the shareholders of banks. What was the state of matters with which the Bill proposed to deal? They had many large banks which, by giving the assurance of unlimited liability on the part of the shareholders, had induced the public to put very great confidence in them; and, as a consequence, they had received from depositors and others very large sums of money. Now, in consequence of the great confidence which the public had placed in them, those banks had been able to pay very large dividends upon their capital. They had ranged from 10 to 20, and even more, per cent per annum, besides making large additions to the reserve funds. Well, a business which paid at that rate was not, as a rule, unattended with risk to its shareholders, and what was now proposed was this—that those banks which commenced with unlimited liability, and having secured the confidence of the public, having large deposits placed with them, could now turn round and limit the responsibility of their shareholders. Now, the grounds upon which that proposition was made were somewhat to this effect. The shareholders in unlimited banks—not only the City of Glasgow Bank, but others—had become aware that they were incurring considerable liability in being so; and it was alleged that men of substantial property would not now consent to be made shareholders with that undefined liability hanging over them. But surely it was a very great insult to the intelligence of men of business to suppose that up to that time—the time of the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank—those banks were not perfectly well aware of the very great responsibility which they incurred. Every business man must have known that he, as a shareholder, was responsible to the fullest extent of his means for the obligations of that bank. What really was now asked to be done by the Bill was to maintain the price of bank shares in the market. It was proposed by the Bill to relieve the responsibility of shareholders of unlimited banks, the consequence of which would be that the price of bank shares would be maintained in the market. As it was, the shareholders of these banks having raised the price to such an amount, a dividend of 15 per cent, might be, would only return 5 per cent, or at the most 6, upon the market price. There were two cures for the present state of matters. It was quite true that business men and men of common sense would not hold bank shares, while they could sell them at such a price as would only bring the purchasers 4 or 5 per cent. They would reflect that if, instead of holding these shares on which they were getting 20 per cent, they could sell them at a corresponding price, and re-invest the money in some security on which they would get 4 or 5 per cent, and with no liability whatever, it would be much better for them. The price of bank shares had risen in the market. The expected higher dividend had been discounted, and the bank shares were now at their present high price, not so much for the dividend the shareholders had got, as for the dividend that they expected to get. If this Bill passed, they would have bank shares higher still in the market. The real difficulty which had occurred was this—that they put the price of bank shares too high in the market, and the Bill was introduced for maintaining that price. The remedy for the difficulty was that the price of bank shares should go down in the market to such a price as would pay their purchasers a dividend of about 6 or 8 per cent, in which case the shares would be purchased by men of substance, who would be willing to incur the amount of risk which would be entailed by a dividend of 6 or 8 per cent. With regard to the proposal as to reserved liability, he did not think that it would be found to be satisfactory in practice, or, indeed, practicable. The difficulty which arose was this. If they organized a limited or reserved liability bank with a capital consisting of £50 shares, and another £50 liability upon them; if the first £50 was called up, although the shareholders should have some reserve to meet their liabilities, the objection was that the remaining £50 was not available for the purposes of the bank until the bank suspended payment. It would be much better that the bank should be organized with a smaller amount of paid-up capital, so that the public could see how much uncalled capital there was, and that that uncalled capital should be available for the bank at the time of difficulty. He thought that, for the purposes of reserved liabilities, it was hardly worth wasting such a Bill; because he believed that if the public had an opportunity of organizing a bank with limited liabilities they would not do so, but would prefer a bank which would leave a proportion of the capital not called up in the manner he had suggested. There was, however, another question connected with the measure he wished to call attention to, and that was the privilege which was to be continued to unlimited banks which became limited or reserved of still maintaining their issue of notes. That was a point which created very considerable complications with regard to the Bill in carrying out the principle which was supposed to underlie its provisions. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech had said that this Bill provided that the shareholders should, in addition to their reserved liability, be also responsible for the full payment of the notes in circulation to the general body of creditors of the bank. Now, he thought that introduced an abundant element of uncertainty in regard to the shareholders. It might be quite true that the reserved liability was united to a certain amount, when there was no issue of notes; but when there was an issue of notes the shareholder could not possibly learn the amount of his liability. It seemed to him that the clear and broad principle to lay down with regard to the note issue would be that if an unlimited bank became limited, by the fact of its doing so it should lose altogether its right to a note issue. If that principle were not adopted in the Bill, the effect of it would be to still further augment the privileges and increase the monopoly of banks. The Scotch bankers and the monopoly they possessed had been very frequently alluded to in the course of the debate; but, up to recently, that monopoly had not been complained of to any very great extent. But he thought he was expressing what was becoming a general opinion in Scotland, to the effect that Scotch banks were beginning to exercise their monopoly to an extent which was injurious to the trade in Scotland. One particular complaint which the people had as to the Scotch banks coming to London was that the Scotch banks were receiving deposits all over Scotland, that they brought the money to London, and actually lent it there on the Stock Exchange, or at discount, at a much lower rate of interest than they would have charged in exactly similar transactions in Scotland. He considered that that was a point which was deserving of the consideration of the House; because, until the note issue was taken away from the Scotch banks, it would be hopeless to attempt to institute any new bank in Scotland to compete successfully with the present monopoly. He should wish further to call the attention of the House to the State policy in regard to the note issue. The question was raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard), when a Bill was introduced on the subject in 1875. In the discussion on that Bill, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) said—

“Sir Robert Peel proceeded steadily on the principle that where the law proposed restrictions on issuing banks, these restrictions ought to be maintained; and, moreover, Sir Robert Peel did that with reference to a wider principle still—namely, that the State ought ultimately to get into its own hands the whole business of issue, and that that course ought to be taken upon the first favourable opportunity.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxii. 1985.]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, rising afterwards, said—

“I believe this to be the truth of the case—that as far as England at least was concerned, Sir Robert Peel looked forward to the time when the provincial issue should be absorbed, and come into the hands of the Bank of England as the agent of the State.”—[Ibid. 2020.]

He thought, therefore, that the present would be a favourable opportunity for providing in the measure now before the House that any unlimited issuing bank which availed itself of the powers of the Bill, and became limited, should lose altogether its right of issuing notes. It appeared to him that the present was a favourable opportunity for the State to demand of those banks of issue which availed themselves of the advantages of that Bill that they should abandon altogether the right of issuing notes. Then, as regarded the provisions of the Bill as to notes, they seemed to him to be altogether unsatisfactory. According to the last Acts—namely, the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867—notice of an intended change had to be sent to every special creditor of the company which converted itself into a limited liability company. But banks which intended to convert their liability into that of a limited character would immediately take the opportunity of changing the deposit receipts; so that a creditor, without being aware of the fact, would find that he was only a creditor from the date of his new deposit receipt. For all these reasons, he should support the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Glasgow.

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD said, the whole subject was one of extreme complication, and it was so because the interests affected were distinct ones, and had been erroneously connected when they were absolutely and entirely different. Banks performed two functions, one the Imperial function of issuing notes, and the other the legitimate business of banking, and the only remedy for the evils which attended the present system was for the Government to assume for the State at the earliest opportunity the absolute exercise of the Imperial function of issuing notes, a step which need not involve any injustice to issuing banks. Why was the Bill introduced? What had been the provoking causes of this proposed legislation except the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank? Barring that failure there was nothing in the world to disturb the confidence of shareholders or depositors—nothing but that failure, which had opened a vista of the possible failures of other banks. But what was the case with many of the other banks? They were asked to permit them to diminish their liability; but in whose behalf was that request made? It was a petition on behalf of the banks. On whose side ought the House to consider it. He thought it ought to be on the side of the depositors, who were as 100 to 1 compared with the shareholders, while much more depended on the money put into the bank than on the capital subscribed. For himself, he had no faith in subscribed capital; while the capital of a bank ought to be in proportion to the amount of business done. Then, with regard to audit, he had no great faith in periodical audits; but he had faith in a true candid statement made in a shape that the public could understand. Nothing was more unsatisfactory and more calculated to mislead than the way in which many of the banks presented their accounts at present, for they mixed up "cash" with "money on call" and with "convertible securities," essentially different things. He believed a great deal might be done hereafter with regard to putting banks under an obligation to make their accounts more straightforward and satisfactory. If the House legislated for the purpose of the present measure they legislated in a panic, and without due consideration of the subject; and it was impossible to deal with the subject properly as long as the operations of issuing and banking were conducted for the advantage of the same bank, because, for mere banking, the most absolute liberty was required, and the issue of paper money was a function which ought to be exercised for the State alone. He thought the Government would find, in the fact of the many objections to the measure, that they could hardly expect to pass such a Bill, and he suggested that they should leave the subject to another Session and deal with it in a larger and more comprehensive manner.

SIR HENRY JACKSON agreed that this was a panic measure, and nobody could doubt that the panic had resulted from the unfortunate case of the City of Glasgow Bank, a case which was different in its circumstances from many of its English compeers. Although the House of Lords had now decided the contrary, yet there was good ground for believing that the position of trustees who happened to be shareholders in the Scotch banks was, by an Act of Parliament, somewhat more favourable than that which they were known to occupy in respect of the English banks, and a very large number of gentlemen had been caught in the toils of that litigation, and had been ruined. They thought the terms in which they had actually registered as shareholders in that bank freed them from any personal liability, and that the liability attached to the estate which they represented and not to themselves. That created, very naturally, great alarm, and a great amount of suffering, and then the London unlimited banks began to perceive that the moment there was panic there was a great rush to get rid of shares. The natural tendency of this was, of course, that weak holders took the place of strong holders, because the person who, under the circumstances, would take a share in an unlimited bank was a person who had nothing to lose but the interest in that particular investment; and, no doubt, there had been a tendency in that direction. He believed that to some such circumstance as that the great pressure, which it was notorious had been put upon the Government, was to be attributed. As far as allowing an unlimited bank to become a limited bank, if it was so minded, he, for his own part, saw no objection. The Act of 1862 gave that power; but the banks then were far too proud of their credit and position to condescend to take advantage of it. It was not on that account that he ventured to submit there was an objection to their Bill, and that the matter required to be further considered. He understood that it was quite settled that Clause 8 should be omitted; but he did not know how far Clause 9 was to remain in the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: We retain that clause.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, it became important that he should call the attention of the House to the great difficulty which resulted from the retention of that clause. They had at present limited and unlimited companies, and companies incorporated by Act of Parliament and incorporated by Royal Charter, and that was, surely, enough. But the Bill proposed to create a kind of Joint Stock Companies. The banks reserved liability, and he understood that the necessity for this legislation resulted from one circumstance only—namely, that there were a large number of banks with unlimited liability who had paid up the whole of their share capital, and, inasmuch as there was no reserve or share subscribed capital, the directors did not see their way to persuade the shareholders to increase their subscriptions, without which they could not get credit on the footing of being registered as an unlimited company. The Government stepped in to help them, and proposed a new category of Joint Stock Companies to meet that particular emergency or difficulty—that was to say, they proposed a class of banks where the liability should arise, not while the bank was a trading concern, but the moment it came into liquidation. In other words, they did not propose to intrust directors with the power of calling up the reserve from the shareholders for the purpose of trading; but they kept it as a fund to which the creditors might look in the event of the company eventually coming into liquidation. At first sight, there did not seem to be a great deal of harm in that; but what he wanted to point out to the Government was this—How many banks were there in that position? What was the necessity for any change in their companies' laws? Unless the necessity had been clearly proved, it seemed to him that there was the strongest possible reason why the Government should not call into existence a new class of companies with new incidences. With every new institution, possessing new rights, rose up a vested interest which made it more difficult hereafter to legislate in regard to the whole subject upon a broad and comprehensive principle. He would submit to the Government whether it was worth while to put on the Statute Book this year an Act which would create two distinct classes of new companies, and add confusion to the existing state of confusion in regard to their Joint Stock Companies' law? He hoped that the Government would be satisfied with the fair discussion which had taken place, and defer legislation till next Session, when the subject might be more satisfactorily grappled with as a whole.

Mr. J. G. Hubbard

MR. CHARLES LEWIS thought there was something peculiar in this chorus of opposition, arising from the particular quarter from which it came. He was surprised at the speech of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson), who had referred to the 9th section as introducing a new series of complications. Now, considering the distinguished position which his hon. and learned Friend occupied, both in the House and elsewhere, he was the last person from whom he should have expected to hear that observation. If he had looked out the first two lines of the section, he would have seen a reference to the clause in the Companies Act of 1862, which in another form did the very same thing but imperfectly. If the Bill were liable to the charge brought against it by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) in two particulars, it certainly would not deserve the support of that House. That hon. Member objected, in the first place, that the measure was not in the interest of the public; and, in the second place, that it altered the liability of present shareholders to their existing creditors, and that by some peculiar process, which, no doubt, he understood himself, it was likely to keep up and even to increase the price of bank shares. But was not this a public question? They could not go on without banks any more than they could without Water Companies and Gas Companies. They were a part of the necessities of business life, and anything which put their relations towards the public in a better, a more solid, enduring, and healthy condition was worthy of the consideration of the Legislature. The experience they had had in this matter had been narrowed to the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank; but it had been forgotten that since then a very considerable English bank had failed, and spread disaster right and left to such an extent as to create a second panic in England. The public had got to look to the healthy condition of the joint-stock banking system, as a part of the great business of commercial life in this country; and the present condition of affairs was such that but for the probability of this Bill becoming law there would have been a general stampede of all the men of fortune, and property, and of common sense from the unlimited banks, because no man who desired to sleep comfortably in his bed, or make a will for the benefit of his family, would consent to remain under such liability as existed at the present moment. It could not be said that that was a state of things beneficial to the public. He maintained that the question was a public one. The hon. Member for Forfarshire could not have read the Bills and Banks Act, for it was as plain as the way to the parish church that the liability at present existing on the part of the banks could not be affected by this Bill. Therefore, they were doing no such outrageous thing as narrowing the liberty of existing shareholders. The Act of 1862 had not been taken advantage of by the banks on account of its cumbrous machinery. By that Act the banks were compelled to give individual notice to the depositors of their intention to change from unlimited to limited liability, which would operate most prejudicially to all concerned; whilst the present Bill enabled the directors to make the change by publishing notice of their intention in the public newspapers and in The Gazette. The suggestion that the operation of the Bill would be to increase the value of shares, and that in that way small investors would be tempted to seek larger dividends, was not consistent with the avowed object of the Bill to encourage richer men to allow their capital to remain in banking concerns. The House was not considering the Bill in a panic, but under the pressure of demands deliberately made in such a way as to render it the duty of the Government to throw upon the House the responsibility of rejecting a measure for the relief, not of shareholders only, but equally of depositors and of the whole banking community. No doubt it would have been satisfactory if there had been time to send the Bill to a Select Committee, in order that it might be considered whether the object could be attained without creating another class of banks; but, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, he trusted the House would be loyal to the principle of the Bill, which up to that time had been received with general assent, and not only pass it through Committee, but secure its becoming law without any further waste of time.

SIR ANDREW LUSK begged to say that he was rather vexed that this Bill should be brought forward at the present time. He would have preferred a measure that could have been more maturely considered, and that greater time could have been allowed to work out this important question. He was sorry, after what they had heard, that this Bill should be pushed forward. In Scotland, it was said, the banks had a great monopoly, and that they exercised their power over the public as they liked. They charged what rate of interest they pleased, and the public were, practically, helpless in their hands. It was a serious accusation for a Scotch Member to put before the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There was a galling monopoly in Scotland, which could not be touched. There was no monopoly so great as this bank monopoly, and there was no question at all that it was a very serious thing that this state of affairs should exist; but still he was sorry, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer had undertaken to legislate on banking, that he had not done what he proposed at the beginning. Some people from Scotland would not let the Bill pass unless they got their way, and others unless they got theirs; and it seemed to him that the Bill would dwindle down to a very small thing on limited liability. They were legislating, as it seemed to him, entirely on behalf of banks, and were neglecting those who were depositors in those banks; and he confessed he did not like that people should run away with the idea that Parliament was endeavouring to save those who were bankers, and leaving those who were depositors in their unprotectedness. A banking company was simply a commercial company, intended to make money for the shareholders. Why should Parliament continually throw around them the mantle of protection? Why should they not be subject to the same rules as other commercial establishments? What about private banks, of which there had been more failures than of public banks? The Scotch wanted monopoly at home and liberty in England; the English wanted a fair field and no favour. Let there be but one denomination of banks, and let them all be under one law. Above all things, they ought to consider the confiding public, whose trust was wonderful and astonishing, and who ought not to be deceived by names and distinctions they could not understand. He did not want to oppose the second reading of the Bill exactly, because it was right to give some consideration to those who had enormous risk on their shoulders; at the same time, he could not say he approved of the Bill.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, it would be wise to pass the Bill this Session, because he feared that if the question of allowing unlimited banks to become limited were not dealt with until the question of issue was considered, the day would be far distant when liability could be limited. He was a Member of the Committee on Banks of Issue, and he remembered that the Committee was flooded with schemes on the currency question. That was a subject it would take a very strong Government to deal with, and he did not believe that in Scotland they wished to have it dealt with. The sympathy of some hon. Members was confined to depositors; he thought some consideration should be shown to shareholders also; and he would, therefore, be very glad to see the Bill, with certain modifications, passed. He hoped the House would have a statement from the Government as to what portions of the Bill they meant to retain, and what to abandon; and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would see his way to allow banks, simply by advertising in The Gazette and in certain newspapers, to make the change from unlimited to limited liability, instead of requiring them to write "Limited" on their doors. A good deal had been said about the monopoly of Scotch banking. He did not believe there was any such monopoly, and he was quite sure that Scotch banks had been a great advantage to the country. He believed there were over 600 branches scattered all over Scotland, every small village almost having its branch bank, and that had been of untold advantage to the people; and there could be no doubt that every person who could give reasonable security would have the necessary facilities afforded him by every banker. He hoped the clause as to auditing would be kept in the Bill. He believed that a system of auditing and a particular form of accounts would prove a great advantage both to the banks and their customers. If, in the case of the City of Glasgow Bank, there had been auditors chosen by the shareholders, and a proper supervision by accountants, the organized fraud of directors and officials of that bank would not have occurred. He did hope the House would agree to pass the second reading of the Bill; and he hoped some Member of the Government would show exactly how the Bill would stand if it did pass, and what alterations would be made in it in Committee.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE cordially supported the Bill, observing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had a task of the greatest difficulty in legislating for the shareholders of a bank, and, at the same time, doing it in such a way as not to injure the interests of depositors. He looked upon the position of banks as peculiar. The capital of those in Scotland was only about £10,000,000, while the deposits were £80,000,000; and he did not see what harm could arise to these banks if they were only limited to their shares. There were several banks in Scotland of limited liability, which had maintained themselves side by side with unlimited banks, and with great success. He considered that the two interests were not irreconcilable, and if they could obtain equal security as before for depositors, it would be for the public interest that the liability of the shareholders should be defined. For his part, he shared the expectation that this measure would induce persons of responsibility and position to come forward in the management of those banks more readily than they had hitherto done, and thus give some security for good management. This was what they must mainly look to for the security of shareholders, apart from the vigilance of the shareholders themselves. No doubt, there might be a good deal of difficulty in the transition; but it could be got over. The point on which the Bill had been attacked by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Henry Jackson) was a great merit. It was owing to a panic that it had been introduced; but the very circumstance that there was a panic justified the Government in coming forward. If nothing was done, a shock would be given to many concerns which they could not easily weather; and, therefore, it was in the interest of depositors as well as shareholders that there should be legislation in the matter. He was anxious, however, to press on the Government and the House that legislation ought not to stop there. The Scottish banking system was not a monopoly, as had been stated popularly in conversation. There was no legal restriction in the establishment of any bank; but there was a social restriction, inasmuch as no bank had any chance of being established in Scotland that had not the power of note issue. It was now about 15 years since endeavours were made to find a remedy for this, by allowing all banks to be established on the ground that they should deposit gold in respect to every note that was issued. The proposal met with little support from Scotch Members. However, in the absence of such a scheme, he would be glad to see facilities given for the establishment of banks where the public would have some security for the solvency of the notes that were issued, and where, at the same time, a degree of freedom would be given that was now wanting to the banking transactions of the country. If they were to wait until all issue banks were swallowed up, they would have to wait two or three hundred years. If care were taken to satisfy the public as to the convertibility of the notes, that was all that would be wanted. He did not think that Scotland laboured under any very serious evil owing to the present limitation of banks. Though they had come down from 30 or 40 banks some 20 years ago to 10 or 12 now, there was a sufficient number to satisfy the wants of the public. The grounds for legislation was, therefore, not extortion from the existing banks, but the danger arising from the whole circulation and business arrangements being thrown on a limited number of banks, so that it was impossible to fill up a gap when a great failure occurred. Perhaps some such suggestion might find more favour, if the Government would clear their heads of the notion that there was some great profit to be made out of the circulation. It had been contended that the privilege of issue should be enjoyed by the State alone; but the amount of profit on the whole was so small as to be scarcely worth considering. The whole note circulation of Scotland was scarcely more than £3,000,000, and the whole profit of that would not amount to more than £80,000 or £90,000. That was not a matter which it would be necessary to entertain; but he thought that in any steps they took there should be full security for the interests of the public, and the freedom of banking throughout the whole country.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON said, that as this Bill embraced Joint Stock Companies as banks, and as it was received with almost universal approbation, he hoped the House would allow the second reading. Those banks which availed themselves of reserved liability did so at their own risk, and would have to notify the same to the public. With regard to the shareholders, there was no doubt that they ought to have protection as well as the general public. As far as the City of Glasgow Bank was concerned, there was not a shareholder there who was aware of the enormous liability to which he was subject when the bank went down. He believed that the passing of this Bill would give confidence to the public mind, that it would reflect credit on the Government, and that it would allay a great deal of outside alarm.

MR. MUNTZ said, that the discussion which had taken place had shown the great difficulty of the question, and how dangerous it was to interfere with institutions of this kind. They were told that certain clauses were to be inserted in, and others taken out, of the Bill, so that they hardly knew what the nature of the measure was. He could see no reason why banks should not be allowed to register as limited banks, if they objected to the great responsibility of being unlimited. The object of the Act of 1826 originally was to give an unquestionable and unlimited security to depositors; but now they were told that the interests of the depositors were quite a secondary consideration, and that the object of the measure was merely to protect the shareholders of unlimited banks. The first object of the Bill was to allay the panic which grew out of the failure last autumn. If they were to legislate, they ought to legislate so as to meet the requirements of the unlimited banks that desired to escape from their responsibility; but they ought, at the same time, to protect the depositors, who, in his judgment, were not protected by this Bill. If the Government wished to pass the measure simply in order to give a limited liability to the unlimited banks with ample security to the public, he should be glad to vote for the second reading. But nothing could be more unfair than to allow people to get rid of their liability to depositors, without acknowledging it openly by the adoption of the title "limited;" and if it were the object of the Bill to enable London banks, under the new-fangled name of "reserved liability," to get rid of their liability, while they were ashamed to own it, there would be a fraud committed on the public, and the Bill ought not to pass. The clause had now been withdrawn. The Government had better withdraw the whole of the Bill, excepting the part of it which enabled unlimited liability banks to take steps for making themselves limited. He could not vote for the second reading of the Bill, unless it was curtailed in some such manner.

MR. BARING thought he went further in opposition to this measure than almost any Member who had spoken on this subject. As he understood the principle of the Bill, it was a measure to make it more easy for laymen and laywomen to do the business of bankers, merchants, and traders, without knowledge, skill, labour, or risk; but there must be risk, and so it had to be put on somebody else. The Bill, therefore, was a Bill to relieve the shareholders and directors of a responsibility which they had assumed of their own free will, at the expense of depositors and creditors. Now, that was a very serious extension of a system of the working of which he had not a very high opinion, so far as it had hitherto gone. He did not assert that this Bill was a piece of panic legislation; but it certainly was introduced in consequence of panic, and in order to avoid, if possible, fresh returns of panic. He did not feel sure that they were entirely free from signs of panic at present. When they saw money at 1 per cent it was a sign that people were afraid to employ their money in anything that involved risk. He did not think they were in a safe position to proceed with legislation which would shake the credit of the country, and he believed the passing of this Bill would damage that credit. If hon. Members looked at the position of the City of Glasgow Bank before its stoppage they would find that, according to its reports, there was hardly a bank in the country in a better position. Its whole capital was paid up, and it was stated to have 45 per cent in reserve. Could anybody say to him that there would have been the slightest difference in the position of that bank had it been a bank of limited liability? Would there not have been the same difficulty to shareholders and depositors—to the persons who had their money in, and who trusted the bank? Persons in London who trusted that bank would have lost their money, although they had given it on the faith of a return issued by directors believed to be honourable, responsible, and well-to-do men. They were told that if this Bill were passed there would be better and more responsible shareholders. But were they so sure of that where there was limited liability? Was it not the fact that they did not under such a system get men who understood the banking business? The whole joint-stock business was rotten from top to bottom. The system worked upon was simply this—A bank was started. It was desirable, in order to make large profits, to call up as small an amount of capital as possible; but, in order to give confidence, there must be a large amount of capital subscribed. The larger their deposits were, in proportion to their called-up capital, so much the larger would be their dividends on the money invested. That was one false principle. Another false principle was that these banks allowed interest to depositors, and, in order to do so, were obliged to employ their money in more risky undertakings than those on which the old-fashioned unlimited liability banks employed their capital; and there they got to the bottom of the City of Glasgow Bank difficulty. They took risks, in order to pay 15 per cent, that no bank not paying interest would have dared to take. There was a further evil. Shareholders were induced to put into shares money out of proportion to their capital, so that, when a call came, many had no money to meet it. He maintained that it would make no difference to many of these banks whether they remained as at present or were limited, without providing for the cutting down of nominal capital. But even supposing this Bill enabled them to obtain a respectable class of directors for banks they would generally have a managing director. Now, a man who dealt with his own money would naturally take more care than one who dealt with the money of other people. He would know that if he failed his fortune was gone altogether. But a managing director of a bank might ruin the shareholders and the creditors, and might be appointed to manage some other concern if he had shown himself to be very clever. He would mention another point. A great many banks had lately been doing business in accepting bills on shipments to foreign countries, and against shipments from foreign countries. Where the banks had a large capital those bills were taken in London and in the Continental market very freely. But supposing those banks, to protect themselves, became limited, would there not be a great deal of inquiry and distrust aroused? If the directors and shareholders were so very anxious to become limited this year, did it not seem natural to suppose it was because they thought that something unpleasant was going to happen this year? Therefore, if the directors of a bank now proposed to make their bank limited, they would be raising against themselves a disagreeable amount of inquiry. And this might produce exactly what they were trying to avoid—a panic. With regard to the 8th clause, he could only echo what had been said by the right hon. Member for London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard). He thought that what was sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. If the Scotch banks came to London, the English banks ought to have equal advantages. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) said that by the Act of Union England and Scotland were to be treated as one country. Let that be carried out and England would be satisfied. The 8th clause was left out to please the smaller country. It ought to be reinstated to please the larger country.

MR. RAMSAY felt that if this Bill had been introduced to allay panic there was good reason that, now it had produced all the good it was likely to do, the Government should rest satisfied and withdraw it. If it was not withdrawn, they should deal with this subject on some principle which the House could understand, and which might benefit the public. The truth was, that the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank and the West of England Bank, and the rumours regarding other unlimited banks had created throughout the country a desire on the part of shareholders to have their liability limited; and he had no doubt, if the Government had confined their Bill to enabling unlimited companies to become limited under prescribed conditions, there would have been no such discussions as those to which this Bill had been subjected, and such a measure could have been retained. If the measure was not to be so limited, he thought the Government should not, at all events, seek to create distinction between the classes of banks by maintaining the 4th clause, which provided for the formation of banks of reserved liability. He could not, indeed, conceive in what way it would be possible to distinguish between the limited liability of banks which were in existence, and the reserved liability of banks to be formed under the Bill. In the one case, the liabilities must be determined according to some multiple of their capital. In the other case, it was in the same way a multiple of a prescribed capital, for which the shareholders in a limited company were liable, and there was no real distinction between the two cases. If the Bill should go into Committee, he would propose to strike out the 4th clause altogether, and thus refuse to sanction the reserved liability provision. In reply to the hon. Member for North Lanark (Sir Edward Colebrooke), he would say that if the business of banking in Scotland were restricted by legislation, surely that made it a monopoly. A bank could not be carried on in Scotland according to the mode in vogue there without the right of issue. That mode had been a great advantage, and ought to be continued, unless it could be shown to be detrimental to the State. Some hon. Members who preceded him endeavoured to show that the Government should take the whole right of issue and circulation into their own hands, and make it a source of profit. But by what means was the State to benefit, if it benefited at the expense of the population of the Kingdom? He did not know what the State meant, if it did not include the whole of the Kingdom; and what would the State benefit by taking from the present banks the right of issue, by means of which they conferred advantage on the population? So far from acting on this idea, the Government ought to regard the promissory note for 20s. as the same as the note for £100. He deprecated the perpetuation of the system of monopoly. He deprecated the provisions of the Bill, which proposed to increase the classes of banks. It would be an advantage if they were all placed under the same category. He did not admit that there could be any advantage to the country derived from limited liability in commercial concerns. He protested against limited liability anywhere; but the Legislature, having recognized it, would do well to confine this Bill to the clauses that provided that an unlimited company might be made a limited company, notwithstanding the restrictions placed upon it by the Act of 1862. He thought that if that were done the Bill might be of use. Whether it would be an advantage to the State to have that limited liability was another question; but, seeing that the State had recognized limited liability in other trading and mercantile concerns, there was no reason why it should not be applied to banks. He quite recognized that the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank was not caused by ignorance on the part of those who administered the affairs of that establishment, but by the fraudulent practices the directors and officials indulged in. They could not, however, protect shareholders from fraud on the part of the directing and managing body. Any attempt to do so would fail. He did not object to that part of the Bill which provided for the audit of the accounts of limited liability banks. He believed it could do no good, but it could do no harm. He did protest, however, against the time of the House being occupied in the discussion of a measure which was not urgently called for by any section of the community; and he was of opinion that the Government should delay the Bill, and all discussion in regard to it, until they could deal with the subject of banking as a whole, and place it in a position satisfactory to the country. He hoped the Government, therefore, would not press the measure this Session.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the hon. Member for Falkirk (Mr. Ramsay) had given the Government two pieces of advice which were hardly consistent with each other. In the first place, he advised the Government to drop the Bill altogether; and, in the second, that they should only retain the clause of the measure which would enable unlimited banking companies to convert themselves into limited ones. He entirely agreed with the hon. Member that it would be unwise of the Government to attempt to deal, during the present Session, with more than the clause by which it was proposed to empower the unlimited banks to come to an agreement with their creditors by which their liabilities should be restricted. It was too late in the Session for the Government to attempt to bring in a complete measure dealing with the whole law relating to banking; and he desired to point out to the right hon. Gentlemen opposite that one or two proposals in their Bill would certainly excite discussion—not to say opposition—if they were pressed. For instance, the proposal of the Government to enable banks of reserved liability to be established was looked upon in the district with which he was more directly connected with more wonder than approval. Everybody understood what a limited and what an unlimited liability meant; but no one exactly comprehended what was meant by banks of reserved liability. Then, again, although there might be much to be said on the question of issue between Scotch and English banks, that was a large and difficult question which might fairly be put off till another Session. He, however, was far from thinking that it was desirable that no measure whatever on this subject should be passed. He had listened with interest to the able speech of the hon. Member for South Essex (Mr. Baring), who had so much experience on this subject; but one remark which fell from that hon. Gentleman had surprised him more than anything he ever heard. The hon. Member had said there was no difference between the position of the shareholders in unlimited banks and of those in limited banks; and he had pointed, in illustration, to a bank with which he (Mr. W. E. Forster) happened to be connected. That was a limited bank, and knowing that his liability was restricted to five times the amount of his share, he felt that his position was immensely different to what it would be if every penny he had in the world was at stake. For the hon. Member, with the facts of the City of Glasgow Bank failure staring him in the face, to say there was no difference between limited and unlimited liability was an extraordinary assertion. Hon. Members must be acquainted with case upon case in which wealthy shareholders in the City of Glasgow Bank, who could easily have paid five times the amount of their shares, would now be utterly ruined. It was desirable, therefore, in his opinion, after what had happened, to make the proposed change, and to enable all the unlimited banks to do what some of them were able to do. He had not been aware that the unlimited banks generally, under existing legislation, could not agree with their creditors and clients to turn themselves into limited banks; but it turned out that, though in some cases they could, in others they could not. He could not see the injustice of giving the same permission to all of them. In fact, he could not see the justice of withholding the permission. What right had they to refuse people the power of agreeing together as to how they should do their business? Of course, if they gave power to the directors or shareholders to say to their creditors, "You shall accept our limited liability whether you like it or not," it would be unjust; but this Bill gave creditors the option of refusing to agree to such an arrangement. It was a natural anxiety on the part of shareholders, after what had occurred, to wish to limit their liability; but it was also a step which would be immensely advantageous, not only for the banking interest, but for commercial interests generally. He was speaking now with some little degree of knowledge of what happened in his own district; and he believed that if they left the law in its present state the joint-stock banks would deteriorate in soundness. Gradually the rich shareholders—the people who would be perfectly able to pay five times the amount of their shares—would withdraw from those banks, and they would get in their places an unlimited number of men of straw, who would probably not be able even to pay up the value of their shares. He suggested to the Government that they should be satisfied with doing this Session what was useful, and not be ambitious to do more. If they passed a Bill containing the one clause to which he had referred—and the exact wording of it might be considered in Committee—they would confer a benefit on the community generally. Perhaps it might also be well to go into Committee on the audit clauses; although, like the hon. Member who spoke last, he was not very certain of any good resulting from them. They seemed to him to trench on that rather dangerous line of placing private affairs under the management of the State. But in regard to the main proposal of the Bill, he approved of it, believing the law was unjust which did not allow debtor and creditor to agree together in a way mutually advantageous, and he could not see why they should not at once remove that blot.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. ASSHETON CROSS remarked, that there were several ways of approaching a measure when it was desired to destroy it, and some of those means had been resorted to in this discussion. Thus, the right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) had advised the Government to wait until they could bring forward a complete measure dealing with the whole question of banking, while other hon. Members had attacked the measure by minutely criticizing its provisions in a way more suited for Committee than for the second reading. He did not intend to touch upon the one or the other, but to state broadly the principles of the measure, and why the Government thought it should pass. One word, however, as to what had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for South Essex (Mr. Baring). He agreed with the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) that the arguments of the hon. Member for South Essex had been rather extraordinary. There had been running through the whole of that hon. Member's speech a dislike of the joint-stock system of banking altogether, and it came out when he spoke about persons becoming bankers who knew nothing about their business. The hon. Member had also said they must take care how they limited the liability of persons who put their money into banks; but that was a matter which ought to have been discussed when they originally sanctioned the establishment of limited banks, and upon that he would only remark that limited banks, established under the Act of 1862, had been as prosperous as any. He (Mr. Assheton Cross) admitted that mischief resulted from men becoming directors who knew nothing about banking, who were misled by the managers, and who did not see where they were going till it was too late. It was also true that there ought to be great caution in the selection of managers or managing partners. They had enormous powers intrusted to them, and it was important that the utmost possible care should be exercised in their appointment. Another danger which the hon. Member had touched on was also real—namely, that the persons who invested in banks did not consider really what they were doing. People would buy £100 shares, of which only £10 had been paid up, and forget all about the

£90 which remained to be paid up. It was this class of investors who were referred to by the hon. Member, who said that it was practically of no importance to the shareholders whether the bank was limited or not. He (Mr. Assheton Cross) had been much startled at what had fallen from the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk), who said they could not deal with this question till they passed a law placing all banks on the same footing. Why, they might as well talk of passing a law that there should be only one denomination of religion. It was a principle in this country that they should carry on trade as they liked. He did not know whether the hon. Baronet meant that all banks should issue notes, or that none should do so; but the idea of making all banks alike was an extraordinary one. The hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) had argued on Clause 9 as if it were a perfectly new thing; whereas, in point of fact, it was only a clause of an old Act, newly drawn. Now, what was the real principle of this Bill, and what were they legislating about? It was said they were legislating in a panic. That he most entirely denied. No Government could have approached a question with greater calmness and consideration than the Government had approached this, nor did he think the House was in a panic, for they had discussed the matter with a due sense of the responsibility which attached to such a discussion. That the unfortunate failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, followed by that of the West of England Bank, had undoubtedly pressed the question on the notice of shareholders, the House, and the country, was true. The effect of those failures had been to make all the shareholders of banks look to their own position, and, having looked into that position, they had discovered that, in reality, they were subject to liabilities which they had never thought of before. Their danger had been brought home to their minds, and when the hon. Member for Forfar (Mr. J. W. Barclay) talked about this being a Bill in the interest only of bank shareholders he denied it. He did not say they were not benefited to a certain extent; but it was the benefit of the public generally which the Government and the House had to consider. It was to the interest of the public to retain the present class of shareholders—such men as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster)—and to give them such protection as would induce them not to withdraw their investments, which he believed they would not be so likely to do if they knew the full extent of their liability. On that ground, the matter appeared to him to be of sufficient importance to justify the intervention of Parliament. When they passed the Act of 1862 they gave all the banks the choice of registering themselves as limited liability companies; but, at the present moment, they had the greatest difficulty in so doing, and the object of this Bill was to restore to them absolute freedom to make themselves limited if they liked. Although many banks, when the Act of 1862 was passed, did not avail themselves of it, yet, if time and experience had shown them the desirability of doing so, they ought to have the same facilities for effecting that object now as they had in 1862. The hon. Member had surprised him, by arguing that those who had deposited money in unlimited banks would suffer if they had only limited liability companies to fall back upon; but he seemed to forget that the change could not be made without the concurrence of the creditors themselves. He wished to say a word or two about the audit and the form of accounts. Nothing would induce the Government to impose upon the banks any interference as to their management. The experience with regard to Insurance Companies would be sufficient of itself to deter anyone from such a step. They wished, however, to secure that there should be an independent audit. It was, undoubtedly, true an independent auditor could not go through the securities held by a bank and put an accurate value upon them; but he would be able to prevent the fraud in such balance sheets as those which had been issued by the directors of the City of Glasgow Bank. If the banks were honest, this would be a check upon inaccuracies; but if they were dishonest, of course, it would be difficult for any audit to defeat them. Then, again, under the present law, all limited banks were bound to publish detailed statements every six or twelve months; but the form of account thus provided was not proper or good enough. Of course, they were not bound to adhere to the form which had been placed in the Schedule of this Bill; but it was necessary, as a security to the shareholders and the public, that there should be some adequate form of account, which the banks should be bound to publish. He hoped the House would consent to read the Bill a second time. If this were done, it was the intention of the Government to commit it, pro forma, in order that it might be re-printed in its amended form. Some Amendments would be introduced, but none of vital importance; and, with the exception of the 8th clause, the measure would, practically, remain in its present form.

CYPRUS—ADMINISTRATION OF THE ISLAND—CIVIL POLICE FORCE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in rising to call attention to the impropriety of the proposal to vote money out of the Civil Service Estimates for the support of a Police Force in Cyprus, and to move—

"That it is inexpedient to grant a sum of £26,000 for the Cyprus Police until a report from the authorities of the Island, showing the necessity for such expenditure, and a full statement of the finances of the Island be laid before the House ;"

said, the Vote had been originally intended for a military pioneer force, to consist of eight English officers and doctors, 10 interpreters, 20 native officers, and about 1,100 men, and would have been included in the Army Estimates but for the fact that it was illegal to employ aliens in the service of the country without a special Act of Parliament, for, of course, the Natives of Cyprus were still subjects of the Sultan. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had admitted the illegality of the proposed military pioneer force; and the corps had, therefore, been described as a police force, and a Vote for it had been placed among the Civil Service Estimates. What he wanted to know was, what this police force was to be; whether it was to be a military force under a new name? It would seem that the force was to be reduced in number, though it would cost the same sum of money. Upon the face of the Vote the name of the force only was changed; its character and object remained unaltered. To enlist a military force in the Island would be illegal without a special Act of Parliament; and, in the case of a military force, the Vote ought to appear in the Army Estimates, and the men placed under the Mutiny Act. But it must be assumed, he supposed, that this was to be a police force in aid of the civil administration of Cyprus. In any case, however, the Vote was abnormal and unconstitutional; the force, if military, was illegal; and, if civil, ought not to be paid for by this country. They had constantly been told that no such Vote would be necessary. The Prime Minister, speaking at the Mansion House, had said that the Island, even in the first year of our occupation, would be no burden to this country, and that it would furnish not only the sum annually accruing to the Sultan, but also the whole expense of the civil government; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken at Birmingham last winter to the same effect. It appeared, therefore, clear that there was no intention last year to call upon the House to vote money for the civil expenditure of Cyprus. He wished now to know, assuming that this was to be a bona fide civil force, and not merely disguised as a police force, whether it was to be an addition to the Zaptiehs, or Native police, a force which had not been reported favourably upon by the officers in charge of it. The Reports of Colonel Warren showed that a very large force of Zaptiehs already existed in Cyprus, and that they had very little work to do. There were at present something like 1,100 Zaptiehs in the Island, and he wished to know whether the 800 which the House was asked to vote was to be in addition to that force? If it was, he could only say that Cyprus would have the largest force of the kind in proper-

tion to its population of any country of which he had heard or read. As far as he could ascertain, the population of Cyprus was 150,000. There would be nearly 2,000 police, or 13 to 1,000 of the population; and there could not, he would venture to say, be employment for anything like that number. There had recently been complaints of the large police force in Ireland, and yet there the police were only two per 1,000 of the people. Taking the Colony which most resembled Cyprus, the Mauritius, which was about the same size, he found that, with a population of 350,000, it had only 600 Native police, or about two to 1,000. Again, the new Colony of Fiji, with 240,000 inhabitants, had only 400 police, and no military force whatever. He should like to know how many police would be required for Asia Minor if the calculation were based on the number supplied to Cyprus? A force of at least 140,000 police would be necessary; while India, if the police force there were placed on a similar footing, would require altogether 2,000,000 police. In the circumstances, he wished to know whether the Government were prepared to lay on the Table any Report showing the necessity of the enormous addition which it was proposed to make to the police force in the Island of Cyprus. From all that he could learn, such an increase of the force was absolutely unnecessary, and he could not help thinking that the proposal was the result of the strange and abnormal position of Cyprus with regard to the Government. If Cyprus were placed under the Colonial instead of the Foreign Office, he felt sure the House would never have heard of any such foolish, irregular, and unconstitutional proposal as that to which he had adverted. If, too, a man like Sir Philip Grant, who had so successfully administered the government of Jamaica, had been appointed to govern Cyprus, he was confident he would have found it possible greatly to reduce the police force of the Island. The Island, in his opinion, had been rather hardly treated, for from no country in the world, he believed, was so large a proportion of its revenue drawn as it was proposed to draw from Cyprus, with the view of handing it over to the Porte. The Revenue was £170,000 a-year, and out of that sum he understood that £115,000 was to go direct to the Sultan, leaving a balance behind of only £45,000. That was a difficult position in which to place the Island, and it would scarcely be remedied by undertaking so large an expenditure as that which was now proposed. The present proposal was one of a most extraordinary, abnormal, and irregular character; and he contended that the Vote required explanation from the Under Secretary of State before they went into Committee, and he hoped that the Government would postpone the Vote till another year, if they did not wholly abandon it; as, without some Reports from those in authority in the Island, he did not think that the House of Commons ought to be called upon to vote such a large sum for a force which could not be required in the Island. He, therefore, begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in seconding the Motion, said, he felt his hon. Friend the Member for Reading had demolished the proposed force. The original proposal to establish a military pioneer force in Cyprus was perfectly illegal, unconstitutional, and indefensible. He must, however, strongly object to the action of the Foreign Office, who, finding the illegality of their proposal, sought to carry out their object by a sort of side-wind by establishing a force there under the name of police, which, seeing that it was a peaceful country and free from insurrection, was wholly unnecessary. There was, at that moment, a British military police force in Cyprus. Therefore, we had two forces of police in Cyprus amounting, probably, to about 1,200 men, and we were proposing to add a new force of between 800 and 900 men to the police. That would be a police force of 2,000 men to a population of 150,000—that was to say, one in every 25 grown men would be a policeman in a uniform of some kind. Was not this Vote an attempt to get into Cyprus by a side-wind a military force, and without the direct consent of the House to the enlistment? As we were getting near the end of the Session, he would impress upon the Government the great necessity of their laying the financial account of Cyprus before the House. If this was to be a civil police, then he thought we should have an account of all the civil expenditure of the Island that we might know what were likely to be the future demands on our purse. No doubt it might be said that the sum now asked for was small; but it was only a commencement, and it might lead to untold expenditure in the future. There was no blinking the question. The real difficulty with respect to Cyprus was that of being able to make both ends meet. That desirable result could hardly be attained as long as £150,000 of tribute had to be sent to Constantinople. All the more necessary, therefore, was it for the House to be put in possession of the financial Papers connected with the Island. He also hoped that before this Vote was agreed to we might also have other Papers respecting Cyprus which had been frequently asked for in the House, especially those in reference to the rejection of the election of a Greek gentleman to office on the ground of his nationality, and to the existence of negro slavery in the Island, upon both of which points the information furnished him came from high authority, and was in complete conflict with the denials which had been officially given; and, also, the new instructions with regard to the usages and customs of the people of the Island. Generally speaking, all our troubles as to Cyprus seemed to be only beginning. He ventured to express a fear that if this Vote of £26,000 were passed it would only be a fleabite in comparison with what we should be asked to vote in future years. They had never yet received any statement of the views of foreign Governments as to our acquisition of Cyprus. The reason given for placing Cyprus under the Foreign rather than under the Colonial Office was that there were so many international questions arising with respect to it. Were these complications at an end? Were foreign Governments satisfied with the jurisdiction we had established there? If so, why was not the Island placed under the Colonial Office? The Under Secretary had been asked for any new Papers showing the necessity for this police force and the inability of the Island to maintain it; but the Government stated in reply that no such Papers were in their possession; so that, in fact, the Government admitted they were about to establish a larger police force per head in Cyprus than had been established in almost any other country without any Papers to justify such a measure.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is inexpedient to grant a sum of £26,000 for the Cyprus Police until a report from the authorities of the Island, showing the necessity for such expenditure, and a full statement of the finances of the Island, be laid before the House,"

—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre),

MR. BALFOUR said, that his hon. Friend who spoke last (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had so far taken the affairs of Cyprus under his special protection that he was not surprised he had gone again over a good many topics on which he had before addressed the House. He would not follow his hon. Friend's example in that respect; but two points had been mentioned as to which he thought an answer might be usefully given. The first was, that the government of Cyprus had been placed under the Foreign Office because complicated negotiations had been going on with foreign Powers as to their subjects resident in Cyprus, which negotiations could more advantageously be carried on by the Foreign Office than by the Colonial Office; but, argued his hon. Friend, those complications had been got over, and the government of the Island ought to be at once transferred to the Colonial Office. In that conclusion his hon. Friend was mistaken, as many and strong reasons existed to justify the government of Cyprus remaining under the Foreign Office. Then, again, his hon. Friend referred to a debate which took place in the House of Lords yesterday on the subject of slavery; and he stated that Lord Salisbury had made a mistake in saying that the existence of slavery had been denied, not only by the present government of the Island, but by Sir Garnet Wolseley. In that, too, his hon. Friend was in error, the fact being that, a considerable time ago, the existence of slavery in the Island had been distinctly denied by Sir Garnet Wolseley. With respect to the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), he was sorry that so much industry on his part, in ascertaining the proportion of police to population in all the countries of Europe, and also in India and our Colonies, should have been thrown away.

He regretted, too, that his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea should have wasted so much time in stating that the flood-gates of expenditure in Cyprus had now been opened, and that this claim of civil expenditure would be followed by many others. All these calculations and prophecies were thrown away, and for this reason—that the £26,000 now asked for by the Government was not, strictly speaking, for civil expenditure. The first hypothesis adopted by the hon. Member for Reading—that it was for military expenditure—came much nearer to the truth than that adopted by him later on in his speech. There was, of course, no doubt that this expenditure of £26,000 was for a quasi-military purpose, and could not properly be said to belong to the civil expenditure of the country. Lord Beaconsfield was, therefore, right, when he said at the Mansion House that Cyprus would make no demand upon England in connection with civil expenditure. For what kind of uses would this force be required? It would be wanted to guard stores, perform escort duty, and, if necessary, to defend the Island. Who could deny that a body of men were required to fulfil these duties in Cyprus, or maintain that the force, which it was proposed to have, would be unnecessarily large for these purposes? There now remained two questions to be considered. Was the scheme of the Government economical and efficient for the purposes intended, and was it legal and constitutional? To answer the first of these questions, he would point out that the substitute for the scheme of the Government would be the presence of two battalions of regular soldiers, which would involve the expenditure of £70,000, which would fall on the Home Exchequer. Therefore, so far as economy was concerned, it was plain that the Government had pursued a judicious policy. As to the efficiency of the force, no doubt could be entertained by those who knew the class of men employed by the Government. He had now to consider how far the conduct of the Government was justifiable on legal and constitutional grounds. He admitted that Cyprus was in a somewhat anomalous position. It could not be denied that there might be difficulties and frictions connected with its administration; but these were outweighed by considerations of high policy. The question, however, was, had the Government, in its management of the affairs of Cyprus, violated either the letter or the spirit of the law? That they had not violated the letter of the law was admitted by hon. Gentlemen opposite; and no one, he believed, could justly contend that they had violated its spirit. He therefore maintained that, in the action which they had taken, the Government had not done anything which was in the least illegal or unconstitutional. It should be remembered that the force which they proposed to establish was not a military force, and would be under the control of Parliament. No one, therefore, could say that the liberties of this country were endangered by its existence. For the reasons which he had given, he held that ample justification existed for the Vote which his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would propose at a later hour in the evening.

MR. T. BRASSEY said, they were asked to vote a sum of money for the maintenance of this police force in Cyprus because we had burdened our administration of the Island with a financial obligation of a most onerous character. The amount of the tribute to be paid to the Porte was £115,000, out of a total Revenue of £175,000—a Revenue which represented the extreme sum which the most despotic Government could extort from an oppressed people. He very much regretted that we had taken upon ourselves the unworthy office of tax-gatherers for a foreign Power. Of the sum of £60,000 which remained at the disposal of the local Government in Cyprus, the surplus available for works of public improvement amounted at the utmost to £15,000 a-year. Englishmen, he was glad to say, felt a desire to carry out those improvements in the system of government which were shadowed forth by the Chancellor of the Exchequer at Birmingham, and it was impossible to carry out those humane designs without an expenditure of money. It was clear that the necessary sum was not forthcoming from local resources, so that it was very natural that the Government of Cyprus should make an effort to insinuate into the Estimates laid before the British Parliament a Vote which, under whatever designation it might present itself, would be, practically, a contribution from the National Exchequer towards the local Revenues of Cyprus. They might call this a police force, or whatever they pleased; but he was quite satisfied, from what he had seen of the docile habits of the people of Cyprus, that the proposed force was not required to guarantee public order, and, therefore, he felt sure that the intention was to employ men composing it in a variety of civil duties. The long-neglected Island presented an infinite field for the work of improvement. He ventured to urge upon the Government that they should take steps to amend the Convention into which they had entered, and relieve the local Government of Cyprus from the burden of an annual tribute to the Porte. While urging this upon them, he was very sensible of the fact that there was really no military value attaching to Cyprus. He could not, however, entertain the thought of abandoning the people of the Island, after the encouragement given them to rely upon British protection. Although the bargain which we had made was not a favourable one from a British point of view, he held that it was our duty to take immediate steps to improve the position of the local Government of Cyprus.

MR. BOURKE said, he could not object to the general tone of the observations which had been made by the hon. Member for Hastings, who had preceded him; but he must object to a line of criticism which would not admit that Her Majesty's Government, having taken possession of Cyprus on high grounds of policy, were not justified in the line which they had adopted and followed. England having made up her mind to occupy and administer Cyprus, they could not recede from their bargain; and the question was whether the financial arrangements made was not the best, and, in fact, the only arrangement that could be made. That arrangement was that England was to give to Turkey only that which Turkey had got before; and unless we had broken the Treaty of Paris and violently taken possession of Cyprus it was not possible to come to any other arrangement. It was possible, perhaps probable, that in the future better arrangements than existed at present might be made for the government of Cyprus; but as long as the present arrangements existed he could not see how it was possible to alter the state of things which had been agreed upon between this country and Turkey. What he complained of was that, before the Island had been occupied 12 months, every conceivable Vote in connection with the place had been exaggerated, and if the prosperity of the Island was a success it would not be owing to the good wishes or good-will of the Liberal Party in that House, who had done their best to disparage everything connected with the Island. In the face of all this, he had heard with pleasure the good wishes which had been expressed by the hon. Member for Hastings for the future welfare of Cyprus, and could not refrain from expressing his regret at the tone which had characterized the remarks of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea, who was always ready to listen to and to believe the complaints which came from the people of any country between China and Peru who, being subject to British rule, were disaffected concerning it. The view which the hon. Baronet had expressed on the present occasion was based upon a misapprehension, and upon the existence of exceptional circumstances, as he believed the hon. Baronet would see when he came to read the Papers which would be laid before Parliament on the subject. He should not, on the present occasion, enter upon the broad question of whether it was or was not wise for England to have taken possession of the Island; but, having so taken possession, he thought the House would agree with the hon. Member for Hastings in thinking that it was the duty of England to do the best it could in the circumstances. As far as the question of slavery in Cyprus was concerned, he had nothing to withdraw from what he had already said on the subject. He was told that slavery did not now exist, and that the Courts of the Island had not given effect to any demand for the holding in involuntary servitude any person in the Island. There was no intention on the part of the Government at the present moment to propose a large expenditure for Cyprus. With regard to the Papers which the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea had asked for that Session, the accounts had not come home from Cyprus nearly so fast as Her Majesty's Government thought they would have come; but he should be happy to produce such as he could for the inspection of the hon. Member for Chelsea. He was sorry to think that the promise he made of a financial statement in regard to the affairs of Cyprus before the end of the Session might not be fulfilled; but that would arise from a complication in the manner of keeping the accounts which had been found to be necessary, but could not possibly have been foreseen. The views of a correspondent of The Cologne Gazette had been quoted as against the policy which Her Majesty's Government had pursued; but he could not for a moment think of treating seriously opinions of the kind, as they knew more about the Island than a newspaper correspondent. At the same time, the greatest attention had been given to every statement made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea; and he (Mr. Bourke) thought it would be admitted by everyone who had perused the Papers that these statements had been substantially refuted. The greater portion of the speech of the hon. Member for Reading appeared to be based upon the supposition that the Vote which Her Majesty's Government asked for was in the same shape in which it had appeared some time ago. That supposition, however, was not correct, as the hon. Gentleman himself had been compelled to admit. In common fairness to Her Majesty's Government everyone should bear in mind that when this Vote was first put down in the month of November the Island of Cyprus had only been in the occupation of the Government for some five months, and that, consequently, it was impossible for them to know at that time exactly what were the requirements of the Island, and what description of permanent force it would be necessary to maintain there. The question between the hon. Member and Her Majesty's Government was a very small one, because the force employed in the Island would have to discharge both military and civil duties. As had been pointed out by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford and others some time ago, there were technical and legal objections to the form of the Vote as it originally stood. Its form had, however, been changed, and he trusted that it would now be presented to the House in a perfectly legal shape. It now took the form of an estimate of the amount required for the year ending March, 1880, to defray the additional expenditure thrown upon the Government of Cyprus in consequence of the augmentation of the police force, rendered necessary by the reduction of the military garrison in the Island. As it had been intended to employ the military force it was originally proposed to keep in the Island in civil duties, so now it was intended to employ this augmented police force in discharging Imperial duties, such as those entailed in defending the Island, and other military duties; and, therefore, it was only fair that the funds for paying this additional force of police should be provided out of the Imperial Exchequer. A large number of the force would be employed in escorting treasure from one part of the Island to the other. [A laugh.] It was all very well for the hon. Member for Reading to sneer at that statement; but it was a duty that had to be performed, and officers and official persons were often employed on it, and it was certainly an Imperial duty. There was already a police ordinance; and though it might require amendment in regard to the regulation of this additional force, yet it would be placed substantially in the same category as the present police force. There was no legal objection to the proposal which any hon. Member could bring forward, and he could quite well understand the disappointment of hon. Gentlemen opposite when they found that the Vote was denuded of such objections. No one who had the good government of Cyprus at heart could doubt that the proposal of the Government was a fair one, and that it would contribute very much to the prosperity of the Island, and to the good administration of every branch of the Service.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, they had had two accounts of the proposed Vote—one from the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and another from the Private Secretary to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and, having heard the explanations, he was disposed to ask, in the celebrated phrase, "Under which thimble lies the pea?" He had never known of an attempt to palm off on the House of Commons a Vote which was so utterly unsatisfactory as this. What did it come to? It was a piece of financial jugglery, deliberately done by the Government. They adm that they had kept the Vote upon the Estimates from February till the 21st of July, and that it was an utterly illegal and unconstitutional Vote. They had endeavoured to smuggle through the Civil Service Estimates a military Vote, in defiance of the first principles of the Constitution. Having been challenged months ago on this subject, they went on with it and stuck to it; and it was only through the pertinacity of the hon. Member for Reading that they had been driven out of that position. They had asked for money, in defiance of a well-known financial principle by which the House was governed, and in the teeth of the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, which forbade them to enlist aliens; and yet, all the time, they had had on the Table a demand upon the House to vote this money. Finding that they could not justify it as a military pioneer force, they had put the pea under another thimble and called it a Vote for the Cyprus police, and then, with great ingenuity—and he might say ingenuousness—the Private Secretary of Lord Salisbury said it was all the same thing, and the Under Secretary said it was almost the same thing. These men were “to take the place of a military force”—these were the words of the Under Secretary—and when it came to be challenged that they were the same thing as the pioneer force the hon. Gentleman said that was nothing. The fact was that the Government were proposing to juggle the House by a mere play of words into voting under one name money for an object which was illegal under another name. He never heard of such a thing in the House of Commons; and it had not been attempted for generations or for centuries. The Government might have a majority at their backs to support them in passing this Vote; but there was an ulterior judgment, far beyond their majority, which would have to be passed upon the question of Cyprus, and he was not afraid of that ulterior judgment. What was the state of public opinion and the position of the House with regard to Cyprus 12 months ago? They were not then attempting to get up a miserable pioneer force; on the contrary, they were sending Sir Garnet Wolseley at the head of 10,000 men to occupy and defend the Island. It was a high policy then, for they were going to regenerate Asia Minor, and Cyprus was to be the fulcrum by which they were to move the world. The noble Lord the President of the Board of Trade said that the whole of the East were exclaiming, “When are you coming?” The noble Lord seemed to be playing on the bagpipes, “The Campbells are coming.” Under the direction of Her Majesty’s Government the whole of the East was going to be regenerated. Steam ploughs were to be introduced into Cyprus and reforms into all Asia Minor. What had now become of these steam ploughs and reforms? What had become of the emporium of steam ploughs to be established in Cyprus, and of all the farthing rushlight illumination of 12 months ago? It was flickering in the socket, and was giving out a savour which was not agreeable. And now they were in the dregs on the lees of the Anglo-Turkish Convention, and they were at present engaged with a miserable juggle of a Vote for £26,000 to eke out the glorious occupation of Cyprus. There they were, with the Government on its last legs, shifting about under one name and another in order to squeeze that sum out of the taxation of the country for the purpose of keeping this miserable abortion of Cyprus upon its legs. And that was the result of 12 months of the great policy undertaken for the regeneration of Asia Minor. The Government assured them that they would ask for no more money on behalf of Cyprus; but what had become of the great Famagousta harbour scheme, where the Fleets of England were to ride and dominate the East? Nothing had been said of that by the Under Secretary. It was reasonable, when the House was asked for £26,000, to inquire what was the financial situation of Cyprus? The Under Secretary gave no answer. It appeared that those admirable administrators, who were to set an example of model farming to Asia Minor, had not sent home any accounts, the reason being that the juice of the orange had been given to someone else, while these unfortunate officials had been left to do what they could with the rind. Her Majesty’s Government had been in such a hurry to acquire Cyprus that they were willing to give any price for it—to pay away its whole available income. And why? Because they signed a sort of Salisbury-Schouvaloff Memorandum.

Sir William Harcourt

They bought a pig in a poke, and when they opened the poke they found a very bad pig indeed. What was the end of it all? They had this wretched Vote, which seemed to him nothing less than the catastrophe of a diplomatic farce. Last October, the Chancellor of the Exchequer assured the people of Birmingham that he had a pocketful of statistics about Cyprus, and that he was going to give us a Cyprus Budget; but the Under Secretary now said that he had got no materials. The Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke to the people of Birmingham of the "Returns which were made out of the estimated Revenue of Cyprus." Where were these statistics and Returns? [Mr. BOURKE: I stated them.] Stated them! That was not the way to make a Return. The statements of the Under Secretary had been most cautious, reserved, and, as regarded that night at least, ambiguous; but the House wanted the statistics and Returns which the Chancellor of the Exchequer quoted last October. If there were such Returns they ought to be brought forward to show the solvency of the Island. The Prime Minister, speaking at the Mansion House, said—

"Perhaps it will not be uninteresting to the citizens of London to learn that Cyprus will be no burden to the people of this country."

But the poor citizens of London would learn a different fact when this Vote was brought before them. There was a great deal of that sort of "bunkum" going on about July last year; and the Prime Minister added that the Revenues of the Island would not only pay the Sultan, but would also defray the cost of its civil government. Well, either Cyprus did not pay for its civil government, as the Prime Minister said it would, or this Vote ought to be in the Military Estimates. That was the dilemma. This was a military Vote. [Mr. BALFOUR: A quasi-military Vote.] The Under Secretary had said that something was "almost a quibble." Well, he would not call what his hon. Friend had said "almost a quibble," but a quasi-quibble. What was the view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was the guardian of the finances of the country, of this "quasi-military Vote?" Ought it to be in the Military Estimates, or the quasi-Military Estimates; and when would the right hon. Gentleman produce his quasi-Supplementary Estimates? He should be extremely curious to know what was the view taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of this quasi-military Vote. There had been no information on the subject which had not been dragged out of the Government with the greatest possible difficulty; and he thought it impossible for the House of Commons to vote money for this new settlement under the circumstances, after the assurance of the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer that nothing would be required for its maintenance. He was glad the matter had been brought forward in that form, because he did not believe there was anything which was more likely to enlighten the people of this country as to what the character of the transaction had been from first to last. The Government had split the amount they now required, first into one thing and then into another, and when they were asked to say what was the financial position of the Island they said they had no Reports and could give no information. Either this was a military body or it was not. If it was a military body it should have been raised in a proper manner; and if not, the Government should show that it was a civil force. It seemed to him that it had been a quasi-military affair from the beginning, and had never any substance in it. It was meant to throw dust in the eyes of the country, and would come to grief, just like the Anglo-Turkish Convention on to which it was tacked.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not help remarking that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Oxford was chargeable with one very monstrous vice—he meant the vice of ingratitude. The hon. and learned Gentleman was really more ungrateful to the Island of Cyprus than he could have conceived possible, for that Island had furnished the hon. and learned Gentleman during the last 12 months with all sorts of excuses for making grand speeches and for saying good sayings. The hon. and learned Gentleman ought really to be very grateful to the Island of Cyprus, for, in his speeches, he had prophesied all sorts of misfortunes and failures; but the failures had ended in the failure of his predictions. Probably, the hon. and learned Gentleman might keep it up a little while longer by great force of ingenuity and a grand selection of words; but he thought that those who laughed the last would probably laugh the longest. The last failure which he seemed to cling to was the supposed failure of something that had been said about the Island of Cyprus; but he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), on the part of the Government, was quite prepared to appeal to the not very distant future as to the working of the experiment which was being tried in the Island of Cyprus. Hon. Members had wandered so far from the original Motion of the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) that it was desirable to recall their attention to it. Upon that Motion there had been founded a series of discussions upon almost every possible subject in connection with Cyprus. Reference had been made to a speech delivered by him at Birmingham last October. What he then said was to the effect that, according to the accounts received from those who were inquiring into the Revenues of Cyprus, the Government gathered that the civil administration of the Island would be without cost to this country, though he did put in a word of caution, and remarked that, possibly, in the first year, some expense might be thrown upon us. Hon. Members were well aware that the original idea of the Government, in entering into the arrangements for the occupation of Cyprus, was that we should have a position which would be important as a military and naval position, and as a place of arms, and which would be of great importance in that part of the Levant, because it would enable us to fulfil obligations that we had entered into on behalf of the country with regard to Asia Minor. We did not propose, in the step we were taking, to injure or detract in any way from the advantages which the Sultan derived from the Island. We held that it would be possible for us to undertake to make a bargain by which we could leave the Sultan in as good a position as he previously occupied in regard to the revenues from Cyprus; while we undertook to maintain the government of the Island, without any expense to this country, out of the revenues to be fairly extracted from the people of Cyprus. Of course, if we were to make use of Cyprus for purposes of our own as a place of arms, that would involve military expenditure altogether outside of the administration of Cyprus itself. One of the first steps the Government took was to send out to Cyprus a gentleman of considerable financial ability to report upon the financial condition of the Island. That gentleman sent home a preliminary Report, from which he took the figures that were given in the speech that had been referred to. Speaking from memory, they had from that gentleman a statement that they might expect from one source so much revenue, and from another source so much; that the expenditure for purely civil purposes would be a certain other amount; that the surplus would be the sum to be paid to the Porte; and it appeared that by better administration, by taking care that the revenue levied from the taxpayer should find its way into the Treasury, and remain in the hands of middlemen, they would be able to defray the cost of the civil administration, and still to pay the tribute due to the Porte. He had himself been a little sceptical, and for that he had been thought to take a rather gloomy view; he had been a little sceptical as to the first year, supposing that there might then be a difficulty in making ends meet in regard to the civil administration. But as to the military expenditure, that, of course, was put in quite a different category. They were occupying Cyprus for their own purpose, which was a military purpose, and they thought it was right that they should defray out of the Expenditure of this country the charge for maintaining a proper military force in Cyprus. Therefore, in his statement, and in those of the Prime Minister and others, there was always an exception made as to the military expenditure in the prospect they held out of Cyprus paying its own way. Then they came to the question of what the military expenditure was to be. His right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War informed them what would be the establishment which he contemplated maintaining there; but when the matter came to be more carefully considered it appeared that it would not be necessary or advisable that that amount of English force should be kept in Cyprus in present circumstances. But, inasmuch as that force would have discharged various duties of a military character, of course, some provision had to be made for the performance of those duties. Accordingly, it had been in contemplation to have a force which would have been called the Cyprus pioneers. That stood upon the Estimates for some time. He need not now go into the circumstances in which it was found that that would not have been the proper or a legal step to take; but another arrangement was made which brought the matter into the form in which it now appeared on the Estimate. Whether they called it civil or military expenditure, it was expenditure incurred in consequence of the withdrawal of the troops which it was originally intended to keep in the Island, and which would have relieved them from the necessity of employing this force there, whatever name they pleased to give it. They were asked to say what was the precise financial position of Cyprus at this moment, and why they did not produce the accounts which had been rendered. He was not sure how the matter stood as to the sending home of those accounts. He knew that they had been asked for, and that they were very anxious to see them at the Treasury; but he knew, also, that there had been a good deal of difficulty as to the negotiation. The nature of the bargain was necessarily one involving some delay. They were to pay the Porte the average surplus of the Revenue of Cyprus over its Expenditure in past years. That seemed, at first sight, a very simple thing to ascertain; but when they came to deal with a country like Cyprus, and with a system such as had prevailed there of late years, it was not so easy to get at the exact sum. It could not be furnished by return of post. They had to go into a number of questions, some of which were very complicated. They had to ascertain in what mode the remittances were made; to verify the nature of those remittances; learn the currency in which they were made, and the rate at which the payments to the Porte were fixed. It was easy to say that such and such a service cost 10,000 piastres; but how were they to ascertain what a piastre was—whether it was in coin or in paper; whether it was to be reckoned at one rate of exchange or at another? All those things took time to adjust; and when they had to deal with Orientals in those matters they could not proceed with the same rapidity as when the Treasury dealt with the Admiralty or the War Office. Even in transactions between the Treasury and the Indian Government considerable time elapsed before they got at the exact state of the accounts. And when they had to go into a settlement between the British Government administering a Turkish dependency on British principles and the Turkish Government, the number of questions they had to solve took more time than one might be apt at first to suppose. They had, therefore, a right to appeal to the consideration of Parliament and of the country in the whole of those matters in relation to the improvement and the reform of the administration of Oriental countries. Why, what was the theory on which they were proceeding? That theory was, that there existed great abuses of long standing, thoroughly ingrained and very difficult to unravel, and that they desired to get rid of those abuses and to introduce a better system. If they wanted to introduce radical reforms they must go patiently into those questions; and the very fact that there were so many of those abuses to be corrected proved the difficulty of the work they had undertaken, and also indicated the great advantage that would be derived from its accomplishment. He ventured to say that when they looked at Cyprus some few years hence they would find that a great and good work had been done in the early years of their administration. He said that those who had been administering the Island during the last 12 months had done a work which would bear comparison with the achievements of many founders of States and legislators in bringing about great reforms. It was not because they might pick a hole here, or another there, or because they might receive a letter from some discontented person who might have had an interest in the retention of the old system, and who cried out at what was being done—it was not because of such things that they were to condemn their own Government, which, amid many difficulties and all sorts of misapprehensions, was endeavouring to correct those evils. It had been said, in the course of the debate, that it was a condemnation of their system of Native police that they had to punish and imprison five or six zaptiehs and bring them into order. Why, the case always made against the Turkish Government was that the zap-

and a grand selection of words; but he thought that those who laughed the last would probably laugh the longest. The last failure which he seemed to cling to was the supposed failure of something that had been said about the Island of Cyprus; but he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), on the part of the Government, was quite prepared to appeal to the not very distant future as to the working of the experiment which was being tried in the Island of Cyprus. Hon. Members had wandered so far from the original Motion of the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) that it was desirable to recall their attention to it. Upon that Motion there had been founded a series of discussions upon almost every possible subject in connection with Cyprus. Reference had been made to a speech delivered by him at Birmingham last October. What he then said was to the effect that, according to the accounts received from those who were inquiring into the Revenues of Cyprus, the Government gathered that the civil administration of the Island would be without cost to this country, though he did put in a word of caution, and remarked that, possibly, in the first year, some expense might be thrown upon us. Hon. Members were well aware that the original idea of the Government, in entering into the arrangements for the occupation of Cyprus, was that we should have a position which would be important as a military and naval position, and as a place of arms, and which would be of great importance in that part of the Levant, because it would enable us to fulfil obligations that we had entered into on behalf of the country with regard to Asia Minor. We did not propose, in the step we were taking, to injure or detract in any way from the advantages which the Sultan derived from the Island. We held that it would be possible for us to undertake to make a bargain by which we could leave the Sultan in as good a position as he previously occupied in regard to the revenues from Cyprus; while we undertook to maintain the government of the Island, without any expense to this country, out of the revenues to be fairly extracted from the people of Cyprus. Of course, if we were to make use of Cyprus for purposes of our own as a place of arms, that would involve military expenditure altogether outside of the administration of Cyprus itself. One of the first steps the Government took was to send out to Cyprus a gentleman of considerable financial ability to report upon the financial condition of the Island. That gentleman sent home a preliminary Report, from which he took the figures that were given in the speech that had been referred to. Speaking from memory, they had from that gentleman a statement that they might expect from one source so much revenue, and from another source so much; that the expenditure for purely civil purposes would be a certain other amount; that the surplus would be the sum to be paid to the Porte; and it appeared that by better administration, by taking care that the revenue levied from the taxpayer should find its way into the Treasury, and remain in the hands of middlemen, they would be able to defray the cost of the civil administration, and still to pay the tribute due to the Porte. He had himself been a little sceptical, and for that he had been thought to take a rather gloomy view; he had been a little sceptical as to the first year, supposing that there might then be a difficulty in making ends meet in regard to the civil administration. But as to the military expenditure, that, of course, was put in quite a different category. They were occupying Cyprus for their own purpose, which was a military purpose, and they thought it was right that they should defray out of the Expenditure of this country the charge for maintaining a proper military force in Cyprus. Therefore, in his statement, and in those of the Prime Minister and others, there was always an exception made as to the military expenditure in the prospect they held out of Cyprus paying its own way. Then they came to the question of what the military expenditure was to be. His right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War informed them what would be the establishment which he contemplated maintaining there; but when the matter came to be more carefully considered it appeared that it would not be necessary or advisable that that amount of English force should be kept in Cyprus in present circumstances. But, inasmuch as that force would have discharged various duties of a military character, of course, some provision had to be made for the performance of those duties. Accordingly, it had been in contemplation to have a force which would have been called the Cyprus pioneers. That stood upon the Estimates for some time. He need not now go into the circumstances in which it was found that that would not have been the proper or a legal step to take; but another arrangement was made which brought the matter into the form in which it now appeared on the Estimate. Whether they called it civil or military expenditure, it was expenditure incurred in consequence of the withdrawal of the troops which it was originally intended to keep in the Island, and which would have relieved them from the necessity of employing this force there, whatever name they pleased to give it. They were asked to say what was the precise financial position of Cyprus at this moment, and why they did not produce the accounts which had been rendered. He was not sure how the matter stood as to the sending home of those accounts. He knew that they had been asked for, and that they were very anxious to see them at the Treasury; but he knew, also, that there had been a good deal of difficulty as to the negotiation. The nature of the bargain was necessarily one involving some delay. They were to pay the Porte the average surplus of the Revenue of Cyprus over its Expenditure in past years. That seemed, at first sight, a very simple thing to ascertain; but when they came to deal with a country like Cyprus, and with a system such as had prevailed there of late years, it was not so easy to get at the exact sum. It could not be furnished by return of post. They had to go into a number of questions, some of which were very complicated. They had to ascertain in what mode the remittances were made; to verify the nature of those remittances; learn the currency in which they were made, and the rate at which the payments to the Porte were fixed. It was easy to say that such and such a service cost 10,000 piastres; but how were they to ascertain what a piastre was—whether it was in coin or in paper; whether it was to be reckoned at one rate of exchange or at another? All those things took time to adjust; and when they had to deal with Orientals in those matters they could not proceed with the same rapidity as when the Treasury dealt with the Admiralty or

And when they had to go into a settlement between the British Government administering a Turkish dependency on British principles and the Turkish Government, the number of questions they had to solve took more time than one might be apt at first to suppose. They had, therefore, a right to appeal to the consideration of Parliament and of the country in the whole of those matters in relation to the improvement and the reform of the administration of Oriental countries. Why, the case always made against the Turkish Government was that the ~~war~~

curious one. The position of that city had undergone a complete change within the last few years. The main political influence of Europe, which at one time was centered there, was now centred in Berlin; yet we continued to keep up in Paris an Embassy at an enormous expense, instead of reducing the charge to the amount which we expended on our Embassy at a Court where the political influence was at least equal, if not much greater. He might also take the case of Constantinople in support of the view which he desired to impress on the Committee. The political character and power of the Porte had recently undergone a very great change indeed. No one would, for a moment, argue that the position of the present Sultan had not been greatly impaired as compared with that which was occupied by his Predecessors on the Ottoman Throne. Yet we still maintained at Constantinople an enormous Embassy. It was, perhaps, the most expensive of all our Embassies. He found that our Ambassador in Turkey received a salary of £8,000 a-year, and that he occupied a palace of great magnificence. He was aided in the discharge of his duties by a principal Secretary of Embassy, who had a salary of £900 a-year. There were, besides, three second Secretaries of Embassy, a third Secretary, a physician, a chaplain, and a number of other officials. Then there were miscellaneous expenses which had to be provided for, and the result was that the amount expended on the Embassy at Constantinople exceeded, if he was not mistaken, the charge borne on the Estimates in connection with any Embassy in Europe. Now, he had some years ago induced the House to appoint a Committee before which the whole question of our diplomatic expenditure was brought; and he was quite prepared to believe that that Committee had done a certain amount of useful work. He could not, at the same time, say that the expenditure on account of the Diplomatic Service had been reduced. We paid our Ministers abroad salaries far larger than those which were paid to their Ministers by any other country in the world; and he was strongly of opinion that the time must soon arrive when another review must be taken of the scale of our expenditure for the Diplomatic Service, and when the question must be considered how far the great changes which had taken place in Europe rendered it the duty of the Government to reduce the charges on account of our Embassies and Missions abroad. A considerable reduction might, he felt satisfied, be made in many cases with advantage; while, in other cases, no doubt, it might be found that the present establishments did not go beyond what was expedient and desirable. But although, on examining the Vote, he was by no means satisfied with its general character or the total expenditure on the Diplomatic Service, he did not think it was necessary, or that it would be advantageous, to challenge a Division upon it at that moment. He could not ignore the fact that this was a moribund Parliament, and he did not think it would be well to have questions such as those to which he had been referring investigated now that the present House of Commons was so near the end of its existence. He could have no expectation, at all events, that the present House would enter upon the subject in the spirit of reform and economy. He could only hope that the next House of Commons would contain a larger number of economists, from whom a Motion for the reduction of our Expenditure would receive a more favourable reception than could now be expected from it.

MR. BOURKE said, that the fact of the matter was, as the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down must be aware, that although the Vote might look large upon paper it had been found impossible to reduce it. The Diplomatic Service, as a whole, was badly paid; and he did not think that any Government, taking into account the duties which had to be performed, and having due regard to the interests of the country, could say that our Representatives at foreign capitals should not be liberally remunerated and enabled to maintain a position of becoming dignity.

MR. CHILDERS asked for an explanation of the item of £3,000 for providing a new steamer on the River Tigris. The item was one, he thought, which ought to come under the head of the Consular Expenditure, as the matter was connected with the duties which were discharged by our Consul General at Bagdad.

MR. BOURKE said, the right hon. Gentleman was probably a better authority than himself on the question of whether the item should be placed in the Consular or Diplomatic Vote, but the point was one of only minor importance. As to the steamer on the Tigris, the right hon. Gentleman was aware that we had had a ship on that river for many years. The old vessel had become worn out, and it was anxiously desired by the Indian Government that she should be replaced. Her Majesty's Government, after carefully considering the communications which they had received on the subject, thought it their duty to insert in the Estimates the sum of £3,000 as a contribution to the building of a new ship; but that was not to be an annual Vote.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £184,597 to complete the sum for Consular Services.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he found no mention made in the Estimates of a salary for a Consul at Philippopolis. There was an item for the salary of a Vice Consul; but that was an old item. The salaries of some of the new Consuls were given, but not those of all of them. Was it proposed to have a Supplementary Vote?

MR. BOURKE said he had stated some time ago, in answer to a question which had been put to him in the House, that several new Consuls had been appointed, and he thought the provision made for their salaries in the Estimates would be sufficient, without having recourse to a Supplementary Vote. It would, of course, be the duty of the Government to propose a Supplementary Vote, if necessary.

MR. CHILDERS reminded the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that a Return had been promised with regard to the Anatolian Consuls before the Estimates were made; but that no such Return had been laid upon the Table of the House. Looking at the multifarious duties of the Foreign Office, he would be the last to blame the hon. Gentleman for this; but thought it was only right that the House of Commons should have placed before it, before the end of the Session, a Paper showing the changes which had taken place in the Asiatic Consulates as a result of the Treaty of Berlin.

MR. BOURKE promised that a Paper should be laid upon the Table. The Government were rather anxious that the spheres of the Consuls in the districts referred to should from time to time be changeable.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID said, it was not satisfactory that the House should vote money for Consulates, such as Bosnia and Cyprus, which had been abolished, in order to apply it to others the Government proposed to establish, with regard to which the House had no information.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, several Consular appointments had been made to Anatolia and Roumania which had not been gazetted. He complained that the Committee should be called upon to vote money for Consulates that did not exist, and no money for those which were in existence. He trusted the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary would furnish the Committee with the best information in his power with reference to the salaries proposed to be given to the Consuls in Anatolia and Roumania and Paphos in general terms, and would also state who were the Consuls proposed to be appointed to these districts.

MR. BOURKE believed that two of the Consuls in Anatolia would receive salaries of £800 and £900, and the others £400 and £500 a-year.

MR. RYLANDS had to call the attention of the hon. Gentleman to another part of the world. He had not expected that this Vote would come on that evening, and had given Notice of a Question which it would, perhaps, be more convenient to ask now in order that the Under Secretary might have an opportunity of making an explanation to the Committee which would probably be satisfactory to them. The case, which was altogether a peculiar one, had reference to the Consul General in Siam. He was informed that, on a recent occasion, the King of Siam flogged one of his Ministers—a circumstance, probably, of very little interest to the Members of the House. Now, it so happened that this Minister of the King married the daughter of the Consul at Bangkok; and the Consul, feeling that British interests were seriously affected in consequence of his son-in-law, the Prime Minister of the King of Siam, having been flogged, immediately ordered up from Singapore the Foxhound, one of Her Majesty's gunboats. This vessel arrived and anchored off Bangkok in order to make some demands to satisfy the wounded honour of Great Britain. He had put a Question to the Under Secretary some time ago upon this subject, asking him whether there was any truth in the statement which had been made, and the hon. Gentleman said, in reply, that the information was correct, that some difference existed between the Consul General and the King of Siam; but he did not give the House any information as to the particular facts. According to the information which he (Mr. Rylands) had, and which he believed to be correct, this state of contention between the Consul General and the King continued, and the Foxhound was still lying off Bangkok to support the Consul General for some object or other. He was also informed that the Consul General had marked his serene displeasure with the conduct of the King by giving orders that the officers of the gunboat should not receive courtesies from the Siamese nor pay to them any courtesies whatever, and that a garden party having taken place which was visited by some of the ship's officers in undress, the Consul General, on hearing of it, issued a prohibition against the officers visiting or inviting the Siamese. He, therefore, wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it was a fact that the son-in-law of the Consul General having been flogged by his master the King of Siam, a British gunboat had been sent up to Bangkok, and whether it was a fact that a considerable amount of ill-feeling had been caused by that transaction? In his opinion, the Consul General had exceeded the duties of his office, and the Committee had a right to complain that one of Her Majesty's gunboats had been used in this matter, unless there was some reason for the act other than had appeared.

MR. BOURKE could not state whether the circumstances related by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) were true or not, although they were, probably, substantially correct. It was correct to say that the Consul General did order up a gunboat; but it had since left Bangkok. Her Majesty's Government were quite alive to the necessity of the strictest investigation into the conduct of the Consul General.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked whether the Consul General had, of his own accord, sent home any Report of the case before an explanation was asked for?

MR. BOURKE said, he thought a Report had been received.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £32,401 to complete the sums for the Colonies, Grants in Aid.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH called attention to the item under sub-head L. He believed that Sir Bartle Frere no longer held the office of Her Majesty's High Commissioner for South Africa and Governor-in-Chief of the Cape and Griqualand West; but the Estimates, nevertheless, provided for his salary. Sir Garnet Wolseley having gone out to the Cape as High Commissioner to the seat of war and also to Natal, he asked what effect would that change have upon the Vote?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the office continued to be held by Sir Bartle Frere in South Africa, except as to that part which was connected with the seat of war, where the functions of the office were, of course, transferred to Sir Garnet Wolseley. Sir Bartle Frere was still the Governor and High Commissioner of the Cape and Griqualand West, with respect to which his functions remained, practically, what they were before. The Vote, therefore, remained at the same figure as formerly.

MR. GOURLEY asked for information with respect to the sum of £1,500 for the government of the small Island of Heligoland. He also remarked that the same amount of £3,000 was charged as formerly for the steamer on the African coast, and thought that, inasmuch as there was a very large number of small steamers in connection with the Admiralty lying at various places and rarely used, he did not see why one of them should not be sent out to the Coast of Africa. He thought the time had come when the class of vessels used on the Coast of Africa might be revised by the Admiralty.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the several places on the Coast of West Africa under the jurisdiction of the Government of Sierra Leone could only be conveniently reached from Sierra Leone by sea; and it was, therefore, necessary that the Governor should have a steamer at his disposal, of which he made excellent use for ascending rivers into the interior, opening up those rivers, and establishing friendly relations with the Natives. The Island of Heligoland was, no doubt, a small possession of the Crown; but it was a possession which, he ventured to say, this country would not readily give up, while he was quite sure the inhabitants of the Island would be very sorry to see it given up. He did not think the small sum annually voted in aid of its government could be regarded as excessive.

MR. W. H. JAMES thought the Committee were entitled to information of a more definite character with regard to the salary of Sir Bartle Frere than had been afforded by the right hon. Gentleman. He asked, in the event of Sir Bartle Frere not resuming the position which he formerly held by the end of the present year, whether his salary would remain the same, or whether the residue would be paid to Sir Garnet Wolseley? The right hon. Gentleman had mentioned that the expenses would be equally great; but it must be borne in mind that the duties and responsibilities of the office would be infinitely less under the present arrangement.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH had said that the arrangement made when Sir Garnet Wolseley was sent out must be looked upon as temporary in character. The question now asked was one which it was impossible for him to answer. Everything would depend upon events. He trusted to see Sir Garnet Wolseley soon complete the work which he had been sent out to do, when it would become necessary for the Government to decide how the Commissionership should in future be arranged; but it was impossible to make any statement upon the subject at that moment.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL inquired the reason why the salaries of the Lieutenant Governors of the Islands of St. Vincent, Grenada, and Tobago, which were not to be continued beyond the present year, were each £325 in excess of the amounts charged last year?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH explained that the apparent difference was merely a matter of account, and arose from the fact that these salaries were not to be continued beyond March, 1880. The change in question had made it necessary to include five quarters' salary instead of four.

MR. RAMSAY asked why it was that the country had to pay £1,226 for charges under the head of Clergy in North America? He had understood some years ago when he was in Canada, that an arrangement had been made for the Colony to bear this expense. He confessed that the amount under the head of Missionaries of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel appeared to him to be quite uncalled for.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, this was not a Vote for the maintenance of the Church in Canada. When the former system was changed those persons who were officials in the service of the Crown had, of course, a right to have their vested interests reserved, and there had since been an annual Vote for their salaries, which was becoming gradually less.

MR. WHITWELL trusted that if the present High Commissioner for the Northern part of South Africa were recalled at the close of the war, Sir Bartle Frere would not, in consequence, act again as High Commissioner of Natal and the Transvaal. Was the Committee right in understanding that a fresh appointment of Sir Bartle Frere to Natal would not take place?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, the question was one which it was quite impossible for him to answer.

MR. RYLANDS remarked that the sum of £3,000 for the Pacific Island Commission appeared for the first time in the Estimates of this year. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would inform the Committee in what way this amount was expended?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH explained that the charge was for salaries and travelling expenses—the latter being a very important item of expenditure under the Pacific Islanders Protection Act.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £1,770, to complete the sum for the Orange River Territory and St. Helena (Non-Effective Charges), agreed to.

(6.) £1,120, to complete the sum for Suez Canal.

MR. D. JENKINS again called the attention of the Government to the charge for pilotage upon vessels passing through the Suez Canal. He found that this charge had not been reduced since Canal might very properly be brought before the Suez Canal Directors with a view to its reduction. He took the opportunity of asking what was the policy of Her Majesty's Government with reference to the Suez Canal? Was it to be regarded as international property; as Anglo-French property or as British property? If it was to be regarded as an international property, to be used by all countries, then, so far as England was concerned as a high road to India, it would, in his opinion, be comparatively useless in the event of war, and as such the Government should re-consider the question whether it would not be better to send their troops to India by the old route via the Cape of Good Hope. If, in the event of war, the Canal remained an international high road, our troops would have to be conveyed by large Fleets, and, in addition, it would be necessary to maintain another large Fleet at the entrance to the Canal to prevent our vessels from being molested. Seeing, therefore, that the route by the Cape was now almost as short, in point of time, as that by the Canal, he thought the Government would do well to review their policy in connection with this matter. The time occupied by troop-ships on the passage from England to Bombay, via the Canal, was now 31 days.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. rests. In answer to for Sunderland (Mr. regarded the Suez Canal as a commercial undertaking for the benefit of the world.

Mr. E. JENKINS, Secretary to the Treasury, said that it was hardly a question in the House to the manner in which the Suez Canal was managed (Mr. E. Jenkins) as a whole business of the world. The present Vote of interest in this Canal was proper that ship-owners should look to the fact that the interests of the country were fairly represented by these Directors were for the purpose of the sum of money in the hands of the Committee had been taken with the object of protecting the interests; but, from the Gentleman, it had been British interests were The pilotage dues, well known, fell he passing through the a larger proportion than upon those of and it was surely correct.

Her Majesty's Government originally brought this matter forward, that they hoped to get the entire control of the Canal, that our interests would be secured there, and that we could at any time secure a road through it; but, so far as he could now see, the country had, so to speak, only thrown £4,000,000 sterling into the Canal, for it appeared by the speech of the Under Secretary that we could do nothing whatever in the matter of protecting our interests. The hon. Gentleman had called the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) to account for bringing forward this question upon the present Vote, saying that the matter was irrelevant to the question before the Committee; but he (Mr. E. Jenkins) ventured to consider it as exceedingly relevant, and that Her Majesty's Government ought to instruct the Directors to make strong representations with respect to the pilotage dues, which weighed very heavily indeed upon British shipping.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON reminded the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) that his answer, with respect to the pilotage dues, had been that it was a subject which the Directors ought to bring before the Board of Direction, and that they would, no doubt, do everything in their power to protect British interests. The hon. Member had seen fit to remark upon the throwing of this £4,000,000 into the sea; but he would point out to the Committee that merely as a matter of finance that amount of money returned an ample interest to this country, and, therefore, even from a commercial point of view, it was certainly not right that it should go forth to the country that the money spent upon purchasing the Suez Canal Shares was unproductive, or that the money was absolutely thrown away.

MR. D. JENKINS complained that the charge made as pilotage went into the assets of the Company as tonnage dues; that the Company paid only 100 francs to the pilots, and charged the ship with 1,000 or 1,500 francs.

MR. WHITWELL quite agreed with the hon. Member for Penryn (Mr. D. Jenkins) that the charges were excessive, and that British interests in this respect should be looked after. He objected to them—first, because they were high; secondly, because they fell heavier on the large number of British ships which passed through the Canal; and, thirdly, because captains of vessels who had sailed in every sea were bound to take pilots on board so ignorant of the navigation that whenever a stoppage occurred it was entirely through them. He trusted the Secretary to the Treasury would send a recommendation to the Directors to look after the interests of our mail, steamers which had not that preference shown to them that they were entitled to.

MR. A. GATHORNE-HARDY said, he had been through the Suez Canal, and his attention having been directed to the question of pilotage dues, he had, therefore, discussed the subject with the British Admiral in charge at Alexandria, who said that the dues were not excessive. He (Mr. A. Gathorne-Hardy) was far from saying that the question was not one deserving of attention.

MR. RAMSAY thought that the pilotage was a very proper subject for the consideration of the Committee. But he rose chiefly to express his objection to the remarks of the Secretary to the Treasury in speaking of this Vote as being for the purpose of securing our interests in a very good commercial investment. When the House was asked to vote the sum of £4,000,000 for the purchase of the Suez Canal Shares the question was presented distinctly as one of policy. He had never expected that by the acquisition of those Shares we should acquire the right of Sovereignty over the soil. It was upon that very ground of having no Sovereign rights that he had objected to the £4,000,000 being voted. That the Government should enter into commercial transactions of any kind, whether they paid 5, 10, or any lesser sum per cent, he deprecated then, and did still. The matter had, however, been treated as a commercial investment, and the justification was that we had got a promise of 5 per cent.

MR. CHILDERS said, there could be no question that the charges did require especial watchfulness on the part of the Government. With regard to the British Admiral referred to by the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. A. Gathorne-Hardy), the hon. Member was probably not aware that he was not serving the British Government. The officer in question must have been a servant of the Egyptian Government, as we had no Admiral at Alexandria.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL agreed with the view expressed by the Secretary to the Treasury with reference to the Vote for the Directors of the Suez Canal. But, at the same time, it appeared to him that whereas the subject of the pilotage dues would be a proper one for the Directors to consider, the Committee should recollect that the Directors were not now appointed for the first time. Certainly, therefore, they ought to have looked into the matter before this time and obtained justice for British commerce. If there was any truth in the statement that the Company charged vessels with a much larger sum than they paid to the pilots, that was a fraud upon the British Government, because the subject of British vessels passing through the Canal had been the object of diplomatic consideration. The tonnage dues had been limited, and it therefore appeared to him that if the Company put into their pockets an undue amount under the name of pilotage it was really a fraud upon British commerce, and Her Majesty's Government should interfere and make vigorous representations upon the subject.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN asked for information as to the salaries of the non-resident Directors?

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK inquired the names of the Directors, and remarked that the sum charged for the Director resident in Paris was rather large. He thought, moreover, that the Directors should be paid by the Company.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY asked the Secretary to the Treasury if the Directors kept any records, and if Her Majesty's Government had any means of knowing whether they did any work?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, one of the Directors resided in Paris, where the Offices of the Board were situate. The other two Directors were Mr. Rivers Wilson, of the National Debt Office, and General Stokes. The Directors kept the Reports, which were sent to the Government, of the transactions of the Board. He thought the Committee would see that it was advisable that certain Commissioners should be resident in England, so that they might be in constant communication with the commercial world, and that this in no way interfered with the usefulness of their action on the Board.

MR. RYLANDS thought that his hon. Friends expected from the British Directors a great deal more than they were likely to get. They seemed to imagine that they could, by their position on the Board, secure terms of an advantageous character with regard to the charges upon British ships. This pilotage left a large profit, which was distributed amongst the shareholders in the Company. But the shares held by this country did not carry with them a share of the profits; and, therefore, any representations which might tend to the reduction of the income of the Company coming from the British Directors would necessarily be looked upon with disfavour by the other Directors who represented shares which did participate in the profits of the Canal. The Committee had heard a good deal about Cyprus that evening; but this Suez Canal affair was about as absurd a business as it was possible to conceive. When the Government said this was a good investment he would like any man to be found who would guarantee that the Khedive of Egypt would repay to this country the money advanced on these shares. He did not know that the country had that confidence in Egypt to enable it to believe that the whole of the money would be received back in the way contemplated by Government. He did not anticipate, from the position which the Directors occupied on the Board, that the interests of Great Britain were likely to be promoted at all. The House voted the salaries of the Directors from year to year; but he should be glad to find out what they did in return.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK observed, that the answer of the Government seemed to him to be eminently unsatisfactory. One of the resident Directors was the Controller of the National Debt, and had also held the position of Minister of Finance to the Khedive. It had been alleged that it was desirable that those Directors should reside in England, in order that Her Majesty's Government might know what was going on; but one of those resident Directors appeared to reside in Egypt. The position of that gentleman was, therefore, perfectly anomalous. In his opinion, it was the duty of Directors to do their best for the benefit of the shareholders; and in that respect again the English Directors appeared to be in an anomalous position. The whole matter was one which required further consideration before it again came before the Committee. He still thought that the salaries of Directors should be paid by the Company; but he did not divide against the Vote without having given previous Notice.

MR. DODSON inquired the name of the Director who resided in Egypt and was also in the service of the Khedive?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Mr. Standen.

MR. DODSON supposed that Mr. Standen received pay as a British Director, and also as a Minister of the Khedive. He should like to know whether it was intended that that arrangement should be permanent?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that his absence in Egypt was only temporary, and he received a salary from this country during the time of his absence.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £5,492, to complete the sum for the Suppression of the Slave Trade.

MR. E. JENKINS asked why there was a Consul at Mozambique? He should also like to know what work that Consul did at Mozambique? He saw no justification for the appointment of a Consul at Mozambique; and he should like the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to explain to the Committee what that Consul did for his salary of £600 a-year.

MR. GRAY observed, that the Consul referred to by the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) apparently required the services of a chaplain.

MR. BOURKE did not know whether there was a chaplain at Mozambique or not.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought that the Consul at Mozambique was required in respect of the Slave Trade carried on in the Red Sea. He should like to know whether the efforts of the Consul extended to both sides of the Red Sea?

MR. BOURKE said, that the Consul at Mozambique directed his exertions to the suppression of the Slave Trade in the Red Sea. His efforts were not confined to any port; but no port required and received more attention at his hands than Jeddah.

MR. GOURLEY could aver, from his own knowledge, that the Consul at Mozambique was extremely useful. The Channel at that point was extremely dangerous in respect of navigation, and, of course, the Consul of a country with so much commerce as Great Britain must, of necessity, be of great service. Then with reference to the suppression of the Slave Trade in the Red Sea, the Consul at Mozambique did great good. Many captures took place in the Mozambique Channel owing to the traffic in slaves that went on there. Owing to the fact that the Portuguese authorities were on one side and the French on the other side of the Channel, an English Consul was necessary, and rendered very valuable assistance. Great efforts were being made to suppress the Slave Trade in those parts; but, at the present moment, more slavery went on in the Mozambique Channel than on any other part of the African coast.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. GOURLEY begged to move the reduction of this Vote by the sum of £5,000. He did so because he considered that the money was not required, and that there was already sufficient money to meet all expenses with reference to the capture of slavers by British vessels. At the present moment a very large sum of money stood to the credit of the account of naval prize money, and a large balance was transferred to the Consolidated Fund in 1865. Moreover, a very great decrease had taken place in the Slave Trade since the Treaty with the Sultan of Zanzibar. Two years ago the number of slaves captured in a year averaged from 500 to 1,000, but that number was now very much reduced. In consequence of the diminution in the Slave Trade a number of vessels employed in its suppression had been reduced; but, still, Parliament was asked to grant a sum of £10,000 in respect of the expenses connected with the suppression of the trade. He did not, however, rely so much upon the reduction in the number of slaves captured as upon the fact that there was a considerable amount of money in hand to meet those expenses. Under these circumstances, he thought that it was reasonable to ask the Government to reduce the Vote by the sum of £5,000. There was another point connected with the Vote to which he should like to call attention—namely, the expenses incurred in respect of the maintenance of liberated Africans. In the present year the estimated charge of their maintenance was £3,102. They had no explanation how the charge arose, or how the money was spent for the liberated Africans. He thought that, instead of maintaining those persons, they ought to be sent to their own homes, or to some employment. There was no reason why liberated Africans should be permanently maintained at the expense of this country. Either the liberated Africans should find employment for themselves, or the Government should find it for them. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by £5,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that the same sum was asked in that year for slave bounties as was granted last year, and was estimated upon what it was thought would be really wanted. It very often happened that payments had to be provided for which were not anticipated. He might tell the hon. Member that the amounts voted in previous years had been usually entirely spent. It might be that the amount now asked for would not be wanted during the current year, but it had to be provided for, and if not spent the amount would be paid back at the end of the financial year into the Exchequer; and, therefore, they provided for what might occur, and which, judging by the evidence of past years, they had a right to suppose might fairly occur. With regard to the question raised as to the maintenance of liberated Africans, the hon. Member would see that the expense in respect of those persons had diminished that year by the sum of £250, and the whole expense would be gradually wiped out.

MR. GOURLEY did not think that the large sum of money asked for under that Vote ought to be granted. The number of vessels employed in the suppression of the Slave Trade had been reduced; and as it was evident from that that the number of slaves captured must also be reduced, the same amount of money for incidental expenses could not now, as formerly, be required. Unless the Government would reduce the Vote by the sum of £5,000 he should be prepared to divide the Committee.

MR. CHILDERS hoped the hon. Member would not take a division upon that Vote.

MR. E. JENKINS hoped that his hon. Friend would not divide the House, for it would be taken as an expression of feeling against the suppression of slavery, and he was sure that there was nothing upon which the country entertained so strong an opinion as upon that.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WHITWELL observed, that there was a small charge in the Vote in respect of St. Helena. He wished to know whether the Government would give them a statement of the income and expenditure of St. Helena, and also of Sierra Leone? He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies would give them a statement of those expenses, as had been done by some of his Predecessors.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH was afraid that he was unable at present to give the hon. Member the information he required.

MR. WHITWELL wished to have a Paper, similar to that with which they were supplied last year, showing the income and expenditure of Sierra Leone.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH promised to find out what was done last year, in order to comply, if possible, with the request of the hon. Member.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

CLASS VI.—SUPERANNUATION AND RETIRED ALLOWANCES, AND GRATUITIES FOR CHARITABLE AND OTHER PURPOSES.

(9.) £11,647, to complete the sum for Hospitals and Infirmaries, Ireland.

MR. A. MOORE rose to call the attention of the House to the case of the Female Orphan Home. They had been told that the Institution had existed since 1800, and that ever since that period it had been charged in the Estimates under an arrangement sanctioned by the Act of Union. He did not wish to cast any reflection upon the present Administration, who, of course, were not responsible for the item; but it seemed to him that, practically, the Vote was moved for under false pretences. That particular Vote was placed in the Votes as if it were under the management of the Board of Superintendence; whereas, in point of fact, the Board had no control over the Institution whatever. So much so was that the case, that there was a Parliamentary Paper relating to the Hospitals under the Board of Superintendence, and no mention was made whatever of that Institution. Before they passed that Vote he thought they should have some explanation of the legality of the charge, or, at least, that it should be explained. It professed to be done under the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 16; but, for his part, he could see no legality in the charge. He did not wish to prevent the money being voted; but he thought that if the money were to be granted the House had a perfect right to know how it was being spent in that Institution.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that some explanation was required with regard to that item in the Estimates. The other night he was asked why that item was included in this Vote, and he explained how it came to be placed in the Vote. It had occurred to him that, perhaps, the charge ought, properly, to have come under the head of Industrial Schools. He had communicated with the authorities in Dublin; and he had ascertained that what he had previously stated was accurate—namely, that the Vote depended upon the Act of Union. It had, however, only been placed in that particular Vote 10 years ago, when it was transferred from another Vote which had been discontinued, and the various items of which it consisted had been distributed amongst other Votes. He thought that, at the time the grants were made, they were intended for grants-in-aid. As a matter of fact, as the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) was well aware, this question had been brought under the review of the Endowed Schools Commissioners, and he had no doubt it would occupy a place in their Report. He did not know what would be the recommendations of the Commissioners; but, whatever they might be, they would receive the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

MAJOR NOLAN expressed his admiration of the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He had talked for four minutes, and yet he had given them no information whatever in regard to this Institution. He hoped the hon. and learned Member for Limerick would explain to them what all this meant.

MR. GRAY said, since the discussion on Friday evening, he had had some communication with Dublin, and he found that the allegations of some speakers, that this was a proselytizing Institution, were not correct. He was bound to say that it was not; and also, according to his information, it was very well managed. He did not desire, therefore, to say anything at all against the Institution, although he might remark that it was purely sectarian, and that its advantages were confined to members of one religious denomination. He wished the Committee to notice that fact, because it showed that Parliament did not hesitate to make denominational grants. He, himself, approved of such grants, and wished they were further extended. The Chief Secretary had not dealt with the real source of the complaint—that this Vote was placed under a heading which had nothing at all to do with it, and that the section of an Act—19 & 20 Vict.—was quoted which did not affect it. That Act dealt with hospitals and infirmaries. The Chief Secretary said this was probably an hospital, and therefore, according to him, the little girls in the Home were patients. But what the Act also required was, that the Institutions dealt with under it should be placed under the Board of Superintendence.

MR. J. LOWTHER begged pardon. He intended to state that this should, no doubt, have been placed under another head. He was afraid he had not made himself quite clear. What he stated was that the Vote was given in accordance with arrangements entered into at the time of the Union, and transferred to this Vote in consequence of the Report of a Commission about 10 years ago.

MR. GRAY suggested that the better way would be to strike this item out, and to bring it forward as a Supplementary Vote. But he did not think the matter was of very great importance.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY agreed that the Institution was very well managed, and was utterly devoid of any proselytizing tendencies. At the same time, the Vote was presented in a form in which it ought not to appear.

MR. A. MOORE asked under what heading this Vote would be placed in the future? Further, if they granted this money in future years, under what inspection would the Home be placed? They had a perfect right to know what was done with the money, and that was a point he wished very strongly to impress on the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. J. LOWTHER replied, that the whole subject would be fully considered before the Vote was asked of Parliament again, and, of course, the Report of the Royal Commission must be also considered; but he could not say under what head it would be included, or whether it would be again proposed at all; but it certainly should not appear in the Estimates again without being fully looked into.

MR. M. BROOKS said, since this Vote was before the House last time, he had made some inquiries, and he found this Home was the first female orphanage established in Ireland. In the year 1790 it had a grant of £500 from the Irish Parliament. It was attached to a college or chapel at which, for a great many years, he had attended Divine Service; and he was bound to say there were no proselytizing practices carried on during the time he had the privilege of attending there. At the time of the negotiations for the Union, a stipulation was made that the Imperial Parliament should allow a grant of £500 per annum to this Institution, and he hoped nothing would be done now to disturb the arrangement.

MR. GRAY pointed out that the point which had been raised by the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) was a very simple one. Either this Vote was sanctioned by 19 & 20 Vict., or it was not. If it was sanctioned by that Act, the Home should be under the Board of Superintendence. They had no right, if it was not, to vote the money under this head, and they could not get out of that dilemma; for, at present, the Home certainly was not under the Board of Superintendence. It was not a question of whereabouts in the Estimate to decide where the charge should go; but of deciding whether the Vote was sanctioned by an Act of Parliament. If it was not, by what right was it put in there?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON explained, that the question of the arrangement of the Estimates was gone into about 11 years ago, when the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) re-arranged them, and, at that time, placed this particular sum under this heading. He would merely submit that the heading referred generally only to the items appearing under it, and there were many Votes under those heads which were in no way affected by the particular Act quoted at the top. There were other cases in the same position, where Votes were not governed by the particular Act quoted at the heading, but by others. He quite agreed, as his right hon. Friend had said, that the placing of this Vote under this heading was misleading; and if his attention had been called to it before, he would have placed it in another place, so that any difficulty of this sort would not have occurred.

MR. CALLAN pointed out that on Friday—or, rather, at an unusually early hour on Saturday morning—the Attorney General for Ireland stated that this was one of the encumbrances handed over by the Irish Parliament to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and that it was in consequence of specific statements in the Act that this Vote was taken. The Secretary to the Treasury had now made another statement, which did not at all corroborate that. He had made inquiry as to the Act, and he found that it was not based on any particular Act. The Secretary to the Treasury had said that there were other Votes in a similar position. He should like to ask which they were? [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Next page.] Well, all this only showed how careless and negligent, if not utterly incompetent, the under-strappers of the right hon. Gentleman had been in preparing this Vote. ["No, no!"] He maintained it only showed how utterly negligent they were in placing it before the House; and he would suggest that, another year, the Secretary to the Treasury should direct his subordinates to place on the Paper the specification under which this Vote was taken.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON observed, that this Vote had been continued ever since, and had been placed in this particular clause on re-arrangement of the Estimates by a Committee who sat to diminish the number of headings. He had already stated that the headings in no wise governed all the Votes under it; but as the heading in this case was of a misleading kind, he would take care the change was made. He must protest distinctly against the accusation made against the very able clerks in the Department with which he was connected. Nothing could be more careful than the way in which the Estimates were prepared, and every desire was shown to give every possible information.

MR. RAMSAY thought some misapprehension had arisen, from the fact that some hon. Members had assumed that all sums voted in Committee of Supply must have statutory authority. That was an entire misapprehension, and the majority of the sums voted were voted without any authority other than the authority of the House, and they did not recognize any authority higher than that.

MR. CALLAN said, he was under no mistake, and did not suppose any such thing. Fortunately, he was well aware that such a safeguard was not required. What he maintained was, that on Saturday morning the Attorney General for Ireland stated that the Vote was proposed under an undertaking given at the time of the Union. He now wished the right hon. and learned Gentleman to point out the page on which such an undertaking was mentioned, which gave the House the authority in support of his assertion. The right hon. and learned Gentleman would relieve them of a difficulty by replying: although he did not, for his part, see why they should vote this money, when they did not vote £500 for places of other denominations.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, he would be very happy to help the hon. Member out of the difficulty. [Mr. CALLAN: No; the House.] Well, or the House. He thought, when attention was directed to this matter by the hon. Member for Clonmel, explanations were given by his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, who was enabled, from the documents in his possession, to give a very considerable amount of information to the Committee on the subject. It appeared that this Vote, from a time long antecedent to the Union, was granted—first, by the old Irish Parliament, and was continued ever since the Union. He thought that was mainly the manner in which the reference to the Union came out, and that there was no dogmatic or positive assertion made. As to the assertion that there was any agreement which would prevent Parliament from saying they would not vote the money, he did not think that was for a moment suggested. The fact that this was on the Votes was proof that Parliament was quite competent to accept it or not; and it could terminate the grant either this year or next year, or could re-consider the whole matter, and deal with it in any way it thought proper. As he understood, the hon. Member for Clonmel objected more to the form than to the substance of the Vote, and his contention was that it ought not to come under this particular head. As a matter of law, it was not necessary that the Act under which the money would be dealt with should be stated in the heading; it was merely put there for the information of the House; and there was obviously now no misconception on the subject, and everything was known about this Home. The funds, and the character of its work, would be investigated before the Committee now sitting, and the result would be available in the next Session of Parliament. He thought they might now pass this Vote.

MR. A. MOORE did not desire to press this matter further, because his whole object in bringing it forward was to show that, whereas this Home appeared to be under the governance of the Board of Superintendence, as a matter of fact they had no authority at all over it. He believed that proselytizing was not practised in the Institution, therefore he should be sorry that the Vote should be further objected to; and he merely thought it ought to be put under proper inspection, and that some guarantee should be given that the money would not be spent without inspection. He was quite content with the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. GRAY was also thoroughly content that the Vote should pass, now that the Committee thoroughly understood its nature. They were informed that they were bound by a clause in the Act of Union, and the Attorney General for Ireland would probably recall that fact to his mind. They now found that they were bound by no clause of any sort, and that this was purely a voluntary Vote. He was quite willing to join in a Vote to a purely denominational school, hoping to use that Vote as an argument by-and-bye. He sought for aid for denominational Institutions of this kind; and he hoped, therefore, hon. Gentlemen who joined in this Vote for an Institution without a "conscience" clause, or provision of any kind, would not refuse grants to well-managed institutions of a similar sort because they belonged to another religion.

MR. P. MARTIN was very glad of the discussion, because of the facts which had been elicited. Here they had a Vote of money to a purely Protestant Institution over which there was no Government control. He asked hon. Members to bear that in mind when they next heard taunts against Catholics for coming to that House and asking for grants for educational purposes, as to the due application of which they had been willing to submit to the most stringent Government supervision. Yet, though the majority in that House had so recently refused to sanction payment by results, or any grants in aid of Catholic Collegiate training, year after year they had passed a Vote of this character for a Protestant Orphan Home in Dublin. It was not creditable to the liberality of those hon. Gentlemen, who professed themselves opposed to any application of the public funds to denominational purposes in Ireland, to say that an examination of these Votes would show not a single shilling given to relieve the sharp pressing needs of the majority of the population, while there were many sums bestowed out of the Consolidated Fund each year to purely Protestant purposes, without any supervision or check.

Mr. A. Moore

MR. MACARTNEY: I will remind the hon. Member of Cree Roman Catholic Schools.

MR. P. MARTIN replied, that the hon. Member for Tyrone was under a misapprehension. This school, it had been admitted, was not an industrial school, or under any Government supervision, nor was it under the Reformatory Acts.

MR. MACARTNEY observed, that he said that the House would have objection to see all schools under Government supervision.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) £123,944, Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Deficiency.

MR. E. W. HARCOURT hoped the noble Lord the Postmaster General would be able to give some assurance that the Government would turn their attention towards the important question of the increase of Post Office Savings Banks. The matter involved the interest of many millions of people in the country; and he trusted next Session to find a more auspicious moment for bringing it forward than had been accorded to him during the present Session.

LORD JOHN MANNERS could safely say that, as long as he had been in Office, his attention had been turned to this subject. In addition to the 6,000 Savings Banks, there was the Penny Banks movement, which was making great and satisfactory progress. He believed there were about 2,000 of these banks in existence; and, besides that, there were upwards of 1,100 School Banks. All these were regarded by the authorities as excellent allies, working cordially and harmoniously together. His attention had been constantly directed to the extension of the system, and everything that tended in that direction should always have his most careful regard.

Vote agreed to.

(11.) £2,544, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Charitable and other Allowances, Great Britain.

MR. CALLAN thought there must be an error with reference to the amount allowed to one of the American pensioners for services rendered at the time of the Declaration of Independence. He also asked who were the refugee French clergy alluded to in the Vote, and what right they had to receive money from the House of Commons?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the name of the American referred to in the Vote was Macdonald, who was in receipt of a pension of £11. He was a man of very considerable age; and although alive at the present time, he could not be expected to enjoy the Vote for any length of time. There seemed to be a discrepancy with regard to the matter of the French refugee clergy, and he would make inquiry into this, giving an accurate account of the transaction upon Report.

MR. CALLAN asked that the Vote should be postponed, or reduced by the sum of £10. He did not see why they should support the descendants of French refugees.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he had already made known, on the part of the Treasury, that they intended to re-consider these Votes.

MR. COURTNEY explained that the Vote was for the stipend of two teachers attached to the French Chapel, where service was performed every Sunday in the French tongue. It might very well be that this Vote should by-and-bye cease, perhaps after the death of the present recipients.

MR. CALLAN expressed himself grateful to the secular Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) for his explanation; and trusted that, having defended this Vote, he would not come down to the House on his secular hobby-horse and repudiate Votes on Irish topics.

MR. WHITWELL asked whether there was any possibility of commuting the pension which appeared by the Votes to have been in existence since the time of Charles II? He thought, if it could be commuted on any terms whatever, it ought to be done. He could understand how it was that this pension was not commuted, when the coal dues, on which it was settled, were taken over by the City.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON did not know that there was any power of commutation in respect of this pension without the assent of the parties, the sum having been granted by Letters Patent, and forming a first charge on the Revenue. The opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown had been taken, and they held that there was no power of commutation.

Vote agreed to.

(12.) £2,802, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Charitable and other Allowances, Ireland.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, with reference to the item for the Protestant clergyman of the French Church at Portarlinton, that up to about 35 years ago the French Protestant service was held at that place; but the clergyman now only discharged the ordinary duties of the Protestant Church, which, as it had been disestablished in Ireland would, he thought, render it impossible that this Vote should be retained. No doubt, the clergyman had a kind of vested interest, which he (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) would not like to disturb; but the Government should take care that there was no new appointment.

MR. J. LOWTHER agreed with the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) upon this Vote. Of course, the House of Commons was always desirous that vested interests should be respected; but he confessed that a case had been made out that the appointment should not be renewed.

MR. CALLAN asked when the Report would be brought up with reference to the Superannuation Allowances to Prison Officials, so that the Committee might know when they would have an opportunity to discuss the matter?

MR. J. LOWTHER said, it had already been reported.

MR. CALLAN asked for an explanation of the item of £3,000 for Charitable Allowances. He did not think this sum should be voted without knowing what it was for.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, it was for persons in distress, and was analogous to the Royal Bounty.

Vote agreed to.

CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS, SPECIAL, AND TEMPORARY OBJECTS.

(13.) £19,076, to complete the sum for Temporary Commissions, agreed to.

(14.) £5,086, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Expenses, agreed to.

REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

(15.) £806,258, to complete the sum for Customs, agreed to.

(16.) £1,582,125, to complete the sum for Inland Revenue.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH asked whether any new system had been adopted of collecting Income Tax, for there was a large increase in the poundage?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON replied that the poundage was paid, as before, on the amount collected; but as the Income Tax was now 5*d.*, of course the poundage had increased.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH observed, that that did not explain the increase, which was very considerable. It was not possible in that way to understand how it had gone up from £26,000 for 3*d.* to £70,000 for 5*d.*

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON answered, that there was no difference made in the payment of collectors. The Estimate was based on the grant of last year. He had made every inquiry into the matter at the time, because it struck him that there was a very large increase in the poundage; and he was assured by the officer of the Inland Revenue Office in charge of the matter that the amount of the increase was due to this cause.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, surely that would not explain an increase from £26,000 to £70,000.

MR. WHITWELL observed, that there was also a very large increase in the Supplementary Estimate.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. GRAY wished to know whether it was the system to confiscate savings that had been deposited in two accounts by some persons? He believed the Post Office Savings Banks realized some small profit; and, therefore, there was no excuse for dealing harshly with depositors, who were, of course, for the most part, of the poorest class, and were probably not aware of the various regulations under which the Department existed. He had put the question in reference to a case which had been mentioned to him before; but he would now ask something about the matter, not having anticipated that this Vote would give it so soon. He wished to know whether, if a depositor violated the rule that two accounts should not be opened by one person, whether the Post Office had the power to confiscate all his savings? The case which had been brought to his knowledge was that of a farm labourer, who had deposited with the Post Office the savings of a life's labour, amounting to about £100. Part of the money was deposited in his own town, and the other at another, some few miles off. After his death his relatives attempted to take some of it out, in order to pay the expenses of his funeral, and then the Department discovered that he had kept two accounts. According to his information, the money was absolutely confiscated; and on an appeal being made to the Treasury, the reply was that they should allow matters to take their course. If his information were correct, the Government had confiscated the entire savings of this poor man, and left his family without any means of subsistence. The noble Lord would be able to tell them, at any rate, whether this system existed, even if he were not acquainted with the facts of this particular case; and, if it did—which he could scarcely believe—the Government would certainly find their labours in Ireland very much lightened.

LORD JOHN MANNERS replied, that the law was very much as the hon. Gentleman had stated, and, of course, his Department was bound to obey the law. The case was brought under his notice by two hon. Members from Ireland not very long since, and he then found that the matter had occurred more than a year ago. The procedure was as follows:—The Solicitor to the Treasury had his attention called to it, and was asked to express his opinion on it in writing. If he reported that these double accounts were opened in error, then the money was not confiscated, but returned. If the Solicitor stated that, in his opinion, there was fraud in the transaction, then the law took its course. Two hon. Gentlemen, one the hon.

Member for Wexford (Mr. O'Clery), had called about the case. They had been referred to the Treasury, and, he apprehended, it was now undergoing inquiry.

MR. GRAY begged to move that the Vote be reduced by £100. What was the fraud for which this money was confiscated? The Government took deposits from poor people, giving them only a low rate of interest—2½ per cent—and then invested the money they received at a much higher rate, principally lending it to local bodies, and making 3½ and 4 per cent. By these means, after paying all the costs of management, they made a considerable profit from the business. What, then, was the conceivable amount of fraud that this man had perpetrated by opening two accounts? He had simply induced the Post Office to take a little more money than they otherwise would have had, and so they made a little more profit. Was that a sufficient justification for making a charge of fraud? He could not bring himself to use the word. They might call it a trick or a subterfuge, in order to get a greater amount deposited than the Government accepted. Was that conduct sufficient to justify the confiscation of the entire capital sum? The bare statement of facts needed no elaboration from him. He thought they were simply appalling. The expression used would be applied by the people of Ireland, not to the depositor who had lost his money, but to the persons who had taken it from him. He would certainly take the opinion of the Committee on the subject.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the hon. Gentleman hardly understood the statement of the noble Lord in answer to his question. There was no power in the Department to do anything of this kind. It was simply a question of carrying out an Act of Parliament. The Act of Parliament sanctioned the Post Office Savings Banks, in order, he supposed, to prevent interference with the ordinary banks of the country, and limited deposits to a certain sum. Under that Act, any attempt to open two accounts in the same name was considered a fraudulent transaction, and rendered the account liable to be confiscated. If this were proved to be a fraudulent transaction, forfeiture was necessary also, for otherwise persons might have a great many accounts open in different Post Offices, and give great trouble. If any alteration was required, it must be by means of a new Savings Banks' Bill, allowing an increase in the amount deposited.

MR. GRAY replied, that he did not misunderstand at all. He did not state that the Department had power to make restitution of this money, because, as to that, he accepted the explanation of the noble Lord. What he did state was that the Government, as represented by this Department, had confiscated the money, and that he represented as grievously unjust. The Treasury had power to return this money, and they did not exercise it. It was not with reference to a particular case, the details of which he had not been able fully to bring before the House, and which the noble Lord had not had time to examine, that he intended to move this reduction, but as a protest against the whole system. The opening of an account might be a fraud technically, and according to an Act of Parliament; but, he contended, it was a fraud in no sense of depriving a person of money, and he contended it was not a fraud deserving of anything like the punishment meted out. He would, therefore, take the earliest possible opportunity of taking the opinion of the Committee on the general question of whether such a policy was desirable. He was positive the people of Ireland did not know they could be treated in this way; and he was sure the Government would find very little difficulty in dealing with the Post Office Savings Banks in Ireland in the future, in consequence of a considerable reduction in the number of deposits. Yet so strongly did he feel on the subject, that he certainly would raise the question in a more formal shape on another occasion.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the law was that when a depositor opened an account at the bank all these rules were

Member was probably under the impression that the Amendment had been withdrawn.

MR. COURTNEY replied that, in his opinion, it would be more convenient to report Progress before leaving the Amendment before the House. It was impossible to discuss the question of the organization of the Post Office at that time in the night; but he thought hon. Members present would be surprised to learn that the cost of every single transaction was over 8*d.* [Lord JOHN MANNERS: A little under 8*d.*] If the noble Lord would look at page 27 of his own Report, he would find a statement there that the average cost to the Post Office of every deposit withdrawn was, in the year 1877, 8*1*/₂*d.*; so that it was over 8*d.* for the whole period. It had been 6*1*/₂*d.*, and there was an explanation why the charge had been increased.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that the hon. Member for Tipperary has asked leave to withdraw his Amendment. It is in accordance with the practice of the Committee to speak only to that Amendment, until the Question is decided. When it is withdrawn, he will be in Order to make his observations.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. COURTNEY did not propose to enter into any discussion, and only wished to point out why they ought to report Progress. It seemed to him too absurd that the cost of each transaction should be 8*1*/₂*d.* If ordinary banks had to pay that, they could never carry on business. He wished to point out how that might be reduced, and also how the operations of the banks might be extended so that they might be established wherever Money Order Offices existed. He begged to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. MELDON did not wish to interpose in this discussion; but he did wish to protest against the language made use of by the Secretary to the Treasury on the conduct described by his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary. The

The Chairman

Secretary to the Treasury spoke of the person making the two deposits as acting fraudulently, and as showing a fraudulent intention. [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON dissented.] He understood the hon. Gentleman to say so, and he was only too glad if he would disclaim the intention. He challenged him and the Postmaster General to point out how such conduct could be fraudulent. The Act of Parliament even did not give power to confiscate this money, and there ought, certainly, to be no declaration that conduct of this kind was fraudulent merely upon rules framed by the Post Office. He challenged the hon. Gentleman to prove this language; and when this Vote came on again he hoped they would have some explanation of such a charge.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON hoped the Motion would be withdrawn, on condition that this Vote was postponed. He was very anxious to get on with the other Votes, in order to include specifically the Votes of Supply. He would not enter further into the dispute as to whether he did or did not use the words imputed to him. What he intended to convey was, that an Act of Parliament having laid down certain conditions, an attempt, with a knowledge of that Act of Parliament, to frustrate those conditions, was a fraud on the Act of Parliament.

MR. COURTNEY had no objection, on this decision, to withdraw his proposal.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(17.) £574,725, to complete the sum for Post Office Packet Service, agreed to.

(18.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £834,528, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880, for the Salaries and Working Expenses of the Post Office Telegraph Service."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Major O'Beirne.)

MR. GRAY wished to direct the attention of the Government to a subject he had already brought under their notice—namely, the discontent which existed in the Dublin Offices amongst the Post Office clerks at the injustice to which they were subjected in the matter of salaries. They had already called attention last year to this matter by Memorial, and he then pointed out that it was never forwarded to London until he called attention to the matter. He saw by the newspapers that in the last two or three days the Post Office clerks in Dublin had met to consider their grievances, and it was then stated that a second Memorial had been addressed to the noble Lord, which had not elicited any reply. The noble Lord promised him last year that the matter should have his careful attention, but no relief had yet been accorded. The complaint was that the work in Dublin was just as hard, and required as skilled manipulation, as any city in the Empire; a statement which he could testify from his own knowledge, having had some experience of the amount of work done, in a very limited time, and which was paid on a lower scale, not merely than in London, but in other towns, such as was paid to the clerks in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Manchester, Liverpool, and all the principal provincial towns of England and Scotland. These clerks had the same work as the clerks in London, and must be their equals in skill; for, of course, in transmitting messages, if they did not have as good a clerk at one end as at the other, they lost the advantages of the skill of the first. He found that second-class clerks in London began at £200, rising to £300; while second-class clerks in Dublin began at £90, rising to £300; while clerks in the fourth class in London began at a higher rate than the second-class clerks in Dublin. There was another matter to which he might call attention, which the clerks thought might injure them, or be to their detriment. Recently, their names had been changed by a Circular from “telegraph clerks” to “telegraphists.” An Act of Parliament provided for the superannuation and pensions stipulated for when the telegraphs were transferred; and these clerks feared that the Circular changing their name was intended to deprive them of some benefit which they would have secured under the Act. The men complained, also, that they had an enormous deal of extra work on Sundays, and that they were kept continuously at work long over hours. Of course, they were paid extra for that; but the work was more than they were physically able to perform, and the extra pay did not compensate for the loss of health contingent on the work. He trusted this matter would not require very much more consideration from the noble Lord, and that he would do something like justice to these clerks; and he trusted, also, that the agitation of these men would not bring on them any kind of punishment, of which they stood in considerable dread.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he would readily give the last assurance asked for by the hon. Member. With respect to the general status of these clerks, the principle he wished to lay down, speaking generally, was that the clerks in Dublin should be on the same footing as those in Edinburgh. The capital was always regarded as different to other places. He would communicate to the hon. Member, as soon as possible, the result of his inquiries, and of certain communications which were now passing between the Treasury and himself on this matter.

MR. M. BROOKS asked, if the rates in Edinburgh at present were greater than those in Dublin? He knew the wages paid were some 40 or 50 per cent below those paid in London; and if the clerks did not get a rise, it would be very poor consolation to them that they got the same as was paid at Liverpool and Manchester. He should be very glad to hear the noble Lord say that they should be put on a level with the men in London.

MR. DILLWYN thought it was a very odd principle to pay clerks according to the place where they were working. They surely ought to pay according to the efficiency of their work.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (IRELAND)

BILL.—[BILL 256.]

(Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland).

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MAJOR NOLAN asked what was the meaning of the Bill? He had read it to the end, and could not understand it. It was simply a repetition of previous Acts, and he did not know what its object was at all.

MR. J. LOWTHER replied, that it was found that the municipal arrangements of Ireland were not subject to the last Act which governed the rest of the United Kingdom. It was merely an Act to remove doubts.

MR. GRAY observed, that this Bill was merely an extension of a very useful Act passed in 1875, which was believed to extend to Ireland, and which on that belief had been acted on in Ireland. Owing, however, to a question which arose in a recent election for the Dublin Corporation, which was referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, it was discovered that the Act under which they had been carrying on their elections did not extend to Ireland. This Bill proposed to extend it.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND) [REPAYMENT OF ADVANCES].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That is expedient to authorise the payment, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, of any deficiency in the Pension Fund which may arise in the repayment to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt of any Advances made by them for the purposes of any Act of the present Session for improving the position of the Teachers of National Schools in Ireland.”

MR. COURTNEY asked, whether the Secretary to the Treasury or the Chancellor of the Exchequer had considered the point raised by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers), as to whether this money was to be repaid to the Consolidated Fund? His right hon. Friend gave reasons why that form of repayment should not be adopted.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not very much in favour of the suggestion that these charges should be placed on the Votes, as he was afraid they would be more likely to lead to extravagance than economy. It would be far better to keep to the present arrangement.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he would take advantage of the opportunity to ask the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) whether he would withdraw his opposition to the National School Teachers Bill, so that it might not come on at a late hour? He had received several letters from the National teachers in Ireland hoping this Bill would become law this Session; and as a Notice given by the hon. Member prevented the Bill coming on before half-past 12, it might have the effect of stopping it altogether, or, at any rate, of preventing it from being properly discussed.

Resolution agreed to; to be reported To-morrow.

MOTIONS.

COPYRIGHT (No. 2) BILL.

Acts read; considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in moving that the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the Law relating to Copyright, said, the Bill contained all the recommendations of the recent Royal Commission on the subject, with the exception of two—that registration should be removed from Stationers' Hall and undertaken by a Government Department, and the abolition of the privilege of free copies to the Universities and Advocate's Library at Edinburgh. With these two exceptions, all the main recommendations of the Commission would be found in a Code on the subject. The Bill was introduced, not with the object of becoming law this Session, but that it might be circulated during the Recess, not only at home, but in the Colonies.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the Law relating to Copyright.

IRISH CHURCH ACT (1869) AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. PLUNKET, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend "The Irish Church Act, 1869," and to provide further compensation to certain persons, being Priests and Deacons of the late Established Church of Ireland, said, the Bill would not at all challenge the general policy of the Irish Church Act, or in any respect re-endow the Irish Church. Its provisions simply aimed at redressing a grievance felt very severely by certain clergy of that Church. It was complained that although the Act did profess not to treat with harshness or severity individual clergymen, and professed to give them full compensation, yet that it failed to make provision for the loss they had suffered in being deprived of all hope of preferment. Amendments in this respect were brought forward at the time of the passing of the Act through the House, but the arguments in favour of these proposals were rather evaded than met. At all events, the Act did not contain any such provisions, and the object of his Bill was to introduce provisions remedying that grievance. By its clauses any incumbent or curate who believed himself aggrieved would be entitled to present a Memorial to the Irish Church Commissioners, and they would be required to entertain that Memorial, and bear in mind any amounts that might have been paid previously. Then, if they thought the Memorial well-founded, they would redress the grievance out of the surplus. This proposal made a very small demand on the Church surplus indeed, in comparison with others already submitted, or about to be submitted, to the House. He thought only about £300,000 or £400,000 would be required; and the Committee, whom he represented, were quite willing, if necessary, to agree that the total sum to be expended in this way should be limited to £500,000. He did not intend, either, that this Bill should conflict with the passing of the National School Teachers (Ireland) Bill. He rather desired, if he might use the expression, that they should run side by side; and, if the House co-operated, he trusted that both these Bills might pass that Session, late as the time now was.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he would not oppose the first reading of this Bill; but it was only to be expected he should look at it with a certain amount of natural hesitation. He remembered reading in the Conservative organ of Dublin, The Daily Express, at the time when the Chief Justiceship was vacant, and that paper was urging the claims of Mr. Whiteside, that it said that Protestants should look rather kindly on his promotion to that post, because he construed the Church Act liberally; whereas if he had construed it harshly the incumbents of the Irish Church would have got £1,000,000 less than they received. That seemed to him very strong evidence that the Act had not been harshly construed. He knew very well the incumbents in the town in which he lived were not harshly treated, and it was their opinion also. Although they spoke very strongly against the Bill, they admitted that its provisions were extremely liberal. Indeed, he believed that a number of the junior clergy only entered the Irish Church in order to obtain compensation. He could not allow that this Bill went on all fours with his. He had no objection to it as it stood; although he thought there should be some accompanying advantage introduced for other denominations. When they came to ask for £500,000 it was a very serious matter for any one denomination to claim.

MR. DILLWYN said, the noble Lord the Postmaster General had just introduced a Bill merely for the purpose of circulating it during the Recess. If the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Plunket) had introduced this Bill for the same purpose he should have no objection to it; but, at the beginning of August, it was utterly impossible that a measure of this kind could receive the consideration it ought to have at the hands of the House. He did not like, in courtesy to the hon. and learned Member, to oppose the first reading; but he hoped no attempt would be made to press it at that period of the Session.

MR. M. BROOKS said, the Bill would, when understood, have the support of a large number of Members on both sides of the House, and of his hon. and gallant Friend (Major Nolan).

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PRIVILEGE — (TOWER HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE (METROPOLIS) COMMITTEE.)
PETITION.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE moved that the following Petition of John Sandilands Ward be taken into consideration:—

"To the honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland assembled.

"The humble Petition of John Sandilands Ward, now a prisoner in the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending your honourable House,

"Sheweth,

"That the Petitioner has not only suffered very much from loss of liberty, but his health has been seriously affected in consequence of his imprisonment by order of your honourable House, as is shewn by the certificates of Dr. Sieveking, Physician in Ordinary to the Queen, and Dr. J. H. Waters, of which the following are copies:—

"July 29, 1879.—I have this day, in the presence of Dr. Waters, examined Mr. J. S. Ward, and find him affected with diarrhoea, headache, and great depression of spirits. Ten years ago Mr. Ward suffered in a similar manner, and was then obliged to withdraw from business for eight months; there is just reason to fear that if his present symptoms become aggravated by prolonged imprisonment, a similar or worse nervous malady than that which occurred before may return.—(Signed) Edward H. Sieveking, M.D., Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians.'

"July 29th, 1879.—I certify that I have this day seen and examined Mr. J. S. Ward, in conjunction with Dr. Sieveking, and find him suffering from symptoms of nervous irritation and debility, and am of opinion that these symptoms will lead up to a severe illness, similar to a former attack from which he suffered some nine years ago, unless his present confinement, and the trouble consequent on it, ceases.—(Signed) J. H. Waters, M.D.'

"That your Petitioner entirely submits himself to your honourable House, and begs to express his unfeigned sorrow and regret for having incurred its displeasure, but he ventures most humbly to hope that your honourable House will deem that the harassing imprisonment your Petitioner has already undergone, and the very serious loss and inconvenience thereby entailed upon him, are a sufficient expiation of the offence against the privileges of your honourable House, of which he has been adjudged guilty.

"Your Petitioner therefore humbly prays that your honourable House will order his discharge out of custody.

"And your Petitioner, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

"Dated this 29th day of July 1879.

"J. SANDILANDS WARD."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I propose to move now—

"That John Sandilands Ward, having entirely submitted himself to this House, and expressed his sorrow and regret for his offence, and having already suffered in his health, be discharged out of the custody of the Serjeant at Arms, on payment of his fees."

• The case is one in which, under ordinary circumstances, I certainly should not have recommended the House to take any steps for the discharge of Mr.

Ward until the close of the Session; but, having regard to the fact that he has entirely placed himself at the mercy of the House, and expressed his sorrow and regret for his offence, and having regard mainly to the medical certificates which have been presented on this occasion, and which are in the hands of the Serjeant-at-Arms, and with regard to which I think I may say, from the testimony of those who have had opportunities of seeing Mr. Ward constantly during the period of his confinement, there can be no doubt that they do not at all exaggerate the circumstances of his health. Under all these circumstances, I think that the House may fairly and mercifully take the case into consideration, and assent to the Motion which I now submit to it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I beg to second the Motion. My first impression was that of the right hon. Gentleman, that it would have been right, and not at all too severe a punishment, that this person should have remained in custody until the close of the Session. I cannot say I think the entire submission to the House would, in itself, have been any reason why Mr. Ward should have been liberated; but, looking at the medical certificates, which are certainly very strong and by a very eminent physician—Dr. Sieveking, I think—the House would hardly think it right to detain him in custody any longer.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: "The quality of mercy is not strained," as we all know; and, therefore, the House will probably do well to accept the Motion of my right hon. Friend, but simply accept it as an act of mercy, and simply on the medical testimony, and, above all, not accept it on any ambiguity. I think my right hon. Friend, in the kindness of his heart and his desire to help a suffering man, has gone a little too far in his account of Mr. Ward's submission, and that it would be a mistake in the cause of justice if it were to be supposed that Mr. Ward had confessed the justice of his sentence, and had verbally retracted that statement of his which has placed him in his present unpleasant predicament. I must bring the House back to the case itself. What was the state of the case? The Committee, over which my right hon. Friend and Colleague (Mr. Spencer Walpole) presided, reported that one class of witnesses spoke the truth, and that another class of witnesses spoke something that was not the truth; that they believed the one class, but did not believe the other. The House, accordingly, believing and agreeing with its Committee, sentenced the two delinquents to imprisonment. One has escaped that imprisonment, and is now swaggering under an alias at an eminently respectable and delightful resort of English visitors across the Channel. The other is in custody, and has made a submission. But what is his submission? Has he retracted his false statement? He has done no such thing. He says—

“Your Petitioner entirely submits himself to your honourable House, and begs to express his unfeigned sorrow and regret for having incurred its displeasure.”

But he takes good care not to say whether that displeasure was incurred rightly or wrongly. It has taken him away from the vicinity of his clients, and has placed him in close proximity to the ticking of the clock. He expresses his unfeigned regret for this; and I think the House will agree with me that no one ever did a questionable thing and found the penalties were disagreeable, who did not very soon afterwards find that Providence had endowed him with a bad constitution. This being the case, and seeing that Dr. Sieveking and another physician say that the confinement is injurious to Mr. Ward's health, for Heaven's sake let him out; but do not allow it to go forth that we believe his evidence, or that he has retracted his false statement.

MR. MONK: My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) has anticipated me in the remarks I was going to make. I am quite certain that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in framing the Motion he has placed in your hands, and in the statement he has just made to the House, that Mr. Ward had admitted his offence, really believed that Mr. Ward had so admitted his offence; but in the Petition which Mr. Ward has presented to the House it is quite clear that he has not admitted it. He has expressed his regret for having incurred the displeasure of the House; and at the close of his Petition he calls attention to the imprisonment which he has undergone, in expiation of the offence against the Privileges of the House, of which he had been adjudged guilty. But there is not one word in the nature of an expression of regret for having committed a grave offence against the Privileges of the House. I, therefore, think it is impossible for the House to agree to the Resolution in the form in which it has been submitted to us by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer will consent to amend the terms of the Motion, and will quote the words which appear in the Petition of Mr. Ward, I think that, after having received a certificate from Dr. Sieveking of the nature of the one we have before us, the House might very well extend its clemency to Mr. Ward; but that we are to put on record on the Journals of this House a statement that Mr. Ward has admitted his offence when he has not admitted his offence is altogether repugnant to the dignity of Parliament. I hope, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will amend his Motion in that sense. If not, I think it would be impossible for the House unanimously to agree to this act of mercy, which, I am sure, we are all anxious to extend to Mr. Ward.

MR. DODSON: I would really appeal to the House not to continue this discussion. A question has been raised in regard to the dignity of the House; but I doubt whether it is for the dignity of this House to enter into a discussion of this kind. It appears to me that this man has committed an offence against this House, in regard to which the House has found him guilty, and for which he has been punished. That punishment is now about to be curtailed on the score of the state of his health. It seems to me that the proper course, under the circumstances, and what will be most conducive to the dignity of the House, is now to release him on the ground of his health.

MR. HERMON: I quite agree with my right hon. Friend who has just sat down that it will be conducive to the dignity of the House to release this man from confinement. But I must express here my opinion that the first part of the transaction ought not to have involved the serious consequences from which he is now suffering. As he owned himself, he committed a breach of the Privileges of the House; but he does not appear to have done so from any fraudulent or corrupt motive. But when he came before the Committee he did commit a very serious offence, which ought not to be lost sight of by the House. I am quite willing that he should be discharged from custody; but I think he ought to be brought to the Bar of this House, and called upon to acknowledge his error. The conclusions arrived at by the Committee are of a most serious character, and it is of great importance to consider the words used by the Committee appointed to investigate the matter, when they say that the counter-statements made by Mr. Ward and Mr. Grissell are false. That fact Mr. Ward has never acknowledged; and he does not, to my mind, express himself sorry for his offence against the House, but merely expresses himself sorry for the punishment it has involved. At the same time, I think in the whole of this matter there has been a good deal of unnecessary mixing up of certain persons. I do not think the proposal of the solicitor who first proposed to Mr. Grissell to write down the nature of his proposition was exactly necessary. If, however, in this case Mr. Ward expresses sorrow for what he has done, I think he may now be discharged.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I am sure it is the general wish of the House to get rid of this man. The point now is what to do with him. I heard the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman on the front Opposition Bench (Mr. Dodson), and I quite agree with him that we ought to consult the dignity of the House. But I think the dignity of the House would be best consulted by a strict adherence to truth than by anything else. I quite appreciate the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He made it in the kindness of his heart, in order to get rid of this man, and not to be too hard upon him. I would make a little alteration in the Motion, and would recite the words which the man puts in his own Petition. That makes no statement at all as to whether the man is guilty or innocent; but in it he simply submits himself to the House. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be so kind as to alter his Motion in that sense, I am sure it will meet with the approbation of both sides of the House.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA: Whatever is to be decided upon I hope will be decided at once. There is one point, and one alone, upon which I wish to make a remark. I do not think, since the days when persecution was prevalent, that it was ever insisted upon by the House that a man who was found guilty, and who was subsequently pardoned, should acknowledge the various details of his guilt. We have found Mr. Ward guilty. We are quite confident that he is guilty. We have sustained, unanimously, the judgment of our Committee. The man appears before us now as a man suffering from sickness; and what the House is now asked to do is to turn its attention to the best way in which the Prerogative of mercy can be exercised in getting rid of this man.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE: I wish to say one word before the discussion closes. I think the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) did not quite correctly hear the Motion which has been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. When it is read again I think the House will find that in the Motion now made the Chancellor of the Exchequer uses the exact words of the Petition, both in regard to the submission, and also in regard to the regret expressed in it.

MR. COURTNEY: It is desirable that the House should have a clear understanding. I understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to read these words in the Motion—"having admitted his guilt." ["No!"] That is, certainly, what I understood. If those words are in the Resolution, we wish to have them struck out. If not, of course, the case would be altogether different.

MR. SPEAKER said, the Question was—

"That John Sandilands Ward, having entirely submitted himself to this House, and expressed his sorrow and regret for his offence, and having already suffered in his health, be discharged out of the custody of the Serjeant at Arms, on payment of his fees."

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

EDUCATION CODE—ELEMENTARY SCIENCE.—RESOLUTION.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK rose to move—

“That it would be desirable to modify the Code of Education by adding Elementary Science to the subjects mentioned in Article 19, c. 1.”

The hon. Gentleman stated that object lessons were introduced in the early part of the school course, and that it was very desirable that they should be continued in the Second and Third Standards by adding elementary science to that class of subjects. The suggestion, since he last made it, had been gradually gaining adherents, including no less an authority than the London School Board. He might remind the House that the Committee which sat on Elementary Education in 1868, and the Royal Commission on Scientific Instruction, strongly recommended that elementary science should form a part of the National School system. Many of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools were also of the same opinion; and he could quote in favour of his views the almost unanimous voice of those who had devoted themselves most successfully to the education of the people—such men as Dean Dawes, Mr. Henslow, Mr. Ellis, and Sir James Kay-Shuttleworth. Lastly, he might refer to those whom in this matter he regarded as, perhaps, the highest authorities of all—namely, the children themselves. Wherever elementary science was taught they welcomed it with a warm interest. He did not seek to impose any new duty on the Department or on schools, but only to leave them an option. The practical difficulties in the way were quite imaginary; and his proposal, so far from upsetting the equilibrium of the Code, would for the first time establish it, seeing that at present the Code was entirely one-sided, all knowledge of natural phenomena being excluded. He admitted that it would not be desirable to impose new duties on school managers or committees; but he did not propose to do so. Quite the contrary; his wish was to remove an objectionable restriction. His proposal would, therefore, not make the Code more complex, but the reverse. The present system crammed the heads of the children, and overtaxed their memories. A string of verbs, or dates, or names of Kings, was a mere matter of recollection. He wished, on the contrary, that a portion of the school-time should be devoted to explanations of the common phenomena of nature, which experience showed had a strong interest for children. It was often said that it was ridiculous to teach “ologies” before the children could read and write thoroughly. But, in the first place, it was a misnomer to call the lessons he proposed “ologies;” secondly, it should be remembered that when children were learning to read they had to read something, and the question was, what that something was to be? The real difficulty was that we had no good old Saxon word in use among us for “natural science.” If we had any expression equivalent to the German word Naturkunde, he believed that the House would unanimously adopt the present Resolution. He was, however, compelled to use the word “science,” though, unfortunately, he immediately frightened hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. Contrary to what was believed in some quarters, his proposal would really not involve any appreciable cost. The little books would come to no more than those on history or grammar; while the sun, moon, and stars, rain and dew, wind and light, air and water, heat and cold, stones and flowers, were before us all; and even if a few objects as illustrations were required they could be obtained for a few shillings. He wished for nothing difficult or abstruse, nothing beyond the range of the children's minds and daily experience. In mechanics the simple forces might be explained to them—why carts were put on wheels, how levers and pulleys acted, the use of the screw and wedge; then the nature and relative distances of the principal heavenly bodies; in agricultural districts the primary facts relating to air and water, the character of the soil, the reason for the rotation of crops, the origin and principal qualities of such substances as chalk, coal, iron, copper, &c.; the succession of the seasons, the flow of rivers, the growth of plants; the fundamental rules of health, the necessity for ventilation and cleanliness; and, last, not least, the need for industry, frugality, and economy. Explanations of these simple and every-day things would be most interesting and useful to the children. So far from cramming and confusing them, you would introduce light and order into their little minds, and give them an interest in their lessons which, under the present system, they rarely felt. So much for the educational side; but, before sitting down, he wished to say one word with reference to the Amendment from the point of view of local self-government. Much of our freedom and success in Parliamentary government was due to the training afforded by our municipal and other local institutions, and he confessed that he viewed with some apprehension the present tendency to centralization. He was not asking that any new duty should be imposed on localities, but only that they should have a power, which, practically, they possessed until the last few years, and which the Education Department had every year reported to have been exercised with discretion. Several school boards, including that of the Metropolis, were anxious to try the system; and in the interest, therefore, of local self-government, in the interest of education—nay, more, in the name of the children—he asked the House to sanction his Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it would be desirable to modify the Code of Education by adding Elementary Science to the subjects mentioned in Article 19, c. 1,"—(Sir John Lubbock,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

COLONEL BARNE hoped the House would reject a Resolution the effect of which would be to increase the expense of education.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK explained that such would not be, and was not meant to be, the effect of his Resolution, which was merely to substitute one subject for any other contained in the 19th Article of the Code.

COLONEL BARNE said, that if the hon. Member did not propose to add to the expenses of education in this country there could be no great objection to the Resolution; but if it would have that effect, it was a proposal which, in these hard times, ought to be resisted on behalf of the ratepayers.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that, while he could not agree with the hon. and gallant Member opposite, he was bound to say he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone had approached the question from one point of view only, and had not sufficiently regarded certain and other important effects which would flow from his Motion, and which were worthy the attention of the House, one of which was the effect the adoption of his Motion would have upon elementary teachers. He had had for some time on the Paper the following Notice:—

"To call attention to the expediency of establishing a series of higher standards in Night Schools; and also to the unnecessary number of examinations, and the difficulty of some of the subjects required of pupil teachers and students in Training Colleges."

It might not appear, at first sight, what the connection was between those subjects and his hon. Friend's Motion; but if that Motion were adopted it would become obligatory, instead of permissive, as at present, for all elementary teachers to have passed an examination in natural science, and all school managers would require that the teachers should be competent to teach natural science. That would be a great addition to the already heavy burden placed on the shoulders of pupil teachers and Colleges. There had, within the last 15 years, been a steady, a constant, and an enormous increase in those burdens. The following subjects were, practically, compulsory upon students during their first and second years in the Training Colleges:—Learning by heart, reading, penmanship, school management, grammar, composition, geography, history, arithmetic, algebra, mensuration, geometry, political economy, and, he supposed, to cheer those whom the teaching of political economy had made dull, vocal music. There were, in addition, elementary classics and science, which were not strictly obligatory; but the inducements held out to take up one or the other might be regarded as rendering it a matter of compulsion. He asked the House whether, if his hon. Friend's Motion were adopted, there would not be, so to say, a further tightening of the girths? In fact, natural science would become a strictly obligatory subject of examination. What they should look for, in his opinion, was not so much the teaching of science as for what used to be called object lessons. There were two points he desired to press on behalf of the unfortunate pupil teachers and students to whom he had referred. He did not think the Education Department sufficiently appreciated the great difficulties under which knowledge had to be acquired by the children of the labouring classes of this country. The House was not now drawing up a merely abstract Code which they would wish to see complied with. They were dealing with girls and boys, women and men, and they ought to bear in mind the class of life from which they were drawn before they placed upon them additional burdens. It was a different thing for a University man to shut himself up in his room, and "sport his oak," as they call it at Cambridge, from what it was for a poor boy to study amid the numerous surrounding distractions of his narrow home. He had positively known cases in which the minds of boys had given way under the strain which was put upon them. A pupil teacher or student, from the time he became such until his leaving the Training College, had to pass no fewer than eight examinations, and there was no break in their continuity. No sooner had they passed one examination than they had to prepare for another. At the University of Cambridge examinations were held at considerable intervals, and no one was worried by them. Then, again, in subjects to which they were now asked to make an important addition, the standard required was absurdly high. The standard, for instance, in the case of high mathematics required in a pupil teacher last year at the Training College was positively higher than was required for the ordinary Bachelor of Arts degree at Cambridge. Many hon. Members he saw present would agree with him that there was no greater tyrant than a Cambridge mathematical man. Now, the system of which he spoke had grown up under the auspices of a gentleman of whom he desired to speak with every respect—an eminent Cambridge mathematician. The tyranny which they had succeeded in shaking off in Cambridge had been transferred to the Training Colleges by a very eminent Cambridge mathematical man, Mr. Sharpe; but he hoped his noble Friend the Vice President of the Council would put his foot down, and would not allow himself to be bullied by any of those Cambridge mathematical men. It was an intolerable tyranny that a person, however learned in other subjects, should be debarred from becoming a teacher of elementary subjects merely because he did not happen to be thoroughly versed in high mathematics. His noble Friend would, he trusted, inform the permanent officials of his Department that the opinion of many persons whom he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) could name, to whom he had spoken, and who were capable judges of the matter, was that the state of things to which he had directed the notice of the House was absurd and ridiculous. He believed that his noble Friend had already lightened the load of the unhappy pupil teachers so far as regarded the extent to which they were required to learn poetry and prose by heart; and he hoped he would go further in the same direction as regarded other subjects, and would transfer the higher mathematics from the obligatory to the voluntary column. Another point in his indictment against the present elementary education system was, that the standards of instruction in night schools were so low that they tempted the children of the working classes to go to such schools instead of to day schools, to the detriment both of their health and education. Night schools should, in his opinion, be places to which working-class children could go with advantage after they had learnt all they could in the day schools. A Committee of the London School Board had been, or was about to be, appointed to consider this subject, and he was informed that the system he recommended had been at work for some time in Glasgow, and with the best results. He had brought forward the first subject to which he had referred, because of the impression made upon him last winter by cases with which he became acquainted, in which the cruelty of the existing system of examination had caused a breaking down, not only of physical health, but, worse still, of mental capacity.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, the comparison which had been so well made between the standard of mathematical teaching in the Universities and the standard of mathematical teaching in Training Colleges was to those who were familiar with the system of the Universities pregnant with meaning. The great evil in our educational movement was a confusion of means and ends. Surely the objects of any Training College should be to produce instruments, not only capable, but willing, readily and cheerfully, to discharge the useful, though, perhaps, humble, service of training the children of the labouring classes satisfactorily to perform their duties in life. The present system tended to the production of the unknown genius—the philosopher masquerading as a village schoolmaster. They might be certain that a man who was very learned in the higher branches of mathematics would not be on the best way for making a good teacher of the three R's; for, having the power to soar into the nobler regions of the binomial theorem, and of quadratic equations, he would despise those rudimentary branches of education. The present system reminded him of that of the magnificent horticulturist who spent thousands a-year upon his vineries only to produce a few show bunches of grapes. With regard to the question of the fairness of giving repetition a place in examinations, he might say that when he was at Harrow the idea of reciting from memory at an examination was never dreamt of. A desperate attempt was, indeed, made at one time at that school to galvanize the system of repetition into life by prizes for running it off in quantities; but the attempt was not successful. In short, repetition could never be a true standard of competitive merit. With regard to the suggestion that had been made as to the expediency of raising the standard of teaching in night schools, he wished to point out that if the alternative subjects that had been named were admitted into a school of the kind, its manager would never engage a master who was not competent to conduct the night department with its enlarged curriculum. It would accordingly bring about in an indirect way the very mischief against which, in its direct shape, his noble Friend protested. He invited his noble Friend to re-consider the matter in this light. He should not be able to vote with the hon. Member for Maidstone, and he hoped that the Education Department would not forget the weighty warnings given them by the noble Lord.

Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice

MR. RAMSAY said, it was not from any indifference to education that he hesitated to attribute so much importance to the teaching of science. The question resolved itself into one of practical difficulty in carrying out the object which his hon. Friend (Sir John Lubbock) had in view. His (Mr. Ramsay's) objection was that children up to 11 or 12 years of age were heavily taxed in acquiring any knowledge of the elementary branches of science in elementary schools. He felt that if it was desirable to add to the Code the elements of natural science care should be taken that they were taught by men perfectly versed in those branches of science in which they gave instruction. The noble Lord (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) had referred to the difficulty in the way of teachers at the present time acquiring sufficient knowledge to pass examinations in science. There could be no doubt that these examinations were heavy. In normal schools the elements of natural science were taught, and the students acquired some knowledge in these branches; but he doubted whether that knowledge was such as to enable them to teach the elements of natural science with success in the schools in which they might be employed. His objection to this system of instruction was that the number of branches which the children were required to learn was too great rather than too small. Too many subjects were forced upon them; and unless they could develop greater natural power on the part of the pupils he thought it would not, at the present time, be expedient to require from the teachers that they should give instruction to any class of children under 13 years of age in elementary branches of science. If they were dealing with children over 13 years of age he should take a different view of the case; and, under these circumstances, he would admit that it would be desirable to teach the children the elements of natural science. Children between 11 and 13 might not only derive information, but be very much interested in acquiring knowledge in any branch of natural science taught by the teachers; but the difficulty which forced itself upon him arose from the fact that the younger children were now over-taxed. Until the standard of the Education Department was reduced he should not himself bound to support the Motion of his hon. Friend.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON entirely agreed with the noble Lord (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) in his observations, and the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Ramsay). He (Sir Baldwin Leighton) thought the training of teachers was being carried too far. The acquirements expected from them were such that in country districts it was often found very difficult to obtain the services of a teacher. He hoped the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council would reject the proposal of the hon. Baronet. Possibly, if the study of mathematics in Training Colleges were to be reduced from the present high standard, it might be expedient to introduce some elementary science, and even other practical subjects, into the curriculum of teachers; but, at present, he thought the introduction of this subject would not be at all desirable.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, as he understood the Motion, it was intended to place elementary science on a par with poetry and other subjects of a kindred character. The pupil teachers had power, under the existing rules, of passing examinations on subjects of science, and they were, in fact, invited to do so. It had fallen to his lot to submit to the Education Department that science had been unduly favoured under the Code. There was a common belief that, under the operation of the Code, language had been unduly taxed and scientific subjects favoured. That, he knew, was the opinion of a large number of the Inspectors. His object was to put these subjects on a par, and he was very glad to take the opportunity of discovering any preference for what were called University subjects. An opportunity should be afforded the teachers to qualify for instruction. Of course, he was aware that science must always be heavily weighted in the struggle, because it was the natural bias of the young mind to turn far more towards poetry than to science.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, a very simple question had been complicated by the speech of his noble Friend (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice). Many persons might approve of the proposition that elementary science should be added to the subjects of tuition, and many might also disapprove of the high-class training which was given to the teachers in training schools. This latter question, however, was entirely beside the question which was before the House. The simple issue was, whether elementary science should or should not be constituted an optional subject in connection with our ordinary school education? It seemed to be thought by some hon. Members that if the Amendment before the House were passed, teachers in training schools would be obliged to learn the subjects of natural science. This, he desired to say, was a misconception. Should they, then, allow teachers, who had been taught natural science as an optional subject, to impart instruction in the ordinary phenomena which were continually presented to children? Should not children, he asked, be taught something respecting the air they breathed, the water they drank, and the food they ate? This was organic chemistry—if they wished to call it by a big name—but, after all, it simply meant that the children should have an intelligent knowledge of what they met with every day of their lives, from the first moment when they breathed air until the last moment when they could no longer breathe air. The difficulty in the way of providing this knowledge would not be found to come from the teachers, who generally knew enough of elementary science, but from Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, who, for the most part, had not acquired an elementary knowledge of science, and who, consequently, disliked the subject. If these Inspectors had been taught at the Universities the subjects coming under the head of natural science, they would understand themselves that such things were most fit and necessary to be taught to the children. It was that which ought to be the great inducement to the Education Department, if they desired those things to be taught which were so essential to the happiness and comfort of the poorer classes, to see that the Inspectors they appointed should know something of the subject under discussion. With regard to elementary science in mining districts, would it not be extremely useful and important to teach children to know something of the dangers they would meet in their work in the mines, of which they were commonly so negligent and ignorant, and in many cases did not know how to avoid? Those were points—it might be called science, if it was chosen—but they were simply an intelligent knowledge of phenomena which children, as well as men, continually met at all periods of life. That argument might be followed in almost any phase of life. Take, for instance, agriculture. Would it be called high science to teach a child, whose life would be spent in the fields and in connection with agriculture, something regarding the air, food, and the earth, food of plants, the use of manure, and such kindred subjects? That was the proposal of the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone. He simply said he did not ask that it should be made compulsory; but he asked that a teacher should be allowed, where he had the knowledge, to adapt that knowledge to the wants of the children in whatever position they might be placed. Let the agricultural child have the knowledge of that which surrounded him. But it need not be compulsory. Let it be optional, and given as a matter of good will between the teacher and his children. It was not suggested that any expense should be incurred. He believed that voluntary effort would give any such illustrative objects as were needed, especially if the teaching was to be optional. The request of the hon. Member for Maidstone, who asked neither for compulsion nor expenditure, was such a simple one that he could not help hoping the Government would refrain from opposing it. The time had undoubtedly come when it was desirable to spread such useful knowledge as that which he had indicated; and he, therefore, trusted that the proposal of his hon. Friend would be carried out with no more delay than was unavoidable.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he did not altogether agree with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, that the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) was not germane to the subject before the House; for there were, in that speech, some arguments of a very pertinent and weighty character. When the hon. Baronet (Sir John Lubbock) brought forward his proposal last year, he (Lord George Hamilton) stated that the Education Office would be most anxious to consider the views of the hon. Member, and would see whether the practical difficulties standing in the way of the proposal could be overcome. Since he had so answered the hon. Baronet, he and his Colleagues had communicated with a number of gentlemen on the subject before the House, who were capable of giving valuable information and advice, and he would now acquaint the House with the result of those communications. The concluding part of the speech of the hon. Baronet was, he contended, a little misleading. The hon. Baronet made an appeal to the House on behalf of local government, asking that the different localities might have some option with regard to the subjects to be taught in their schools, and concluded by saying that the great branch of human knowledge to which he was drawing attention was excluded from the school curriculum. This, however, was not a perfectly correct statement of the case, as there existed nothing to prevent a competent teacher from giving instruction in elementary natural science to the children under him. But a teacher was not necessarily paid for giving such instruction, and the object of the hon. Baronet was that he should be paid. At present everything in the Elementary Education Code was defined and clear; but the reverse would be the case if the Resolution were passed, because what the hon. Baronet wanted to do was to bring in the subject of natural science and make what is called "a class subject" of it. The first objection to that was, what was the definition of natural science, so as to know what a child was to be taught and in what an Inspector might examine him? Natural science, as he stated last year, included every branch of human knowledge, except, perhaps, history and moral philosophy. There was a large number of excellent teachers who obtained certificates to teach; and if any one of these teachers happened to be out of a place, he or she would be asked—"Can you teach elementary science?" That would be, probably, the first question put to him, and it would be pointed out that the Education Department had laid down the rule. In such a case it would be found that a considerable obstacle would be put in the way of a most excellent teacher obtaining employment. Since last year the Department had had this matter constantly under their consideration, and he said unhesitatingly—although considerable number of eminent persons' opinions might be quoted in favour of the Resolution—the balance of opinion was against it. This was more true of the teachers than even of the Inspectors. Dr. Gladstone, a prominent member of the London School Board, had given much attention to this subject, and last year he delivered a lecture at the Society of Arts, of which a copy had been sent to him (Lord George Hamilton). Dr. Gladstone had been asked to make out a course, and that course had been sent in; but Dr. Gladstone said that, although it might be suitable for the London School Board schools, he should not take the responsibility for prescribing for the schools in the country. There, then, was another difficulty. They were told that in Germany this class of instruction was given to the children; but there the system of instruction was quite different. The Education Department had altogether abandoned the practice of prescribing a text-book. He agreed with the right hon. Member who had just spoken that the best way to meet this difficulty would be that the managers of different schools should take particular care as to the particular text-books used as reading books in the schools. So, in the mining districts, the manager of a school would take the trouble to obtain such a text-book as would impart the various information referred to by the right hon. Gentleman. But this was information which they could get in the ordinary reading lessons. As to this point, he could only refer to what he said last year. It was said that only 5,000 children had passed in science; but the number was 45,000 in specific scientific subjects, and the number would have been greater only that children were not allowed to compete until after they had passed the Fourth Standard. The hon. Member for North Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) rather complained that the Education Department had ousted the older subjects, and given preference to scientific subjects; but it was satisfactory to learn that, so far from the country schools not holding their own in classical examinations, they had succeeded in beating children from the town schools. In Latin and Greek the children in the country schools had passed better than the children in towns. Then his noble Friend asked that opportunities should be given to those attending night schools to pass in the higher standard and receive instruction in science and other subjects. The night schools were rather excrescences, so to speak, upon the education system, and, with the small number of attendances, it was impossible to pass in the higher standards. No doubt, in many cases the opportunities were availed of, and at the present moment he should not like to give a definite answer on the point. Another point to which his noble Friend had alluded was the alleged intense stringency of the tests imposed on pupil teachers; but he doubted whether, under existing circumstances, there was much proof of that allegation. All that he himself had heard from pupil teachers was rather in favour of increasing the stringency of the tests than otherwise. He quite agreed that they ought to do everything they could to give such an instruction to children of elementary schools as would develop their intelligence and would be useful to them in after-life; but he could not see his way to getting over the practical difficulties to which he alluded, and, therefore, the Department could not accept the Motion.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would only detain the House a few moments, after the speech they had heard from the noble Lord. He was glad to learn from his speech that the noble Lord and his Colleagues had been seriously considering this subject; and although the Government were not as yet able to accept the proposal made to them, he had no doubt that when they had further weighed the matter the difficulties would grow less and less. There were two objections. It was said that if the suggestion of the hon. Member for Maidstone were adopted much more labour would be involved so far as the teachers were concerned, and that there would be great difficulty in defining what were to be the lessons given. But his noble Friend had mentioned a third objection which he thought rather contradicted the other two. He had said that if they allowed this choice it would be so much more easy to teach, and so much more practical that it would drive out the other subjects. Well, if it were easier to teach, the great difficulty of the labour disappeared. By the principle of results, which laid at the very basis of their educational arrangements, it would be found of more practical advantage to the children, and that was precisely the object which they wished to attain. As for increased labour to teachers in regard to the addition of a new subject, they were really as much obliged to learn this branch of knowledge now as they would be if the suggestion of the hon. Member for Maidstone was carried out. They were not absolutely compelled to learn it now, nor would they be compelled if the suggestion were adopted. In the 4th Schedule, for the teacher there were several alternative subjects—those which they might study, and for which they would get marks, but which were not compulsory. The elements of physical science formed a part of those subjects, and a knowledge of them was implied, sufficient to qualify for teaching young classes. Then, the higher mathematics formed one of those possible subjects which were not compulsory. By Article 21 of the Code a grant of 4s. was given to every scholar who passed a satisfactory examination in two of the specific subjects. One of those specific subjects was elementary science. In the table of Schedule 4 there would be found the subjects physiology, mechanics, and botany, these more than covering the proposed addition. Well, if the managers wanted their teachers to earn the money for elementary science under Article 21, they would say they must have a scientific teacher in the same way as if what was proposed by the hon. Member for Maidstone was carried out an elementary scientific teacher would be required. It would, in either case, depend on the managers, and they would be as likely to adopt the same course in one case as the other; and there was, practically, just as much pressure brought on the teacher in regard to these special subjects now as before. He believed the real difficulty lay in defining the lessons to be given, and the actual practical difficulty of bringing science into the standard of examination. In Article 28 there was a technical subject list. When they got into Standard 4 they found they had optional examinations in grammar, geography, and history, with definitions of the requirements under the different heads. Well, the difficulty would be imposed on the Department of having something corresponding with this definition. He believed his hon. Friend had hit the difficulty—namely, that the Inspectors were more ignorant of science than anything else. Many of the Members of that House felt that they had not been properly taught elementary science. But he believed that was not an insuperable difficulty. Let them obtain from Germany an exact statement of the operation of the law as to these examinations. If his hon. Friend went to a Division he would support him; but he would advise him not to do so, as he wanted the Department to consider the subject thoroughly for another year. He would repeat, in a word, the argument of the hon. Member for Maidstone. He had said that, in this class examination, they should give 2s. or 4s. to each scholar of 17 years of age if they passed an elementary examination on certain subjects. He did not think that would interfere with the needlework included in the present programme; and, so far as the rest of it went, it would mean that with the boys science and history would be taken instead of grammar and history, or science and geography instead of grammar and geography. The only question was this—Was elementary science as desirable as these other three subjects? Well, he liked the study of history and geography, but he did not think it was more necessary than science; and those who thought the acceptance of this proposal would lead to cost were wrong, because it would merely be the substitution of one subject for another. Well, he did not see why important results should not be produced in many districts by the adoption of this proposal. He was convinced that, if more attention was given to this subject, the difficulties which at first presented themselves would disappear. He would conclude by making this suggestion—that the Department should find out between now and next Session how this was done in Germany, and should tell the Inspectors that they must acquire a little knowledge of elementary science in order that they might be able to conduct examinations in natural science.

NATURAL HISTORY MUSEUM, SOUTH KENSINGTON.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. E. JENKINS rose to call attention to the present form of the buildings for the Natural History Museum at South Kensington. He had given Notice of a Resolution, which he could not, owing to the Forms of House, now move—

“That it appears from their existing state that a deception has been practised on this House in relation to the plans and estimates, and that a Select Committee be appointed to investigate the matter, with power to call for papers and to examine witnesses on oath, and to report to this House.”

He said he was sorry to stand between the House and the Committee of Supply; but the terms of his Motion were of such a startling character that he deemed it advisable to bring it forward at the earliest moment. In 1870 the then Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Lowe), in answer to a Question from the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Beresford Hope), said the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the disposal of the Natural History Collection at the British Museum, which recommended the erection of a Natural History Museum on the Thames Embankment, could not be carried out without taking a considerable quantity of ground belonging to the pleasure ground on the Embankment, and that no steps had been taken to carry out the Report. The Government for the time being were of opinion that a Natural History Museum would be better situate in the suburbs than in some central place in town, where people might conveniently get at it; and, consequently, that all-absorbing place, South Kensington, was selected as the site for a Natural History Museum. The original Estimate for £350,000 included a description of an entire building. The next reference to the building showed that that Estimate had not included fittings, and that the cost of the building would be increased by £45,000. After accepting certain estimates and plans the Government had been induced to make additions to them without first consulting Parliament. Last year an enormous Estimate was sprung upon the House for £171,000 odd for internal fittings, and that was only an approximate Estimate. He wished to know who was responsible for the deception of Parliament? He had seen the building the other day and found that the scaffolding was being stripped off before the two towers were completed—and without any intention of completing them—in order that the two annexes might be added to the building. Immense factories had been erected in the centre of the ground, for what purpose he knew not, except it might be to boil whales. The House had, year after year, been jockeyed into expenditure on South Kensington. It might have been desirable that that expenditure should take place; but the House had not been dealt fairly with. The matter was one of some importance, considering how much money had been spent on Museums at South Kensington.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he had listened with much interest to the ingenuous speech of the hon. Member. It was refreshing to hear a young mind brought to bear upon the existing state of things with so slight a knowledge of the antecedent circumstances. The hon. Member had drawn a very formidable indictment against two delinquents whom he wished to crush—namely, the South Kensington authorities and Her Majesty's Government; only it was unfortunate that neither of them was at all concerned in the matter. The building in question was a branch of the British Museum, and the persons who had brought about the present state of affairs were the Members of the Liberal Governments under which the country had flourished till five years ago. Parliament became pledged to this particular way of dealing with these collections on one memorable occasion some 15 or 16 years ago—when Lord Palmerston, for one night only, left the Leadership of the House in the hands of his Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone), who succeeded in inducing the House to purchase the site of the Exhibition building, and then tried hard to get them to buy the building itself also, only that they turbulently declined to make the purchase, notwithstanding the subsequent persuasion of Lord Palmerston, who, on return, pointed out that if they would only buy the building, and stick a little plaster on, it would make a very decent Natural History Museum. With regard to the Natural History Museum, it had much better have been placed on the

Embankment. A forlorn hope was led in behalf of this good course by his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), who obtained a Committee of the House to inquire into the matter. This Committee, on which he (Mr. Beresford Hope) served, reported favourably of the plan; but it was too late, and the plea of expense prevailed. Still, if it was necessary to erect the building at South Kensington at all, it was much to be regretted that, owing to Mr. Ayrton's parsimony, it had been found necessary to build it in a hole. He believed that for no greater sum than £7,000 the ground on which the Museum stood might have been filled in to the level of the roadway. Part of the expenses of which the hon. Member complained was due, no doubt, to the fact that the design originally adopted was by Captain Fowkes, who was an engineer, and not an architect, and that, though clever, it was found to be impracticable, and that it was, consequently, necessary to commission the architect, Mr. Waterhouse, who had been called in to carry it out, to prepare an entirely fresh one. On the subject of the increased expense the House might, perhaps, be enlightened by the Government, who probably knew of the matter by tradition, or they might be informed by some Member of the Opposition who could speak from actual experience. He could not see what room there was for deception in the erection of a building ostentatiously carried out, with the full knowledge of successive Parliaments. If it was necessary to boil whales in the interests of science; it must be done, and even the hon. Member for Dundee could not do it in a tea-kettle. The building itself was to be a central school of science, in many of its most important branches, and not a place for furriers' refuse. The annexes, no doubt, were not specially artistic, and a great deal might be said against the buildings at the back, and in particular against the chimneys that had been made to look like bell towers; but, after all, the grand collection of the Museum would be exhibited satisfactorily, and then its first object would be gained. The question of cost was one that never could be settled a priori, but had to be determined by a tentative process. Probably too small a sum had been originally asked for. That was the whole grievance, and he trusted he had been able to throw some light on the subject.

MR. GÉRARD NOEL maintained that the charge of deception had not been borne out by the facts the hon. Member had brought forward. The facts as to the plans and estimates were these. In 1864 architects were invited to compete with designs for the Natural History Museum, and the first premium was bestowed upon Captain Fowkes, who was directed to put himself into communication with the Trustees of the British Museum. Unfortunately, however, he died, and Mr. Waterhouse was appointed to carry out his plans. But when the matter was gone into further it was found that Captain Fowkes's plans were totally inadequate; and a printed Correspondence on the subject, which was moved for by the present Judge Advocate General, clearly showed that they were dropped and others substituted in their stead, and that Mr. Waterhouse was appointed architect. It also appeared that certain features of the original design were left out of the Estimate. The salary of the Clerk of the Works, to which exception had been taken, was not included in the original Estimate. As to the Estimates themselves, the first Vote taken was for a sum of £6,000; that was in 1868. But on the 2nd of August, 1870, when a further sum was asked for, it was stated in a foot-note that the total Estimate and the details of the scheme were then still under consideration. This was when Mr. Ayrton was First Commissioner and when Mr. Waterhouse was appointed architect. All this appeared upon the Papers, so that it was not true that Parliament had been deceived. Parliament had known exactly what had occurred from 1868 until the present time. In 1871-2 £40,000 was voted, and £350,000 was the sum named for the total Estimate. In 1872-3 a further sum was voted, and tenders were obtained which amounted to £395,000. Mr. Ayrton at that time struck out many details, among which were the central towers. The original contract had been made in 1868; but it was found in 1872 that since then the prices of labour and materials had risen, so that in 1873-4 the Estimates had to be revised, and £43,000 additional was added to cover the increased prices and to include the salary of the Clerk of the Works and the expenses of warming, ventilating, &c. In the present year, he (Mr. Gerard Noel) had moved to increase the Estimates by £14,000, on the ground that the building would be very incomplete and imperfect if the centre towers were not added, and the Vote was passed two or three months ago. As to the fittings, it had always been understood that those which were necessary for the accommodation of the specimens had never been included in the Estimate. The fittings to which the hon. Member alluded as being so included were doors and other things which were required in any ordinary house. The contract with Mr. Waterhouse expressly stated that it was made exclusive of fittings. With regard to the architectural design, he need not express any opinion, as it had been settled long before he had come into his present Office. He believed it, however, to be worthy of the British Museum and a credit to the architect.

MR. RYLANDS: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Beresford Hope), in a burst of his accustomed eloquence, has attempted to draw the attention of the House away from the main point which my hon. Friend had in view in bringing this matter forward. I am one of those who always listen to the criticisms of the hon. Gentleman with reference to questions of fine art and architecture, upon which he is necessarily so great an authority, with the greatest respect; and I am also not unwilling to make allowances for him for the pains he has taken on this occasion for throwing on the former Government the responsibility of the large expenditure which has been incurred on account of the Natural History Museum. The hon. Gentleman has gone out of his way to make an attack upon Mr. Ayrton in connection with these plans. I will, however, say this of Mr. Ayrton—that the country is very much indebted to the late First Commissioner of Works for the constant care and attention which he gave to the expenditure for national purposes, and the control which he brought to bear upon enthusiastic Gentlemen, who, like the hon. Gentleman opposite, are inclined to spend public money upon anything which appears to them to be good and useful in the most lavish way. But I venture to say that all the remarks which the hon. Gentleman has made with regard to national improvements of this sort are in no way questioned by my hon. Friend, and they are certainly not questioned by myself. I agree with the hon. Gentleman entirely that in this sort of national expenditure it would be false economy to stand in the way of any arrangement that might be necessary for the proper care of such a Museum which is to give the opportunity to the public of taking advantage of studying these collections. Upon this point there is not the slightest question. But what is the question? It is not a question, let me say, between the political occupants of the Treasury Bench, whether on one side or the other. We are perfectly aware that when right hon. Gentlemen come into Office for a certain period they find permanent officials of the Government at the Offices. Those permanent officials are continually taking steps which often result in a very large expenditure for certain objects; and what we complain of is that the Government are misinformed by those permanent officials themselves, and, in consequence, bring Estimates before the House in such a manner as to keep the House without full information as to all the facts of the case. That is the complaint which my hon. Friend makes, and I must say that I think my hon. Friend has substantiated his complaint. It may be that the expenditure has been perfectly justifiable; but what we complain of is that the whole amount of the expenditure was not stated at first. It is no answer for the right hon. Gentleman to say that, owing to certain changes in the plans, there has been a considerable addition to the original Estimate. [MR. GERARD NOEL: I did not say there had been any change of plan.] The right hon. Gentleman is perfectly right in correcting me. There is, practically, no change in the plan. The Estimate to which my hon. Friend called attention—the first Estimate of £350,000—was the plan which was approved by Mr. Waterhouse; and, therefore, there is no question as to the previous plans which were adopted by the Government. Our complaint is, in terms, that the whole amount was not stated, and that when the House of Commons considered the matter there was a suppressio veri. We see that by the subsequent proceedings, and we are entitled to say that the Votes have been inconsistent with the statements made by the Department.

MR. GERARD NOEL : I said that the first contract was made in the year 1868, and that the tenders were invited in 1872—four years afterwards. During those years the price of terra cotta, labour, and other things, had risen, and there was also the salary of the Clerk of the Works.

MR. RYLANDS : It is true that the contract was made in the year 1868 ; but we are alluding to the year 1871. It was in the year 1871 that this Estimate of £350,000, for carrying out Mr. Waterhouse's plans, was accepted. That is the Estimate which was laid on the Table, and it was laid on the Table as the total Estimate for the work which had been decided upon, including the "architect's commission, salary of Clerk of the Works, fixtures, fittings, warming, lighting, ventilation, &c." Those are the words. Now, I am not blaming the right hon. Gentleman. He certainly is not responsible, because it was done long before he came into Office. But I must say that I do not think any sufficient answer has been given to the complaint of my hon. Friend. I hope, now that the matter has been brought forward, the right hon. Gentleman will look more closely into the Estimates before giving information to the House.

SCOTCH SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. M'LAREN had the following Notice on the Paper :—

"To call attention to the Second and Third Reports of the Endowed Schools and Hospitals (Scotland) Commission, and the Appendices thereto, respecting the Society in Scotland for Propagating Christian Knowledge, and to move an Address for Return respecting the Society in Scotland for Propagating Christian Knowledge, incorporated by Royal Charter under Letters Patent granted in 1709 and 1738 respectively, in continuation of the financial information given by the Secretary and Directors of the Society, when examined before the Endowed Schools and Hospitals (Scotland) Commissioners, and printed in the Appendix to their Second Report 1874 (pages 248 to 260), and in continuation of the statement made by the Commissioners, in their Third and final Report 1875, that 'this is the largest fund in Scotland applicable to educational purposes generally ;' that it 'may be valued at £200,000, accumulated since their incorporation in 1709 from subscriptions, donations, and legacies, and greatly increased by judicious investments in land. Their annual income is about £6,000' (page 137). The Return to include a Copy of the last balanced annual account of income and expenditure, and to give the names of the schools and teachers, with their salaries, now supported by the Society. Also to show to what extent the Directors have diminished the number of their schools annually since the passing of 'The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872,' as was contemplated in the evidence given by them before the Commissioners ; also to show the sums expended annually in promoting each of the four purposes to which the Directors proposed to apply the surplus funds to the Trust, as specified in the Third Report of the Commissioners (page 138)."

The hon. Member said, he was aware that, from the fact of a Division having already taken place on going into Committee of Supply, he could not move the terms of his Motion ; and, therefore, he proposed to confine himself to the first part of it, which called attention to the Report of the Endowed Schools Commissioners. The Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge in Scotland was founded in 1709, and was entirely a charitable institution. Some hon. Gentlemen seemed to think that it was a private foundation ; but no error could be greater than to suppose anything of that kind. The words of the Patent were—

"We, understanding the charitable inclinations of many of our subjects for the raising of voluntary contributions towards the promotion of Christian knowledge and increasing piety and virtue in Scotland, especially in the Highlands, Islands, and remote corners," and so on. That showed that it was not a foundation formed by one individual—as many institutions were—who gave a large sum of money. The Letters Patent sanctioned the collection of subscriptions, donations, legacies, and funds of all kinds for the purpose of propagating Christian knowledge in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, and in other remote parts. When the Secretary and Directors of this Society were examined before the Commissioners it was seen, as was stated in the Report of the Commissioners, that this was the largest fund in Scotland applicable to religious purposes generally. This fund was now of very large amount, and was, in the opinion of the Commissioners, applicable to educational purposes generally. The Commissioners said—

"It might be valued at £200,000, accumulated since their incorporation in 1709 from subscriptions, donations, and legacies, and greatly increased by judicious investments in land. Their annual income was about £6,000."

It appeared to him that the Society had been managed, not as one for spending the annual income which they had obtained in the manner pointed out by the Charter and Letters Patent, but as a Society for accumulating large sums of money with which to purchase estates in three or four counties in Scotland. If the money which had been invested in the purchase of estates had been applied for the benefit of the poor illiterate Gaelic-speaking population in the Highlands, and Islands, and other remote parts of Scotland, he thought it would have been far more advantageously spent than in accumulating large sums and buying large estates. The estates were now valued at £192,000. He thought it was a matter very well deserving of the attention of the Government. He knew that the Commissioners had devoted a great deal of attention to the subject; and three of them, Members of this House, and now present, believed that the Government would have done well to consent to grant the information sought for as an unopposed Return. He did not impute any bad motives to anyone; but it was a fact that meetings of the Society were held in secrecy. The subscriptions to the Society had now dwindled down to almost nothing; whereas, formerly, they were very large. He remembered being a subscriber about 40 years ago. There were no subscriptions, no public open meetings, and no information whatever was laid before the public as to what was done with the £6,000 a-year which the Society enjoyed. He thought that, under those circumstances, with the various educational works that were being carried on, and especially having in view the poverty of the people in that particular section of Scotland which was pointed to in the Charter first obtained by the Society — that a great deal might be done with those large funds to promote the interests of the people in those remote districts. The managers of the Society said, in their examinations before the Commissioners, that at one time they had 295 schools under their control and to support. They explained that they did not build the school-houses; but they paid salaries to the teachers, and other charges, as arranged with landowners and others, who agreed to build the houses. But they also said that, in consequence of the passing of the Education Act of 1872, they contemplated surrendering a large proportion of the schools to the School Boards; and at the time they gave their evidence they stated that they had already surrendered 40 schools. Now, he should like to know what was done with the money formerly employed for the support of these schools? He thought the Society should be compelled to give a copy of its accounts and balance-sheet for last year. That was a most reasonable request. There was not an educational foundation in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, or any part of Scotland which did not print and publish its balance-sheet. This Society, however, was a secret Society—he used the words advisedly. Nobody knew anything about their operations; their transactions were conducted in private. It might be the best managed Society in the world, or the worst managed, for anything he knew; but what he protested against emphatically was the secrecy with which everything connected with the Society was done. He held that it was not for the benefit of the public that such large sums should be administered in secret; and he thought this was a case where the House of Commons should take steps to protect the interest of those who were originally intended to be benefited by the Society under their Charters. He might mention, as showing how contrary to the spirit of the original foundation of that Association their present system was, that the first Charter expressly stated that they must never accumulate any fund so that its annual product should exceed £2,000. The Government of the day were jealous of that system of heaping up money and investing it, buying property with it, &c.; and they accordingly restricted the Association to that sum of £2,000 a-year. But, by the second Charter, which the Association obtained some years afterwards, they got that restriction removed; and, therefore, at the present moment, there was no legal obstacle to their buying estates, by means of their annual income, in place of expending it for the benefit of the poor Highlander, to whom the annual income both morally and legally belonged. The Commissioners very properly asked what they intended to do with all that money, now that they proposed to get rid of the schools? and they named certain objects to which it would be applied, among other things, in support of missions, and certain bequests to churches in Scotland; though he held it to be doubtful whether, under their Charter, they had the power to make these grants to churches. There was a great deal of money to be spent, and they made four propositions to the Commissioners with respect to it, which propositions the Commissioners had summarized in their Report. With the fear of the Secretary to the Treasury before his eyes, who, he knew, desired to go on with the Estimates, he would not enter on these propositions, or, indeed, say one-half of what he had intended to say; but what he wished to ascertain by his Motion was, whether this Society had spent any money on those four propositions, and, if so, whether they had any balance left, and how much? In short, he wanted to know what the Society had been doing for the last 12 months? He thought Her Majesty's Government blameworthy in not having at once agreed to give this Return. If they had proposed any limitation or qualification upon the Return, he should have been happy to have met them; but he had got no encouragement, having, on the contrary, been met with a point-blank refusal.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. WATSON): I think it well that I should interpose at this stage of the discussion, because the Government have been charged with wrongfully refusing these Returns. I do not think it is in the least degree necessary to argue any of the special questions which the hon. Gentleman has raised with regard to the administration of this fund, because it appears to me that the granting of the Return would be objectionable upon grounds entirely apart from what may be the merits or demerits of the present administration of the revenues of the Society. No doubt this Society, which is a body of private individuals associated together for charitable purposes, have now very large funds under their administration. I repeat, that this is a body of private individuals associated together for charitable purposes, for collecting subscriptions and employing them in promoting, according to their views, religious knowledge within the four corners of Scotland. In what manner that ought to be done, and whether they have really discharged the purpose which they set before themselves, are matters which it is not for us to inquire into; but it is ridiculous to suppose that a Royal Charter is needed in Scotland or anywhere else to levy or to collect subscriptions, and to apply them to charitable purposes, or that a bank or any other institution, by obtaining an Act of Parliament, becomes in any sense a public Department or Office, from whom the Government are at any time entitled to call for Returns. No doubt it is a common thing to ask for Returns in continuation of previous Returns; but here we are asked for Returns—

“In continuation of the financial information given by the Secretary and Directors of the Society, when examined before the Endowed Schools and Hospitals (Scotland) Commissioners, and printed in the Appendix to their Second Report 1874.”

I venture to say that if the fact of a body of men, or of an individual, appearing before a Commission of this House, and there giving evidence as to the financial condition of the body of which he is a member, or of his own private affairs, is to be made the groundwork for extracting from him a continuation of that information, that is contrary to all Parliamentary procedure. No doubt, Returns are very widely moved for, and I am sure that the present Government—any more than their Predecessors—are not amenable to the charge of not yielding wherever the demand is reasonable. But if you ask for Returns of this kind simply because information has been given before a Committee, I do not see how any private individual may not be called upon to exhibit the contents of his books, or the particulars of his business. The two things have no earthly connection with each other; and it is a great mistake to put forward in a Motion like this any such fact, as that information has been given before a Committee in order to justify a continuation of that evidence in the shape of a Parliamentary Return. I do not see, if you are to introduce that rule, how any private Society or party who have had a Charter which confers certain privileges upon them would not be liable to be called upon to furnish Returns. That is a matter which is contrary to the practice of this House, because there is an obvious distinction to be drawn between continuing Returns which have been presented from year to year and asking for such Returns as are now asked for. There is the greatest possible distinction between the character of the information to be given in continued Returns and the character of the information which is obtained, and quite legitimately obtained, before a Royal Commission or before a Committee of this House. A Royal Commission, or a Committee of this House, are entitled to ask for and to acquire information of the most delicate and confidential character; but I venture to say that that rule does not in the least degree apply to Returns. But I will not rest upon that alone. In this case there was a very elaborate and searching inquiry carried out by the Commissioners referred to in this Notice under the Schools and Hospitals (Scotland) Commission. That inquiry was directed by this House with a view to legislate upon the subject-matter of these very schools and endowments, whether private or public; and one of the schemes which fell within the legitimate scope of that Commission was the Society in Scotland for Propagating Christian Knowledge. Accordingly, not only were the position and the monetary affairs of this Society very fully investigated, but the Commission reported upon them. It is necessary to attend to what followed on the Report. It was treated by the hon. Member for Edinburgh as if it had been a nullity; but the fact is that it was made the foundation of legislative action in this House, and the plain meaning and the intention of the Act of last year is simply this—that those institutions, whose affairs had been investigated by the Royal Commission, should have from the passing of that Act two years' grace to make up their minds as to whether they should voluntarily bring in schemes for the alteration and adjustment of their own constitutions. I am happy to say that a great number of those institutions which were included in the scope of the Act have already acted upon that provision; but I do think it would be an entire violation of the principle upon which that Act proceeded, and of the object which the Legislature had in view in passing it, if you were now to deal with those institutions whose two years' grace has not expired by investigating their affairs in the interim, with an ulterior purpose, with the object of which we have not yet been made acquainted. It was intimated at the time the Act was passed, and there was a common assent on both sides of the House in the matter, that in the event either of the institutions failing to re-constitute themselves, by or without a Provisional Order, they would at the end of that period of grace be dealt with in a manner which would admit of no refusal—in other words, they would be dealt with summarily and compulsorily, instead of having time and leisure given to them to propose any self-amendment. Now, I think, upon those last grounds, even supposing the Return was a proper one to make, which I do not admit, it would be very inconvenient to interfere at present with any one of these institutions which fall within the scope of the Act. Under these circumstances, I think the Government are justified in declining to grant the Return for which the hon. Gentleman asks.

MR. C. S. PARKER expressed, as one of the Endowed Schools Commission, a feeling of great regret that there should be any difficulty in obtaining information as to the present position of the Society. The gentlemen representing the Society at the time when the Commission asked information made no difficulty whatever in giving it, and made no suggestion that there was anything of a confidential nature in what they laid before the Commission. Indeed, so frank and full were their answers, that it would be unnecessary now to renew the inquiry, were it not for one or two peculiar circumstances. The whole system of the Society was undergoing a change at the time they gave evidence before the Commission. Hence, they were not able to tell the Commission for certain what their future policy would be. For the Education Act had only recently been introduced, and, under it, they saw it was necessary to give up their existing mode of granting aid, while their new policy had not yet taken shape. The chief difficulty in administering the affairs of the Society in a manner satisfactory to Scotland arose from this. At the time of the Disruption a large proportion of the contributors joined the Free Church; and the legal question having been raised, whether the business of the Society might be conducted through agents belonging to the Free Church, the Law Courts ruled that it might not. In consequence of that decision, a large number of the warmest supporters of the Society had to stand aloof from it; and, inasmuch as many of the schools to which the funds were applicable were under the charge of Free-Churchmen, a continual difficulty arose in administering the funds, for if it happened that the master of a particular school was not a member of the Established Church of Scotland, it was not possible to employ him as an agent of the Society. In some Highland districts, where the Free Church was very strong, and the Established Church almost non-existent, it was hardly possible to conduct the operations of the Society through agents belonging to the Established Church, and this caused a great desire that the matter should be looked into. The Endowed Schools Commission was not composed of Liberals only. The late Sir William Stirling-Maxwell was a Member of it, and he joined in recommending that this legal restriction to the Established Church should be removed. Since that time an Executive Commission had been empowered to give effect to such recommendations. But as this Society had as yet shown no disposition to go before the Commission, it was a very natural desire on the part of the hon. Member for Edinburgh to put pressure upon the Society to do so; and the hon. Member had said nothing in his speech to justify anyone imputing to him that he had any special scheme in view, or wished to interfere, except so far as to express the strong desire there was for more information. Though it was not possible to bring a Motion before the House on this occasion, and though it seemed that, even had it been possible, the Government had thought it necessary to refuse to accede to it, yet he hoped this short discussion would not be without its effects. For if the Society was still disposed to act in the same spirit as it did five years ago, he saw no reason why, after this strong expression of opinion, they should not voluntarily give such information as they had to impart, and if they also came before the Executive Commission with a scheme, they would be acting wisely. The Established Church of Scotland recently made overtures to the non-Established Churches, and expressed an earnest desire to co-operate with them in Christian work. That desire was reciprocated by the non-Established Churches; and it seemed to him that if ever co-operation was to be begun a fairer opportunity could not arise than this if in those parts of Scotland where the people did not belong to the Established Church, the Established Church would consent to co-operate with other Churches in the work of Christian education. He trusted that the Society would take this view of the matter, and would submit proposals in accordance with the recommendation of the Royal Commission.

MR. RAMSAY said, that he could not allow the discussion to close without expressing his regret that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate should have thought proper, on what he feared would be regarded as purely technical grounds, to refuse to accept the Motion of the hon. Member for Edinburgh. The Motion itself did not contain the slightest allusion to any desire on the part of the hon. Member to interfere with the operations of the Society. He felt satisfied that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman had inquired, the Society would have expressed its willingness to give all the information which the hon. Member for Edinburgh had asked for. He was quite satisfied of that; because that body had not only given evidence before the Endowed Schools and Hospitals Commission, but also gave evidence, in 1865, to the Education Commission, of which he had had the honour of being a Member. The Directors of the Society would deprecate this refusal, because they had come before the latter Commission, and had given evidence of the total inefficiency of the way in which their funds were applied; and, being excellent gentlemen, anxious for the good administration of the affairs of the Society, they would have been glad to have this opportunity afforded them of placing before the public a full statement of the way in which their funds were now administered, as the hon. Member desired. In 1865, before the Education Commission, the Inspector of the Schools of the Society came forward, and said that the education in these schools was of a very low character indeed, and it was an exception to the rule if they had what was called an efficient teacher. The Society was originally intended to promote the cause of education in the Highlands and Islands. The first Letters Patent were so framed that it could only be applied to male teachers. The second Letters Patent were granted for the purpose of affording to females instruction and training in the industrial branches of education, as those were then understood. Had the right hon. and learned Gentleman thought fit to apply to the Directors of the Society, he would have got not only the information which the hon. Member for Edinburgh had asked for, but a full account of all that had been done to carry out some amendment in the various schools which were scattered throughout the Highlands and Islands; and as the funds were originally intended for the behoof of the Highlands and Islands, he (Mr. Ramsay) would deprecate any change which would take away from those districts the advantages of the funds, particularly at a time when the Hebrides and other Islands of Scotland stood so much in need of extraneous aid for educational purposes. He hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would soon be able to place on the Table of the House such information as the Directors of the Society could furnish as to the operations of the institution. He believed such Returns would go far to show that there was no cause for the jealousy existing regarding their transactions, which took their rise in the secret way in which, as his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh had said, the administration had been heretofore conducted. The Society ought, he thought, to have the chance of doing, even in an informal way, what the hon. Member for Edinburgh suggested—namely, furnish an account of their administration of this important fund.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, the funds of the Society were very much for the benefit of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, and he had heard with a great deal of disappointment the answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate; for, from information which had reached him (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh), the people in those districts had looked forward to this Motion being agreed to, and thought there could be no possible objection to it. It was for the interests of the Society itself that due publication should be made, and those concerned should have full knowledge of the affairs, before any scheme was submitted to the Endowed Schools Commissioners.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, as Chairman of the Commission to which reference had been made, he hoped the hon. Member for Edinburgh, who showed such high respect for one recommendation of that Commission, would show equal reverence for some others. It might not be right to make demands upon such Associations as this until some option had been given them to take advantage of the Act. He could not, however, recognize the force of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's the Lord Advocate's objections. These institutions were not private institutions. They were public institutions, and open to the criticism of Parliament now, and he hoped also in the future. A particular recommendation of the Commission with regard not merely to the present but to the future was, that they should be regarded as public bodies, and placed under the obligation of laying under a public officer their accounts before the public year by year, so that the public should know how the work was being carried on.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY thought hon. Members opposite were showing a little unreasonable impatience in this matter. The two years of grace given to these institutions was not a long time to wait. He thought the Government's refusal of these Returns was perfectly justifiable.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said that, after the strong expression of feeling which had come from so many Representatives of Scotch constituencies, the Society would have the right to do away to some extent with the reproach of secrecy by communicating some of the facts connected with its working. It was quite within the power of the Society, if actuated by the motives attributed to it by the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay), to give all the information which the hon. Member for Edinburgh desired.

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

£1,521,168, to complete the sum for Education, England and Wales.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON observed, that the Committee were aware that every year it was the custom, when moving this Vote, for those who were responsible for the Estimates to make a statement, giving an account of the educational progress of the past year. He thought that every Member of the Committee who had read the Report which had been presented to Parliament for the year ending August, 1878, must admit that it contained a most gratifying account of the progress of elementary education. That Report had been most satisfactory as regarded increased accommodation in the State-aided schools. Statistics on this, as on other subjects, were somewhat dull and wearisome; but it was necessary to cite them, in order to a thorough understanding of the subject. He was sure, therefore, the Committee would excuse him, if he asked its attention for a short time while he stated the actual progress which had been made during the past few years. The practice had hitherto been to compare the progress of the year under review with that of the preceding year. Taking that test on the present occasion, the following were the results as regarded the State-aided schools:—The accommodation for the children had been increased by about 8 per cent, and it now, practically, amounted to very little short of 4,000,000 places. The number of children on the books was 3,496,000, being an increase of 11 per cent, whilst the average attendance was 2,405,197, and that also showed an increase of 11 per cent. There had been a considerable number of new schools, 506 being supplied by voluntary effort and 606 by school boards, and, altogether, the number of schools open was 16,293. As regarded the use made of this accommodation, they had evidence in the number of passes and in the payments by results, and they found that for this year there had been a considerable and gratifying increase in the percentage of passes in the “three R’s.” The number individually examined was 17 per cent in excess of the preceding year. In fact, whether they looked at the standard, or classes, or special subjects, they found, in each and all, a considerable increase. That was very satisfactory, because as compulsion came into operation, and a larger number of the “wastrels” were forced into the schools, it was to be feared that while the number of children in attendance might increase the examinations might not improve; but they had found the fact to be exactly the reverse. The system which had been adopted for some years past in the Education Office was to take the figures of the educational year ending in August, and on those figures to make such estimates and calculations as might enable them to lay before Parliament the sums which would be required for the ensuing financial year. The figures which he had quoted related to the educational year which ended on the 18th of August, 1878, and the Estimates he was introducing related to the financial year ending April, 1880. One of the most important features they had to consider in estimating their wants was any alteration that might be made in the Code as to the conditions under which grants should be made. Complaints had been frequently made that the Code was not very intelligibly drawn, and it had been the ambition of successive Vice Presidents to put it in a clearer and more compact form; but there were great difficulties in the way of effecting alterations. School managers and teachers had now come to understand the Code pretty well, cumbrous though it was; and he was not sure that it was not expedient, for some time to come, to make as few alterations in it as possible. This year there had, practically, been no alteration made that was worthy of the attention of the Committee, with only two slight exceptions. In the discussion which took place, some time ago, attention was called to the recitation regulation. He confessed that, for one, he did not look with favour upon the idea of children reciting long pieces of poetry, because the children mechanically repeated the words without understanding them. Attempts had been made to adapt the poem to be recited to the children’s understanding; and, as a result of that effort, he found that in one town the piece favoured was “Johnny Gilpin’s Ride to Edmonton.” Amusing as that ballad was, it could hardly be said to be of a such a character as to justify a payment from the Consolidated Fund. In the result, the part of the Code which necessitated the recitation of a poem was struck out. The Chairman of the Cookery Committee at South Kensington had been in communication with the Department, and wished them to introduce something into the Code on the subject of cooking.

Doubtless, there was no branch of practical science in which the humbler classes more required instruction than in cooking; but the Department had not yet been able to meet the views of those who wished a course of practical cooking to be inserted in the Code. There was considerable difficulty in the way. In the first place, schools had not the necessary apparatus; in the second place, they had no proper test of results; and, next, it would be rather hard to impose upon the Inspectors the necessity of tasting every experiment of the children in practical cookery. He had no doubt, however, that in course of time they would be able to overcome this difficulty. Therefore, there had, practically, been no alteration in the Code during the year 1878. They had only now to estimate what the increase of children in attendance would be, and if the efficiency of the children was likely to improve; and they estimated that the increase would be 9 per cent, or 178,000 children, which brought up the average attendance to 2,717,800. They also estimated there would be an increase of 6*d.* per head in the grant earned, which raised the rate to 15*s.* 9*d.* per head. Those two increases, taken together, brought up their Estimate to £2,481,168, being an increase of £334,804 over the original Estimate of last year. Of that amount, £315,000 went directly in new grants to schools, and the remainder, £19,000, went in payments to Training Colleges and the employment of additional Inspectors, which was necessitated by the increased number of children they had to examine. Now, he had already compared the results of the examination of the school-year, ending August, 1878, with those of the preceding year; and, interesting as those comparisons were in one sense, they were, it seemed to him, a little wide of the mark; because what they had to consider was not what progress was made in one year or another, but how far the educational supply met the actual wants of the country. Probably, the first point on which the Committee would like information would be in reference to the accommodation supplied. At the present moment there was school accommodation for 3,950,000 children. The school supply in the last 10 years had increased 95 per cent, and the actual number of children who ought to be at school had only increased 9 per cent.

Lord George Hamilton

Applying the test to the whole population of England within the area of the school districts, they calculated that 3,400,000 children ought to be in constant attendance in the schools—that was, assuming that compulsion was universal throughout England and Wales—as a matter of fact, only 2,700,000 were in actual attendance. The accommodation, therefore, already provided was 500,000 places in excess of what the average attendance should be, and 1,300,000 in excess of what the average attendance was. He mentioned these figures, because the other day, somewhat unexpectedly, a discussion came on; and when he stated that, except in certain large towns, the supply was sufficient, his contention was somewhat disputed. No doubt, in the large towns, and particularly in London parishes, fresh schools would have to be erected, because the distribution was not equal throughout England and Wales; but, still, as every year the school supply was increasing in a greater ratio than the children who had to go to school, he thought they might arrive at the practical conclusion that the school accommodation was, or very shortly would be, quite sufficient to accommodate all the children who ought to be at school. Assuming, then, that all the children were at school who ought to be, they had next to consider how many teachers were required. They estimated that 33,000 teachers would be required. They had at the present moment 28,235 certificated teachers, 5,700 students, and upwards of 31,000 pupil teachers; so that the supply of teachers was ample for present wants; and considering the number who annually applied to be admitted to the ranks of certificated teachers, he thought they might go a step further, and say they would have sufficient for all their prospective wants. This was not to be wondered at, because the position of no class of persons had been so much improved within the last 10 years as that of the elementary school teachers. In 1870, the average salary of the masters was £95 12*s.* 9*d.*, and in 1878 it was £118 14*s.* 3*d.*; whilst in the same period the average salary of the mistresses had risen from £57 16*s.* 5*d.* to £71 2*s.* 2*d.* Last year, in the discussion of the Education Estimates, many hon. Members represented to him that there were great complaints made, not only on the part of the teachers, but also on the part of the managers, in consequence of the large number of Returns they had to furnish; and they especially indicated a certain Return which had to be made to the local authorities, which entailed much trouble and took up a great amount of time. He thereupon undertook to go into the question of Returns, and to reduce them as far as possible. He found that, valuable as they were, they did entail considerable labour on the teachers; and, therefore, after consultation with those who were well able to advise him on the subject, he came to the conclusion that they might altogether abolish that class of Returns. Therefore, the teachers had been relieved of the Returns of which they most complained. Well, then, as the school accommodation was in the greater part of England sufficient, and as the teaching power was also adequate, the next point they had to consider was whether the machinery for bringing the children to school was sufficient? The population of England and Wales was about 22,700,000, according to the Census of 1871, of which upwards of 13,000,000 were under school boards, and 9,500,000 under school attendance committees. As regarded the figures he had just mentioned, these, no doubt, were the figures of 1871; but in one sense that did not interfere with the effect of his argument, because the population of 1871 was divided, as it was now, into a rural and an urban population; and he was pointing out to the Committee that, assuming those figures existed at the moment, it would be found that of the population of England 16,000,000 were at the present moment under bye-laws, and that during the past year nearly 2,000,000 had placed themselves under the operation of compulsory bye-laws. Perhaps it would interest the Committee to know that the last parish which had unanimously adopted compulsory attendance was the parish of Hughenden. Therefore, at this moment there were under compulsory bye-laws no less than 70 per cent of the total population of England and Wales. The number of children, as he had before stated, who ought to be in attendance was 3,400,000, and the number they estimated who would be in attendance this year was 2,700,000; so that there was a very considerable gap between the number of those who were and the number of those who ought to be regularly at school. That might, undoubtedly, be accounted for by various reasons. Certain of his hon. Friends suggested last year the expediency of passing a short Bill by which compulsory attendance should be enforced throughout the whole of England. No doubt they would gain something in point of uniformity and symmetry if they adopted that course; but, on the other hand, hon. Gentlemen must recollect that the main cause of the success of the Education Acts of 1870 and 1876 was that they had been able to carry local opinion with them, and the local authorities had worked with them, and not against them. At the present moment, no doubt, there was a certain repugnance in certain rural parishes against the adoption of compulsory bye-laws; and if the House were to attempt to enforce compulsory attendance by Statute there would be very considerable difficulty in carrying it out. Therefore, he thought it was preferable to wait, in the certain hope that year by year the number of parishes in which compulsion was not in force would diminish. He thought he might say that as they had accommodation, teaching-power, and local organization, the account he had given was satisfactory. He believed they had made greater progress in developing their system of elementary education during the past few years than had ever been done by any nation before. But, of course, that had entailed a certain additional expenditure; and he now asked the attention of the Committee for a moment or two whilst he placed before them what that expenditure was. In the year 1870, previous to the introduction of the Elementary Education Act, there were 1,225,000 children in average attendance. In the year under review there were 2,560,000; so that the average attendance had more than doubled in eight years. The expenditure connected with the maintenance of schools in 1870 was £1,525,000. In 1878, excluding all expenditure connected with the interest on loans and the expenses of the administration of school boards, the expenditure connected with the maintenance of schools was £4,354,000. Dividing those amounts by the numbers of children in average attendance, they found that in 1870 the average expenditure per child was £1 5s., and in 1878, £1 15s. The Government grant, eight years back, was 9s. 9d. per child in average attendance; last year it was 15s. 3d.; in the present year it would be 15s. 9d. In the discussion on the Estimates last year, certain hon. Gentlemen, and, he believed, two right hon. Gentlemen opposite, impressed upon him the necessity of economizing, as far as possible, the grant annually voted to education by Parliament, and of considering the expediency of placing some limitation upon the amount which was annually so voted. Now, there were two causes for the rapid increase of that Parliamentary grant. The first was, that every year there were more children to be educated. They knew the number who ought to be at school; they knew the number who were there. Every year the margin between the two was diminishing; so that he had very little doubt that in a very short time they would, practically, have at school all who ought to be there. Then the growth of the grant would practically end, except so far as the increase of the population was concerned. The other main cause of the increase of the grant was the abolition of the limitation that was imposed in preceding Codes. His noble Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Viscount Sandon) removed that limitation, and at the present moment, provided after 15s. per head had been earned by the children in average attendance there was a certain income derived from substitutions for fees, there was, practically, no limitation to the amount they could obtain from the Parliamentary grant. How rapid the growth had been of the sum annually earned by the children was instanced by the figures he had just given, which showed that in the nine years—1870 to 1879—the annual grant per child had risen from 9s. 9d. to 15s. 9d. In the Report they had issued this year there was one paragraph which he believed had caused great concern to the managers of the board schools—

“The time has possibly come when it may be necessary for us, in certain particulars, to revise a part of the annual grant.”

The annual grant, as at present payable, might be divided into two heads. Previously to the Revised Code of 1862, the grant was, practically, a capitation grant, and then it was converted by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) into a system of payment by results. Still, a considerable portion of the capitation grant remained; so much was paid on average attendance. Now, that seemed to him to be the part of the grant to which it was necessary to direct their attention, if any reduction was to be made. He thought it would be hard at present, when there was so much distress in the country, and when there would naturally be great difficulty in raising the necessary subscriptions, if they were to permanently, with a stroke of the pen, diminish the income of the voluntary schools. On the other hand, they ought to let school managers know that they must not imagine, as a matter of course, that they were every year to obtain more money from the Parliamentary grant, and that the conditions were in no way to be altered. It seemed to him that, as regarded that part of the grant called the capitation grant, the course they ought to adopt was to apply some test to the children before it was paid. He could illustrate what he meant by referring to the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), which proposed to reduce the grant by £100,000, referring, no doubt, to the sum that was paid for teaching music. He would suppose that all the schools claimed this part of the grant to give instruction in music, and, as a matter of fact, the Returns laid before Parliament showed that this grant for music was, practically, a capitation grant, as nearly 99 per cent of the children attending obtained it; and he thought it was a very fair matter for consideration in subsequent years whether or not they ought to attach some condition to the payment of that particular part of the capitation grant, by which the children should be required to have really some musical instruction and knowledge. That was the direction in which he thought they ought to go. He did not think they ought summarily to reduce without notice the grant which was payable to the managers of the different schools. At the same time, it should be distinctly understood that the Department considered themselves at liberty from year to year to make such alterations as they chose, and as might affect the sum previously obtained by any school. He knew that certain hon. Gentlemen thought they could not spend too much on education; and, therefore, any proposal by which a reduction or limitation of expenditure might be effected would necessarily lower the efficiency of the education given. To those who held that opinion there was a very instructive little paragraph in the table of statistics published annually by the Education Department. It might be found on page 10, and it was, perhaps, the most compact and informational paragraph in the Return. They would there find what the expenditure per child of the different classes of schools was, and what fees were paid by the children attending them. The cost of maintaining a child in a board school throughout England was £2 1s. 10d. That rate was abnormally raised by the expenditure of the London School Board, which amounted to £2 13s. 5d. per child, whilst the average expenditure of other school boards was £1 17s. 4d. But the cost under any of the school boards was considerably in excess of the cost of maintaining children in any of the voluntary schools. The schools connected with the Church of England expended £1 13s. 10d. per child; the British and other schools unconnected with the Church of England, £1 14s. 11d.; the Wesleyan schools £1 13s.; and the Roman Catholic schools £1 10s. Therefore, the first fact brought prominently before them was that the cost of maintenance in board schools, and particularly in the London board schools, was very much in excess of the expenditure in voluntary schools. The second fact, which was also made very apparent, was that there was a great difference in the fees paid by the children in these different classes of schools, taken in relation to the contributions which were made in support of these schools. The sources of income of all schools were—first, the Parliamentary grant; secondly, the school fees; and, thirdly, the voluntary subscriptions or contributions from the rates. Excluding for the moment the Parliamentary grant, they found, taking only the fees and voluntary contributions, the following results:—The fees paid by children in Church of England schools were, as near as possible, equal to the subscriptions and the endowments of those schools. The fees paid by Roman Catholic children were, to a very small fraction, identical with the subscriptions and endowments of those schools. The fees paid by British and Wesleyan scholars were more than double the subscriptions in support of those schools. On the other hand, the fees paid by children at board schools were very considerably less than half the contributions from the rates to their maintenance. Therefore, they found, first, that the cost of maintenance in the board schools, particularly in London, was far in excess of the cost of maintenance in other schools; second, that the fees paid under the more costly system were far less than under the more economical. But when they came to test results they did not find that the more expensive system was better than the less expensive one. The competition was very remarkable. In 1877 it was very close, and the board schools beat the voluntary schools by 1d., earning a Government grant of 14s. 5d. as compared with 14s. 4d. earned by the voluntary schools. In 1878, the voluntary schools turned the tables on the board schools, and beat them by 1d., having earned 15s. 2d., to 15s. 1d. There was another fact, which was rather remarkable, with reference to the expenditure in these different schools. As might have been expected, owing to the exceptional distress in all branches of trade, the subscriptions to the voluntary schools had greatly fallen off. There was only one denomination whose subscriptions had not fallen off—namely, the Roman Catholic. Considering the poverty of the population they had to educate, it was greatly to the credit of the Roman Catholics that they were able to return such good results for so moderate an expenditure. He wished now to point out what, in his judgment, were the defects in the present system of education. His noble Friend the present President of the Board of Trade very properly, some years ago, provided a Schedule of special or specific subjects to be added to the voluntary subjects taught in the elementary schools—those were the subjects in Schedule 4. So long as they had a system of voluntary education there could apparently be no objection to adding any number of special subjects to be taught in schools, because, if the results justified the extra expenditure which was incurred, the managers of schools would continue that expenditure. They would say—“We will only teach those subjects when we can afford to do so." They considered the subjects indicated by the Education Department as subjects for instruction when it was possible to give it. Therefore, they had to consider whether or not they could afford it; and, if they could, they made provision for that instruction. But in the case of particular school boards, like the London School Board, these specific or special subjects were regarded from an entirely different position. The school boards, having the rates behind them to meet their expenditure, provided masters competent to teach these subjects at great cost. But it must be apparent to everyone that it was absolutely impossible that the vast mass of children attending their elementary schools—whether voluntary or board schools—could have either the time or the capacity to pass through the special subjects which had been added to the compulsory subjects in the Code. That fact was very clearly illustrated by some figures contained in the Report. If the children were to learn as much as they could under these optional subjects, each child would obtain 8s. per head; whereas, in point of fact, the highest earning hitherto had been 11½d. per head. There was also another objection which must be apparent to those who had considered the letters which had been written in reference to the proceedings of the London School Board and other large school boards. Those school boards, of course, obtained the best teachers that they could. Many of the teachers were placed in schools where the fees were very low on account of the poverty of the district, and where they depended for a large proportion of their salary on the various examinations which were held. Consequently, it was to the interest of the masters to bring into the schools children of a higher class, for whom those schools were not intended. The question which they had to consider was, how to remove those defects? He thought that it would be very unwise to prescribe any wholesale remedy. It seemed to him that they ought, if possible, to bring a perfectly sound but, at the same time, a compact elementary education within the reach of every child, that they should, if possible, apportion the cost of that education to the means of the parents, and also that they should give ample opportunities to those children who, either by their industry or their capacity, or by their aspirations, might wish to avail themselves of a more advanced or higher education. It did not, however, appear to him to be reasonable to expect that every child who attended an elementary school should pass through all the subjects which had been added to the Code. At the present moment their system of secondary schools was rapidly improving; and, in his opinion, they ought to endeavour to grade their elementary schools, and to make the character of the elementary education given in them dependent, so far as possible, upon the fees paid. In the majority of school districts in England there were only one or two schools; and the character of the instruction given in those schools, as well as the class of children educated, would be so similar, that it would be difficult to grade these schools. But in the large towns, like London, Manchester, Liverpool, and Birmingham, where they had the advantage of very able school boards, it would be possible for them to move in that direction if they only received encouragement from the Education Department. They would be able to grade their schools to a certain extent, and to give opportunities to the poorer children to pass from the cheaper into the more expensive schools. In the past year a remarkable feat was performed by a boy who had been in an elementary school, and who in the course of a very few years passed through the school, and obtained a Scholarship in one of the older Universities. That fact seemed to him rather to indicate the direction in which they ought to go. Of course, they ought not hastily to attempt to proceed in any wholesale manner; but if those interested in educational matters would carefully consider the suggestion he had thrown out, and would endeavour to secure co-operation in that direction in the various great centres of population in England, he did not believe that the task which he had somewhat briefly indicated would be beyond their power to achieve. He begged to thank the Committee for having listened to him with so much patience; and he would only, in conclusion, say that it seemed to him that if they could work in the direction he had indicated he believed they would secure the most efficacious means of making their elementary schools lead to their Universities, and would provide a thoroughly sound system of national education in all its branches and in all its phases.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, that the noble Lord had instituted a comparison between the results obtained that year and the preceding year. He thought that to obtain a proper comparison he should go a little further back, as it would be interesting to the Committee to know what had been the effect of the legislation. While the accommodation and the number of children upon the register had both increased 123 per cent in 10 years, the average number of children in attendance had only increased 127 per cent. The result of that was, that the average attendance had only just kept pace with the increase of accommodation in the schools. It was a satisfactory thing to find that they had 127 per cent more children in average attendance than they had 10 years ago. But it was not so satisfactory when they remembered that the attendance had increased only in the same proportion as the accommodation. It should be remembered that they had introduced compulsory bye-laws, and it was confidently expected that larger numbers would be driven into the schools, which had proved to be the case. The noble Lord had astonished him by saying that, at the present time, the amount of accommodation for children exceeded by 500,000 what it need be.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON wished to explain that what he had said did not refer to the populous localities or large towns. Taking the total amount of accommodation throughout England, the result would be as he had stated.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, that, of course, he made allowance for that. He found that, from the Report of the Education Department in 1878, it was calculated the total number of children for whom it was necessary to provide accommodation in elementary schools was 4,899,000; and the Report went on to say that it was not to be expected that all these children would be put to school; and allowing, therefore, for that fact, seven-tenths of that accommodation would be sufficient. He ventured to say that was not the case; for if they turned to the Report of the Committee of 1878, on the first page would be found the statement that, whereas the average attendance during the scholastic year was 2,405,000 per diem, yet that 2,944,000 children were present on the day of examination. It was obvious that they ought to provide accommodation for the maximum number that might be present on any one day, when the number was greatly in excess of the average attendance. He hoped that the noble Lord would not rest satisfied with the present proportion of attendance. He found that at present they had accommodation for 3,492,000 children, whereas they had an average attendance of 2,405,000 children. The result, therefore, showed that if they were speaking in a manufacturing sense they would say that the schools had been working little more than half-time, and he did not see why they should not express in that manner their sentiments with regard to education. He wished that the noble Lord would look a little more kindly at the proposal to draw more children into the schools than could be done under the present system. The noble Lord seemed to throw every obstacle in the way of trying an experiment in the direction of increasing the attendance of children, and had, on the contrary, spoken of still further raising the school fees. Was it not worth while to consider whether the result they desired to bring about could not be achieved by lowering or abolishing the fees altogether? He did not, however, suppose that there would be any chance in that House of establishing universal free schools; but where the local authorities were willing to try the experiment they might do so. He thought that the Department should promote this, and not, as at present, reject all such proposals. Why should the country pursue a course with regard to education which no other country pursued? In all other countries, both Transatlantic and Continental, the tendency was either to lower or to abolish the fees altogether. He thought that the same experiment should be promoted in the education of this country, wherever such a thing was possible; but now, whenever a school board proposed to establish a cheap school, objection was at once raised, because it was supposed that the interests of the denominational schools would be injuriously affected. He was convinced that if the fees were generally reduced it would draw children into the schools, and, at the same time, the average attendance would come up in a much greater degree to the total amount of accommodation. He would now pass on to consider the results which had been already achieved. He always looked at the Return which gave the number of children passing Standards 4 and 6 as very important. The education obtained by children who did not come up to Standard 4 was not of a very high character. He confessed that it was a somewhat humiliating thing to find that during the last 18 months only 218,000 children passed in these Standards, being only $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the children upon the register, and only 9 per cent of the children in average attendance at the schools. Assuming that the same number would ultimately pass in future years as in the years he had quoted, the fact would remain that less than one-fifth of the total number of the children on the register would receive any education worthy of the name. He was glad to find—and in that he differed from the noble Lord—that the educational results in the board schools were better than the results in the ordinary Church schools. The noble Lord had told them that the board schools were more expensive than the Church schools; but the excess of expenditure on the board schools was only about 10 per cent over the expenditure of the denominational schools. As almost the whole of the board schools were in towns they, of necessity, cost much more than the denominational schools in the country. Taking that into account, the difference of 10 per cent between the cost of the two kinds of schools was very trifling, and was nothing more than might be expected. He thought the result showed very great economy in the administration of board schools. The noble Lord had also told them that the more expensive system of board schools did not give better results than the voluntary system. He tested the system by the results as shown in the earnings of the two classes of schools; but to depend upon the savings only as a test of results was not fair to the board schools; because, assuming that they were new schools, in the first year or two of their establishment they might not obtain a very large attendance. It was only after two or three years that the test of attendance became fair. The noble Lord would find that the total percentage of children who passed in all standards had risen since 1872, 15·09 per cent in the board schools, and were now. The per centage in the Church schools had, on the other hand, decreased in the corresponding eight years, and stood now at 9 per cent. He did not mean to say that the Church schools were less efficient than they were in 1871; but the examinations were more stringent than they were, and it was the fact that they had not shown any marked advance at all, while the board schools were advancing, and had shown better results than the denominational schools. The results of the board schools, according to these calculations, were 10 per cent better than those of the denominational schools; and if they cost only about 10 per cent more than the denominational schools the country might congratulate itself upon getting a fair return for its money. The noble Lord had alleged that the increase in the Government grant was due to the increase being made upon the capitation grant. [Lord GEORGE HAMILTON: The abolition of the capitation grant.] Including the amount for infants, the capitation grant now amounted to about 8s. on the total amount per head, the increase in the total sum received being in the grant for examination, which had risen from 4s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 6s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. He thought they had some reason to congratulate themselves upon the results already achieved, although he thought that they might be more satisfactory in many respects. He was bound, however, to say that he did not think the Department had any right to take credit for the results that had been effected; for some of their recent actions had been rather in the direction of obstructing where they ought to have promoted, and of promoting where they ought to have rejected. If the present policy of the Education Department were continued, it would become the most doctrinaire and the most centralizing of all the Departments of the Government. There seemed to be an attempt—though he would not lay it upon the shoulders of the noble Lord—to stereotype education throughout the country; and he could not conceive anything which would be more fatal to the interests of education. He would only give one or two illustrations of what he had advanced. In the case of the Birmingham School Board

they wished to employ female teachers. The Department at first refused to allow them to do so; but, eventually, the noble Lord consented, and since that time female teachers had been employed by the Board. Although the Birmingham School Board was able, from its size and importance, to obtain the reversal of the decision of the Department, yet the small boards throughout the country would no more think of resisting the decree of the Department than of flying, and thus the Department would destroy all that liberty and that freedom in education which would produce the most beneficial results. He was very glad to find that the Birmingham School Board were not only permitted to employ female teachers, but had converted the Education Department to their views. In the Report of the Department, they stated that there were at present a large number of school mistresses employed in elementary schools who were at once the most suitable and most efficient teachers for two-thirds of the children attending those schools. It was also said that the Department most entirely sympathized with the remarks recently made by the Minister of Education in Japan. But he should like to know when the Department was converted to the views of a Minister of Education in Japan, and what made them now entertain his opinion that it was a desirable thing to have as many women teachers as possible in elementary schools? How was it, if they entertained those views, that they objected to the employment of female teachers by the Birmingham School Board, although they now alleged that the proposal had met with their entire approval? The questions in which the Department chiefly interfered were those concerning the building of schools; and the views there put forward were of the most absurd description. While he had the honour to occupy the position of Chairman of the Birmingham School Board, they proposed to build an infant school with a semi-circular bay, as being the most convenient form for the teachers to observe and direct the school. The Education Department said that they could not permit a school to be constructed with a semi-circular bay, and that it must be a square bay. He could not conceive the policy which dictated that sort of interference, and which refused to permit experiments which might be continued to very useful results. Recently the Department had also interfered in a more serious manner. They had interfered in what they styled "the interests of economy." He wished to put it to the noble Lord that he had no business to interfere between the ratepayers and their authorized representatives. The whole principle of the Education Act of 1870 was, in his opinion, that education was to be carried out, within certain limits, by boards representing the majority of the ratepayers in each district. If the boards incurred an excessive expenditure, the ratepayers had their remedy, for they could turn the board out, and supply its place by men of more economical views. But if, on the other hand, the expenditure met with the approval and consent of the ratepayers, why should the noble Lord come down and reverse the decision of the majority of the ratepayers? In Birmingham a strong contest had taken place with respect to the action of the School Board; and the ratepayers, by an overwhelming majority, had expressed their approval of the action of the Board. With the full consent of their ratepayers, they had built schools which would be a credit to any school board in the Kingdom. They had not wasted the money of the ratepayers; but they had thought it right that the schools should be ornamental, and they had also thought it right to provide a fitting home for the work which they were to carry on. Their work had been submitted to the public, and in the election the ratepayers of Birmingham, by an enormous majority, had given their entire approval to the action of the board. To take another instance, he would draw attention to the architect's department. Of the gentleman who occupied the position of architect to the Education Department he wished to say nothing ill; but he did not think that he was likely to be a person whose practice or experience was likely to be greater than that of the local architects employed by the different boards throughout the country, who were generally gentlemen at the head of their Profession. It was too much to expect gentlemen of that kind to submit their plans to the official who undertook to be the architect of the whole Kingdom. A plan of the architect to the Birmingham School Board was submitted to the architect of the Department, who said that he would not approve of it, because the design was too expensive. He was asked what alteration he would suggest, and thereupon he took a ruler from his desk, and ruled off every projection from the school building until he had left it a brick block. Then he said—"That is the plan for an elementary school." In his opinion, such conduct as that was insulting to the architect, and insulting to the school board of Birmingham, and it was also insulting to the ratepayers, who had approved of the action and conduct of the board. He had one other representation to make against the Department over which the noble Lord so ably presided—namely, that the Department had interfered in numbers of cases where it ought not to have done so, and had not interfered in many cases where it was their duty to do so. The other day a Question was asked of the noble Lord with reference to the Horley school board, which was presided over by the vicar of the parish. The board refused to appoint the only candidate for a female teachership, on the ground that she was a Baptist. The noble Lord, from his answer, wished the House to infer that there was no general bann against the employment of a Nonconformist by the Horley school board; he also said that he had so many complaints with regard to that particular matter that he did not think it right to interfere. He (Mr. Chamberlain) would have thought that if he had had so many complaints he ought to have interfered. He would challenge the noble Lord to produce one case in which a school board, where there was a Nonconformist majority, had refused to appoint teachers who were not Nonconformists. Of course, such instances might exist in the annals of the Education Department; but no such case had ever come to his knowledge. In the case of the Horley school board it was admitted, by all the members of the board, that the female candidate was well qualified for the position; but the vicar of the parish objected to a Nonconformist being appointed. It was observed that if it had not been intended to appoint a Nonconformist that should have been mentioned in the advertisement, and he fully agreed with that.

As it was, the unfortunate girl was sent back to her parents on account of her religion; and the same board also rejected a youth who was a candidate for a pupil scholarship on precisely similar grounds. If it had been intended to make religious belief a disqualification for the appointments, then that should have been indicated. He thought that wherever instances of the rejection of candidates on the ground of religious belief occurred the noble Lord would be justified, by common sense and by the good feeling of the country, in interfering to stop them. He sincerely hoped that the noble Lord would take the remarks which he had made in good part, and that he would allow school boards as much liberty of action as possible, as he believed that in that way the real interests of education would be best served.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that at that hour it was utterly impossible to discuss in an adequate manner the very important questions raised by the speech of the noble Lord. He hoped, therefore, that the Committee would not be taken to have assented to all the proposals of the noble Lord; but, at the same time, he did not wish it to be understood that he expressed his disapproval of them. He agreed with the noble Lord that economy ought to be considered as well as the improvement of education; but he would remind the noble Lord that, in 1876, the Government gave up what he believed to be the greatest safeguard to economy, as they would find day by day and month by month—namely, that each locality should find as much money as the Department. He was aware that that had been given up, because it had caused a good deal of difficulty to the noble Lord. With regard to the question of fees, he agreed that there would be a great advantage in grading schools in large towns; but it would be utterly impossible if the noble Lord carried out the intention he had foreshadowed in the debate upon the London School Board. He believed that by grading the schools what they wished to see would be accomplished; and the whole of the middle and working classes would be willing to send their children to the board schools, and pay for the better education of their children. They desired to provide a better education for the children as far as possible; but he agreed that it should be paid for by the parents. He had no further remark to make, except to express his concurrence with the views of the hon. Member for Birmingham, that the Education Department was not working as well as could be wished. He thought that it was in danger of becoming too much destrinaire. It seemed to him that there were two points to which special attention was required in the conduct of the Department. He did not wish, in any way, to blame either the permanent Chiefs or the noble Lord; but he was only pointing out the difficulties they had to contend with. In the first place, he doubted whether inspections were as carefully conducted, or the Inspectors so carefully chosen, as they might be. The noble Lord should remember that inspection was becoming more difficult by the progress of education. They required the schools to be better inspected, both in knowledge and in educational teaching, than they were before. He thought also that, speaking generally, the Department was interfering with school boards and with the managers of schools more than it might. He hoped that the Department would not throw difficulties in the way of the labours of the school boards by seeming to think that it was necessary for them to decide whether any new school was necessary or whether it was not.

Vote agreed to.

Resolution to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. RAMSAY objected to so important a Vote being taken immediately before 6 o'clock, and moved that Progress be reported.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow;

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [29th July] reported.

MR. J. HOLMS had understood that the Government had promised not to take the Vote for the Consular Service until they had laid certain Papers with reference to it before the House. He found, however, that the Vote had been passed.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON did not think that there was any such understanding on the part of the Government; but he believed that the Papers in question would soon be in the hands of hon. Members. He hoped, therefore, that no objection would now be made. He would take that opportunity of correcting an error into which he fell in giving an answer to a question with reference to the salary of one of the Directors of the Suez Canal. He fell into the mistake of saying that during his absence from England, and while acting as Minister to the Khedive, Mr. Rivers Wilson also received his salary as a Director of the Suez Canal. He wished now to state that he found, on inquiry, that that gentleman did not receive his salary as a Director of the Suez Canal during his absence from England.

THE LUNACY LAWS—LEGISLATION.
QUESTION.

LORD ABERDARE asked the Lord Chancellor, Whether it was his intention to introduce a Bill amending the Lunacy Laws?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply, said, that Her Majesty's Government were anxious to introduce a Bill to consolidate the Lunacy Laws, and in doing so to make certain Amendments not of any great importance, but which experience had shown to be desirable in the existing Statute Law; but he need not say that at this period of the Session, and in the present state of Public Business, it was impossible for the Government to introduce a measure having that object during the present Session.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BILL.

(No. 7.)

(The Earl De La Warr.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Adjourned Debate on Motion for Second Reading resumed (according to Order).

EARL DE LA WARR said, that the debate had been adjourned several times, in order that the measure of the Government on the same subject which had been introduced in the Commons might have come up and have been considered by their Lordships with this Bill. But this, he regretted, had not been the case. The subject with which the Bill dealt was one of great importance, affecting, as it did, the interests of a large number of the industrial classes of this country. In the existing state of the law, Companies and other employers of labour got rid of all liability to workmen injured in their employment by appointing a manager to act for them, and the object of this Bill was to make Companies and all employers of labour in mines and railways or other occupations, liable in the same way that masters were already liable by law for accident or injury sustained in their services through negligence or want of due precaution on their part. There was a strong feeling out-of-doors in favour of the measure, and numerous Petitions had been presented in favour of its becoming law. For these reasons, he thought their Lordships might well give a second reading to the Bill in order that it might be considered in Committee.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR wished to take that opportunity of expressing his thanks to his noble Friend for the course he had taken on previous occasions in postponing this Bill in order that their Lordships might have the advantage—if it could have been so arranged—of having before them the Bill on the same subject proposed by Her Majesty's Government in the other House of Parliament; but that had not been possible, and he hoped that the noble Earl would, on the present occasion, adopt the same course he had previously taken. The subject was, unquestionably, one which occupied a good deal of attention on the part of the working classes of the country; it also occupied the attention of the great employers of labour, and those who had embarked a large amount of capital in industrial undertakings; and, obviously, every word which might be used in a measure dealing with a question of this kind would have to be scanned and considered with the greatest care. The matter had been taken up by Her Majesty's Government, who had referred the whole subject to the inquiry of a Select Committee, who took a great deal of evidence, and they had also introduced a Bill on the subject in the other House. A measure dealing with the question, and identical with that of the noble Earl—Employers Liability for Injuries to Servants Bill—had also been brought forward in "another place" by private Members. He did not see how it would be possible for their Lordships to enter upon a discussion of the matter until they had these Bills before them; and the opinion of Parliament upon them, and upon the subject generally, could not be fairly obtained at this period of the Session. He might take the present opportunity, however, of stating that the Bill of the Government was founded upon the recommendations of the Select Committee who inquired into the question; while the measure of the noble Earl was framed in accordance with the recommendations of that Committee; but he believed that the Bill of his noble Friend was framed on a Report composed by a Member of the Committee, but which was not adopted. In these circumstances, it was not going too far to say that their Lordships would not be in a position to decide until they had the Bill of the Government before them; and there was no hope of this in the present Session. He thought he could show his noble Friend that, in its present form, this Bill was not workable. He should be sorry to ask their Lordships to reject the Bill of his noble Friend—his case was that they had not time to consider it; and if his noble Friend did not move the discharge of the Order, he would ask their Lordships to allow him to move the Previous Question.

LORD NORTON said, that the difference between the Bill of the Government and the Bill of the noble Earl was one of degree, and not of principle. They were much agreed on principle. An employer's common-law liability for injury done by his servant might be too wide; but the Judgment of 1837, removing all liability to a servant for injury by undefined fellow-servants, relieved the employer from liability too much. The Scotch Courts were more favourable to servants; and in England the workmen had an undeniable and palpable grievance in being deprived of all remedy, even when the master had been distinctly to blame for his injury, and when he was injured while following the express orders of his master. The release of a master from such responsibility was greater than justice required or could excuse. Employers were legally responsible for the due care of those exercising their full authority, and that their machinery was in order. With these two conditions fulfilled, no compensation for injury was due from them to an injured servant; nor in any case, so far as the servant's own negligence contributed to his injury. But for injuries caused by the non-fulfilment of these conditions they ought to be liable to their servants as to anyone else. The Government Bill defined employers so as to include Companies, and made servants exercising the employer's full authority implicate him in the ordinary liability of qui facit per alium facit per se. It was a great pity this Bill had not even been discussed, as it might have been if introduced in that House. The existing interpretation of the law was admittedly unsatisfactory; but what was the exact remedy for the grievance he was not prepared to say. Their Lordships might have to fall back in questions of injury in service to the test of express warranties; but the present law exposed employers to needless odium, and servants in some cases to most unjustifiable deprivation of their due.

EARL DE LA WARR, yielding to the request made by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, said, he would move the discharge of the Order, in the hope that the Government would take the earliest possible opportunity of bringing the Bill forward next Session.

Motion and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(No. 162.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR expressed regret that he should have been unable to insert any clause into the measure dealing with its operation on the Borders of England and Scotland. The reason he felt he could not introduce such a clause was this—that he feared that, by doing so at this late period of the Session, he should incur the risk of its not being returned from the Commons in sufficient time to enable it to pass this year. He, however, proposed to introduce a separate measure for Scotland.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, he was aware of the great inconvenience arising from the fact of warrants and citations on the Borders being ineffective if the offender got across the line; and, therefore, he was sorry to hear the noble and learned Earl's statement. He thought a clause to meet the case might have been inserted in the Bill without difficulty. That had not been done, however; but as it was imperatively necessary that some steps should be taken, he wished to know when the Bill mentioned by the noble and learned Earl would be brought in?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the Bill would be laid on the Table at once, and he would ask leave to move the second reading to-morrow.

Further Amendments made; and Bill to be read 3^d To-morrow.

And, afterwards—

BORDER SUMMONS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to provide for the service of summons in the Border Counties—Was presented by The Lord CHANCELLOR; read 1st. (No. 170.)

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (POWERS OF SCHOOL BOARDS) BILL—(No. 135.) (The Lord Steward.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD NORTON said, that at first he entertained great doubts about the Bill, which he defied anyone to understand by merely reading it; but it appeared to be its object to give school boards powers to contribute to, or erect industrial schools, and to borrow money for that purpose. They ought to be very cautious of giving school boards increased powers of spending money. At the present time they were recklessly spending, and there was no other body in the country which possessed such unchecked powers; they were endeavouring to introduce into the elementary schools the same kind of education that was given in secondary schools, and to crush out the voluntary elementary schools. They required watching; but he was informed that the actual effect of this Bill would really be to economize their work in the most essential part of it—provision for the most neglected children. He should have liked to revert to the approval of the Education Department in preference to that of the Secretary of State, as industrial schools ought not to be part of Home Office or prison administration; and on the third reading he would move an Amendment directed to that point.

The Lord Chancellor

EARL BEAUCHAMP pointed out that the purpose of the Bill was to enable school boards to do directly and effectually what they were already indirectly authorized to do by the Industrial Schools Act and Elementary Education Acts, and to give power to Guardians to contribute towards the maintenance of a child in a certified industrial school in the same manner as if they were a school board.

EARL FORTESCUE remarked, that there had been too easy an acquiescence in the expenditure by the school boards.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Power of School Board to borrow for contribution towards or undertaking cost of, enlarging, &c., industrial schools).

EARL FORTESCUE moved an Amendment, the effect of which was to limit the making of loans extended over a great many years to sums raised for permanent works, and to prevent its applying to sums to be expended on furniture.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Power of Guardians to contribute to maintenance of child in industrial school) agreed to.

Further Amendments made: the Report thereof to be received To-morrow.

COMPANIES' ACTS AMENDMENT BILL (The Lord Aberdare.)

(NO. 71.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD ABERDARE moved that the Order be discharged. He said he did this because the Bill would require Amendments, which could not be made at this period of the Session.

Motion agreed to; Order discharged.

RAILWAY RETURNS (CONTINUOUS BRAKES) ACT, 1878.

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL DE LA WARR asked, Whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to lay on the Table a further Return by the Railway Companies of the United Kingdom, in pursuance of the Railway Returns (Continuous Brakes) Act, 1878? Up to the time of the last

Return most of the Companies had expressed themselves willing to take into their consideration this important question; but a very large proportion had taken few steps in the matter. He believed the Brighton Company had adopted a brake, and the Great Northern Company had made many experiments, but had come to no conclusion. Between 1870 and 1876, out of 1,234 accidents investigated by the officers of the Board of Trade, 952, or nearly four-fifths of the whole, might have been prevented, or their effects materially lessened, had there been continuous brakes. He also wished to ask, Whether there was any objection to lay on the Table any Correspondence which had taken place between the Railway Companies and the Board of Trade on the subject of brake power, and whether the London and North-Western Railway Company still refused to comply with the requirements of the Board of Trade?

LORD HENNIKER, in reply, said, a Return as to continuous brakes under the Act of last year—the Railway Returns (Continuous Brakes) Act—for the half-year ended June 30 was being tabulated and printed, and would be presented with the least possible delay—probably on Tuesday next. In reply to the further Question—of which his noble Friend the noble Earl had given him private Notice—namely,

“To ask if there is any objection to laying upon the Table of the House the Correspondence between the Board of Trade and Railway Companies relative to the use of brakes, and to ask whether the London and North-Western Railway Company still refuse to adopt the requirements of the Board of Trade?”

he had only to say that all the Correspondence between the Board of Trade and the Railway Companies on the use of continuous brakes was already before Parliament; and that from the Return received from the London and North-Western Railway Company for the first half of the year it appeared that they were still using a brake known as Clark and Webb's chain brake, which from the Returns did not appear to be continuous throughout the train or automatic in its action.

TREATY OF BERLIN—EASTERN ROUMELIA—THE EVACUATION.

QUESTION.

EARL STANHOPE asked, Whether his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had any information which would enable him to say that the evacuation of Eastern Roumelia by the Russians would be effected by the 3rd of August—the day stipulated in the Treaty?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in reply, said, that two or three days ago he received information from our Vice Consul at Burgas that the last Russian soldier had left the Province, and that the Province was entirely evacuated by the Russians.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION—REPRESENTATION OF SCOTLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been called to the Return, No. 223, of this Session, from which it appears that, as regards the present population of Scotland, it ought to have ten additional Members, as compared with the present population of England and Ireland respectively; and that, if the revenue derived from taxation were made the basis of representation, Scotland ought to have eighteen additional Members as compared with the revenue derived from taxation in England and Ireland respectively; and, whether, in distributing the vacant seats, he will take into consideration the just claims of Scotland to obtain additional Members?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, my attention has been continually drawn to the circumstances of Scotland by the Returns which were moved for by the hon. Gentleman. Undoubtedly, I have seen the Return to which he refers. I can only say, in regard to the second part of the Question, that whenever the time comes for distributing the vacant seats the just claims of Scotland, as of all other parts of the Kingdom, will be duly considered. I hardly think, however, that the changes proposed will be of the revolutionary character glanced at by the hon. Gentleman.

MINISTER OF COMMERCE AND AGRICULTURE.—QUESTION.

MR. W. HOLMS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What steps the Government intend to take in order to give effect to the Resolution of the House upon the Motion of the honourable Member for Plymouth—

“That it is desirable that those functions of the Executive Government which especially relate to Commerce and Agriculture should be administered by a distinct Department, under the direction of a Principal Secretary of State, who shall be a Member of the Cabinet?”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am afraid the only answer I can give is that the matter will receive the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (METROPOLIS).—QUESTIONS.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the Vice President of the Council, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table a Copy of the last Report of the London School Board upon Educational Endowments?

MR. A. MILLS said, before the noble Lord answered that Question he should like to know, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Report to which the Question of the hon. Member for Dundee refers is a folio volume of 486 pages?

MR. E. JENKINS rose to Order. He had asked a Question of the noble Lord, and he wished to know if it was regular or proper for any other hon. Member to interpose between the Question and the noble Lord's answer? It was quite open to the hon. Member to put his Question after the noble Lord replied.

MR. SPEAKER: As the Question of the hon. Member relates to the same matter it seems to me that he is in Order.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, when the hon. Member put his Question before he had no information on this subject; but he was now informed by a member of the Board that no regular Committee had been appointed by them on the subject of Educational Endowments of London. Since then, however, a large volume had been sent to the Education Office, from which it appeared that it had been the habit of a Committee appointed to inquire into various schemes of Educational Endowment to make various reports. These had been collected, and the result was a Blue Book of 480 pages. He did not think any object would be served by making it a Parliamentary Return, since any ratepayer could obtain it on application.

THE SCIENCE OF AGRICULTURE—MR. BUCKMASTER.—QUESTION.

MR. E. HUBBARD asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether his attention has been drawn to the interest with which the members of several Chambers of Agriculture have listened to the lectures of Mr. J. C. Buckmaster on the scheme of the Science and Art Department “for promoting instruction in the science of agriculture;” and, whether Mr. Buckmaster's services can be equally spared for the benefit of Farmers' Clubs and Associations in country parishes, not being Chambers of Agriculture, but desirous of information on the subject?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, he could quite understand that a lecture by Mr. Buckmaster on this subject would be of great interest, and if his hon. Friend wished Mr. Buckmaster's services to be more extensively availed of, he would undertake that any application to that effect should be considered by the Office.

NAVY—PUNISHMENT OF A SEAMAN AT SHEERNESS.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he has had the facts of the late court martial on board the Admiral's ship at Sheerness before him; whether he will state what was really done by the seaman; and, if he sees no reason, when it has been considered, to remit in some degree the apparent severity of the sentence?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, I have had all the facts of the late court martial at Sheerness before me; and it will be in the recollection of the House that I stated on a previous occasion that the offences committed were deliberate and repeated disobedience of the lawful and reasonable commands of a superior officer, followed up by a violent attack upon him. The offences were of a very grave character indeed, fully meriting severe punishment. It would be premature now to consider whether any portion of the punishment should be remitted, almost before, indeed, any part of it had been inflicted; but reports as to the prisoner will be made from time to time, and they will receive careful consideration.

MR. MACDONALD gave Notice that, on a future day, he would ask for the name of the seaman, whether he was an ordinary seaman or an A.B., whether such a sentence as that passed on this man had been passed on any seaman since the right hon. Gentleman had been in Office, and whether it had not come to his knowledge that recent discussions in the House had influenced the severe penalty which was then inflicted?

INDIA—BANDA AND KIRWEE PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

MR. M. BROOKS asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any, and, if so, what, legal proceedings have been taken in order to obtain a satisfactory account of the residue of the movable property of the ex-Chiefs of Kirwee, in accordance with the Parliamentary Orders of 1873 and 1874; and, whether it is true that, after so many years' delay in furnishing these accounts, the Secretary of State for India in Council has applied to the Court of Chancery for a further postponement of the inquiry?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, on the 15th May last the Rev. Alfred Kinloch commenced an action against the Secretary of State for India in Council relating to the Banda and Kirwee prize money, which action was set down for hearing before the Vice Chancellor Sir Charles Hall. The application to postpone the hearing of the cause until November was made with the consent of the plaintiff, as there was hardly any chance of the case being reached before the Vacation.

METROPOLIS—PAROCHIAL CHARITIES OF THE CITY OF LONDON—REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS.

QUESTION.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Report of the Commissioners on the Parochial Charities of the City of London will be presented?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that great progress had been made with the Report; but, owing to unforeseen circumstances, and the engagement of many Members, it had been delayed, and it could not be presented to the House this Session.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL, as a Member of the Commission, said that, in his judgment, it would be impossible to hold out any hope that the Report would be presented before November.

ARMY — ARMY COMMISSIONS — THE ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE, KINGSTON, CANADA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the report in the "Times" of the 21st instant is accurate, which represents him as having said that—

"Her Majesty has very recently agreed to a proposal which will enable successful students at the Military College in Canada to enter into competition annually for appointments in the English Army;"

and, if so, whether, in consideration of the novelty of this proposal, he will lay upon the Table of the House the Rules and Regulations under which such students would be entitled to compete; and, whether equal facilities will be granted to Her Majesty's subjects in Her Majesty's other Colonial Possessions where similar military educational establishments may be formed in future to obtain Commissions in the Imperial Army?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, the statement which I made the other day was merely a general reference to an arrangement which has been recently made, the precise terms of which are that four commissions annually—one in the Engineers, one in the Artillery, one in the Cavalry, and one in the Line—shall be given to successful candidates, being duly qualified, from the Royal Military College at Kingston. The rules for the competition will, I presume, be laid down by the War Office after communication with the authorities of the College; and I cannot say whether they could or could not be presented to the House. I do not think any reply could be given to the Question whether equal facilities will be granted to other Colonies, until it is ascertained whether a College exists in any other of our Colonies equal in position to the College at Kingston.

ARMY—THE AUXILIARY FORCES—YEOMANRY AND VOLUNTEER AD-
JUTANTS.—QUESTION.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked the Financial Secretary of the War Department, Whether, as compared with the pay received with their Regiments, Adjutants of Volunteers are not about £50 a-year richer, and Adjutants of Yeomanry about £200 a-year poorer by their appointments; whether, in Administrative Battalions, the Volunteer Adjutant has no financial duties as Yeomanry Adjutants have; whether a Volunteer Adjutant receives five shillings (in addition to his already higher pay) for every recruit enlisted through his agency, while a Yeomanry Adjutant receives nothing; whether the increase of pay given to Yeomanry Adjutants in 1876 was not counterbalanced by their being forbidden to receive anything from the Contingent Fund; what the reason for these differences is; and, whether it is not possible to place Yeomanry Adjutants on the same footing as Volunteers by giving them the pay, &c. of their rank as Captains of Cavalry?

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY: Sir, the £50 alluded to by my hon. Friend undoubtedly refers to an allowance for a servant, which is given to adjutants of Volunteers, and also to an allowance for forage for one horse. My hon. Friend also asks whether, in administrative battalions, the Volunteer adjutant has no financial duties? Yes, Sir, he has very distinct financial duties to perform. As to the next part of the Question—if he is allowed by the officer commanding the brigade dépôt to recruit?—he is entitled to 5s. head money; and if it were thought desirable that an adjutant of Yeomanry should be similarly employed he would receive a similar allowance. In 1876, upon the recommendation of a Committee, the pay of Yeomanry adjutants was increased; but, advisedly, they were not allowed to draw any part of the Contingent Fund belong to their regiments. Then, perhaps, my hon. Friend would like an analysis of the pay of adjutants of Yeomanry and Volunteers. The pay of an adjutant of Yeomanry is 10s. a-day, making £182 a-year; for forage and stabling he is allowed 2s. 4d. a-day, making £42 a-year, or a total of £224 a-year. The pay of Cavalry captains is 14s. a-day, or £266 a-year, with a forage allowance for three horses of £47 odd, making a total of £313 a-year. The pay of an adjutant of Volunteers is £211 a-year, with £42 for forage and stabling—total, £253 a-year. There is no doubt the pay of Yeomanry adjutants is less than that of Volunteer and Militia adjutants; but that was advisedly arranged in consequence of the duties which those officers have to perform being lighter than duties of adjutants of Volunteers and Militia; the pay was also regarded as sufficient to induce as many Cavalry captains as necessary to take the appointments for five years.

ARTIZANS' AND LABOURERS' DWELL-INGS ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether he can undertake that none of the sites which had been cleared under "The Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act, 1875," and which have not already been disposed of, shall be sold until Parliament has had an opportunity of considering the Bill which the Home Secretary intends to introduce to amend the Act?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: Sir, I must point out to the hon. Member that no sites have yet been cleared under the Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act, except a portion of the White-chapel and Limehouse area, which has already been sold with five others to the trustees of the Peabody Fund. Some time must necessarily elapse before the removal of buildings from any of the sites not yet disposed of; and, assuming that the Bill of the Home Secretary is brought in this Session, I can readily undertake that no further sale of sites shall take place before the House has had an opportunity of considering the measure.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS — THE ROYAL COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I wish to put a Question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of which I have given him private Notice, on a matter of much general interest—namely, Whether he is as yet prepared to give the House the names of the Gentlemen whom the Government propose to put on the Commission on the State of Agriculture; and if he cannot do it to-day, whether he can give any idea as to when he will be able to do it, for I suppose the Government would not wish that the information should be withheld until the closing days of the Session?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am quite aware of the interest that is taken in this subject, and I can assure the House and the right hon. Gentleman that the Government are most anxious to complete the Commission; but, though they have been in active correspondence with various Gentlemen, they have not yet been able to bring the arrangements to a final conclusion. As soon as we are in a position to do so, which I hope will be shortly, we shall be ready to mention the names to the House.

NAVY—FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

QUESTIONS.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it be the fact that the Admiralty rules only prohibited combinations—"for the purpose of bringing about alterations in the existing rules and regulations of the Navy" and "by appointing Committees, or in any other manner obtaining signatures to memorials, petitions, or applications;" if it be not the fact that the meeting of petty officers at Portsmouth was held for some of these purposes, but solely to protect themselves against public misrepresentations of their opinions by certain Naval Officers, and, therefore, strictly an exercise of citizen rights not abrogated by employment in Her Majesty's service; and, whether, in these circumstances, Admiral Fanshawe's Memorandum was not an indiscreet straining of authority?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, I will not enter into an argument with the hon. Member as to whether a meeting composed of petty officers and seamen called to discuss punishments in the Navy does or does not come within the Article in the Queen's Regulations to which he refers; but I repeat that it was the duty of the Admiral Commanding-in-Chief at Portsmouth to warn men against being led into the commission of acts which, in his judgment, are subversive of discipline and are breaches of the Queen's Regulations. I do not, therefore, consider the publication of the Memorandum referred to was an indiscreet straining of authority.

MR. ANDERSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman produce the Memorandum, and lay it on the Table?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Perhaps the hon. Member will give Notice of that Question.

POST OFFICE TELEGRAPH CLERKS (DUBLIN).—QUESTION.

MR. M. BROOKS (for Mr. GRAY) asked the Postmaster General, What were the dates of the receipt, in Dublin and London respectively, of the latest Petition of the Dublin Telegraph Clerks, praying for an assimilation of their salaries and duties to those of the Telegraph Clerks in English provincial towns; what was the date and nature of the reply; and, whether a circular has been issued changing the designation of these Telegraph Clerks to "Telegraphists;" whether, if so, this change of name is general in the service; whether it affects the official status of the clerks, and, if not, what was the reason of the change?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, the Petition referred to by the hon. Gentleman was received in Dublin on or about the 23rd November last, and was received in London the 28th November. The matter to which the question refers is of considerable importance, and requires very careful consideration, and I have not as yet come to any decision on it. With respect to the last part of the Question, a Circular was issued changing the name from telegraph clerks to telegraphists; but that change was general to all the clerks of the Service. It does not in any way affect their status, and was adopted simply with a view to general convenience.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—THE ESQUIMALT DOCK.—QUESTIONS.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, What was the date of the promise by the Imperial Government to grant £50,000 on completion of the Esquimalt Dock, a promise referred to in a Paper printed and laid before the Legislature of British Columbia on 7th February 1878, under the title "Graving Dock Correspondence;" what sum has already been expended on the dock at Esquimalt by the province of British Columbia; whether, as a doubt exists as to Esquimalt being the best site for a dock in the Pacific Station, he will state what other site or sites are now available; and, whether, by the Act of Incorporation of British Columbia with the Dominion of Canada in 1871, the Dominion Government is bound to "use its influence to secure the continued maintenance of the Naval Station at Esquimalt?"

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the sanction of the Treasury to a grant of £50,000 to British Columbia on the completion of the Esquimalt Dock was communicated by letter to the Colonial Office from the Admiralty, under date December 19, 1874. The sum expended and the liability incurred on this work by the Province up to December 31 last was $208,998, or, roughly speaking, £41,799. What other sites may be available for a dock on the Pacific Station is a question which I do not think it would be for the advantage of the Public Service that I should discuss. I have only to add that I believe there was an undertaking on the part of the Dominion Government to use its influence to secure the maintenance of the Naval Station at Esquimalt.

MR. CHILDERS asked, Whether the promise in 1874 was to make a grant or a loan?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, there had been a previous promise of £30,000 as a grant on the completion of the docks, and it had since been extended to £50,000.

BANKING AND JOINT STOCK COMPANIES BILL.—QUESTIONS.

MR. MUNTZ asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Banking and Joint Stock Companies Bill will, when reprinted, give to Limited Banks the power to register with reduced liability, and take advantage of its provisions?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, Sir; it is proposed to meet that point.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked on what day the Committee would be taken?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped the re-printed Bill would be circulated by Saturday, and he would put the Committee down for Monday; but he was not quite sure that he would be able to bring it on on that day.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTIONS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What course he intended to take as to the discussion of the Treaty with Afghanistan? As he (Sir George Campbell) had a Notice of Motion on the subject, he would be glad to consult the right hon. Gentleman's convenience.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am afraid I cannot name any special day for it; but there will be opportunities for discussing the matter both on the Order for going into Committee of Supply, and on the various stages of the Appropriation Bill.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: But will the right hon. Gentleman make a statement on the subject himself, and give us an opportunity of discussing it?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No; I am afraid I cannot undertake to do that.

In reply to Mr. W. E. FORSTER and Mr. NEWDEGATE,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Government proposed to take the Public Works Loans Bill at 2 o'clock to-morrow. He was afraid they would have to ask the House to sit on Saturday for the Committee on the Bankruptcy Bill. It would probably be convenient to the House to take the Vote of Credit for the Zulu War on Monday. On Tuesday they proposed to proceed with the Committee on the Irish University Bill.

MR. FAWCETT begged to remind the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he had promised to give him an opportunity for bringing on his Motion in regard to the water supply of London.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he still intended to do so; but it would be impossible properly to discuss it next Tuesday, or on any other day after 9 o'clock; and, therefore, he proposed to fix a later day, when it could be taken at an earlier period in the evening. It would not, however, be possible to make sure of obtaining such a day next week.

SIR HENRY JAMES appealed to the right hon. Gentleman not to proceed with the Bankruptcy Bill on Saturday, as most of the lawyers who had seats in the House could not be in attendance on that day.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would consider what arrangement could be made on the subject, and would communicate it to the House.

MR. M. BROOKS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, as it was a matter of convenience for Irish Members, Whether the Local Courts of Bankruptcy Bill would be taken on Saturday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Irish Bankruptcy Bill would not be taken on Saturday.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked if it was necessary to have a Morning Sitting on Tuesday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought it would be the most convenient course.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—o—o—

WAYS AND MEANS—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SOUTH AFRICA — ESTIMATE OF EXPENDITURE.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of moving that you do now leave the Chair. It had been in my mind that I might make the few observations I have to make in Committee; but I find that we may, perhaps, be some time before getting into Committee, and I believe it will be more convenient to the House that I should say the few words I have to say now, instead of waiting until we get into Committee. At the same time, I do not understand that it is likely the House will desire now to enter into any discussion of the subject I have to bring before them; but, of course, I am in the hands of the House. I promised some time ago that we would lay the Estimate for the Vote of Credit that would be required for the War in South Africa on the Table of the House before the close of the month of July, and I am just within my promise, having delayed as long as possible, for the obvious reason that I was anxious to get the latest intelligence, in order to form, as far as possible, an idea of what was likely to be the course and, therefore, the expense of the war. We have not yet received absolutely final intelligence; but we have received intelligence of a character which renders me less indisposed to offer an estimate of what the probable cost of the war will be. I have mentioned more than once in the House that, according to the best calculations we were able to make, we believed that the additional expenditure from the Army Services for the war were at the rate of about £500,000 per month. Recently I have gone with more care into this question, and I have discussed with the Accountant General of the Army, and also the Accountant General of the Navy, all the information that they had at their command, and the result is this—that the War Office calculate that the net cost of the war beyond the sums already provided in the Army Estimates will be covered by £500,000 a-month; and they carry this expenditure at the full rate up to the end of July. From that time it is considered that the expenditure ought to diminish rapidly, although it is probable that it will not come to an end immediately. Therefore, I propose to take a further sum of £450,000 for the possible expenditure on Army account for what might be the remaining period of the war. Then the Navy has given an estimate of £500,000 as the probable cost of transport, and we have allowed a sum of £50,000 for contingencies. Under these circumstances, the Vote of Credit which I shall lay on the Table is for a sum of £3,000,000—that is to say, £2,450,000 for the Army, £500,000 for the Navy, and £50,000 for contingencies. That is the best estimate we can form of what is likely to be required. At the same time, the House is of course aware that in these matters there is room for uncertainty, and that it is impossible to give a complete, full, and accurate account. Reckoning, however, according to the accounts we have received, and also according to the rate of drawing upon the Treasury Chest, I feel perfectly satisfied that a Vote of that character will be, if not sufficient for the whole of the expenses of the war, at all events sufficient for anything that will be required to be provided between this and the next Session of Parliament. I hope it will fully cover the expenditure that will have to be incurred. That being the case, I must remind the House that that expenditure will raise the total amount of expenditure advanced by this country on account of the South African War to something like £4,500,000, including what was voted at the end of last year—I must also remind the House that that expenditure is expenditure which ought not, certainly, to fall in whole upon the Imperial Exchequer. From the earlier period of these transactions, and, indeed, from the period of the previous war which had been going at the Cape—what is called the Transkei War—we have kept before the notice of the Colonial authorities the fact that the advances that were made by this country were not to be considered as admitting that we undertook to bear the whole of these expenses ourselves. I do not know that at the present moment I can very conveniently go into the details of the claims that we think we shall have against the Colonies. The Papers which have been presented to the House, and especially those which have been presented within the last day or two, will show what the views of Her Majesty's Government have been; and I will only at the present moment refer to one or two despatches rather as indicating what they will do well to pay attention to than attempting myself to exhaust this subject. They will see, in Paper No. 2,000, presented last year, that as early as in January, 1878, Lord Carnarvon called the attention of the Cape authorities to the mode in which it would be right and necessary that provision should be made for the expenditure which was then being incurred at the Cape in connection with the Transkei War. Previous to that time, the arrangements with the Cape had been that they made a normal payment of £10,000 a-year to the Imperial Exchequer in respect of the Forces that had been kept there. But in the end of 1877 two additional regiments were sent out to the Cape in connection with the war that was then going on, and it was understood that the Cape should bear their cost, and provision was made in this despatch and others that they should make monthly payments to the Treasury Chest on account of the drafts that might be made upon the Treasury Chest for commissariat and other services. Well, that went on until the Transkei War was over; and it will be seen in the next volume, Command Paper No. 2,374, that on the 8th of August, and again on the 19th of December, my right hon. Friend the present Colonial Secretary wrote despatches calling for an account of the expenditure which had been incurred. The House will also see in the same Papers a Minute—a reply, in fact—from the Cape Government to those statements. They will see that the Cape Ministers informed my right hon. Friend that they had already obtained in one way or another the sum of £1,254,000 towards the expenses of that war. They had taken power to raise a war loan of £750,000, and according to this account they had spent £1,254,000. Then I would direct attention to the last and most important despatch of my right hon. Friend, which is to be found at page 3 of the same Book, in the Correspondence which has been delivered within the last few days—the despatch dated 12th of June, in which my right hon. Friend points out what the principles are upon which the claims to be made against the Cape Colony are founded. I think it would be inconvenient, at the present moment, to provoke a discussion which I doubt whether the House has any desire to enter into, by going into the details; no doubt, that will be a matter for future discussion; but I would draw attention to these particular despatches, as showing the principle upon which we have proceeded with regard to the Transkei War. Now, with regard to the Zulu War, it will be found that there is not the same amount of information in these Papers; in point of fact, this is a matter which is still too incomplete to enable us to deal with it quite in the same categorical manner. Of course, the Colony which is mainly interested in the Zulu War is the Colony of Natal, and various communications have passed between my right hon. Friend and the authorities at Natal urging upon the Governor there to do all that was in his power to keep down the local expenditure in every way; and also to make provision for the claim that will have to be made upon the Colony of Natal for expenditure incurred on account of Natal out of Imperial funds. With regard to that matter, and, indeed, with regard to the whole question, I may say that general instructions of the strictest character have been given both to Sir Henry Bulwer and to Sir Bartle Frere and, last, to Sir Garnet Wolseley; and, moreover, that it is now the intention of Her Majesty's Government to send one or two officers—the Accountant General of the Army, and probably some gentleman from the Treasury—to go out at once to Natal or the Cape, whichever may be found most convenient, but probably to Natal, in order to examine the accounts, and to see in what way the expenditure can be properly apportioned between the Colonial and Imperial resources. I hope before Parliament re-assembles we shall be in possession of information which will enable us to deal much more satisfactorily with the question than we are able to do at the present moment. Therefore, the net results of what I have at present to say is that we have to provide temporarily for this sum of £3,000,000, which will be required in order to carry us on, as we believe, to the end of the Zulu War. Well, then, I have only to say how that sum affects the finances of the year. The House will bear in mind that at the time of the Budget I estimated the income of the year at £83,055,000. I estimated the ordinary expenditure, excluding anything that might occur from the Zulu War, at £81,155,000, showing at that time a surplus of £1,900,000 of ordinary income over the ordinary Expenditure. Since that time some Supplementary Estimates have been presented to the House, which appear upon the face of them to amount to £89,000, but which, in reality, only amount to £64,000, because the Vote for Cyprus pioneers is merely a transfer from another head of the Estimates. They involve, therefore, an addition of £64,000 to the Estimates of the year. Add to that the Vote of Credit which I shall have to ask on account of the Zulu War, and we get an Expenditure of £84,218,000, showing a deficiency of income of £1,163,000. Well, Sir, the Revenue prospects for the year I cannot say are brilliant; at the same time, they are not so unsatisfactory as to lead to the belief that they will fall short of the Estimate in the long run. The Estimates were very carefully taken; and I have gone through the present financial Returns with the heads of the Revenue Departments, and, upon the whole, I am of opinion that we may fairly reckon at the present time upon the amount of Revenue which we took for our basis in the month of April. I therefore take the deficiency at £1,163,000, and I have to remind the House that there is a sum which we hope and expect to recover from the South African Colonies. We have claims still against them in respect of what was advanced in former years. I therefore think that we may consider that we have only to make a temporary provision for the present loan. Of course, some little time must be taken in ascertaining what the exact outcome of these arrangements will be; but, for the present, I think it will be sufficient that the House should be asked to make temporary provision for this sum by granting to us the privilege and the right of issuing Exchequer Bonds for the amount of £1,200,000. That will cover the amount, and will, I think, bring the Ways and Means of the year up to the amount which is required by the expenditure. I do not, of course, intend to make that proposal in Committee of Ways and Means to-day; but I shall bring it forward probably on Monday—that will depend upon the other Business. What we have to do in Committee to-day will be merely to effect a renewal of those Bonds which are at the present time falling due. I beg to move, Sir, that you do now leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. CHILDERS desired, before the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) introduced his Motion, to make one or two comments upon the Statement just made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He assumed that the House would not, on the present occasion, discuss the circumstances which had led to the expenditure for the Transkei and Zulu Wars, or, indeed, discuss in detail the financial position of the Government. But, at the same time, it might be convenient to put one or two figures in a simple form, in order that when they did come to the discussion of the question they might be prepared to do so, not only from the point of view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but of those who might not quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman. It was worthy of remark that in the last two years they had had six Financial Statements, instead of two. He assumed that the present Statement would wind up the affairs of the present year; but it almost looked as if they were to have a seventh, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer nearly promised to them at the commencement of the next Session. He wanted to remind the House what the exact state of the case about these six Budgets was. They commenced with an Estimate, in February last year, of £6,000,000 in connection with the War in the East. No Ways and Means were asked for this, which the House was even told might not be spent. Then, in April, came the Budget, which added £3,750,000 to the taxation of last year, and £4,500,000 to that of this year, and they were promised that by the end of this year the new taxes would have wiped out all the additional expenditure. In August came a third Budget, with no new Ways and Means, but additional expenditure of more than £2,000,000. The fourth Statement was in last February, with further expenditure to the extent of £1,100,000. Then came the Budget in April, making the accumulated deficit of the last two years £4,930,000, but hoping that the Zulu War would only cost £1,300,000 more, to be met out of this year's surplus. And now they heard that the Zulu War would cost, up to the meeting of Parliament next February, at least £3,000,000; and that instead of paying off their debts at the end of this year, as the Budget of 1878 promised, they would then be in a deficit of £6,094,000. What, then, should they have done towards paying off the debt for the War in Europe? No one would deny that such an expenditure as that of the Transkei and Zulu Wars, spread over three years, ought to be met out of the Revenue of those years. No one had ever yet proposed to deal with wars of the kind by way of deferred payment; and, therefore, the logical result was that if those two wars were dealt with out of the Revenue of the year they would close the present year without having devoted one sixpence towards the expenses in connection with the War in the East, which just amounted to £6,000,000, the deficit at the end of this year. They would have to begin again on the 1st of April next, spreading that payment over a series of years. Now, even if the basis of the present Budget could be trusted, the future surplus would be less than £2,000,000, and probably not much more than £1,000,000, so that on the 1st of April of next year they would start with a system of deferred payment for three, four, or five years. Whether that was sound finance or not he declined now to discuss; but he thought the House would clearly see what the effect of the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was. The right hon. Gentleman told them that they might expect to get some of the money back from the Colonies. He had read with great interest the Papers which came before the House on the previous day, and he thought they set forth very fairly the claim of the English Government upon the Colonies; and he should not say anything which would tend to deter the Colonies from complying with the request of the English Government. But it must be remembered that the Cape Colonists had said that they had spent £1,200,000, and that they did not intend to contribute any more. He hoped, however, that they would find it necessary to do so. He was not inclined to say much upon the Estimate of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the outcome of the present year; but he felt bound to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that, at the present time, the state of Customs and Excise Revenues was very nearly as bad as at the time when, in reply to the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), he said that, though they looked unsatisfactory, the returns would soon show much amendment. He considered, however, that the point to which he had drawn attention—namely, that not a farthing of the expense incurred in connection with the War in Europe had been met out of the Revenue of the last three years—required to be seriously weighed.

SIR ROBERT PEEL thought it would have been far better if the speech just delivered by the right hon. Gentleman

Mr. Childers

(Mr. Childers) had been deferred to another and more suitable opportunity, inasmuch as it consisted mainly in a discussion of the financial proposals of the Government during the last few years. What he (Sir Robert Peel) rose to call attention to was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had most distinctly promised the House that, in the course of the present month, they should have an opportunity of discussing the whole of the affairs which had taken place in connection with South Africa. He understood that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given Notice that he would, in Committee of Ways and Means, proceed to move certain Resolutions; but it appeared now that, without giving Notice, he had adopted a different plan, and he did not know that precluded hon. Members from entering into a discussion on Zulu affairs. The other day, when he attempted to draw attention to certain matters in connection with South Africa, he was told that he would have every opportunity to do so when the Estimate was proposed; but it appeared him that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had rather slurred over the promise he had made, to give the House a full opportunity of discussing the question, and he trusted the House would at once go into Committee and discuss the points raised by the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman had told the House that the Zulu War was only to cost £4,500,000; but those who were in the House at the commencement of the Abyssinian War would remember that they were told that the war was only to cost £3,000,000, when it really cost £9,000,000. No one in the House or in the country would believe that this miserable, mismanaged war in South Africa would only cost the taxpayers of this country £3,000,000 or £4,000,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his remarks, had made use of the word "additional" expenditure. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean to add that additional expenditure to what had been already incurred?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: What I meant by additional expenditure was the expenditure over and above the ordinary Army and Navy Votes.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that that showed what an appalling state of things they had come to; it showed how dangerous it was to trust to these flimsy remarks without bringing them to book. In addition to what had been already voted, which was large enough, they were now told the present Votes were additional ones; and, in spite of the pledge given to the House, it was proposed to drive off the debate until next week. The state of affairs was most serious, and yet they were not to be allowed to discuss them. He really thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer was bound in honour to bring on the discussion at once. He would appeal to the Government whether the present was not the most fitting opportunity to discuss the subject? He had come down to the House prepared to go most fully into the matter, and he had no doubt hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House had done the same. He thought the country ought to know, without further delay, what was the state of affairs; and he, therefore, trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consent to discuss the matter at once.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I may say, by way of personal explanation, that I stated some time ago that we would present this Estimate, and, having given Notice that it would be presented to-day, I was asked by the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), and others, whether we would bring the matter forward and allow it to be discussed; but I gathered from the tone in which the inquiry was made that it was not desired that the discussion should take place to-day. I, therefore, did not bring the Vote forward, because I really thought it would be for the convenience of the House not to vote it to-day.

MR. CHILDERS said he, personally, should have preferred that the debate should have gone on that night; but they all clearly understood from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it was not to be proceeded with.

THE INDIAN MUSEUM.

RESOLUTION.

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, I rise to call attention to the threatened dispersion of the Indian Museum, and to put forward some considerations which may, I would fain hope, incline the Secretary of State in Council to re-consider the determination lately come to, even if the hon. Gentleman opposite sees it his duty to oppose the Motion with which I shall conclude. I have the more hope that this will be so, because the recent decision is in flagrant opposition to other decisions not long since come to by the Secretary of State in Council; so that, in holding its hand, and not dispersing the collections, the India Office will only be reverting to its own earlier, and, as I venture to think, wiser ideas. The Indian Museum was established by the Great Company in 1798, and was the outcome of the same movement of mind which gave to our earlier Indian statesmen so prominent a place amongst Orientalists. That being so, it was natural that the first character impressed upon it should be a learned and antiquarian one. After some time, however, it passed into the care of Dr. Horsfield, who, being himself a naturalist of repute, gave more prominence to Natural History and Science. Later still, it came under the charge of Dr. Royle, who thought less of the promotion of learning or of science in the abstract, and more of direct commercial utility. He it was who developed the economical side of the Indian Museum. When, in 1860, with these three characters impressed upon it—at once learned, scientific, and helpful to trade—it passed from its original home in Leadenhall Street, the authorities at first intended to provide a really fitting home for it in or near the new India Office buildings which were begun shortly after. In 1865 a piece of land was acquired to be available for extending the India Office, and in 1868 the architect received orders from the then Secretary of State, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, to prepare plans for an Indian Museum and Library, to be built on that piece of ground. The same idea found favour with my noble Friend the Duke of Argyll, who went to the India Office in the December of that year, and in the June of 1869 everything seemed about to be settled, when a telegram came from Lord Mayo, giving very bad financial intelligence, which stopped for a while any further progress. From this time forward, for several years, the plan of building an Indian Museum and Library, with rooms for the Asiatic Society close to the India Office, remained in abeyance—while we endeavoured, not without success, to retrieve the finances—but was very far indeed from being laid aside. Meantime, a portion of the Museum was exhibited from the beginning of 1870 onwards in very wretched and unsuitable rooms at the top of the India Office. After right hon. Gentlemen opposite came into power, the question was again considered, and on the 25th of June, 1874, the Council of India passed the following Resolution:—

“Resolved, that it be determined to build on the vacant ground in Charles Street a museum and library, at an expenditure not exceeding £75,000, including internal fittings, with such assistance as can be obtained from the Imperial Government; and that during the construction of the building the offer of the Exhibition Commissioners be accepted to accommodate the museum at South Kensington on a short lease, renewable if desired.”

Then followed a long negotiation with the Treasury as to how much the Indian Government ought to pay, and how much the Treasury ought to pay, which led to no definite result, and, in the meantime, the unlucky Museum, banished from its uncomfortable but central rooms in the India Office, was set out in galleries at South Kensington, far away from the full tide of human existence in this great town. So it has remained to this day, while various plans have been agitated with reference to its future, the last and worst of which is the plan of breaking it up and handing over its disjecta membra to the British Museum, to South Kensington, and to Kew. Now, I have not a word to say against the desirability of these great collections possessing a variety of Indian articles. Doubtless, such articles would fit most excellently into many of their departments. Nor am I concerned to say that there may not be many articles now in the Indian Museum which would not be more in their place at the British Museum, at Kew, or at South Kensington. I should be quite willing to see the Indian Museum part with a good many of its contents to these institutions for a fair price; but I do most strongly object to collections bought with Indian money, or presented by Indians, or Anglo-Indians, for the express purpose of increasing the knowledge of India in this country, being given away to institutions which have as much and as little to do with India as they have with Patagonia or Kamschatka. Why, the Indian Museum is now valued at £200,000. If the India Government is really so bad off that it cannot afford to pay for the looking after its collections, would not it be better to sell the whole thing and put the money into the Indian Treasury? The hon. Gentleman opposite will tell us that if he and those whom he represents succeed in dispersing the Museum they will have an eventual saving of £9,000 a-year. That saving, Sir, will be, I dare venture to say, most uncommonly eventual, for it will only be arrived at after the death of a number of persons who are, I am happy to say, likely to have a prolonged existence; but if they sell the whole thing it will be not much more inglorious, and in every way more profitable; for the British Museum, and South Kensington, and Kew will, no doubt, secure what they most want; and the other articles will many of them also find their way into good keeping; while the Secretary of State will put money into his purse, and be able to comfort himself with the old saying of Vespasian. There is, however, another plan which ought to be considered before anything irrevocable is done. Just about the time that certain difficulties arose with regard to building an Indian Museum on the piece of land which was acquired by the India Office in 1865—difficulties to which I need not further allude, for they have no bearing on the present state of the question—a communication came to the India Office from a Committee which was then sitting at the Colonial Office, with reference to the possibility of uniting their efforts and erecting a Museum for India and the Colonies. Out of this suggestion grew the project associated with the name of Dr. Forbes Watson, the project of a joint Museum for India and the Colonies, in a central situation, close to this House, in the midst of the full tide of human existence. The first site suggested was that of Fife House, and I put a Question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer about that site several years ago. Now, there seems available a somewhat better site rather nearer the place where we are now assembled. The idea which finds favour with a great many persons is to place the India Museum on the site of the building which used to be occupied by the Board of Control. Alongside the Museum, which would extend back to the roadway of the Embankment, would run a short street, on the other side of which would rise the Colonial Museum, which would be connected with the India Museum by a subway, but be under the control of the Colonial Office, as the other would be under that of the India Office or its Representative. In the Indian Museum building would be located the Indian Museum, the India Office Library—always excepting the departmental portion of it—and the rooms of the Asiatic Society, which now receives £205 a-year from Indian Revenues, a payment which would, of course, determine when the heavy burden of rent was taken off the shoulders of that deserving and famous, but by no means wealthy, corporation. In the Colonial Museum buildings there would be—first, the Museum proper; secondly, an adequate Colonial Library; and, thirdly, rooms for the Agents General, who have now to pay a very large sum annually for accommodation in the neighbourhood of this House. It always seems a most surprising thing to foreigners, and it would seem a most surprising thing to ourselves, if we were not so broken into anomalies of all sorts, that there is no place in this City where can be obtained anything like an adequate idea of what sort of places the English Colonies and Dependencies really are. Why, it is extremely difficult even for ourselves, for Members of Parliament with every sort of social advantage, to get anything like a good idea of the actualities of a Colony. Supposing any of us wanted, for example, to get an accurate notion of the present state of Tasmania, he would find it anything but an easy task, even after putting himself in communication with our Librarian here, and with the Geographical Society. There are, it must be remembered, a variety of questions which have nothing to do with politics, which persons not directly supporting whatever Government happens to be for the moment in power would be unwilling to trouble the Colonial Office with, and even if they did the Colonial Office has not the appliances or organization necessary for supplying such information at all generally. We want a place to which not only Members of Parliament and other privileged persons, but all persons, can go and learn, without cost and without trouble, what our Colonies and Dependencies are, where they are, what sort of things they produce, what chances the inquirers or persons in whom they may be interested have of bettering their condition or pushing their fortunes in those countries, what attractive advertisements with regard to our Colonies and Dependencies are mere wills-o'-the-wisp, what little-known and unregarded resources of wealth there may be in those regions which have not yet received bold advertisement. What we want is a place, to the creation of which the Mother Country on the one hand, her Colonies and Dependencies on the other, shall contribute, the object of which shall be to bring them nearer each to each for the common advantage of all. It appears to me that there is hardly any knowledge which is more likely to be useful to a British citizen, whether born in the Colonies, India, or at Home, than a wide knowledge of the gigantic Empire to which he belongs. That knowledge, and the feelings that naturally come of it, are true Imperialism, the best antidote to false Imperialism, the "bloody meddlesomeness," which is the offspring of ignorance, at the centre of affairs, acted on by self-seeking on the far-off Frontiers of the Empire. How many of us, however—even of us, I say, in this great and powerful Assemblage—have adequate knowledge of these things? Is there one of us that has? I very much doubt it. There are hon. and right hon. Members who know individual Colonies and Dependencies well. There are Anglo-Indians, there are Australians amongst us. There are some hon. Members who have made a rapid journey through many of the Colonies and Dependencies. One hon. Member, the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), has written very brilliantly about not a few of them; but that was more than a decade ago, and a decade in the self-governing Colonies is an eternity. The late Sir Arthur Helps used to tell a story which is worth repeating. At one moment, when Lord Palmerston was making some arrangements for filling up vacant Offices, a difficulty arose as to who was to be Colonial Secretary. Lord Palmerston said—"I think I'll take the Office myself;" and the other people who were present, immediately after taking their leave, he said to Sir Arthur—"Just stay a little with me, and we'll look at the maps and see where these places are.' Well, of course, that was rather a caricature of the state of his Lordship's mind; but is it not, nevertheless, perfectly and painfully true—I put it to every man who hears me on both sides if it is not true—that, considering our enormous power and our enormous responsibilities, we all know a great deal too little about our Colonies and Dependencies? Nor do I see how it can ever be otherwise unless, in some perfectly accessible place where he who runs may read, we have brought before us without any investigation, nay, actually forced upon our notice, the actualities of these countries. Persons, Sir, who walk in the dark will inevitably stumble, and we deal in our Colonies and Dependencies with interests so gigantic that we can hardly make the smallest stumble without its costing us more in hard money than it would cost to keep up such an institution as I contemplate for 10 years, considerable though the cost would no doubt be. I may be told, however, that these views are the views merely of a small section of persons who have a belief in knowledge—a most unpopular belief in some quarters—or take a special interest in India and the Colonies. I deny that is toto. They are, I maintain, views, views very largely prevailing amongst the commercial classes of this country. Indeed, it was the mercantile community which first put into practice the principle which I am defending, of co-operation between England and her Dependencies in matters important to the material prosperity of both. For the mercantile community subscribed no less a sum than £2,700 towards the publication of the textile work which the India Office put forth for the purpose—first, of showing to England what lovely textile fabrics could be procured in India; and, secondly, of enabling England to emulate the perfection that had been attained by Indian artists. To show that the principles of the mercantile community are as good as their practice, I will, with the permission of the House, read one or two extracts from the very numerous memorials which have been sent to Her Majesty's Government from Chambers of Commerce, cities, towns, and important Associations in the United Kingdom, all urging that England should aid the Colonies and India in securing the establishment of the proposed Museums on the Embankment. The Manchester Chamber of Commerce says—

“That your memorialists warmly approve a proposal, recently brought under their notice, for combining within the same building a Colonial and an Indian Museum, thereby establishing an Imperial Museum for the Colonies and India for the supply of complete illustrations of the products and manufactures of our British Dependencies. That an institution of this character would supply important advantages and confer benefits not alone on India and the Colonies, but also upon this country; and, in the opinion of your memorialists, such an institution would be entitled to a liberal grant from Imperial funds in aid of its establishment.”

The Bradford Chamber of Commerce says—

“That your memorialists have noticed with great satisfaction the scheme of a really Imperial establishment, embracing India as well as the Colonies, and combining museums, libraries, lectures, offices, and all requirements for study, art, commerce, industry, and government, in one central building, erected at the joint expense of the Mother Country and her Dependencies. That your memorialists believe that such an undertaking, to be of real use to the merchant, the manufacturer, and the student, should have a central position at no great distance from the Government Offices and the city, with easy access to visitors from the country.”

The Bristol Chamber of Commerce says—

“That in the present depression of commerce, and the scarcity of sound investments for absorbing the savings of the country, it is the highest policy to make as widely known as possible the resources of India and the Colonies, which experience has proved to be more reliable in their business relations with us than those of the majority of foreign countries can be said to be, and which, although they already take about one-third of all our exports, and have afforded safe investments to probably more than £300,000,000 sterling of English capital, still possess boundless capabilities for further development.”

The United Association of Chambers of Commerce says—

“That the proposal now before the public for the establishment of an Indian and a Colonial Museum on the old Fife House site on the Victoria Embankment has the approval of this Association. That as, in the opinion of the Association, the proposed Museums are likely to be of great benefit to England, as well as to India and the Colonies, one-half of the expenditure required for establishing them, as also for their future maintenance, should be paid by this country; that as, in the opinion of this Association, the selection of the site for the proposed Museums will have a decisive influence on their future usefulness, no plan will be at all satisfactory which does not secure their establishment in a central position, where they will be easily accessible to all classes, commercially or politically interested in India and the Colonies. And further, that, in the opinion of this Association, the proposed site on the Victoria Embankment satisfies all the required conditions.”

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted at a meeting held in the Egyptian Hall in the Mansion House:—1st. Proposed by the Right Hon. E. Pleydell Bouverie, seconded by Philip Twells, Esq., M.P.—

“That, in the opinion of this meeting, it is expedient to establish in London an Imperial Museum for the Colonies and India, and that such a Museum should be placed in a central position, easily accessible to all classes, whether political, commercial, or industrial.”

2nd resolution. Proposed by Alexander M'Arthur, Esq., M.P., seconded by Hugh Matheson, Esq.—

“That the proposal to establish such a Museum on the Victoria Embankment has the warm approval of this meeting; and that, as the proposed Museum is calculated to be of great use to this country as well as to India and the Colonies, it is the opinion of this meeting that Her Majesty's Government should take the necessary steps to aid in securing its establishment on that site.”

I could go on quoting for the next hour or two the opinions of influential bodies of mercantile men upon this subject; but I think, Sir, I have done enough to show that the commercial classes take a great interest in the scheme of a united Indian and Colonial Museum. But I should like it to be distinctly understood that although I think it would be greatly to the advantage of this country, of its Colonies and Dependencies, that we should have such a Museum, and although I have no doubt that if the Government would take the initiative the Colonies would do their part, I am not attempting to get the House to come to any Resolution on this subject at present. What I am pleading for is delay. I am most unwilling that while this scheme is being discussed in the country, while men's minds are becoming more and more accustomed to the idea of its being necessary to have what may be called an object-index to the British Empire in the Metropolis of the British Empire, India should, by a hurried and ill-considered step, be put at a disadvantage. If she disperse her Museum now she will most assuredly be obliged to repent at leisure, and to re-collect it when she happens to have Rulers more persuaded of the importance of visual teaching than are those who now direct her destinies. Visual teaching is becoming every day more popular. In all directions we hear the complaint that education has long dealt too much with words, too little with things. If I were asked what I thought the greatest fault of our Indian Civil Service, for which I have a very high admiration—an admiration greatly increased by having seen it at work in India—I should say that its greatest fault was a want of power to learn by the eye, a want of curiosity about the objects in the midst of which it passed its life. That cannot continue under the influence of the new educational ideas which are abroad; and before a generation is over, if the Museum is really broken up and dispersed, the names of the men who broke up and dispersed the Indian Museum will be remembered with execrations from one end of the Peninsula to the other. I doubt whether it would be possible to make a better investment of Indian money than by conveying a real feeling for India to a really large portion of the British public. Why, what is the only accusation that can truly be brought against us as a nation in our dealings with India? The English are just, say our foreign critics, but they are not sympathetic. How, then, can their sympathy be aroused? We cannot take millions of our people to India, even in this day of travelling facilities; but we can bring India to millions of our people—that is to say, we can bring the picturesque, interesting side of India into the midst of them. We can do a great deal to make them proud of ruling the races which raised the temples of Southern India, and the Jumma-Masjid, and the Pearl Mosque at Agra, and that wonderful Taj Mahal, which leaves all the other marvels of human architecture, except the Parthenon, at so great a distance. There was a time when much could be done by the cry of justice to India. In the days of Burke, God knows! there was reason enough for it. Very little can, I think, be effected by that cry now; for, having had occasion to look at the relations of the two countries from the Indian and English side, and more from the English than the Indian side, I have come, as I said the other day, to the conclusion that if we are to be guided by bare justice, and not by kindly feeling towards India, the demands made upon her by England for establishments kept up for the joint advantage of the two Empires will not be less, but greater. The time will come when the constituencies will begin to realize this, and when they do—if we have not succeeded in creating in the mass of the people something very like a romantic interest in India, and further, in stimulating the power of India to produce things of all kinds, useful to the world, which are not easily to be provided elsewhere, which things she may exchange against our products to our mutual advantage—shall we not one day be asked in very angry tones—What is the real case for our continuing to hold India? Now, I want to know by what possible process we can create the kind of interest in India, which I would fain see, except by making quite familiar to England all that is most beautiful, and useful, and interesting in India? And how can we do that without some such institution as I am sketching—an institution to which may be given the name of Indian Museum, or anything else, but for which the present Indian Museum and Library, after proper sifting, would form an excellent nucleus? But, it is said, India is wretchedly, abjectly poor. She cannot do anything but exist. She cannot afford to have any of the higher adjuncts and instruments of government. That I utterly deny. That is just as foolish an exaggeration as was the exaggeration of those who generalized the stories they heard of the splendour of the Great Mogul, and believed that India was a country where gold and diamonds were as common as iron and flint among us. The simple truth is that India can afford everything which it is primarily important should be possessed by a State in her circumstances. And I maintain that such a Museum as I wish to see established is of primary importance to a State in her circumstances. She must be economical; she cannot afford anything like luxurious expenditure; but as little can she afford that short-sighted parsimony which robs to-morrow of a pound to save a penny to-day. What case can be made in favour of breaking up the Museum which cannot also be made against getting rid of the library, in so far as it is not a mere departmental library? If Vandalism is to be the order of the day, why not carry it through all proceedings? Is it, perhaps, that this proposed selling of the Museum is not a well-considered piece of policy, but a mere impatient cutting of an official knot, which it is the business of the Secretary of State in Council not to cut, but to unwind? The Under Secretary of State, in reply to me, will not be able to make anything of the expense of the present Museum. It may be that that expense is too great; if so, diminish it; but a large diminution of the expense is entirely compatible with keeping together everything in the Museum which ought to be kept together, and I believe we shall learn, in the course of this debate, that overtures have been made to the Indian Government with a view to the keeping together of the Museum at a diminished cost. Nor is anything to be made against my contention by saying that India ought not to be at the sole expense of keeping up a Museum in London. I think I could prove that if the Museum had been put on the footing and located in the place which would have best suited it, it might have been well worth India's while to have kept it up at her own expense. But that is not the proposition for which I am now contending. I am contending merely that nothing rash should now be done which may prevent India's coming to an arrangement with the Imperial Government for a joint keeping up of a Museum which may be for the joint benefit of the whole Empire. Anyone who likes it may ring the changes upon the poverty of India as much as seems to him good; but he will in no sort of way touch my argument unless he can succeed in showing the uselessness of an Indian Museum, arranged according to the best modern principles, and explained as all Museums intended primarily for the instruction of the people—and not, like the British Museum, primarily to advance the science and knowledge possessed by the leading minds of humanity—should be explained, by trained instructors, as they are in Copenhagen, the only city in which, so far as I am aware, museums are thoroughly worked for popular instruction. If anyone can succeed in demonstrating that I have no more to say, except that if he succeeds he will upset a great many other things beside the Indian Museum. He will, in fact, turn back one of the most powerful currents of the age—that which is running in favour of teaching the people not exclusively by words, but also by things. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "having regard alike to the traditions of our rule in India and to the expediency of establishing, at an early period, by the joint action of the Mother Country, its Colonies, and Dependencies, an institution in which the productions of all those Colonies and Dependencies should be adequately represented, it is undesirable that the Indian Museum, collected at great cost by the East India Company, and taken over by the Crown, should now be broken up and distributed,"—(Mr Grant Duff),

—instead thereof.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON, as one of the general public interested in the Indian Museum, and also as one interested in the history and archæology of that country, where he had travelled, desired to say a few words in support of the Motion. It would be most short-sighted policy on the part of the Government to abolish or disperse the collection, because it was impossible to make the people of this country properly acquainted with the size, wealth, and resources of the Indian Empire, unless they had an opportunity of seeing a Museum which illustrated those facts; and no scheme would be satisfactory which separated it from the library. The reason why so few persons visited the Indian collections at South Kensington was that they were placed in galleries, the approaches to which contained nothing to attract people or direct them further. Nothing could be so fatal to the objects of the Museum as to relegate it to Kew, which was too remote for popular as distinct from scientific interest. The Indian Museum ought to be in an easily accessible part of the Metropolis, and within a short distance of the library, so that both products and books could be referred to without difficulty. The Commissioners could not promote science and art more legitimately than by allowing the collections to remain at South Kensington rent-free until an arrangement could be come to between the Treasury and the India Office. A sum of £10,000 a-year, divided between the two countries, would be well laid out in the establishment of a Museum in a central part of the Metropolis, and it would be amply repaid by our increased knowledge of the manufactures and products of India, and by the greater interest the people of this country would take in that country. It would be very short-sighted to break up a valuable Museum for the sake of saving that sum. When Indian objects had been exhibited at Manchester and Derby they excited great popular interest; and some of our textile fabrics, such as hangings and carpets, had been greatly improved by the study of Indian manufactures. If it were worth while for India to be represented at International Exhibitions, it was surely worth while that it should have a permanent exhibition in this country.

MR. FAWCETT said, he did not desire to dispute the abstract advantages of Museums in general, nor of an Indian and Colonial Museum in particular; but he thought the question of cost and its incidence were somewhat lost sight of. He attended the City meeting, at which, after two hours of speaking, being asked to say a few words, he expressed a desire to move an addition to the Resolution to the effect that the cost of the Museum should be borne by England, and not by India. But this was not entertained, because it was said the question of cost did not concern the meeting. It did, however, concern this House, and the way to bring it home was to consider what would be said if England were asked to bear the cost of maintaining corresponding Museums of English products in Calcutta, Bombay, and Madras. This debate furnished an illustration of the difficulties to be encountered by any Government that desired to reduce Indian expenditure. It was easy to preach economy in the abstract; but every application of the doctrine would provoke objections from some advocates of expenditure who would say—"Look somewhere else for economy." In the event of the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs being adopted, he would move at the end of the Question the following words—

"And this House is further of opinion that if it should be decided, in opposition to the recommendation of the Indian Government, to maintain the Indian Museum in London, the expense of such a Museum ought to be borne by England, and not by India."

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, he had much sympathy with the views of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), but did not agree with him to the full extent of the recommendation he had made to the House. The Council of India were not a good body to maintain and conduct the Museum, and had shown much vacillation of purpose in regard to it. Nevertheless, such a Museum was extremely valuable, and the question was whether some method could not be devised whereby the large charge of £9,450 a-year on the finances of India might be largely diminished? He believed that £7,500 was the amount of the legitimate Museum expenses. Such a Museum was of great importance to our Indian Empire in two senses—in a political sense, and in an industrial sense. It was of great importance in a political sense that the masters of India—this country—should take an interest in her history, in her manners, her social habits, and in her industrial relations and manufactures; and, surely, there could be nothing more likely to interest this country than a well-organized and properly illustrated Museum, by which we could understand how much civilization had advanced in that country, and see that the Natives were by no means the barbarians we considered them. In an industrial sense, the Museum had a double use. It was useful to India, because England was a great customer of India, and it was well that there should be a complete picture of the products of India in a country which bought most of India's goods and manufactures. It was useful to England, because of the advantage it gave in the display of Oriental art and designs, from which our manufacturers benefited. Therefore, this was not an English or an Indian question alone, but a question of joint interest, and it was acknowledged that it was so in 1875, when the Treasury intimated to the India Office that they would be prepared to consider the necessity of furnishing, at the joint expense of England and India, such a Museum. He had gone into the question of expense with those who had considerable knowledge of museums; and he believed that, instead of the absurd sum of £7,500 a-year, the cost of conducting this Indian Museum should only be

Mr. Wilbraham Egerton

£2,000. If the Government asked the Department of Science and Art, they would find that the Museum could be managed and much improved for that sum. Then came the question of rental. Much had been said about the bad position of South Kensington, and the desirability of having the Museum in a central position; but such a position could not be had without incurring an expense which neither Government cared to incur at present. The question was, whether they could not by simple and moderate means avoid scattering the Museum, at least, for a few years, until the finances of both countries were in a better position? Being a Member of the Executive Committee of the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851, he could state—and he was revealing no secret in saying so—that the Royal President (the Prince of Wales) had written to the Prime Minister offering, on the part of the Commissioners, to make facilities for keeping the collection as long as it was considered desirable in their buildings, at a very great reduction of the rent, should the Government desire it. If the Museum was not, at present, as popular as it might be, there was no wonder, because there were no catalogues, and nothing to make things intelligible. He was sure that by the payment of £2,000 a-year on the part of the Indian Government the Museum could be put on a sound basis for a number of years; and he hoped the Government would convince the Indian Government that this was not the time to scatter a Museum of this kind.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE added his earnest request to the Under Secretary of State for India not to adhere to so pitiful a policy as the dissolution of our national Indian collection. Let it not go out to the art-collecting nations of Europe—to Paris, Vienna, and St. Petersburg—that for £2,000 a year we had dispersed an unique Museum of the history, arts, and productions of that Dependency which was our special boast and the envy of the world. What would be the inference? That England must be very hard up, on the very verge of bankruptcy, if she should allow such a thing to be done. One stroke of the pen might disperse the Museum; but what would ever bring it together again? As his hon. Friend the Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) had pointed out, there was a sentiment in the thing. This Museum was 80 years old. It went back to the great days of the Wellesleys, to the traditionary history of India. What effect must the dispersion have upon the Native mind, which was so much more accessible to sentiment than logic? As a student of art, as one who loved science, he must implore the Government not to have set against its name the black mark of having dispersed a Museum which had been ripening and growing for more than 80 years—that was, since we could call India especially our own.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that there was not the slightest objection on the part of the gentlemen connected with India that this collection should be kept together. The great difficulty the Indian Government had felt in this matter had been due to the grand and costly character of the proposed plan for placing the Museum on the Thames Embankment, and the doubt as to who was to bear the cost. The real question was on whose shoulders was the burden to fall, and the two Governments might determine to meet each other on this subject. He regretted that the question should be mixed up with the larger question of a Colonial Museum, from which it stood quite apart. If the various Colonies came forward to join in such a scheme, well and good; but now the question they had really to consider was this India Museum. He deprecated in the strongest way any shirking of the expense of maintaining this collection from economical motives. If that were once encouraged, he feared that the next proposal would be to get rid of the library. If the Government were willing to take the collection into the British Museum and into South Kensington, he trusted that by-and-bye the difficulty with respect to the cost of a building would not be insuperable, and that the ratepayers of this country would not refuse to bear a part of the expense. He sincerely hoped the collection would not be hastily dispersed; but that time would be taken for the consideration of some plan.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER agreed with those hon. Gentlemen who had urged the Government not to allow the Museum to be dispersed, for, if that was the case, "All the Queen's horses and all the Queen's men" would never put the Indian Museum together again. In the India Office there were a number of interesting pictures representing Shah Jehan, Aurungzebe, and other former Rulers of India. He suggested that in the re-arrangement of the India Museum those pictures should be placed in a proper position where the public could see them.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped this short discussion would have a practical result. At present, the sum of £9,000 a-year was paid at the expense of India to keep up a Museum which he believed was as good as it appeared to be badly managed. This was not a state of things to be regarded with any pleasure. In his opinion, it was rather mean to make the Indian Government pay for the maintenance of the Museum if it felt unable to do so. On the other hand, the Indian Government proposed to break up the Museum, and he should be very sorry to see that happen. Such a result would, in his judgment, be disadvantageous both to England and to India. Perhaps his hon. Friend (Mr. Grant Duff) might have exaggerated the advantages of the Museum; but, still, we ought not altogether to disregard them. By object-lessons of this kind we kept up popular and public interests; and when we were considering the interests of India we must bear in mind that it was the English people who ruled India, and that it was desirable that they should have everything which would give them an intelligent interest in the welfare of India. The exhibition of those ancient monuments of India, and other works of Indian art, would keep up that interest, and make us feel what our duties were towards the enormous population of India. That alone appeared to him to furnish very good grounds for not breaking up the India Museum. The proposal of the Under Secretary involved an enormous reduction as compared with the total amount expended on the Museum; because, instead of expending £9,000, it was proposed to expend only £2,000. It would be decidedly to the interest of India if this Museum were kept up for a few years, rather than that it should be broken up and scattered. The question was, how that plan could be carried out? If the Museum were placed under the direction of the Department of Science and Art, it would be in the hands of a body who really understood how it might be improved. They knew very well that the South Kensington Museum was almost the most popular place in the world. He had no doubt if the Trustees of the Museum had the management of the India Museum they would make it far more attractive, and therefore far more useful, than it was at the present moment. He therefore hoped the Government would not pledge themselves to prevent this offer from being taken fully into consideration. On the other hand, he did not think it a right thing that India should pay this £9,000 for the Museum, seeing the very little benefit she had received from it. He quite sympathized with the hon. Member for Hackney that the House of Commons ought not to check the Indian Government in effecting economies; and he hoped, if this offer was found to answer, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not be unwilling to allow the £2,000 to be paid out of the English Exchequer towards the maintenance of this important Museum.

MR. E. STANHOPE remarked, that the operative part of the hon. Gentleman's Resolution referred specially to the Indian Museum; but the remainder of his Resolution, and the greater part of his speech, referred to a scheme of a far wider character. It was a great Imperial scheme, and was part of the scheme put forward originally by Dr. Forbes Watson, whose imagination had soared so high as to lead him to propose the establishment, on the most expensive site in London, of a great Museum to be mainly paid for by India, where lectures were to be delivered, and he did not know what else done at the expense of the unfortunate taxpayers of India. That scheme had met with a great deal of approval in some quarters in that House; but whether it were realized or not it would not be fair to charge, and he did not believe the people of England would ever charge, the cost upon the Revenues of India. The hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs said that if such a plan were to be carried into effect the co-operation of the Asiatic Society might be relied upon. The belief at the India Office was that the reason why the Asiatic Society had not been able to make greater advances was because this visionary scheme of a central Museum was being constantly dangled before the eyes of the public. He believed that if such an idea were knocked on the head private enterprize would come forward, and endeavours would be made at once to enlarge the scope of the Asiatic Society and put some of its functions on a more satisfactory basis. The hon. Member said that if we did not adopt his scheme we ought to sell the Museum and thus get rid of it. That was not, however, the view taken by the Secretary of State for India, who attached great value to this collection, and who believed that the great objects which he, and he believed most Members of that House, had at heart could be secured, without any cost to the Revenues of India, by the scheme which he was now considering. What was the condition of the Indian Museum at the present time? Practically, in spite of its great interest, it was very little visited. The proposal under the consideration of the Secretary of State for India was altogether misunderstood by several hon. Gentlemen who had taken part in this debate. The objects of that proposal were—first, to make the Museum more generally useful to the public; and, secondly, to make portions of the collection available to different localities of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, where they could be seen to advantage. Lastly, they wished to effect those objects without any charge on the Revenues of India. When they came to consider the scheme there were one or two points on which there would be no difference of opinion. Hardly anybody would dispute that it would be much to the advantage of the economic section of the collection that it should be transferred to Kew. At Kew, under the charge and the skilled direction of Sir Joseph Hooker, who had already an admirable collection of similar objects relating to India, the public would have before them a complete exhibition of that class of the products of India. Kew was a place which was visited every year by many thousands of persons, and it was not less accessible than South Kensington. Then they came to the zoological part of the collection. When the Natural History Museum was finished at South Kensington it would be to everybody's advantage to transfer to the authorities at South Kensington, and make as complete as possible, the zoological collection; and it would be hardly desirable that they should keep up their small collection of stuffed birds and animals where they had no persons properly qualified to explain them. They then came to the remainder of the collection. The plan adopted by the Secretary of State in Council was to appoint a Special Committee of the India Office to consider the best means of carrying out the objects he had just indicated. That Committee would be very glad to receive suggestions from those who wished to offer any. They would read with great interest what had been said in the House to-night, and he hoped that Gentlemen taking a special interest in portions of the collection, like the hon. Member for Cheshire (Mr. W. Egerton), would kindly communicate with them on the matter and give them the benefit of their experience and advice. But the instructions which the Secretary of State had given to that Committee were that they should do everything in their power, in the recommendations which they might make to him, to retain the special Indian character of that collection. It might have been desirable to transfer the whole of the collection bodily to the British Museum, the authorities of which would be glad to take it upon the condition of giving it a distinctively Indian character; but that idea was not entertained by the Secretary of State for India as the best course to be adopted, because he had in view another plan, which was that certain portions of the collection—certain duplicates—ought to be made available for the local Museums in the Provinces. There was no possible means at the British Museum for carrying out such an object as that; but at South Kensington they had a machinery ready to their hand for the purpose. It had been suggested—and the suggestion was now before the Special Committee to which he had referred—that the ancient sculptures which were of a similar description to those already exhibited at the British Museum should be transferred to the British Museum, and that the illustrations of contemporary art should be transferred to the South Kensington authorities. But they were now told by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lyon Playfair) that the Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 were about to make an offer as to what they were prepared to do towards meeting the objects of the Secretary of State in Council, and he understood that the missioners were prepared to reduce very considerably the rent charged for the building in which the Museum was at present placed. That was a proposal which should properly be submitted to the Committee which was now sitting; but he was not prepared to say that the Secretary of State would entertain any proposal that £2,000 a-year should be taken from the Indian Revenues for the maintenance of that Museum. When the right hon. Gentleman talked of its being perfectly easy to keep up that Museum at the rate of £2,000 a-year he appeared to overlook the miscellaneous character of the Museum they had now. Take the coins, for example. What was the use of having a collection of coins when they had nobody who was at all competent to give them advice as to arranging and improving the collection?

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR explained, that what he had said was that the administration at South Kensington could do it for £2,000.

MR. E. STANHOPE: That was a point which would be considered by the Committee appointed by the Secretary of State. But if those things were to be taken over by the South Kensington Museum, and to be used for exhibition to the people of this country, and also to be sent through the Provinces, why should not the people of this country do it for themselves? Therefore, the suggestion to be considered was whether they could not endeavour to make some arrangement with the South Kensington authorities, or with the British Museum, for the transfer of the collection to them, so that the Indian Revenues would ultimately be entirely free from that charge. He confessed that he was sorry to hear the sneers which had been indulged in at the Government's attempts to economize. But economy was not the main ground of their action in that matter. They believed that it would end in the exhibition being much better shown to the public; but if they could save £5,000 a-year it would be of great advantage. He might add that their maintenance of that Museum had led them into another extravagance; because whenever an International Exhibition was held anywhere the Indian Government had been asked to make a considerable contribution towards it. In conclusion, the Government believed that that collection might be made one that would really instruct and amuse the English public, and that, instead of being, as at present, passive, it might be brought into active life; and with that view he hoped the House would not pass a Resolution which was calculated in any way to hamper the action of the Secretary of State for India in Council.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK observed, that he had not understood Dr. Forbes Watson to have proposed that the whole expense of a great Indian and Colonial Museum should fall upon India, but that the different parts of the Empire should contribute to the scheme in fair proportions. His hon. Friend the Member for Elgin (Mr. Grant Duff) had urged, very justly, as he thought, that when a project of that sort was before the public and was supported by large numbers of their countrymen in all parts of the Kingdom, it was a very unhappy moment to take for breaking up their Indian collection. No one, he supposed, would deny that it would be a great advantage for India if we knew more about her position and wants—if we had all, for instance, been able to spend some time there. Now, a Museum such as was contemplated by his hon. Friend (Mr. Grant Duff) was a sort of epitome of the country, and though, of course, only imperfectly, would to a certain extent remedy the defect, and be for the advantage of both countries. No one had a higher appreciation than he had of the valuable services of Sir Joseph Hooker; but, as the Under Secretary had told them, at Kew they already had a most admirable collection; and the same remark applied to a great extent with regard to the British Museum. No doubt, if that collection were really to be broken up, the Trustees of the British Museum would gladly receive it, still this would involve some expense. There was the great collection of ancient marbles. The buildings for the British Museum had not been constructed with reference to them, and they would occupy a considerable amount of space. The views he advocated were by no means confined to scientific men. The Association of Chambers of Commerce in the United Kingdom, in their Memorial to the Government, directed particular attention to the case of jute, the importation of which, though now amounting to several millions, was altogether a creation of the last 30 years. It might be said that if India produced something that we wanted, or vice versa, we were sure to find it out sooner or later; it was only a question of time. That was true, but time was everything. We owed our commercial position very greatly to the rapid utilization of new materials and new processes; and, moreover, the existence of such a Museum might actually create markets for the productions of India. It might, and probably would, tend in that direction, both by raising and developing the skill of the workmen in India, and by creating in this country a market for high-class Indian productions. Moreover, the evidence of the high appreciation in which first-rate Native work would be held in England would re-act on India itself, and perhaps stem the debasement of Indian art, resulting from a mistaken introduction of European fashions, and create a better appreciation of the indigenous art. The Memorial adopted by the Working Men's Club and Institutes of London gave evidence as to the opinions entertained by working men. They said—

"As artisans desirous of improving our artistic taste and industrial knowledge, we consider it highly desirable that we should have free and ready access to the admirable specimens of Indian workmanship to be found in the India Museum. The natural products and manufactures of that collection throw great light upon handicrafts in which we are engaged, and are calculated to promote our technical knowledge."

For his own part, he should not object to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). It could not be denied that the Museum would be an advantage to England as well as to India. But whether this were so or not, clearly the saving—the mere pecuniary saving—to India must be quite infinitesimal, and over and over again outweighed by the advantages the Museum afforded.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that he also, as a Member of the Indian Council when the Museum was established, had listened with great regret to the "no surrender" speech of the Under Secretary. As for the Asiatic Society, notwithstanding what it owed to the hon. Member for North Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke), it was quite incapable of undertaking the great task of maintaining and managing the Museum. The right hon. Member for Edinburgh University (Mr. Lyon Playfair) was very hard on the Indian Council when this Museum at South Kensington was established. The views of the Council were, in fact, those expressed by the right hon. Gentleman and others in this debate. They thought it most desirable that there should be a great Indian Museum, and that it should be established in England; but they, unfortunately, fell into the hands of the body to whom his right hon. Friend belonged, and who were, no doubt, a wise and useful body, but who considered it their duty to drive an exceedingly hard bargain with the India Office, and to claim an exorbitant rent for the Museum premises, in addition to excessively high charges for gas, heating, &c. There was no denying that the Museum at South Kensington had been a failure, and these charges, he was afraid, were among the causes. He suggested that a deal of trash which the Museum contained should be destroyed, that duplicate exhibits should be given to country institutions, and that some of the scientific objects should also be given away, leaving a valuable nucleus, partly economical and partly industrial, for retention by the Government, and for development when less was spent on spirited foreign policies and more on things useful to the people at home. He hoped that, some day or other, they would have an Indian Museum worthy of the name.

MR. E. JENKINS said, it seemed, from the statement of the Under Secretary, that South Kensington was destined to gobble up the Indian Museum. If this took place, it would result in the expenditure of far more money, because they would be asked to erect a special building for it at South Kensington, at a cost of some £60,000, which would afterwards mount up to £250,000. If this took place, and he were alive and in the House, he would protest against it.

MR. GRANT DUFF asked leave to withdraw his Resolution.

LORD ELCHO hoped the Report of the Committee, which had been referred to by the Under Secretary, would be laid upon the Table of the House before any final steps were taken in the matter.

MR. E. STANHOPE could not accede to this request, which would have the effect of deferring all action in the matter for a year.

NAVY—PROFESSIONAL OFFICERS IN THE DOCKYARDS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. T. BRASSEY, in rising to call attention to the responsibilities, rank, and emoluments of the professional officers in Her Majesty's Naval Yards, said, the position of the Constructive Departments in our Dockyards was by no means an unimportant question, for if the constructors of the Navy were inefficient our dockyard management would be a failure. Our ships would be too costly, or they would be badly built. On these two cardinal points of cost and workmanship the Constructors were solely responsible. It was laid down in the well-known Memorandum of Sir Spencer Robinson, which was prepared for the Duke of Somerset's Committee on the Board of Admiralty, that the Superintendent was in no sense responsible for the quality or the cost of the work done in the Dockyards. He was the vehicle through which orders passed from the Admiralty to the heads of Departments; but if a work which ought to have been done for £10,000 cost £16,000, he was not called upon to account for this excess. When a question was asked he directed the master shipwright to reply. All the Naval Superintendents who were examined by the Dockyard Commissioners in 1860 took a similar view of their position. The inquiry into the loss of the Megara brought out distinctly the sole responsibility of the professional officers for advising the Captain Superintendent and, through him, the Board of Admiralty, as to the seaworthiness of a ship for any voyage or service that she was to undertake. He wished distinctly to disclaim any desire to see the Naval Superintendents of Dockyards superseded by civilians. But it was obviously most important that the Constructors should be qualified to bear the weight of responsibility thrown upon them. They should be men of education, technical knowledge, and experience, and with ability to direct the labours of large bodies of men; and he asked the House seriously to consider whether the rank and emoluments of these officers were sufficient to command in all cases men of the necessary qualifications for the Public Service. The unsatisfactory position of the Constructors was described by Mr. Oliver Lang, the able Master Shipwright at Chatham, in his evidence before the Dockyard Commission in 1860, who said—

"I do not object to a considerable infusion of the working class, and their being allowed to rise to the highest offices in the branch. I complain that the sons of gentlemen are shut out entirely."

No substantial change had been made in the system of recruiting officers for the Constructor's Department since Mr. Lang's evidence was given. It was stated by Mr. Barnes, the Surveyor of Dockyards, in his evidence before the Stores Committee, that the present master shipwrights, in almost all cases, had been originally entered as apprentices in the Dockyards. The position of the professional officers of the Dockyards was the subject of very serious consideration on the part of the Committee on Dockyard Economy, of which Admiral Smart was the Chairman. That Committee had recommended that the status of the civil officers in Dockyards should be raised. The line between the employers and the employed had been very indistinctly drawn, and there had been a tendency to class the chief professional officers among the employed.

The master shipwrights and chief engineers should thenceforward be looked upon as commissioned officers, and be considered as identified with the Admiralty as the directors or employers of the labour, and not with those who executed the actual manual labour. A superior position in society and a superior education would always have their weight when placed in a proper position. The Commissioners who conducted the inquiry into the loss of the Merger made some strong observations on this point. They said—

“We feel compelled to remark that we have termed, however unwillingly, an unfavourable opinion as to the mode in which the administration of Her Majesty's Dockyards is generally conducted. The officers appear to us too often to have done no more than each of them thought it was absolutely necessary to do, following a blind routine in the discharge of their duties, and acting almost as if it was their main object to avoid responsibility.”

What had been done since these Reports were presented to stimulate the zeal of the professional officers in the Dockyards? The Master Shipwright was now called Chief Constructor, but was still subordinate to the Master Attendant. The head of the Shipbuilding Department, who, at Portsmouth, for example, had from 4,000 to 5,000 men under him, ranked below the head of the Rigging Department, who had only 440 men under his orders. Sir Houston Stewart had very justly called attention to this anomaly. While their relative rank remained unchanged, only a trifling addition had been made to the salary of the professional officers. He would take Portsmouth as an example. In 1868-9 the salary of the Chief Constructor was £700 a-year, and that of the Chief Engineer £650; together, £1,350. At that time 3,460 men were employed in the Dockyards, their wages amounting to £210,258. In 1879-80 the salary of the Chief Constructor was increased to £850, but that of the Chief Engineer was reduced to £534 a-year, the joint salaries of the responsible heads of the two great departments of the Dockyard being £1,384, or an increase of £34 only on the total amount paid 10 years before. In the meanwhile, the number of men had been raised to 4,961—an increase of 1,500 in number, their wages amounting to £326,000, or an increase of £116,000 a-year. He had referred to the case of the Merger as an example of the disasters that might occur from neglect of duty; but neglect of duty, in the form of omission to do a thing which ought to have been done, was, happily, a rare occurrence in Her Majesty's Dockyards. Extravagance and waste in going beyond the necessity of the case in the matter of alterations and repairs were far more common, and we had done nothing to encourage thrift and economy. The results that necessarily followed had been pointed out, not only by Committees and Commissions, but by independent critics of great authority. Admiral Smart's Committee had referred to this question in their Report. They thought that too little regard had been paid to cost, as distinguished from workmanship, and they recommended that some tangible mode should be provided by which any officer could be able to claim the credit of public approbation for any economy to the Public Service which had been obtained by his good management. Persons accustomed to administrative business would readily concur in the observation of Lord Clarence Paget, that—

“Where one Dockyard is found to conduct its business more economically than another it should be an understood thing that the officers of that Yard, who had, by their attention to these important matters, caused a saving of public money, should be advanced—that encouragement should be given to economy.”

Nothing, however, had been done to carry out that suggestion. No instance had occurred of an officer having been dismissed or suffering a loss of salary for extravagance, nor had any officer been promoted or pecuniarily rewarded for economical administration. There was no equitable principle in the amounts of the salaries awarded to the Chief Constructors at the several Yards. The Chief Constructor at Portsmouth received £850 for supervision over an annual expenditure of £326,191 on wages, and probably an equal amount on stores. The Chief Constructor at Pembroke had £700 a-year for supervision over a body of men whose aggregate wages amounted to £97,000. In connection with this subject, he would call attention to the strong representations which had been made by Admirals Hall, Chamberlain, Fellowes, and Sir Cooper Key, to the Committee on Stores as to the great importance of constant personal supervision of the work in progress on the parts of the Chief Constructors in the several Dockyards. The success attained in Pembroke Dockyard in building ships within the estimates had been exemplified in several remarkable cases which were quoted by Admiral Hall. These results he attributed to the great care which the professional officers at Pembroke were able to bestow on their work, from having time enough at their disposal to give the requisite attention to the details of construction. Admiral Fellowes made a strong representation on the same subject. He said it was imperative that the constructive duties of the Yard should receive more attention. There were at Chatham 3,800 men at work—men who were working night and day—and there was only one Chief Constructor and one constructor; whereas, under the old system, the work would have received the supervision of a Chief Constructor, two Constructors, and other officers; and this, at a time when a smaller number of men were employed and the Dockyard covered only 90 acres, instead of, as at present, 500 acres. According to the present practice, the officers of the Yards had but a small share in the preparation of the estimates. He would propose that whenever it was contemplated to build a ship in a particular Dockyard the Chief Constructor should be called upon to prepare an estimate of the cost. That estimate should be revised, and when an agreement had been finally established between the Admiralty and their local officer as to the amount, the figures should be bracketed in the Navy Estimates with the name of the responsible Dockyard officer. A spirit of emulation would thus be encouraged between the different Yards, while bad workmanship might be prevented by the frequent supervision of an Admiralty Surveyor. The organization of the French Constructive Department had been referred to by the hon. Member for Nottingham in his speech of last Session on our ship-building policy. It was equally worthy of examination in connection with the points to which he now called attention. The French professional officers held a higher relative rank than we had accorded to our Constructors. The Ingénieurs de la Marine were selected from the Ecole Polytechnique, and their promotion was secured by an appropriate gradation of ranks, corresponding with those established in the executive branch of the Navy. The staff included an Inspector General, who ranked with, but after, a Vice Admiral. He resided in Paris and made periodical visits to the ports. Under him were 11 directors of naval construction, all ranking immediately after a Rear Admiral in the French Navy, but before a captain. At the ports the Constructive Department was represented by an Inspector-in-Chief of the Naval Administrative Services, who was charged, in the name of the Minister of Marine, with the supervision of all the professional work in the Dockyards. The Inspector was subordinate in rank to the Préfet Maritime, who was a Vice Admiral; but in the discharge of his duties he acted under the orders received from the Minister of Marine and corresponded directly with him. The constructive staff for the English Navy should be selected from the Academy at Woolwich. They would receive their special training at Greenwich and at the Dockyards. They should have an honorary relative rank, like that which was given to the Corps of Naval Architects in the French Navy, and be entitled to the privilege of wearing a civil uniform. The criticisms of foreigners were often most suggestive. M. Xavier Raymond, formerly a frequent contributor on naval subjects to the pages of the Revue des deux Mondes, made the following remarks in his volume entitled Les Marines de la France et de l'Angleterre:—

“By an anomaly most remarkable, the administration of the Navy is conducted by a Board, and that Board is selected almost exclusively from one only of the numerous specialities which must be combined in order to constitute a naval establishment. Of the six individuals who form the Board two are Members of Parliament and do not belong to the Navy. The four others are naval officers. The administrative branches, works, and buildings, naval construction, gunnery, health, are all rigorously excluded.”

As for the Constructors in the ports, if their salaries were not inadequate, they occupied a position of inferiority in relation to the executive branches, unworthy of the talent and services of several of their number. The result was that certain individuals, and those, perhaps, the most distinguished, had left the Service. The name of the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) was quoted as a prominent example. He would venture to urge that the Constructors of the Navy should be constituted as a distinct corps, like the Ingénieurs de la Marine in France, and that we ought to have one or more Naval Architects in every Dockyard capable of preparing competitive designs for new ships. In the French Service, the work of the central office was limited to the specification of the qualities and the general features of the new ships which it was proposed to build. The programme having been prepared at headquarters, the Dockyards were invited to furnish competitive designs, and the most successful was selected. That plan insured a wide development of ideas, and prevented the shipbuilding of the Navy falling into a groove under the direction of a single mind. Turning from the Dockyards to the Council of Construction, he found that the highest shipbuilding officer in the Navy had a salary of £1,200 a-year. The responsibility for the design and construction of new ships, and for supplying those ships with proper machinery, rested exclusively with the civil members of the staff of the Controller of the Navy. The Controllers themselves had on all occasions most fully acknowledged their dependence on the aid of professional men. He put it to the House to consider whether the present salary of £1,200 should or should not be regarded as a maximum, and whether it might not be expedient to hold out to the Chief Constructor of the Navy some further prospect of honorary or pecuniary advancement. Was the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) altogether wrong when he said, in his evidence before the Duke of Devonshire's Committee on Scientific Instruction, that it seemed to him to be quite out of the question that the Chief Constructor of the Navy—a man who had been admitted in Parliament by the First Lord of the Admiralty to have been capable of saving or losing £1,000,000 in a short period—should be receiving a salary of £900 a-year, as he was when he first entered the Admiralty, or £1,500 a-year, as he was when he left. It was well known that managers of private establishments were receiving very much greater incomes. The Engineer-in-Chief of the Navy held an office second only in importance to that of the Director of Naval Construction. He was the adviser of the Controller and of the Admiralty generally on all that related to the steam branch of the Service. He held a highly responsible position in relation to contracts for the supply of machinery. The Estimates for the present year provided for the purchase of machinery at a cost of £396,000. It was not enough that the Chief Engineer of the Navy should possess a competent technical knowledge. He must be capable of defending his opinions before the Board of Admiralty and the Council of Construction. Was it quite consistent to give £1,000 a-year to the Chief Engineer of the Navy, while the Directors of Transport and of Works, who were executive officers, and were rewarded with the Order of the Bath and the other distinctions awarded to the executive line, were respectively receiving £1,550 and £1,300 a-year? By a Return of all civilians employed by the Crown, which was moved for by his right hon. Friend below him (Mr. Childers), and which had recently been presented to Parliament, it appeared that 1,040 persons were employed in the Civil, Judicial, and Revenue Departments, at a total annual charge of £1,437,000 a-year, giving an average salary of £1,400 a-year. In that long list of 1,040 favoured officials no civil officer employed under the Admiralty had been fortunate enough to be included. That exclusion was hardly consistent when they came to consider that the greatest Navy in the world was built, equipped, and repaired under their supervision. He had no desire to see changes suddenly introduced, without regard to the individual merits of the officers employed. He fully appreciated the difficulties of the political heads of the Admiralty in the matter. They might be excused if they hesitated to give a very rapid advancement to officers of whose capacity they could have but scanty personal knowledge. They would all agree, however, that talent could only be attracted to the Public Service, and retained in it, by offering positions worthy of acceptance. The Admiralty might begin, as opportunity offered, by improving the position of heads of Departments at Whitehall. He did not intend to bring this question forward time after time; but, having stated the case, he would leave it with confidence to the experienced judgment and mature consideration of the First Lord of the Admiralty and his Colleagues, knowing that the right hon.

Gentleman was anxious to do all in his power to promote the efficiency of the Naval Service.

PENSIONS TO WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF SEAMEN AND MARINES.

OBSERVATIONS.

CAPTAIN PRICE, in rising to call attention to the importance of making sufficient provision for the widows and orphans of Seamen of Her Majesty's Navy and Royal Marines, said, the subject had been before the House for a considerable time; and he, therefore, would not trouble them with many remarks. His object that evening was to get from Her Majesty's Government some statement as to what they were now prepared to do in the matter. He did not ask for any definite promise; but he hoped to receive an assurance that they were prepared to give assistance to the men in making provision for their wives and children. According to careful calculations which had been made by an actuary, it would require a stoppage from a man's pay of 10s. a-month in order to provide a pension of £20 a-year for his widow. It was out of the question that a seaman could give such a sum; and it was, therefore, proposed that each man should give 5s. a-month, and that the other 5s. should be provided by the Government. If the seamen could only give 3s. a-month, the Government should only give a similar amount. The scheme had been reduced to very simple limits. It was proposed that the insurance should be effected in the same way that all assurances were effected—namely, by a man giving a certain sum to secure a certain pension. Having settled what the total cost would be of providing a Pension Fund according to the Returns which had been presented, the question naturally arose how it could be kept within proper limits. One of the modes in which that could be done was for the Government to impose a limit of age. They should not be called on to pay a pension to the widow of any man who chose to marry under 25. That would reduce the amount required, and keep it within certain limits. The total number of married men in the Service was about 15,000; but of these about 1,500 were under 25 years of age. The adoption, therefore, of that rule would limit the number of pensions to widows to a corresponding amount. The number might also be limited by requiring a certain amount of extra service. He had taken the opinion of many petty officers and others who were interested in this question, and he understood that some would be quite prepared to give as much as five years' extra service, which would be a sufficient quid pro quo for such a grant. There would be a great advantage to the Service in this, that such a scheme would operate as a check upon desertion. He did not think the cost of desertion could be less than £300,000 a-year, and a large sum would, therefore, be saved to the country by the proposed scheme. In the Navies of France and Germany the principle he advocated was carried out. In the German Service the widow of a petty officer received £12 12s., and he was not sure whether any pension was given to the children. The widows of able and ordinary seamen got pensions of £9 a-year, with £6 6s. for every child up to the age of 16. This made a very considerable pension. No doubt, it might be said our men received higher pay; but the difference of pay did not enable our seamen and marines to provide for their widows and orphans. If France and Germany could give pensions to the widows of their seamen and marines, surely a great country like this could do something in the same direction. The principle which he advocated had been already adopted in the case of the Coastguards. It might, he knew, be said that whenever a great disaster occurred in the Navy the public came forward and subscribed liberally for the widows and orphans of the sufferers. That was true; but they should not forget that every year men suffered violent deaths in the Service, of which the public knew nothing. The year 1874 was a year of peace, and one in which no great disaster occurred, yet the deaths from drowning in the Service were 79; from falling from aloft, 35; from accidental wounds, 9; and from various causes other than natural, 8. In fact, every two years and a-half it might be said that an Eurydice was lost—that was to say, about the same number of deaths by violence occurred in the Navy as occurred through the loss of the Eurydice; and he might add that the feeling in the Service was opposed to appeals being made to the charitable feelings of the public. It was thought that a great deal of blame rested on Parliament for not adopting some such suggestion as he now made for the relief of these constantly recurring cases of great distress. One of the sources from which the pensions to widows and orphans might be derived was the savings on rations to the men in the Service which were not taken up. Some years since a Committee sat to consider the subject, and they reported that the saving to the Government under the head of provisions amounted to something like £70,000 a-year. He trusted that they would hear something definite and satisfactory from Her Majesty's Government with respect to the question, pressing and important as it was, which he had ventured to bring under the notice of the House. He did not expect them to commit themselves to any plan; but he trusted they would promise to appoint a Committee to inquire into the subject.

MR. D. JENKINS said, if there was any blot in the Naval Service it was want of practical experience, and it was nonsense to suppose that experience could be gained by mere theoretical or scientific training. With regard to the accidents to the Megara and the Thunderer, they were due to the imperfection of the system adopted, and not to want of skill on the part of officers holding positions of trust in the Dockyards. He, for one, did not object to high situations of trust being held by men who had been promoted gradually from the position of apprentices, and that view was supported by the fact that men who had reflected the greatest lustre on the Royal Navy included those who had risen from the ranks. With respect to salaries, if the Admiralty had not already got the best men in the country, he would say by all means let them engage their services, and not shrink from doing so for the mere sake of saving a few hundreds a-year.

MR. E. J. REED said, great credit was due to the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Brassey) for the remarks he had addressed to the House, notwithstanding the invidiousness of having to suggest an increase of expenditure on the Government of the day. The people on whose behalf his hon. Friend had spoken had very few advocates or friends. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had once, rightly or wrongly, stated in a public document that he (Mr. E. J. Reed) had saved the country £100,000 on every ship which was built under his direction, and yet he had never received a single sixpence of reward in the shape of pension or otherwise; and yet, when one took up a list of pensions relating to the Navy, he found pensions of various kinds, and distributed to such a large extent, that he thought the Admiralty must be at a loss sometimes to know where to bestow these large sums. It did not lie in the mouth of the Government to say they had no funds—that they must set their face against any considerable increase in the salaries of those who had rendered good services—while they had such large pensions at their disposal to distribute unnecessarily to other classes of officers. His hon. Friend said it was true that the civil officers of the Admiralty received decorations and orders, and other things of the kind, in exchange for their services. He received a decoration to remain in the Service when on the point of leaving, and he believed a decoration was conferred on another gentleman; but he was at a loss to recollect any other instance, and he could not understand what had happened to the country; why it should go on under a system which showered decorations and orders upon one branch—namely, the militant branch—not for war services or great distinctions—while nothing of the kind was bestowed on men who laboured perpetually and successfully in other branches. He thought the day would come when this question of the distribution of decorations and orders would have to be considered by the country. He was satisfied that from the Naval Service would be drawn examples of the unfair distribution of these honours. We lived in an age in which mechanism played a more important part than in days gone by, and we were approaching a time when the merits of mechanical men would be more recognized than at present. In the same way, a great effort was made by the former Administration to combine the shipbuilding and engineering branches under one authority. He had never advocated putting the engineers under the shipbuilders, any more than the shipbuilders under the engineers; but his experience at the Admiralty showed that the Public Service sustained great disadvantages from having two authorities in connection with shipbuilding and engineering. He hoped the present Government had not taken any steps to weaken what had been done by the former Government in that respect. Although he represented Pembroke, a small Yard, he had no hesitation in joining his hon. Friend in trying to improve the position of the Chief Constructors in the large Yards. The Government had elevated the position of Chatham, and of the officers with it, and had shown a desire to improve both their status and pay. The Government ought to remember that the course of events had forced mechanism and mechanics into more and more importance in the Naval Service; and, therefore, they ought to deal with those who were concerned with that branch of the business in a larger and broader spirit than they had done hitherto. The officers of the Admiralty and the Dockyards generally received pensions. He was one of those who did not. He was very proud of the fact that he had been privileged for seven years to serve the public without a pension of any kind. He quite agreed with those who held that it was a great distinction for a man to be able to serve his country in a position of responsibility, like that of the principal officers of the Admiralty and the Dockyards. It was hardly possible to exaggerate the weight of the responsibility that rested on them, and no one would more readily bear witness to the manner in which it was sustained than, on the one hand, the political chiefs, and, on the other, the Naval officers who came into contact with them. He believed all his hon. Friend desired could be done without in any way injuring the status of any naval officer. It might be said that one of the consequences of putting technical officers of Her Majesty's Dockyards into positions of greater responsibility would be to throw those positions open to competition. He was satisfied that to throw them open to competition could not be done with advantage to the Public Service. When he retired from Office he believed his right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) did cast about for some outside person to be put in his place. He had heard that his right hon. Friend had fixed his mind on a gentleman in a private dockyard. But there was a difficulty in carrying out that idea, and the area of choice was very limited indeed. The officers of the Dockyards were not open to the suspicion of being theoretical rather than practical men. He did not believe there was a more practical body of men in the country than the technical officers of the Admiralty and the Royal Dockyards. Nearly every man among them had begun his profession with apprenticeship, and had acquainted himself with the use of tools, and nearly every one had risen from a humble position to the position he now occupied. What happened when a private yard wanted a manager? They came to the Royal Dockyards, and the men they got were those who had not been successful in the competition of the Public Service. The inference he drew was that the men in the Royal Dockyards were of the highest skill, both theoretically and practically, that could be found at present in the whole world. A word as to one or two practical suggestions of his hon. Friend. At present, the Admiralty systematically sent the Office estimates of the cost of new ships to the Dockyards, and there they were overhauled, revised, and reported on by the local officers. But there would be great disadvantage in attaching the name of the local Chief Constructor to the estimate of the cost of a ship. If the Admiralty were, in this matter of the estimates, to screen themselves behind the local officers, Members of that House would be in a worse position in criticizing them than they now were. Those who thought otherwise ought to be excused, on account of the variations which the Navy Estimates presented as to the cost of ships. He did not see that the slightest fault could be found with the Admiralty for modifying, from time to time, the estimated cost of their ships, for this reason, that a large ship took a considerable time in constructing, and in these days, as the art of naval construction underwent much modification, it was one of the most important duties of the Admiralty to improve their ships as the building of them went on. The only thing they were not justified in doing was in delaying ships. The best thing to do was to complete a ship that might be in progress according to the best information they had at the time. The present Board of Admiralty had given many indications of a desire to meet the actual circumstances of the case, and to improve the position of technical officers. They ought to continue to bear in mind that the demand was for large changes in every Department of the Service, and if, out of the total Navy Estimates, they attempted to do full justice to those officers, he believed they might give them what was right without doing any injustice to anyone.

MR. BENTINCK desired to make a few remarks of a general character. He had always regretted the apparent indifference of the House of Commons to everything connected with the welfare of the British Navy. He could not congratulate the Government either on their Navy Estimates or on the manner in which they had been introduced. He believed this was the first time on record when the Navy Estimates had come on for the first time for discussion as the Second Order of the Day.

MR. W. H. SMITH remarked, that on the first night they were brought forward they were the First Order of the Day.

MR. BENTINCK said, that might be so; but they were not discussed. This was the first time they had come up for discussion. It might appear odd that in discussing the Navy Estimates he should refer to the condition of the Army. This country had two arms for the purposes of defence and aggression, and if one of those arms was in bad condition, the fact made it all the more incumbent upon us to look to the state of the other. He contended, without fear of disproof, that the Army of this country was a myth. It had ceased to exist, and the proof was that when we had to contend with a few savages in South Africa the whole British force was not equal to the undertaking, and we were compelled to supplement our Army by a corps of Marines. Our Army had been destroyed by the late Government, and the present Government had not had the courage to restore it. And what was the condition of the Navy? It was not equal, at the present moment, to the requirements of the country. We had not iron-clads enough for the duty of the country in time of peace. An incontestable proof of this was that the Admiralty had been obliged to send the Shah as flag ship to the Pacific, confessedly because they had no iron-clad available for service. Moreover, he maintained that we did not possess a sufficient number of ships to protect our own commerce in time of war, or to prey upon the commerce of our enemy. As a matter of sound policy, we ought to have such a number of ships that, in the event of war with a great maritime Power, we could at once sweep the sea of her property, and defend our own. Under what were called the blessings of Free Trade, this country had not more than two or three months' supply of food in hand. This was a question of life and death to this country, as our supply of food was wholly dependent upon our having command of the sea. We had not a sufficient number of frigates and corvettes, and very few of those we possessed could be handled under canvas. This result was caused by our having too much of the scientific element, and too little of the seaman element in the construction of our ships. We were building nothing but floating batteries, which would not do anything except under steam. Quite understanding the difficulty which the First Lord of the Admiralty must feel when going to his Colleagues in Council, and asking them to supply more money for the wants of his Department—understanding that the right hon. Gentleman must feel the same difficulty in coming to the House of Commons, and asking for larger supplies for the Navy—his belief was that the present or any other Government would stand much higher in the opinion of the country if they came frankly forward at once and said—what they knew to be true—that the present condition of the Navy was not what it ought to be, and that more money was required to make it efficient.

MR. E. HUBBARD, in supporting the Motion, urged the importance of suitable provision being made in the form of pensions for the widows and orphans of the seamen of Her Majesty's Navy and the Royal Marines. He found that out of 53,500 men upon the books of the Navy, rather more than one-third were married, and it was calculated about £100,000 a-year would be required to provide a fund for the insurance of the widows of those men. He did not urge the First Lord of the Admiralty to give any definite promise, but merely to assent to the Motion which had been brought forward, or to grant a Commitee, which might, without any unnecessary delay, obtain all requisite information connected with that subject.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he could not complain of the manner in which the discussion or conversation that had now gone on for two or three hours had been introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey), who had called attention to the claims of that most valuable body of men, of whom it was impossible for anyone occupying his position to speak too highly. The Admiralty desired now to express their confidence in, and their obligations to, the officers who were called the constructors, and whose abilities had been of the greatest possible value to this country in developing a powerful Navy, which was certainly equal, and, he believed, superior, to any Navy which existed on the face of the earth. That, he ventured to assert, notwithstanding what had just fallen from the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck). His hon. Friend the Member for Hastings had stated the case of those officers with his usual moderation and discretion, and he had wound up by saying that he did not desire to ask from the Government or from the House any particular remedy to be applied at the present moment; but that his object was to bring before the House the claims of a body of scientific gentlemen, whose services were of great value to the country, to fair consideration whenever it was possible that that consideration could be given. He was perfectly ready to accept the suggestions of his hon. Friend in the sense and with the feeling with which they had been put forward. He could not undertake to make specific improvements in regard either to position or salary, or in any of the various modes which had been hinted at by his hon. Friend. But he wished to repeat, what he had often said in the Board-room of the Admiralty, that they owed great acknowledgments, not only to the gentlemen at Whitehall who assisted them in designing their ships of war, and who assisted them with their advice on the questions from time to time submitted to them, but also owed a great debt of gratitude to the scientific staff of the Dockyards, who certainly had performed their work with very great zeal and very great success; and, notwithstanding the absence of some of those inducements to which the hon. Member referred—in-ducements which could be offered by private establishments, but which could not, in the nature of things, be offered, at any rate so completely, by Public Departments. They had certainly discharged their very difficult duties with very great advantage to the Public Service. The hon. Member had spoken of the constructors and the constructing staff of the Navy as not being always rewarded for the economy they might effect, or the improvements they might make, in the management of the Dockyards, or in the conduct of the business particularly under their charge. Well, it would be an exceedingly difficult thing to lay down any system by which a distinct appreciation of good service might be always accorded in the manner in which he admitted it was possible for the independent head of a great mercantile establishment to reward an efficient manager or head of a department. The hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) had alluded to the results of his exertions in the construction of ships, and to the fact that no money reward, or other reward, was given to him in acknowledgment of those services. The hon. Gentleman had, at least, the satisfaction of knowing that they were very highly appreciated; and it might be said that the position he occupied in the House and the country was due, in some degree, to the position he had previously held in the Admiralty, and to the fame his abilities had acquired for him in the Public Service. But he was bound to say that if he could see a way that was entirely free from bias, and from all those difficulties which surrounded the giving of rewards for good work in the administration of Public Departments, he would be extremely glad to adopt it. His hon. Friend the Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey) had referred to the fact that, at the present moment, certain positions in the Constructor's Department in the Dockyards and at the Admiralty were unattainable by the sons of gentlemen. Perhaps, in one sense it might be called an exclusive Service; but, whatever might be said from that point of view, the mechanical and scientific abilities of the gentlemen who were now occupied in constructing ships and in superintending the construction of ships for Her Majesty's Service were, at least, equal to those of any body of men filling the same positions in any other part of the world. He did not compare them invidiously with the officers of other countries; but if their position was not the same, and if they did not spring from the same class as the constructive Service of other countries did, the results, at least, were as satisfactory as they could desire them to be. It was, as the hon. Member for Pembroke stated, essentially a practical Service. The constructors were selected, first of all, from the apprentices in the Dockyards. These apprentices were admitted on open competition, and the best, after a further competition, were sent to Greenwich, where they received a careful and complete training, after which they came back to the Dockyards. The result of this system was highly satisfactory in producing highly-trained men with a practical knowledge of their profession. At that time in the evening he was sure the House would forgive him if he spoke briefly; but he was anxious to record their high sense of the value of these gentlemen. The hon. Member for Pembroke had referred to the fact that, in the Dockyard establishments, the work of concentration set on foot by his right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had, to some extent, been undone. The fact was, experience had shown that this concentration had been carried rather too far. The Chief Constructor was found to have more work and responsibility thrown upon him than he could efficiently perform, and he himself welcomed the change. The Chief Constructor retained his superior position, and the storekeeper was, in all essential points, subordinate to him. At Devonport, the change had not been made, it was left to compare with the working of the new system after sufficient experience at the other yards, the system was found to work better there than at Portsmouth. Reference had also been made to the mode in which the estimates for ships were dealt with. He agreed that it would be unfair to the Chief Constructor, who might not be responsible for any changes made in a ship during her construction, that his name should be bracketed with the estimate during its whole course from first to last. The system adopted was this. The estimates for the new ship were, first of all, made at Whitehall, and then sent to the dockyard at which the ship was to be constructed. There they were most carefully overhauled and reported upon, after which they were sent back to Whitehall, where they were again considered. In this way, two sets of minds were brought to bear upon them. In the case of estimates for repairs, the process was reversed. This system was found to work most advantageously. As to the care that was exercised in the Dockyards, he doubted whether, in any private yard, the work was done so efficiently as in Her Majesty's Dockyards. The officers all felt the great responsibility of their position, and knew that they would be seriously called to account were they to overlook any circumstance or condition necessary to efficiency or to safety. The consequence was that the work was most thoroughly done. In fact, it was done, if anything, he might say, a little too thoroughly. Our ships were so built that they would last a very long time, and he believed they had a very satisfactory result for their expenditure. The hon. Member for Hastings had referred to a number of Reports made during the last 50 years. He must confess that he had not himself been able to go through these Reports; but he was obliged to the hon. Member for his industry, and he would give them most careful attention. His hon. Friend had compared the French Service with our own. He admitted that the position of the officers in the French Service was, in some respects, superior. Their rank, and the distinction with which they were treated were greater; but he believed their salaries were not so good. Rank was, in the French Service, often taken in lieu of salary; but he was not sure that our officers would welcome a change upon this principle. He might refer the hon. Member to a Report drawn up by M. Gambetta, and presented to the French Chambers this year upon the Naval Service, in which it would be found that, in the opinion of the French Budget Committee, our Naval administration compared favourably with their own. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Devonport (Captain Price) had asked for some assurance from the Government as to provision, in the shape of pensions, being made for the widows and o of seamen. He must, in the first place, point out that the Estimates to which he had drawn attention had only come to his hands a very few days ago. He must also draw attention to the fact that, in the Notice which appeared upon the Paper, his hon. and gallant Friend spoke of a provision for orphans as well as widows, whereas in his speech he had omitted all reference to orphans. The introduction of the orphans would make a great difference in the calculations. He would, therefore, have to speak with great caution. When the subject was first introduced, some years ago, it was proposed that seamen should contribute 6*d.* a-month, the remainder being supplied by Parliament. Subsequently, it was proposed that this 6*d.* should be raised to 1*s.* 8*d.* a-month. The present proposal that the seamen should contribute as much as 5*s.* a-month was one on which he should hesitate to express an opinion before he knew how far the men would be content to submit to such a large deduction from their wages. His hon. and gallant Friend proposed that these allowances should not be granted to any men who married below a certain age. But this itself would give rise to difficulty; for it had been pointed out to him that the greatest danger to such a fund would arise from men marrying above a certain age. If the system of pensions to widows of seamen were carried too far, it would serve as an incentive to young women to marry very old men, in order that they might get their pensions the sooner, while they themselves would live a long time. All he could promise was that he would take the matter into further consideration, and would endeavour to ascertain what was the real feeling of the men on the subject of forming a provision for their wives in case of their own deaths; and he should be glad to accept any suggestion in reference to the matter which did not throw too heavy a burden upon the country. The hon. and gallant Member had said that, by making some adequate provision for the widows of sailors, desertion from the Navy would be checked. He was afraid that men who were content to abandon their own long service pensions would not be much influenced by the fear of forfeiting the pensions of their wives. He fully admitted the painful position in which a sailor's widow was placed by her husband being cut off in early life by some accident, and he could assure the hon. and gallant Member that the subject of pensions to the widows should have the careful consideration of the Government. It must not be forgotten, however, that these men were themselves entitled to pensions at the early age of 38, which formed a very heavy item in the Estimates of the year. The hon. Member for West Norfolk had asked for information as to the present condition of the Royal Navy. If he understood the hon. Member rightly, he was of opinion that this country should possess a Navy sufficiently powerful to cope with any emergencies to which we might be exposed. He himself was quite prepared to assent to that proposition, and, in his view, our Navy was quite sufficient for that purpose. We had a Mediterranean Fleet in good order; we had a Channel Squadron which was not in bad order; we had eight iron-clad ships in commission attached to the Coastguard equal to any others of a similar type which were to be found in foreign Navies; we had in the first-class Steam Reserve four sea-going iron-clads equal to those of any foreign Navy, ready to go to sea; we had nine more which would be complete in the course of the year, and most of which might, if necessary, be ready in the course of two or three months. At the present moment we had 26 iron-clads in commission; we had four sea-going iron-clads ready for sea in reserve, including the Dreadnought, and, in addition, three coast defence ships; and we had nine others which would be ready in the course of the year, including the powerful ships Sultan, Superb, Neptune, and Devastation. These figures ought, he thought, to be satisfactory to the House. We had 42 iron-clads, either in commission or ready to put to sea in a short time, and these constituted a force adequate to any emergency which was likely to arise. If he felt it necessary to come down to the House for further Supplies, in order to increase the offensive or defensive force of the country, he should not hesitate to do so; but he did not think it desirable to ask for increased Votes for building ships which might become obsolete in a few years, and especially at a time when, he believed, our Navy was thoroughly adequate to any service which it might be called upon to perform, and thoroughly able to cope with any Power which might be brought against it. With these few remarks, he hoped the House would now go into Committee on the Estimates.

THE COASTGUARDS.

OBSERVATIONS.

CAPTAIN PIM said, he did not see any credit given for the deduction of 1s. a day made from the wages of the Coastguard during the time they were ordered to serve afloat.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, the amount was deducted in the total charged, and he did not see that any advantage would be gained by dividing the item in that part of the Votes.

CAPTAIN PIM considered it a hard case that these men who were the best afloat, should be deprived of 1s. a-day. The item would be a considerable one, seeing that the number of men mentioned in the Vote was 4,150.

MR. A. F. EGERTON had never known of any complaint being made on account of this deduction from the wages of the Coastguard men, by whom it was thoroughly understood.

CAPTAIN PIM was not impugning the justice of the Admiralty in making the deduction in question. He merely wished to draw attention to the fact that the amount of the stoppage was not mentioned in the Votes.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the Coastguard men had always been liable for this stoppage from their pay, and the Estimates, as the hon. Member for Gravesend must know, were upon precisely the same footing as formerly.

CAPTAIN PIM thought that the Estimates were framed in such a manner as rendered them very difficult to be understood, and that the sooner they were altered the better.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £1,003,375, Victuals and Clothing for Seaman and Marines.

CAPTAIN PIM asked for information with regard to the item of £1,396 charged as dresses for Marines doing duty as officers' servants. Was this amount in addition to the ordinary clothing of the Marines?

MR. A. F. EGERTON replied, that it was a provision for the Service, and was, of course, so far, for the Marine branch.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £185,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the Admiralty Office, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

MR. BIGGAR said, he should have to move the reduction of this Vote, with the object of calling attention to the claims of Mr. John Clare for compensation to which he believed himself to be entitled for improvements in the construction of ships of war. Without going at any length into the case, he would merely state that Mr. John Clare had devoted a great deal of time, and taken a great deal of trouble in this matter some years ago. The Admiralty of the day had made use of his plans and specifications, and when he had asked for payment he had been put off from time to time. Ultimately, he was advised to appeal to a Court of Law, and, having done so, the proceedings resulted in a verdict against him. This was due to the evidence given at the trial by Mr. Scott Russell and Sir Charles Fox. A new trial was applied for and refused on the ground that these gentlemen were persons of great eminence in their profession, and that their evidence could be relied upon. The Law Officers of the Crown had been referred to, and they had said that upon the legal view of the case Mr. Clare could not recover. But, upon the grounds of justice and fair play, he (Mr. Biggar) certainly thought that the case of Mr. Clare might fairly be made the subject of further inquiry at the hands of a Committee. The fact of Mr. Clare having appealed to a Court of Law and been beaten, was not, in his opinion, sufficient reason for refusing an independent inquiry into the merits of this case, and he, therefore, trusted that the Government would appoint a Committee to consider it. Various Members of the House had, from time to time, been canvassed by Mr. Clare, with the result that his case, which had given a good deal of trouble, had been brought forward in the House. He had not, of course, been able to verify all the statements made by Mr. John Clare; but it was the opinion of a good many hon. Members that he had, upon its merits, an honest case. For that reason, he thought the Government should agree to the appointment of a Committee. If that Committee should decide in favour of Mr. Clare, the Government would, no doubt, do what was reasonable and fair; on the other hand, if the decision went against him, the House would have obtained the expression of independent opinion upon the merits of the case, which would then be ended once for all. He moved the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £100 under sub-head A.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £184,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the Admiralty Office, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880.”—(Mr. Biggar.)

CAPTAIN PRICE said, that one reason against the suggestion of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was that Mr. John Clare had appealed to the public at large, by means of an advertisement in the second column of The Times, headed, “John Clare National Testimonial,” for subscriptions in recognition of his services to the State. No doubt, by this means he had realized a large fortune, and he (Captain Price) thought that the House would not now re-open the question.

MR. E. J. REED believed that Mr. John Clare had an honest conviction that he had done something for the benefit of the Public Service, and was quite sure that this belief was, in some degree, shared by every hon. Member who had the slightest interest in the case. But he wished to point out to the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) that, in his opinion, the House, before taking up this cause, which had been heard both in official Departments and in a Court of Law, should have presented to it some evidence that there had been a miscarriage of justice. For a long time previous to his going to the Admiralty he had given Mr. Clare a considerable number of interviews upon the subject of his claim, and he was bound to state that, at that time, when he was entirely free from any prejudice against it, he was never able to discover that it rested upon any solid ground. If he believed that Mr. John Clare had, in the smallest degree, contributed to the improvement of Naval architecture, he would be ready to back up the hon. Member for Cavan in his proposal for a Committee, because, in his opinion, the facts that a verdict had been given against him, and that time had elapsed, were not sufficient reasons for the refusal of justice if it could be made clear that there were any solid grounds to go upon. He would be willing, in that case, that a Committee should be appointed, were it only for the satisfaction of a man so assiduous as Mr. Clare. But it was too serious a matter that the House should appoint a Committee of its Members to inquire into a plea merely because that plea had been systematically asserted and re-asserted. As a suggestion to the hon. Member for Cavan, he would willingly meet the hon. Member and Mr. Clare, who had an honest belief in the justice of his claim, to hear what he had to say; and, in the event of anything being produced that would justify a change of opinion on his part, Mr. Clare and his hon. Friend should have the benefit of it; though, as he had said, from the intimate knowledge of the case which he possessed, he felt that Mr. Clare was without claim.

MR. BIGGAR did not think that the observations of the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) had affected anything he had said in regard to the case. The verdict against Mr. Clare in a Court of Law was given upon the evidence of Mr. Scott Russell and Sir Charles Fox. Both those gentlemen specifically averred that Mr. Clare's plan was not a novelty. Since that period Mr. Clare had been able to show that both those gentlemen were mistaken. If the argument, therefore, of the hon. Member for Pembroke were based upon that ground he thought that it failed, and that Mr. Clare was not entitled to an inquiry. The Committee had only heard an ex parte statement of the case, and had not had an opportunity of judging of its merits. He was thoroughly convinced in his own mind that Mr. Clare was entitled to the inquiry.

CAPTAIN PIM said, that he felt very strongly for Mr. Clare, and considered that he had a very good case; he therefore hoped that his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty would be able to give some encouragement to the hon. Member for Cavan to believe that what he had asked for would be granted. He would point out to the hon. Member for Pembroke that Mr. Clare claimed to be the original inventor of the wing passage bulkhead. If he were the originator of that bulkhead he thought that some consideration should be shown him. It would do no harm whatever if the question were re-opened by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty by appointing one or two gentlemen to decide upon its merits. If the hon. Member for Cavan went to a division upon the question he should certainly vote with him.

MR. SAMUDA hoped that the hon. Member for Cavan would not go to a division. He was sure that he had not been fully informed as to what took place at the trial when Mr. Clare brought forward his claim against the Admiralty. Whatever Mr. Scott Russell, and the other gentleman who gave evidence, might have said, he could state most distinctly that at that trial there was no claim on the part of Mr. Clare to have been the originator of what was alleged by his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan to be his invention. The claim put forward by Mr. Clare was for having been the first to build a vessel in a particular form with regard to cellular compartments. The description which he gave of his invention was, in all respects, absolutely and entirely the same as that which had been used in the Great Western many years before, and with which vessel Mr. Clare had had nothing to do. It was not solely upon the evidence of Mr. Scott Russell that the verdict was given, for he (Mr. Samuda) was one of the witnesses whom the Admiralty called to give evidence with respect to the matter. He called attention to the fact that Mr. Clare had called upon him and endeavoured to explain his invention, and that he then showed him that two or three years before the date of his invention the design in question had been used upon the Thunderer. He showed Mr. Clare his drawings in order to convince him that the plan had been invented long before he brought it out. He had no wish to prevent Mr. Clare obtaining the fullest advantage he could; but he felt called upon to say as much as he had in order that it might not go forth to the world that the Admiralty had done anything in a high handed manner against Mr. Clare; but when he was asked to give evidence with regard to the matter in question he felt it his duty to do so.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, the hon. Member for Cavan must anticipate the only reply which the Government could give to his Motion. He would again repeat what he had said on a previous occasion when the matter was brought forward, that the Admiralty could not grant the inquiry asked for. The case of Mr. Clare had been tried in two Courts of Law—it had been tried by the officers of the Admiralty, and it had been referred to the Law Officers of the Crown. On every occasion it had been decided against Mr. Clare, and he could see no ground for re-opening the matter then. He thought he was speaking the sentiment of his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty when he stated that they must decline to grant a Committee upon the case.

MR. PARNELL had always thought that it would be much more satisfactory if the Admiralty would grant a reference to a gentleman in the matter of the claims of Mr. Clare. He did not think that the testimony of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda) could be considered very satisfactory, for the hon. Member had informed them that he was more or less an ex parte witness on the trial in question. He must remind the Committee that one of the claims of Mr. Clare at the trial was that the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets was using his invention in his office of contractor for the Navy.

MR. SAMUDA said, that if he might be allowed to interrupt the hon. Member for a moment he could explain the matter. When Mr. Clare came to his office he explained to him that, in former years, he had built vessels for the Admiralty in the form which he described as being one of his inventions. That was a vessel with armour plates on the outside and teak behind, then armoured plates and wood behind, and that vessel was built long before Mr. Clare had any patent at all. At the time he (Mr. Samuda) gave evidence in Court, he had no wish to give evidence against anyone; but he only stated what he knew of the matter. Mr. Clare did not then set up the claim which was now brought ward, but he only claimed to build vessels in compartments in a manner in which they had been built previously for the Admiralty. From the evidence of one witness it was perfectly clear that a vessel called the Great Western had been built in precisely the same way that Mr. Clare had claimed as his invention, and which he said the Government had adopted. So far as he was concerned he had nothing more to do with Mr. Clare than the hon. Member.

MR. PARNELL had not misunderstood what the hon. Member had previously said. He was only giving his version of the matter in rather different words. He did not say that the hon. Gentleman himself admitted that one of Mr. Clare's claims was against him in his office as contractor of the Navy, but he maintained that the hon. Gentleman had made use of one of Mr. Clare's patents. At all events, that was the statement of Mr. Clare; but he did not say that that was the statement of the hon. Member himself. All that showed how necessary it was that the matter should be set at rest by a fair and independent inquiry. It had always struck him, with reference to Mr. Clare's claims, that the Admiralty at the trial had to go back 30 or 35 years to meet them. Then, so far as the statement of Mr. Clare went, he had never heard any counter-statement from the Admiralty. The misfortune of the case was that the Government had never attempted to answer the case made out. They had that night heard a great many more details with regard to the case than they had ever listened to before. One of the chief arguments of Mr. Clare was that the Government were obliged to go back 20 or 30 years in order to show that, 25 years ago, a vessel was built of a similar pattern to that which he claimed. By that means, they sought to show that his patent was not well-founded. It looked very much as if the Admiralty of that day was obliged to resort to a strange defence, when they went back so many years in order to find an instance to bring forward in opposition to Mr. Clare. Why did they not bring forward some recent example, such as the hon. Member had told them of? If Mr. Clare had no case, let it be answered properly. But, although the matter had been brought forward several times, yet, on no occasion, had any attempt been made to disprove his case. He certainly could not see that they would have no other resource than to have the matter fairly disposed of by the House of Commons, if the Government would not appoint two or three gentlemen to investigate it.

MR. BIGGAR was very unwilling to press the case farther, and he could only say that he had not, by any means, stated all that Mr. Clare had wished him to say with regard to the matter. He would, however, read to the House an affidavit which had been made by Mr. John Morrison, foreman shipbuilder of the late Mr. Laird, the Member for Birkenhead, which entirely contradicted the evidence of Sir Charles Fox, upon which the matter was decided against Mr. Clare. Mr. Morrison said that the greater part of Sir Charles Fox's evidence was untrue. The truth was, that Sir Charles Fox had nothing to do with the building of the vessel Albarka, and that it came under his (Morrison's) own superintendence, and he was perfectly certain that it had no longitudinal framework. The vessel was built with temporary ribbons, which were taken away as the fittings were progressing. Sir Charles Fox did not superintend the building the vessel, which was under his (Morrison's) charge from the beginning to the end. From his great experience in shipbuilding, the witness stated he could vouch for the novelty of the invention. He only wished to point out that, upon the merits, he thought Mr. Clare had won his case, and that he was entitled to an inquiry. As, however, he should be in a small minority, he should not take a division.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. A. MOORE wished to say a few words with respect to Naval chaplains, and he should like to have some information from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty with respect to the Minute published last year. At the present time, the Roman Catholic sailors in the Navy seldom had the advantages of the administration of members of their own religion. When in foreign ports the men were sent to Roman Catholic churches; but the priests at those places did not understand English. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would take any means to provide more religious advantages for the Roman Catholics in the Navy? He would like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman intended appointing Roman Catholic chaplains? He did not wish to ask the Committee to consider the propriety of placing Roman Catholic chaplains upon each ship of war, for upon many of those ships there was but a small number of Roman Catholics. But he did think that the Admiralty might place Roman Catholic Naval chaplains at the principal Naval centres, where they did not exist at present. He knew many officers of Her Majesty's Navy who thought very highly of that proposal, for they found that the influence of the chaplains civilized their men and made them less liable to fall into crime. There was another matter. Invalid ships were sent back from India with sick on board, without the presence of Roman Catholic chaplains. It was hard on a man, who probably knew that he would not see the shores of England, but would die on the passage home, to prepare to go to the other world without the consolations of religion. He would press upon the Government the necessity of providing more Roman Catholic chaplains at the principal Naval centres at home and abroad, and also on board invalid ships. Upon those points, he thought they had a right to expect some satisfactory statement. No doubt, it was a rather knotty point with regard to the invalid ships; and, perhaps, the right hon. Gentleman would say that it was a matter for the War Department to deal with, and if they went to the War Department, they would probably be told that the question should be brought before the Government of India, who paid for recruiting the strength of regiments in this country, and for their transports out and home. He would not enter into those questions; but he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would not refer the matter to another Department, but would arrive at a satisfactory settlement of it himself. Then, with regard to foreign ports—sometimes a large number of our vessels were lying in foreign ports. During the Eastern complications there was a large Squadron stationed in Besika Bay, in the Mediterranean. He thought the authorities should make some local arrangements to provide for the religious instruction to men under such exceptional circumstances as those. But it was not only in foreign ports, but in home ports, that the Roman Catholic chaplains had no locus standi. In Portsmouth, Plymouth, and other places, they saw the men for three-quarters of an hour on a Sunday morning, whereas the Protestant chaplains had opportunities for going amongst the men every day in the week.

THE CHAIRMAN drew the attention of the hon. Member to the fact that the discussion in which he was engaged would more properly have been raised upon Vote 1, which contained the item for the salaries of chaplains.

MR. A. MOORE rose to a point of Order. He wished to move a reduction of the Vote in respect of the salary of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty. He thought he was entitled to do that, and he brought forward a grievance which he considered existed in certain Departments of the Naval Service.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the hon. Member that, although he was entitled to move the reduction of the salary of an Admiralty official, yet he was not entitled on such a Motion to enter into matters which formed the subject of another Vote. The question which the hon. Member now raised ought to have been discussed on Vote 1.

MR. PARNELL said, it was rather a long time ago since Vote 2 was before the Committee; but now he was reminded of the matter, perhaps he might be allowed to say that when Vote 1 passed through the Committee at a late period of the night, when he moved to report Progress in order that there might be an opportunity of discussing the Vote, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty was very anxious to get money for the Navy, and it was promised either by him, or by someone else, that if the Vote was allowed to pass without discussion, Members should be afforded opportunity upon subsequent Votes for the discussion of any Motion that could be discussed on Vote 1. He did not know whether that would bear upon the present point or not; but, as he recollected what took place at that time, he thought it desirable to remind the Committee.

MR. BIGGAR said, that there was another question with regard to the point raised by his hon. Friend. Probably, the right hon. Gentleman, First Lord of the Admiralty would member that when his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) raised a question as to the chaplains at Delagoa Bay, a promise was made to him that chaplains should be supplied to that place. If the right hon. Gentleman would not give a more specific promise with regard to that question, he thought it open to the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) to complain of the want of attention to the undertaking made by the Government. For that reason, he thought they were right in moving the reduction of the salary of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty.

MR. CHILDERS said, that it was not quite accurate to say that Vote 1 dealt with that matter, for Vote 1 only dealt with chaplains of the Church of England. It would be found that Vote 14 provided for chaplains of the Roman Catholic and all other denominations. He thought it would be more regular, therefore, to raise the question which was now sought to be brought forward upon Vote 14.

MR. A. MOORE expressed his willingness to accede to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract and to bring the matter forward upon Vote 14.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Member would not be out of Order in raising that question upon Vote 14, which was for all chaplains not being members of the Church of England.

MR. MACDONALD wished to move that Progress be reported. His reason was that they had had an Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, which had occupied the House something like four weeks, or 24 days, by which the regulations and government of the Army had, to a large degree, been altered. They were promised, that immediately the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill was concluded, a Bill dealing with Naval Discipline should be produced; but that Bill had passed away, and up to the present time the House had not heard one word from the Government or from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty in regard to it. All they had to depend upon was the vague promise of the Government that it was their intention to bring in such a Bill. He ventured to say that the provisions of the Naval Discipline Act were as severe—nay, they were more severe—than the provisions of the late Army Regulations.

They were called upon to vote large sums of money for the purposes of the Navy; but, before they did so, he thought they were entitled to know what was to be done with regard to the discipline of the Navy? It was now the law that, in the Army, a soldier should not receive more than 25 lashes.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. Member, that the question which he intended to raise would be more germane to Vote 13 on account of naval courts martial.

MR. A. MOORE understood that the Question before the Committee was that Progress be reported.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that in moving to report Progress, the hon. Member for Stafford was entirely out of Order in entering upon the discussion of matters that arose upon a subsequent Vote.

MR. MACDONALD said, that his Motion was to report Progress, and if he had incidentally referred to any subsequent Vote, it was not his intention to do so. His intention was to impress upon the mind of the House that they had legislated for the benefit of the soldier, and that they were not entitled to vote money for the Navy until they had legislated for the benefit of the sailor. He had said before, and he repeated it, that the Navy Discipline Act, in its whole form, was outrageous and cruel in regard to the treatment of the sailor as the Army Act formerly was in regard to the soldier. They were told by the right hon. Gentleman, in regard to sentences passed, that they satisfied him; but he thought that if there was any cruel and outrageous sentence passed upon any individual in Her Majesty's Service, Parliament ought to stop it. He considered that Parliament and the country, as well as the right hon. Gentleman, should know what the conduct of the man had been, and why he was to be called upon to suffer severe punishment. In the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill the functions of courts martial were submitted to the House, and great innovations had been made with respect to them; the functions of the Provost Marshal had also been submitted to the House, and great modifications made in his powers. Courts martial in the Navy were very similar to courts martial in the Army, and he did not think that they ought to vote any money at all for the Navy until they had a Bill before them with regard to Naval Discipline. He begged to move to report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Macdonald.)

MR. W. H. SMITH trusted that the hon. Member for Stafford was not serious in proposing to report Progress at that hour of the evening, especially as it would be perfectly open to him to raise a question to which he referred tomorrow. He might, however, state that immediately the determination of the House in reference to flogging in the Army was arrived at, an Admiralty Circular had been issued directing that the maximum number of lashes to be given in the Navy should be reduced to 25; and, therefore, the spirit of the undertaking given to the House had been fulfilled. He was anxious, at the right time, to bring in a Bill relating to the whole subject of discipline in the Navy; but he trusted that the hon. Member would now withdraw his Motion, and permit the discussion to proceed.

MR. PARNELL certainly thought it would be most convenient to discuss that question upon Vote 13 (Administration of Martial Law). He would suggest to the hon. Member for Stafford that he should withdraw his Motion to report Progress, and should allow them to go on with the Votes until they arrived at Vote 13. He hoped, then, that they would have some more distinct declaration from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty than they had yet had. He had told them that, after the decision of the House with respect to the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, the number of lashes should be reduced to 25, he had issued orders that the same practice should be carried out in the Navy. But he did not give orders in regard to the other reductions of punishment sanctioned by the Army Discipline Act. The old Mutiny Act contained provisions for solitary confinement and solitary imprisonment; all those clauses were struck out of the Army Discipline Act they had just passed. Last year, and the year before, some hon. Members on that side of the House drew attention to the question of solitary confinement, and the result of their exertions was that, when the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill was brought before the House the punishment of solitary confinement was given up, and there was now no power to punish a soldier by solitary confinement as a part of his original sentence. A soldier could only now be punished with solitary confinement, for breach of prison discipline, under the Prisons Acts. When they reached Vote 13, he hoped that they would have an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty that he would not allow any more sentences of solitary confinement to be inflicted by courts martial as part of original sentences. The old Navy Discipline Act ran on all fours with the old Army Mutiny Act. It had been admitted that there should not be more extreme punishment in the Navy than in the Army; and the right hon. Gentleman could not with any consistency refuse to grant the request they now made that, as solitary confinement had been given up in the Army, it should also be given up in the Navy. It would be easy for the right hon. Gentleman to give such directions as would place the discipline of the Navy upon the same footing as that of the Army. He hoped, therefore, that by the time they came to Vote 13, the right hon. Gentleman would be able to see his way to make the announcement to the Committee that he would direct that the punishment of solitary confinement should not be inflicted as part of an original sentence.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER thought that the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) ought to be satisfied with the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, so far as it had gone, and he would venture to support the appeal of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) that he should withdraw his Motion. The abolition of solitary confinement, and other punishments in which alterations had been made by the Army Discipline Act, could be extended to the Navy without legislation and by regulation only. He expected the right hon. Gentleman would probably tell them that, owing to the time the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill took, he had been unable to introduce a Bill of the same character with regard to the Navy during that Session—that would be the most satisfactory explanation. And if he were able to make an order reducing the number of lashes to  he would also be able to order reducing the other punishments in the Navy to a level with those in the Army. In that manner the objections of the hon. Member for Stafford might be anticipated. He was sure that the hon. Member for Stafford did not wish to delay Business, but only to get an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that all the reductions in the punishments effected by the Army Discipline Act would also be extended to the Navy.

MR. CALLAN wished to have further explanations with reference to the cats which had been left in the Cloak Room for the inspection of hon. Members. When he saw the cats at the Admiralty, one of them bore the inscription—"Navy cat; specimen lodged in Storekeeper's Department many years since; Her Majesty's Dockyard, Portsmouth." When that cat was placed in the Cloak Room, the following inscription was substituted:—"Cat provided for use on board Her Majesty's ships for seamen and marines." The hon. Member for Meath asked the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty as to whether the endorsement upon the cat in the Cloak Room was the same as that which appeared upon it a week before, when he (Mr. Callan) saw it at the Admiralty. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, probably not speaking from his own personal knowledge, but from that supplied by one of his subordinates, answered that it was the same. He (Mr. Callan) could aver that no such endorsement as he had last mentioned ever appeared on any cat which he saw at the Admiralty. The statement that the endorsement was the same was without a shadow of foundation. It was an utter falsehood supplied to the right hon. Gentleman by some clerk at the Admiralty. Before Progress was reported, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to have an inquiry to discover the person who had supplied him with so wholly false a statement? Would he institute an inquiry to ascertain who was the party responsible for that intentional mis-statement—he would maintain it was an intentional mis-statement—it was a statement in direct contravention of the facts? Would the right hon. Gentleman defend it, or would he cause an inquiry to be made to ascertain who was responsible for that false and unfounded statement?

Mr. O'Connor Power

MR. W. H. SMITH had hoped that the subject to which the hon. Gentleman had referred had been dropped. The statement which he made in that House was, to the best of his belief, perfectly accurate. If the hon. Gentleman would compare the statement he had made with the statements that he had admitted were accurate, he would see that the difference between the two was not so great as to make it the interest of any person to misrepresent the facts. It did not appear to him that there was any such important difference in the labels attached to the cat as to show that there was any intention to deceive the House. The hon. Gentleman would remember that he (Mr. W. H. Smith) was responsible for the substitution of the labels. The previous label was one which gave no information to the House, and it was only to make the matter clearer; but he had no expectation of obtaining any other result than he had already given to the House some time ago—namely, that the label was one which was attached to the cat in the first instance. Of course, he accepted the statement which the hon. Member made.

MR. CALLAN said, that when he saw the cat, it had a certain inscription upon it; but when it was placed in the Cloak Room, it bore another inscription; and now that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty took upon himself the responsibility of the statement, it became more serious. That was not the first occasion on which the right hon. Gentleman had found that he had been inaccurately informed. He was prepared to prove that the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, to his own certain knowledge, upon the evidence of his subordinates, was utterly without foundation, and was false and misleading. He asked that an inquiry should be instituted to discover and visit with punishment the person responsible for that false and unfounded statement; or, in the alternative, whether the right hon. Gentleman was prepared himself to accept the responsibility of making the statement.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 10; Noes 161: Majority 151.—(Div. List, No. 200.)

MR. A. MOORE would like to ask, before this Vote was passed, what the system of Audit was in the Admiralty? Was it the same as it was in the War Office, and did the accounts go before Sir William Dunbar? If they did not, to whom were they submitted?

MR. W. H. SMITH replied, that the system of Audit was the same in both Departments.

CAPTAIN PIM asked for some explanation as to the re-organization which was promised at the Admiralty. By a Return dated the 14th June, 1878, there was to be an immediate saving of £2,478, whilst, according to the Vote, there had been an actual increase in the cost of the Office of £500. He should like to have some explanation of the failure to carry out the saving announced in the Return of last year?

MR. W. H. SMITH replied, that in the reorganization of the Accountant General's Department the cost had been reduced so that there was actually a saving of £2,800.

CAPTAIN PIM pointed out that, under the head of "Naval Department, Clerical Staff," there could be no question there was £500 increase while they were promised a reduction of £2,478. If the right hon. Gentleman would look at page 14, he would see the matter was as he had stated.

MR. W. H. SMITH replied, that there had been no re-organization in that Department at all. The re-organization promised was in the Accountant General's Department, and that had taken place. The re-organization of the Staff in the Naval Department was under consideration.

CAPTAIN PIM said, with regard to another portion of the Vote, he should like to have some explanation of the purchase of the Independencia, now called the Neptune, for £614,000. The ship was a broken-down craft altogether, and the amount given for her was largely in excess of the cost of ships of larger displacement. A new ship of 10,000 tons did not cost that sum, while the Independencia was only 9,000 tons. He should like to know whether this ship had been tried for stability, and whether she was really a safe ship? She had her back broken in launching, and he should not have thought her worth half the sum mentioned.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. and gallant Member that the question he raises does not come under this Vote.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £193,870, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the Coast Guard Service, Royal Naval Reserve, and Seamen and Marine Pensioners Reserve, and Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

CAPTAIN PIM said, he must call attention to the Royal Naval Reserve, and he should beg to move to reduce the Vote by £139,000, the amount set down for that force in the Votes. His reason for doing this was that he was the officer sent down to organize this Royal Naval Reserve some years ago, and he had taken the greatest interest in it ever since; and he now said, without fear of contradiction, that the force was a sham and a delusion. If England were at war this moment she could not count on 1,000 out of the 20,000 men put down in the Vote. Even if that number were available, we could not get a single man away from the merchant ships into the Navy, because the majority of crews in the Merchant Service consisted of foreigners, who, of course, in the event of war, would go to their own countries. From a Petition presented by seamen to the House, he had no hesitation in saying that the Government would find it utterly impossible to find in the Mercantile Marine so many as 30,000 British seamen. As to there being anything like 20,000 in the Reserve, that could not be the case, and even if they were enlisted it would be impossible for them to leave their ships to serve in the Navy in case of a war. There clearly would not be one man to each ship in the Mercantile Marine, for we had 26,000 ships. The Reserve, he maintained, was a sham and a delusion, and it was a very great mistake to pay this sum every year for what was no use, when with the greatest possible ease volunteer seamen could be raised all along the coast. He had done his very best, on several occasions, to point out the true state of the case, and he should now feel it his duty to divide the Committee on this point.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £54,870, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expenses of the Coast Guard Service, Royal Naval Reserve, and Seamen and Marine Pensioners Reserve, and Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."—(Captain Pim.)

MR. W. H. SMITH said, his hon. and gallant Friend would not expect him to follow him in his objection to the Royal Naval Reserve. For his part, he believed them to be a most useful and trustworthy body of men. He was not responsible for their establishment; but he thought that his right hon. Friends opposite who did establish that force believed that they could place great reliance on it. The hon. and gallant Gentleman said that all these men would be wanted for the merchant ships in time of war. As a matter of fact, a good many of them were constantly under drill at home, and these, at all events, would be available. Besides, as they all knew, one of the results and conditions of warfare was a certain interference with the Mercantile sea service of the country. And, no doubt, if England were engaged in war, there would be a less number of ships sailing under the British Flag than at present. He had no doubt that the Naval Reserve would be a very valuable assistance to our Navy in time of war, and he quite believed that the number of men put down would be available.

MR. A. MOORE said, in reference to the question he had raised a moment ago as to the Audit of the Navy, he found that Sir William Dunbar reported on the Navy Accounts—

"I certify that this account has been examined by officers under my directions in accordance with and to the extent prescribed by the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 29, and that it is a correct statement of the Appropriation Act of 1877.

(Signed) "WILLIAM DUNBAR."

He wanted to ask the right hon. Gentleman the meaning of the reservation contained in the words "to the extent prescribed?"

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is not in Order in raising that point on the question of the Vote for "the Coast Guard and Royal Naval Reserve." His question had reference to the system of Audit for the Admiralty

Office, and he is not in Order in raising it now.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

CAPTAIN PIM asked, if the First Lord of the Admiralty would be good enough to give him an undertaking that he would look into this matter? If his contention were right, all the Royal Naval Reserve men would be required on board the merchant ships in the event of war. Then, surely, it was not worth while going on paying these men; and he hoped his right hon. Friend would consider the matter, which was certainly of very great importance.

MR. GOSCHEN said, this subject had been constantly inquired into, and had been before various administrators at the Admiralty, and their contention was that the assertion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman was not correct, and that the force of the Royal Naval Reserve was of use. The question was fully inquired into under previous Administrations, and both his right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) and himself, when they were at the Admiralty, were of opinion that the Royal Naval Reserve was a very strong force, which, in time of difficulty, would be of the greatest service to the country. He might add that, in 1867, his right hon. Friend actually invited a certain number of men to come forward and assist in manning some of the ships by way of experiment, and the men were not only forthcoming, but they conducted themselves exceedingly well.

CAPTAIN PIM remarked, that that was in time of peace.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) £105,576 (Scientific Branch).

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he wished to take this opportunity of asking the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he had made any inquiry into the result of the recent system of admitting cadets into the Naval Service. The Committee would recollect that, some years ago, a change was made in the regulations by which cadets were admitted into the Naval Service, and that, in place of the principle of examination established by his right hon. Friend near him, the old principle of nomination was re-adopted. He had twice taken the sense of the House on this important question with the view of the restoration of competitive examination in the appointment of cadets; and he would have raised the question again during this Session, but that that he was anxious to give the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith) a full opportunity of making inquiries on the subject himself, and of coming to some decision on it personally before he did so. Therefore, during the Session he had not brought this matter before the House as he had intended to do. He should be glad to know, however, whether the right hon. Gentleman had made those inquiries, and whether he now proposed to make any change in the present system, and to revert to anything like competitive examination? He had reason to believe that the recent change in the admission of cadets had not been beneficial to the Service. The class of boys appointed under the system of pure nomination had not been so satisfactory as the class of boys appointed under the system introduced by his right hon. Friend. The Committee would be glad to know whether the right hon. Gentleman had gone into this question, and especially whether he had taken the opinion of those gentlemen who had had the opportunity of comparing the results of these examinations with the examinations adopted under the system of competition.

MR. E. J. REED wished to suggest to the First Lord of the Admiralty the desirability of giving the House in future further information about these scientific branches. He often himself found considerable difficulty in tracing their operations; and he had no doubt other Members of the House had experienced the same extreme inconvenience which arose from the fact that, although each of the Departments sent out an annual Report, those Reports never came into the possession of Parliament. This was the case, not only with the Observatory, but also of that very important College, the Naval College, with regard to which the House had voted large sums annually, and in which the House felt deep interest, and ought, therefore, to have some information. It was eminently true, also, of the Hydrographic Department. He very frequently came across official statements of the operations of that Department; but he did not think they ought to have to hunt them up from the publications of various scientific bodies. He would therefore suggest, for the consideration of the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether the annual Reports of these several branches could not be laid upon the Table of the House, to enable Members, at any rate, to discuss these Votes with more information at hand than they had at present? He might take that opportunity of saying that he had recently had the means of looking very closely into that branch of the Service. He knew that that Service was conducted with exceptional rules, and with considerable exemptions from the ordinary routine, and he therefore made it his duty, when he was recently in Hong Kong and Japan, to make inquiries into the operations of the Service there. He thought it was a proper thing to do, as a Member of the House, by chance in those distant parts; and he was very glad to say that he was not only satisfied, but he was extremely pleased with the condition in which he found both the Chinese and Japanese Services. They were doing most excellent work in a most excellent manner; and in the case of both branches he was extremely satisfied. He, consequently, regretted more than ever that they were so entirely without information as to the operations of these branches.

CAPTAIN PIM wished to endorse every word that had fallen from the hon. Member. There was no doubt whatever that the information given on this matter, and, indeed, on all the Votes, was meagreness itself. He held in his hand the Report of the Secretary of the Navy of the United States, and nothing could be more clear or more full. It gave, in a readable form, all the information they wanted, and, surely, it would be no trouble on the part of the First Lord of the Admiralty to prepare a similar statement, and lay it on the Table with the Votes, so that hon. Members would be able to look into those matters, and take up those points, in which they felt an interest. They certainly ought not to have to wade through a mass of figures which were as vague and as ill put together as anything he had ever seen.

MR. CHILDERS observed that there were one or two questions in connection with this Vote on which the First Lord of the Admiralty might give them a little information. In the first place, they had not been put in session of the Reports and results of the observations of the transit of Venus. These observations were now a good many years old, and the primary object of the Vote, which he had the honour to move himself, was to correct the measurement of the distance between the sun and the earth. A very large expenditure was granted primarily, though not solely, for that purpose; and he had not yet seen the result of that very careful inquiry. They had had a Report of the observations of the transit; but the question which it was to settle, and which was of very great value indeed, had never yet, so far as he was aware, been indicated to Parliament or the public at all. Then, with reference to the sale of charts and nautical almanacs by the Admiralty, he found that the sale of charts was advancing very satisfactorily, and he was glad of that, because they were of great value to the Service. On the other hand, there was a very decided falling off in the sale of nautical almanacs, although, so far as he was aware, the demand for such works had not fallen off within the last few years. Then, he wished to ask a question with regard to the Service of our Colonies. At page 28 it was stated that the moiety of the charges of the Survey of certain Colonies enumerated were discharged out of the Naval Vote. If he was not mistaken, although one of the Colonies offered to continue the previous charges, for some reason or other not generally understood, the Survey had been abandoned. He was alluding to the Survey of Tasmania. As to the point which his hon. Friend had raised in reference to cadets, he hoped the First Lord of the Admiralty would give careful consideration to that subject, because he had reason to know that though, in some respects, the cadets of last year were more satisfactory than the cadets of the two previous years, yet that a very considerable number of boys of inferior calibre had come in compared with those who used to be introduced.

MR. ONSLOW would like to know exactly how these cadets were appointed? There was great ignorance on the part of the public as to who had the nomination. He had been told that the Admiralty had a certain number; that captains, when their ships were commissioned, also had a certain number. But although he had tried to get to the bottom of the matter, he still remained in perfect ignorance about it. He should like to ask whether it ought not to be incumbent upon the First Lord, and those who had the power of making these appointments, to consider first the claims of those officers who had served Her Majesty in the Army or in the Navy? He thought all these appointments should be made quite independently of Party considerations, and that officers of the two Services who gallantly fought for their country should certainly be first considered. He was afraid that was not the primary consideration, and he would, therefore, impress upon his right hon. Friend how incumbent it was upon him to give up every other claim to such as those he had mentioned.

MAJOR NOLAN would be very glad to know whether there really was a marked superiority in those cadets who came in by nomination over those who came in by competition? It must be remembered that great injustice was done by boys being shut out on the nomination system. In the other Services the appointments were perfectly open, and young men had a chance of getting into the Army, or into the Civil Service, or into the Services in India. He thought there ought to be no nominations, except in special cases like the Guards. But the Navy was a marked exception, and he could not understand why it should be so. The appointments were very valuable, and much sought after. The pay was very small at first; but if they looked through the list, they would find there were a good many prizes and a good many substantial rewards open to lads, and yet there was no means of getting into the Navy except through private friendship with the Government. It was impossible for an ordinary man to get his son in. If there were competitive examinations, the cleverest boy would win. If there were mixed examinations properly conducted, though that was very difficult, the best boy would also win. But, at the present moment, a certain number of vacancies were given to sons of officers in the Army and Navy, and the remainder were left entirely and exclusively in the hands of the Government. The system was an anomaly, and ought not to exist. He did not mean to say for a moment that the present First Lord had not administered it quite as fairly as any other

First Lord, or as well as it could be administered; but the whole system appeared to him totally wrong and totally opposed to the spirit of the day. To justify that, the First Lord ought, at least, to be able to show that he got better boys by that system than by the competitive examinations.

CAPTAIN PIM observed that the Government certainly ought to get the best cadets it was possible to have, for he found, by reference to the Returns, that each one cost the country upwards of £300 a-year.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he could hardly suppose a First Lord to exist who would not be exceedingly glad to adopt the system of competition, and to be relieved from the responsibility of selecting candidates to be nominated for the test examination for cadetships. Since he had been in Office he had very carefully considered the question put to him by his hon. Friend. It was certain that the system of cram adopted in order to get the boys up to the degree of knowledge to pass the competitive examinations formerly required at the age of 13 seriously affected their physical health. That was the reason for the change that had been made. He was prepared to say that the reason was a good one; but he desired to treat the question as an open one, and to give it his best attention and consideration. The matter, however, could only be decided by watching the boys as they passed out of the Britannia. He had done so, and he had thought it right to raise the standard considerably, and to require a larger number of marks to pass the test examination than formerly. The fact was that a considerable number of rejections at the test or entrance examinations took place every half-year, and although they had not got back to the system of their predecessors in requiring competition, there was yet a severe examination for boys before they could pass into the Service. His hon. Friend (Mr. Onslow) had referred to the system of nomination. He could assure him that, so far as the First Lord was concerned, he had always considered the claims for nomination in this order—first of all, he placed the claims of a naval officer, next he had considered the claims of an Army officer, thinking that both those should stand first, because they were men who had served their country. In any nomination which he had to give away, the two Services had the first preference, and then came the persons who had served the country in other ways, or who had a claim to be considered, for some reason or other, before the outside public. That was the principle on which he had acted; and his naval Colleagues, he believed, acted on very much the same principle. A certain number of officers also had power to give nominations; but it was always understood that every nomination was subject to the boy passing a test examination of a very severe character, and if he did not pass that he failed to enter the Service. He thought the system was now very much more satisfactory than it was, and the attainments of the cadets were of such a character as to give promise for the future. As to the transit of Venus, the reduction of the observations had been a very long and serious matter. His right hon. Friend was aware that the officer who was now in charge and at the head of the Observatory was a gentleman who was entitled to a great deal of consideration, for he had rendered very great services to the State, and it was not possible to press him in the same way as they would have pressed a younger man. He had requested the Board of Visitors of the Observatory to take the subject into consideration, and they had now made certain recommendations which he had himself urged upon his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, and which he had no doubt would be acceded to. As the result, he hoped they would very soon have the full scientific results of that observation. With reference to the sale of nautical almanacs, he was not aware of any reason for the falling off. With regard to the survey of the coasts of Tasmania, he had some recollection that in regard to one Service, at any rate, the Colonial Secretary caused a suspension for a time of the arrangement; but he was not able to say for the moment whether that was the Tasmanian survey or not. If his right hon. Friend would ask him the question later on, he would take care that it should be answered. It was their object to maintain these Services as completely and efficiently as possible, and, as his right hon. Friend was aware, a very considerable number of the staff was employed on the survey. In Tasmanian and Australian waters they had done very good work, and no one could possibly doubt that the results had been very valuable. The hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. E. J. Reed) had asked for further information as to the scientific branches. He thought the request that the annual Reports of these branches should be published a very reasonable request, and he would endeavour to comply with it in the course of this year, or, at any rate, before the Estimates for the next year were presented. The Reports of the Observatory, for instance, and some other statements, were likely to be very interesting. He might add that he had thought it necessary to take authority to place the lieutenants who were students at the Royal Naval College on full pay. It appeared to him very desirable that the young men who were ordered to stay in the College for a term commencing in October and ending in June should submit themselves to discipline. They would, therefore, be placed on full pay, and wear uniform in future.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, his information was that the boys appointed by pure nomination were decidedly less intelligent than those appointed on competitive examination. He was aware that the right hon. Gentleman had met with good results in his endeavour to raise the educational standard of the boys nominated; but the fact remained that under a system of competitive examination, even when limited, every inducement was offered to parents and guardians to make clever boys into sailors, while under the system of pure nomination parents and others generally selected the stupid boys for the Navy; and a very stupid class of boys was now being nominated under a system of cramming that just enabled them to pass the test examination. The general result of the present system was that a class of boys was now appointed to the Navy decidedly inferior to that appointed under the old system. He asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he had endeavoured to ascertain if this was a fact from the Director of Naval Education, who had examined boys under both systems?

MAJOR NOLAN suggested that the First Lord of the Admiralty should ascertain the physical capacity of a certain number of boys who had entered through competitive examination, by medical test, at the end of two or three years after admission.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, his impression was that there was no distinction between the boys admitted under the two systems. If the boys who now entered the Navy by nomination were stupid, they must be of a wonderful description, because they passed a severe examination with satisfactory results. He admitted that two years ago there had been some falling back; but that was not the case at the present time. He would, however, obtain further information upon the subject.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord whether the officers appointed to the command of surveying vessels were appointed without any regard to their practical knowledge of the Service in which they were to be engaged, as in the recent case of the Alert?

MR. RYLANDS said, that two years ago he had brought under the notice of the House the question of the Naval College at Greenwich. At that time there were a great many complaints as to the way in which this institution was conducted, and there were those who believed that there was in connection with it a considerable amount of expenditure for which the country obtained no adequate return. In consequence of the discussion which took place on that occasion the First Lord of the Admiralty promised that in future, before the Estimates of each year were taken, there should be a Report presented in connection with the College; that the House should be furnished with a full account of the duties performed there; the number of students; and, in short, with a Report upon the whole subject. He believed that Return had not been laid upon the Table. It was true a Committee of Inquiry had reported upon the subject; but that was an entirely different matter from the annual Report which had been promised to Parliament, for the purpose of enabling the Committee to judge of the results of the expenditure they were asked to vote for. He felt that the fact of the Committee not having been furnished with this annual Report was the result entirely of an oversight, and that it was only necessary to allude to the circumstance in order to secure its being presented in future. He thought he had gathered from the First Lord of the Admiralty that the promised Report should contain information with regard to the proceedings of the College; and in connection with that he hoped it would be shown by the Report that the large staff of Professors and other officers of the College were all usefully employed and all required; but upon that he would not venture to express an opinion. With regard to the various items of expenditure, it seemed to him very difficult to show that they were not excessive; and, perhaps, the Admiralty would look into these matters. The number of police officers and artificers, the charges for fuel, furniture, and stores, were all upon a scale which he could not imagine to be within reasonable limits; on the contrary, they seemed to be very excessive. The police wages, he observed, were put down at the extraordinary sum of £1,497. The allowances to servants, wages, and general mess and staff expenses were also very high, and there were other items which would appear to admit of reduction. He thought it very necessary that the House in future should have a full annual Report of the results of the College.

SIR MASSEY LOPES did not think the expenditure on account of the Naval College was excessive. The Estimates had been very severely criticized.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £1,355,000, be granted to Her Majesty to defray the Expenses of the Dockyards and Naval Yards at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880.”

CAPTAIN PRICE said, it would be interesting to the Committee, and to the Public Service generally, to have some statement as to the result of the scheme for the re-organization of the Dockyard Clerical Staff. He had some reason to think that the senior members of the staff were tolerably satisfied with what had been done; but amongst the lower grades, however, this satisfaction did not exist. There was one class of clerks, called Admiralty writers, a numerous and important body, who felt they had been hardly treated. They had been promised promotion to the Lower Division of Clerks—a rank which, under the new scheme, was abolished with reference to the Dockyards. Surely some compensation ought to be given to these gentlemen, who had been expecting the promotion which had been held out to them for the last three years by Order in Council, and which had been since ignored, even though their names had been given in to the Admiralty for promotion, in obedience to a letter sent to the Yard. As far as he could judge, no compensation was to be given to these persons. He believed also another class, the mechanic writers, whose duties and knowledge were rather more technical than those of the ordinary writers, were dissatisfied with a clause in the instructions which said that they were to give any extra time that might be demanded from them without their having any claim for extra pay. The answer, he understood, on the part of the Admiralty, was that they did not intend to ask these writers to give any extra time. That was all very well; but why, then, was such a provision inserted in the regulations? He trusted that the Admiralty would not call upon these writers to do extra work without extra pay. There was another matter of great importance in connection with this subject. The Committee would be aware that the persons employed in the factories throughout the Yard were of two classes—namely, those upon the list of the establishment, and those who were hired temporarily. For obvious reasons, the latter received a somewhat higher rate of pay than those upon the establishment. But it was not from choice that they were only “hired men;” they wanted to be placed upon the establishment, and serve Her Majesty continuously in the Dockyards, and some of them contended that having served in their present capacity for long periods, say 20 or 30 years, they were entitled to receive a pension, or, at all events, a good gratuity. In 1846 the Admiralty had taken this question into consideration, and had awarded to the hired men a small gratuity on retirement, on account of their age, after a certain period of service, of £1 for every year’s service. But it was subsequently seen that this system would not work satisfactorily, because a man receiving 10s. a-week pay would get the same gratuity as a man who received 40s. a-week, and a change was made which a week's pay was to be given as a gratuity for every year's service. He had in his mind the effect of this system upon two men. The hired man having served for 30 years, would receive on discharge the sum of £63, or just about enough to keep his wife and family for a year; while the establishment man, who had been earning nearly the same wages as the other—namely, 42s. a-week—would, after a shorter period of service, receive a pension of £55 per annum. The discrepancy between these two cases was something enormous. He was aware that the Government were taking this question into consideration; and their object was now to establish, if not all factory men, at all events, a considerable number of them by degrees. But this was poor consolation to those who had been serving continuously in the factory since its establishment, and were now too old to benefit by such a change. His view was that the Government might give the hired men, who had served for a long period, half the amount of pension given to the establishment men, or else a very considerable increase in their gratuity; say, a month's pay for every year's service. He had listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. T. Brassey) with great pleasure; and whilst he agreed with everything that had fallen from him, especially as to the necessity of improving the position of certain officers in the Dockyards, he was bound to say that, as regarded their salaries pure and simple, they should be asked to wait for a time, and give their subordinates a chance. It must be remembered that a number of these gentlemen had lately had an increase of salary. He did not say their salaries had been increased sufficiently; on the contrary, he hoped that before long they would be increased still further; but the subordinate officers had received little or no increase at all lately. He thought he was correct in saying that the greater number of foremen in the Yards were receiving the same salaries as were received 50 years ago. Something had been said by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) on the subject of the police employed about the Dockyards, and in connection with the Naval College at Greenwich. He believed that the amount paid for the police service at the Dockyards throughout the country was something like £60,000 or £70,000 a-year. Now, he had often thought that this large sum might be reduced to a certain appreciable extent by introducing pensioners to discharge police duties in connection with the Dockyards. This system had already been tried with success in some of the small Yards abroad. He could not see why pensioners, having undergone a suitable course of training, say for a year, should not undertake this work in England, and work under the direction of the police authorities. Their duties would soon be learned, and their services could, no doubt, be obtained for a small additional amount of pay over their pensions. This plan, he thought, would effect a large saving in the Estimates.

Mr. D. JENKINS said, that some of the items of the Vote appeared to him very extraordinary. For instance, they had a commodore receiving £600 a-year, and a second officer receiving £396 a-year, and another £200 a-year, and they also had an item of £782 for Admiralty assistants; but the total Service was to be only £1,100. He thought that those large items ought to be explained by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord. It seemed to him that the expenditure at the Dockyard of Hong Kong was very large, considering that there were only small gunboats employed on that station, and that only a small number of artificers were in the Dockyard. He wished to point out to the right hon. Gentleman what he thought would be a great improvement upon the present system with regard to the gunboats—namely, that they should be brought home rather more frequently than at the present time—the passage could be easily made by means of the Suez Canal. By so doing, the expense would be saved of sending men to join the gunboats at foreign stations, and the Service would be improved if the gunboats were sent home for repair. He would suggest, also, that no expensive repairs to ships should be executed abroad, but that they should be sent to Dockyards nearer home, like that at Malta, where the Dockyard was in a very efficient state, and would be available for the repair of ships upon distant stations. He thought they required additional information as regarded the expenditure under that Vote. They voted about £200,000 for the expense of foreign Dockyards, and he thought that some more information should be given as to how that money was expended on foreign stations. More particularly with regard to the expenditure at Hong Kong he should like to have some information.

MR. SAMUDA observed, that when his right hon Friend made a statement at the beginning of the Session he asked for some Returns, in order that he might ascertain the amount of work performed and compare it with the work promised. It would be within the recollection of the Committee that it had been shown that a great disparity existed between the figures stated by the Government and by the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Lefevre). But his object was particularly to draw the attention of his right hon. Friend to what he conceived to be a great failure in the way in which the Estimates were put before the House and of the way in which the Admiralty accounts were kept. It must be perfectly clear that the first thing for them all to possess, in order that they might know what they were doing, was to have a clear knowledge of the engagements they were entering into and what part of them they were carrying forward to the next year. It appeared to him that that was not satisfactorily done by the present system. He wished to draw especial attention to the necessity of making some change. He did not wish to lay any stress upon the shortcomings of the Government, and the difference between what was promised and what was performed; but he did desire that everyone in the House should have the means of ascertaining what had been performed and to compare it with what had been promised. Last year he found that they were promised 8,600 tons of armour-plated vessels; but only 4,800 had been completed. Formerly it was the custom to calculate the amount of shipping by builders' tonnage; but in 1874 a change was made, by which the builders' tonnage was entirely set aside, and, in lieu thereof, the Admiralty adopted a system of calculating, not by the displacement tonnage, but by a system representing the ton weight in the hull. It was, however, stated in the Estimates how much the vessel was to cost and how much was to be provided in the particular year to meet that Estimate. That would appear to give them some idea of what they did in particular years and what they left undone; but the Committee would observe that the way in which the Estimates were now drawn up did not even give them that information, because, when the cost of a vessel increased, as it constantly did, alterations were made in succeeding years, which disturbed all previous reference to progress and cost, and it was utterly impossible to arrive at the ultimate cost. That mode of calculation must lead to complications which no one could follow. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he could not simplify the Estimates, and enable them to understand what they were doing. First, when in cases where the Estimates were to be put before them for the construction of vessels, the Committee ought to know what would be the gross liability that they were assuming. They should not have put before them, as was the new practice, merely an Estimate for building so many hundred tons in the course of the year. They were only asked to vote money for that number of tons; but by so doing they might, and in many cases were, incurring the liability to spend a very large additional sum of money in completing those vessels. They ought to have before them the total sum of money which they would have to vote, not in the present year only, but in all succeeding years, for the completion of the vessels; if in any succeeding year a reference was made to the money spent on these vessels, then they would know how much they had expended, and what it was intended to expend, and how much they would be liable to expend in the future, and in that way they would be able to know what they were doing. At the present moment they could not tell anything beyond the fact that it was intended to build so many tons in the course of the year. Then the cost of the vessels was often found to be greater than was originally estimated for, and additional expense was thereby incurred. It was important that those who followed the Estimates should be able to lay their fingers upon such things to show that they had, for instance, voted £5,000,000 liabilities, of which they had paid £1,000,000 and had carried over £4,000,000. They ought to have the knowledge before them of what their liabilities were, and they should not be left in the dark as to this important matter when asked to vote money for the construction of new ships.

A Supplemental Vote ought to be made in the Estimates of the liabilities that they were incurring, and of the increased cost that had been found necessary in respect of certain vessels. He trusted that when that matter came next before the House they would be able to understand by looking at the figures put before them what was being done. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman would see that when so much smaller an amount of tonnage was completed than was contemplated it was a most serious thing. He did not intend to go into that matter; but still there was a very great difference between what was completed and what was promised. He thought that the Navy Estimates ought to be placed before them in such a way as an ordinary business man would place before him his own obligations and keep them from time to time before his notice. They would then know what their liabilities were, and be able to understand the questions before them.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE wished to say a few words upon the Vote, though he did not desire to enter into the wider question to which he drew attention at the beginning of the Session. As the Admiralty had not been able to make any answer to the criticisms which he then brought forward, he must assume that the truth of them was accepted. He should confine himself on the present occasion to making some remarks on the work performed during the past year in the Dockyards, and compare it with the programme laid before the Committee when the Estimates were last before it. A Return had been laid upon the Table of the House, showing the programme last year as compared with the work performed during the year. That account seemed to him to be very unsatisfactory. He found that it was promised that 13,408 tons of vessels would be completed in the Dockyards during the year. According to the Return, only 10,062 tons had been completed, instead of the much larger number promised; and that notwithstanding the fact that a very much larger number of men had been employed in the Dockyards. It was also noticeable that a very small proportion of the vessels completed were iron-clads. A deduction should be made from that on account of the vessels paid for out of the Vote of Credit. Those vessels had been repaired, their armament had been taken out, and their fittings replaced; while, in the case of the Superb, the rigging had been remodelled. When a deduction was made in respect of those vessels it left but a small amount of tonnage for the new iron-clads constructed in the Dockyards. In fact, so little had been spent on building that it might almost be left out of account. It was promised that about 600 tons should be completed in respect of each of the four new iron-clads in course of construction; of one vessel 15 tons had been built, of another 30 tons, and of a third 50 tons, while the fourth was not commenced. As regarded the Agamemnon, it was promised that 2,335 tons should be built, but only 997 tons had been completed; 1,625 tons were promised in the case of the Ajax, but only 890 tons had been constructed. The Inflexible had now been eight years on the stocks, and had not yet been completed. When the present Government came into Office it was one of their principal charges against their Predecessors that they had not made sufficiently rapid progress with the Inflexible; and they, accordingly, asked for an additional vote of money to hasten the completion of that vessel. It was promised that during the past year 1,383 tons of the Inflexible should be completed, and that the vessel should be off the stocks during the financial year. That had not been done, and the vessel was still in arrear. That was a serious matter, because the Inflexible was a vessel of a peculiar kind, and it was most desirable that its completion should be hastened so far as possible, in order that they might have experience of her qualities, and that that experience should be made use of to guide them as to what alterations were necessary in other vessels of the same kind then being laid down. The money which was required to be expended upon the Inflexible appeared to have been diverted to making alterations in a vessel called the Independencia, and now styled the Neptune. When he last addressed the House he referred to the case of the Independencia, and the right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to give some explanation, which, however, did not appear to him to be satisfactory. The Independencia was a vessel bought from the Brazilian Government for £614,000, including £44,000 for her armament. The purchase was justified by the Government on the ground that the vessel was a powerful one, and in a position to go to sea at once. If so, there might have been some good reason for her purchase; but no sooner was she purchased than a board of officers in the Admiralty proceeded to condemn her armament. The Director of Naval Ordnance said that he would not be responsible for sending such a vessel to sea. Another board of officers condemned her fittings, and the third board condemned her masts, yards, and other equipments. The result was that that vessel, which was bought at the extravagant price he had mentioned, was sent into the Dockyard, and £34,000 was spent upon her during the past year. He observed that provision had been made for a further expenditure of £14,000 or £15,000 upon her. Thus, £45,000 would be spent in altering and converting that vessel, and in replacing her armament, masts, yards, and fittings. The result was that the £44,000 given for her armament would be entirely wasted. That appeared to him to be a most foolish transaction. If the vessel were ready to go to sea, why was she sent to the Dockyard, and that enormous sum expended upon her? On the other hand, if not fit to go to sea, why was such an extravagant price paid for her, or why was she bought at all? He believed that it would have been far better to have expended the money in hastening on the completion of the Inflexible. For a very much less sum of money the Inflexible might have been finished; that powerful vessel might have been already at sea, and they would have gained that experience of her qualities which would have guided them in the construction of the other vessels now being built. That appeared to him to have been a most unfortunate transaction, and one of a most serious character. As he had said, during the past year only 10,062 tons of vessels had been built, against 13,000 tons promised, and the falling off had been almost entirely in iron-clads. He would like to go back three or four years, in order to show the gradual falling off there had been in the ship-building in the Dockyards. He would confine himself to making the comparison during the past four or five years that the present Administration had been in Office. In 1875-6, 13,114 tons of vessels were built in the Dockyards, and 16,000 men were employed in the work. In 1876-7, 13,437 tons were built in the Dockyards; and in 1877-8, 12,052 tons were completed. Last year only 10,062 were built, and a larger number of men was employed. They had thus a continued diminution in the tonnage of vessels built, while in each year the same number of men was employed, except last year, when the number of men was increased. The falling off had been principally in iron-clads; but, from the Return before them, he was unable to say how the money which ought to have been expended in building iron-clads had been spent, unless it were expended upon the Independencia, the Superb, and another vessel. In the Estimates now before them, he found that there was a smaller Estimate for the tonnage of vessels to be built in Dockyards than he could recollect in any previous year. It was proposed to build 12,151 tons of vessels, of which 7,193 tons were proposed to be iron-clads. He should have been glad if the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had promised them that the Inflexible should be finished; but it appeared that her completion was again to be postponed for another year. With regard to the other vessels proposed to be built, he observed that it was intended to go on with the Ajax and the Agamemnon, and also to add some work to the Polyphemus. With respect to the other vessels it was no use discussing what they would be, considering what little progress would be made with the iron-clads. He believed that it would be better to complete vessels like the Inflexible, the Ajax, and the Agamemnon, instead of doing work upon vessels of less importance. He would not detain the Committee any longer at that period of the night, except to add his protest against the Navy Estimates being brought forward at that time of the Session. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had told them that it was owing to exceptional circumstances; but it was the fact that last year the same thing was done. It was then said that exceptional circumstances were the cause of the delay; but if they went 10 years back, they would find no other instance of the Navy Estimates having been postponed to so late a period.

In 1870, the Navy Estimates occupied six nights in discussion, and were completed before the 29th of July. In 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876, four to six nights were expended in the discussion of the Navy Estimates. In 1877, the Navy Estimates took six nights, and were finished before the 18th of June. He thought that it was evident that the ordinary work of the Navy could not be properly discussed in less than five nights. It was now proposed that the Navy Estimates should only occupy one night, and that would not give the House proper opportunity for discussion. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Navy should recollect that the audience in the House upon these matters was a select one. But there was another audience outside the House—a much larger number who were deeply interested in all questions concerning the Navy, and in order that the public might be informed upon naval matters they ought to be able to read the debates and to form an opinion, and to see that justice was being done to the many important questions that so much interested the public. If the discussions were brought on at that late period of the night full justice could not be done to the outside public, for full reports could not be given. No one would, therefore, know outside the House what was being done there, and a very great injury was done, not only the Public Service generally, but to the whole of the public interested in naval matters.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, that on the last occasion when the Navy Estimates were under discussion, the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) made an attack upon the whole policy of naval administration since the time he was in Office. The hon. Member alleged that no answer had been given to him; but he would like to tell the hon. Gentleman that in a few days he would see what he thought would be a most conclusive answer. The policy that he complained of during Mr. Ward Hunt's and his right hon. Friend's administration was that they had been in the habit of repairing instead of building ships. He might say that the great object of the Admiralty had been to place upon the water an efficient Fleet. They had not always been able to carry out that programme; but they had done so to the best of their ability. Their complaint against the Liberal Administration was that they did not pay sufficient attention to the repairs of ships; when they came into Office they found a vast number of ships in a very bad state of repair, and they considered it incumbent upon them to put those vessels in good order. He would not go into details at that hour of the night; but he would give one or two figures to show that the results of the present administration had not been such as had been alleged. On the 1st of January, 1874, there were but 16 armoured ships in good order, and on the 1st of January, 1879, there were 26. That was owing to the care which his right hon. Friend had displayed in causing those ships to be kept in proper repair. The House and the country should remember that repairs to ships were of far more importance at this time than they were 20 years ago. An iron ship was practically indestructible, and when they had got her they must make the best of her. It was much better to keep her in proper repair than to allow her to rust away in a corner. On the 1st of January, 1874, there were 27 armoured vessels, and on the 1st of January, 1879, 66 armoured vessels. In unarmoured ships they had, in 1874, 108 in good condition, and in 1879, 150. The wooden ships, in January, 1874, amounted to 81; but in January, 1879, they had diminished to 38, as that class of vessels had practically passed from the Navy. Those figures showed conclusively the results of their administration. The result of their administration had been to put upon the sea Fleets such as had never existed before, and that, surely, ought to be the proper result of good administration. It was said that they had spent more money; but they had got their money's worth, and when the country had measured and considered the results he had given he thought it would be satisfied that they had not spent the money with which they had been intrusted improperly; but that, speaking generally, their Fleets were in much better order than they had ever been before.

MR. E. J. REED said, that after the speech which had just been made he thought they ought to report Progress. He did not, however, intend to propose that Motion. He so far concurred with the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) that he intended, before the end of the Session, to give Notice of his intention next Session to bring before the House a Motion to the effect that Her Majesty's Government, having deprived the House of all just control over the Expenditure, the Votes in Committee should be postponed until that control had been re-established. He did not know that he should have said anything at all at that time but for some remarks which fell from his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty, in replying to the observations made. He had recently been at Hong Kong, and had examined the works there, and had been very much pleased with them. No doubt, the Estimate for them seemed somewhat large, and he should not have been pleased unless there had been something behind the Estimate. The work was done by the carpenters of the ships that required to be repaired at Hong Kong. By that means, it was possible for the Government to keep a small and efficient staff in the Dockyard in Hong Kong to superintend the work, or otherwise they would have to incur great expense by sending out artificers. The China Station was to be supplied, he believed, with a number of small craft. Those vessels were quite unsuitable to steam against sea, or to brave the monsoons that prevailed there. It was, therefore, desirable to repair and refit those vessels at Hong Kong. In December last, he noticed that a great deal of valuable work was done there, and he was of opinion that the expenditure at Hong Kong was fully justified. He did not say that the money expended on their own Dockyards was not required; but he considered that the Dockyard at Hong Kong did important service, even if it cost somewhat more than the other naval establishments. He thought his hon. Friend would agree with him that that was a very important consideration. He was not surprised that the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Samuda) objected to the change that had been made in the method of measuring the progress of vessels. His hon. Friend had, in passing, referred to the desirability of hastening the completion of the Inflexible; and he agreed that, until she was completed and they had obtained experience of her qualities, many important questions would be undecided. The discussion with respect to her turned upon what would happen when the ship went into action. He hoped the House would not be satisfied with the ship merely going to sea, and would not come to a conclusion until the vessel had been tried in action. He did not intend to go into the question which had been raised in a manner he had not expected. When the House entered into the inquiry he hoped that it would not be narrowed, and that it would be pursued with determination. He might observe, also, that not the slightest particle of information had been given concerning the Ajax and the Agamemnon. He would not prolong the discussion, but would only make one remark about the purchase of the Independencia. The fact had been noticed that it had been considered desirable to keep her a considerable time in the Dockyard and to spend a large sum of money upon her. As regarded the armament of the vessel, he confessed that he felt some surprise at what had been done, when he remembered that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty stated in his most positive manner that the purchase of the Independencia would afford an opportunity for a practical trial at sea of the Whitworth gun, which had been for some time desirable. Many persons at the time prognosticated that the right hon. Gentleman would never carry out that trial, but that the people behind him, in connection with the Navy, would be too strong for him. He had hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty would be stronger than the persons who moved him from behind; but he was sorry to find that the trial had been abandoned. With regard to the other part of the expenditure, he thought that a great part of it was justified, and that the Independencia required considerable alteration. But if it were intended, the moment she was purchased, to make her available for the defence of the country in case of war, then the object had not been fulfilled. However, he, for one, did not blame the Government for making considerable alterations in the Independencia, and rendering her fit for the service of this country. He wished to join in the protest which had been made against the Estimates being taken at that period of the Session.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that it was impossible for the House to deal with the subsequent five years. Using builders' measurement, it was found that from the 1st of April 1869 to the 1st of April 1874, there were built of armoured vessels 29,423 tons in the Dockyards, and 21,439 tons by contract, the total of armoured vessels being 50,862 tons. Then, of unarmoured ships, there was built between 1st April 1869 and 1st April 1874, 37,579 tons in the Dockyards and 10,343 tons by contract, making a total of 47,992 tons. Thus the total amount of tonnage completed in the five years was 98,784 tons, of which 67,002 tons were built in the Dockyards, and 31,782 tons by contract. From the 1st of April, 1874, to 1st of April, 1879, there were built in the Dockyards 36,354 tons, and by contract 11,036 tons, making a total of 47,390 tons of armoured vessels. Of unarmoured vessels built in the Dockyards, there were 38,945 tons, and by contract, 35,301 tons, making a total of armoured vessels built in the five years of 74,246 tons. Thus, the total amount of tonnage, both armoured and unarmoured, completed between 1874-9 was 121,636 tons, of which 75,299 tons were built in the Dockyards, and 46,337 by contract. Therefore, during the last five years, the present Government had built 23 per cent more tonnage of vessels than the Liberal Administration in the preceding five years. He might state that, in 1877-8, a total of 19,647 tons was added to the Navy by purchase out of the Vote of Credit; of that amount 14,808 tons were of armoured shipping, and 4,839 of unarmoured shipping.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that they were under very great disadvantage in testing the Return which had been brought before the House by the right hon. Gentleman. The Return before the House estimated the amount of shipping in tons, builders' measurement, for the late Government; but in ton weight of hull for the present Government. There was no means of comparing the ton weight with the builders' measurement. Could the right hon. Gentleman give them any data by which they could compare the different Estimates?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that he could not give the information that the right hon. Gentleman wished. He placed implicit reliance upon the accuracy of the figures which had been compiled by officials who had been appointed by the right hon. Gentleman himself.

Mr. W. H. Smith

MR. GOSCHEN said, that upon the evidence of the Comptroller, who was a personal friend of his, he placed implicit reliance. But it was upon the results of the figures that the question arose. A conversion had been made from builders' measurement into ton weight, and the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty did not know any relation between the two. They had one Return presented to the House by one of the Members of the Admiralty in ton weight and another in builders' weight; and the Admiralty were unable to inform the House of Commons what was the relationship between those two sets of calculations. Five years ago he would have answered any questions put to him by hon. Members upon that subject. He would again assert that if a Return had been presented by him in the manner in which the present had been framed, and explanations were not forthcoming, he should have considered it necessary to have given them to the House; but the right hon. Gentleman would not adopt that course. He was entirely in his right in asking, and he thought the House would be wrong if it did not ask the right hon. Gentleman to inform them how those terms had been converted? The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that it made a very considerable difference. The hon. Member for Reading had made a comparison between the results of the past and present administration of the Navy according to the figures that were in use when they were at the Admiralty; but the official Return now quoted by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty was prepared on a different system of calculation. They were unable to follow each individual ship, and they were therefore unable to follow that Return. They could not really make any progress in understanding the figures put before them until they knew how they had been converted. He was, of course, aware of the difficulty of discussing those questions at that time of the night; they had sat there very patiently while matters of much inferior importance were being discussed, and he must apologize to the Committee if he had allowed himself to be carried away by feeling too strongly the importance of the subject.

MR. PARNELL asked if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) could tell the Committee the difference between builders' measurement and ton weight? Perhaps that would be a good opportunity to discuss the question of Reserve men, with which the right hon. Gentleman had alleged himself to be acquainted.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that before they entered into a discussion upon the subject alluded to by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) he must express his surprise that the Returns from which the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had quoted had not been laid upon the Table of the House in time for a fair discussion to take place upon them. They ought to have known that those Returns were to be presented to the House. He could not but think that those Returns had only been drawn up in order that they might be used by the hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Admiralty in Lancashire during the coming Recess. He agreed with the observations that had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty as to the undesirability of making the Navy the subject of a Party fight. He only trusted that those observations were addressed by the right hon. Gentleman to his own Secretary, and that he would mark and digest them. During the last Recess the hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Admiralty had taken the opportunity of making grave charges against the Naval Administration of the late Government. With reference to the Returns, from which quotations had been made, there were great differences between the figures there given and the calculations which he had made. He did hope that the Government would give them such information as would enable them to compare the builders' measurement with the weight in tonnage, and in that manner to be in a position to verify the calculations.

MR. E. J. REED said, that with regard to the Whitworth guns there was a very important question as to their penetration of a vessel under water. They had hoped and expected that an opportunity would have arisen in the case of the Independencia for that question to be tried, and the ground of their complaint was that it had not been tried.

MR. D. JENKINS maintained that gunboats could be brought home for repair instead of being repaired abroad with greater efficiency to the Public Service; instead of that they were left to lay for nine-tenths of their time in the Chinese rivers. In his opinion, a great number of those gunboats could be brought home, to the great advantage of the crews and to economy in the Public Service. The charge for the number of men employed at the Dockyard at Hong Kong was very much greater than the expense incurred for a like number of men in the Home Dockyards.

MR. A. MOORE moved to report Progress, as he thought that the subject had not been thoroughly discussed, and that it could not be adequately discussed at that hour.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Arthur Moore.)

CAPTAIN PIM observed, that hon. Members interested in Dockyards, and in nautical matters, had come down that evening to discuss questions upon the Naval Estimates, and it would be inconvenient to have the discussion over again. He thought that it would be highly desirable to take the Vote then.

MR. A. MOORE said, that the hon. Member seemed to think that the subjects under discussion were only interesting to a section of hon. Members. He, in common with several of his hon. Friends near him, took a very great interest in the questions that would arise in connection with Vote 13.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that they did not intend to go as far as that Vote. He thought that, after the discussion they had upon the present Vote, they might reasonably come to some decision upon it.

MR. A. MOORE would be satisfied if Progress were reported when they reached Vote 13.

MR. GOSCHEN suggested that those Votes upon which questions were not raised should be taken, and that they should report Progress when they arrived at those Votes upon which discussions arose.

MR. W. H. SMITH expressed his willingness to adopt that course.

MR. E. JENKINS said, that the questions raised in connection with the Dockyard at Hong Kong deserved the attention of the Admiralty. £11,500 was voted in respect of the officers to look after 53 men; and there was one policeman for every 10 men. The Commodore in charge of the Yard got £1,488 a-year. In all probability, the duty of the Commodore consisted in walking about with a telescope under his arm and swearing at the men. He thought that it was clear that there were a number of officers in that Dockyard that were not required. He did not think that in an establishment of 312 men only so much as £1,100 should be paid to the officers. He thought the expenses of that Yard were a subject to which the Government might look with advantage.

MR. E. J. REED thought that his hon. Friend the Member for Dundee was unacquainted with the circumstances connected with the Hong Kong Dockyard. The Commodore was not a resident in the Dockyard, but had other duties to perform as Senior Resident in the Port of Hong Kong. His hon. Friend was wrong in supposing that the establishment consisted only of 312 men. When work was required to be done at Hong Kong the whole of the carpenters of the Fleet landed and performed the work under the superintendence of the Dockyard authorities. From his personal observation, he could affirm that the Commodore did not walk about with a telescope under his arm, as the hon. Gentleman had imagined.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MAJOR NOLAN complained that they had no Dockyards in Ireland. Out of £11,000,000 spent in Dockyards, only £1,300 was expended in Ireland. The sum spent upon Dockyards in Ireland was really contemptible. It was a great injustice to Ireland that that should be the case, for he had always considered that there was no strategical reason for it. Some of the ports on the West Coast of Ireland would be much better adapted for Dockyards than any in England. There was so great a difference between what was spent in Ireland on those matters and the amount spent in the other two countries that he only wondered that Irish Members had not made a greater stand upon the question than they had done.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. E. Jenkins

(6.) £76,570, Victualling Yards at Home and Abroad, agreed to.

(7.) £67,030, Medical Establishments at Home and Abroad, agreed to.

(8.) £21,408, Marine Divisions, agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,030,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Naval Stores for Building, Repairing, and Outfitting the Fleet and Coast Guard, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

CAPTAIN PIM asked the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty to postpone the consideration of that Vote, as some questions arose in connection with it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £566,749, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of New Works, Buildings, Yard Machinery, and Repairs, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

LUNACY INQUIRY (IRELAND) COMMISSION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD O'HAGAN, in rising to call attention to the Report of the late Irish Lunatic Inquiry Commission; and to ask a Question, said: My Lords, some time ago, I ventured to make a statement to your Lordships—perhaps, at too great a length—as to the miserable condition of some thousands of imbeciles and idiots amongst the poor of Ireland, and I presented a Bill designed for the improvement of their condition. On that occasion my noble Friend opposite (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) promised, on behalf of the Government, that the subject should receive their prompt attention, and, feeling that it would so be dealt with more effectually, I withdrew the Bill. I am bound to say that the undertaking was not forgotten. A Commission was issued to inquire generally as to Lunacy in Ireland; the Commissioners were very competent and able men, and they have produced a masterly Report, giving proof of great industry and conscientious care, and containing a large mass of important information. It concluded with wise and humane suggestions. So far, useful progress has been made; but months have elapsed, and I am not aware that anything has been done to carry those suggestions into practical effect. Your Lordships will, therefore, perhaps, forgive me if I invite your attention to them, and indicate in a few words the pressing importance of adopting, with such modifications as may seem desirable, the beneficial changes which are made imperative by the lamentable state of multitudes of our fellow-beings. Let me ask the attention of the House to the case of neglected lunatics in Ireland. It is the most pressing, as it is the most deplorable. In the year 1857 a Royal Commission ascertained that there were 3,352 lunatics at large, of whom no fewer than 1,583 were returned as “neglected.” And this Report informs us that within the last 20 years the number of that class increased by more than 100 per cent—from 3,352 to 6,709—without, in the opinion of the Commissioners, “any diminution in the proportion of those who may still be classed as neglected.” So that, at this moment, there would appear to be 3,352, “neglected lunatics” in Ireland. What is the life of these wretched people? How does it affect their families and the country around them? Your Lordships will best understand the answer from the details of an individual case described in a letter which is contained in the Report of the Inspectors of Lunacy, and embodied in the Report of the Commissioners—

“On approaching a small farmhouse at a place called——near——in the county——, I heard a most peculiar howling noise, and, to my horror, when I came near the house I saw a lunatic stark naked, confined to a room and looking through the wooden bars that closed the windows, for there was no glass whatever. He is about 19 years of age, and I heard from his mother that up to 10 or 11 years he was a most intelligent boy; but at that age he suddenly lost the power of speech and became moody and abstracted, wandering about the fields alone, and constantly uttering a low muttering noise, and with incessant tendency to mischief. By careful watching the family prevented him injuring himself or others, until, of late, he has got so strong and unmanageable, and his inclination for destruction is so great, that they have been obliged to confine him in the room I have described. He breaks the window directly it is glazed, tears his bedclothes into shreds, and will not allow a stitch of clothing to remain on his body; besides, his habits are most disgusting. It is really a sad case, and the more so as there are two grown-up sisters in the house."

Now, my Lords, this is only one of nearly 4,000 cases, which may be better or worse according to the circumstances, but none of which are protected by any intervention of the law from exhibiting themselves in as shocking an aspect. The Commissioners themselves state the results of their own observations in very startling words—

"We took occasion, ourselves, to visit several of these cases in different parts of the country. Some of them we found in a deplorably neglected condition; others disturbing the arrangements of a whole family, the head of which would willingly contribute a small sum towards maintenance in some suitable place of refuge. It admits of no doubt that many a case, if taken in hand at an early stage, might have been restored to society instead of lapsing into hopeless incurable insanity. Serious evil often results from the freedom with which idiots of both sexes are permitted to wander abroad, often teased and goaded to frenzy by thoughtless children, often the victims of ill-treatment or the perpetrators of offences far worse."

Surely such a state of things should not be permitted to continue, and especially as it may be mitigated, even if it be not removed. The legislation of Ireland is sadly behind that of England in this unhappy matter. In both countries—as, indeed, throughout the world—there was long a grievous indifference to the most afflicted of the human race. Only when the life of George III. was threatened by a lunatic in England did Parliament interfere, and send the insane to gaols. Only in 1838, when it was discovered that gaols were not fit receptacles for them, was provision made for committing them to asylums; and only in the Consolidating Act of 1853 were provisions made for such inspection and report as were needful for their protection and the safety of their neighbours. I lament to say that Ireland was left without even the benefit of the Act of 1799 until 1838, and that the advantages which the Act of that year gave to England were not extended to her lunatics until 1867; whilst you will scarcely believe that the salutary reforms of 1853 have not to this hour been made operative in Ireland. On this, the Commissioners observe in their Report—

Lord O'Hagan

"The interests of the public, no less than of the insane, require that means should be adopted to ascertain that all of that class are properly cared for. This can only be done by substituting the visit of a medical man for that of the constable, and a professional report for the incomplete return that is now made. If it were the duty of the dispensary medical officer to visit and report upon the condition and treatment of every 'lunatic' within his district, as it is the duty of district medical officers, in consideration of a moderate fixed remuneration, to visit and report upon the condition of pauper lunatics in England, incalculable benefit would be conferred both upon the patients and the general public. The visit of the medical man, instead of being received with suspicion or hesitation, would be welcome as that of a friend, in most cases known to the family, to whom all necessary information would be freely communicated. By such means, too, the statistics of lunacy at large might be made as complete as are those of the asylums."

My Lords, need I say more to press on the consideration of this House and of the Government the absolute necessity of applying a remedy to an evil so enormous—and this, especially, when such a remedy has been applied; and applied successfully, to a large extent in this country? The want of identical legislation, when the needs and conditions of England and Ireland require and justify it, is of incalculable mischief. A Bill which your Lordships passed yesterday evening, affording to the commercial community in Ireland the protection which England obtained in a former Session, illustrates that mischief; but the disparity in the matter with which I am dealing now is far more unwarrantable and of far greater evil. I do not mean to detain the House; but I must entreat the Government to give speedy consideration to the general recommendations of the Report which affects nearly 20,000 lunatics. They propose the classification of asylums for the purpose of curative treatment, the care of chronic cases, and the allocation of workhouses as auxiliaries for the benefit of the quiet and harmless amongst the insane. These, and other suggestions, they urge with great force and persuasiveness, and they very emphatically remark that there is no hope of effective change except through the interference of the Executive. They point to the recommendations of the Royal Commission of 1857, and a Committee of the House of Commons in 1858, largely identical with their own, and show how they have been equally disregarded. I trust that it may not be so again. I think that this earnest counsel of men of high authority, backed by the evidence of most faithful witnesses, and capable of being followed with facility if attention be only given to it, will not again be neglected and contemned. The Commissioners and the Inspectors of Lunacy differ as to material points on the modus operandi. The Inspectors desire the extension of the district asylums. The Commissioners do not agree with them, and that extension is suspended. I cannot judge between them. The Inspectors are men of high position and large experience, and the Commissioners have every title to be favourably heard. But no time is to be lost in settling the controversy. The poor lunatic suffers whilst it is not authoritatively settled, and I trust and hope that the Government will recognize the responsibility this Report unquestionably casts upon them, and take such measures as will do away with the social mischief which it so painfully discloses. I conclude, my Lords, by asking whether any proceedings have been taken or resolved on to carry into effect the suggestions of the Commissioners?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I am not surprised that my noble and learned Friend has referred to the Report of the Commissioners. The subject is certainly a very important one, and the Report is a very voluminous document. It occupies over 100 pages, and there are some 200 pages more of Appendix, containing evidence and other information. The subject which this Report travels over is about the most difficult that can be dealt with. It includes the question of the administration of the Poor Law, the best mode of treatment for curable lunatics and of those unhappy classes, incurable lunatics and imbeciles; and there is underlying the whole the important question of finance. It is further complicated, I am sorry to say, by a certain amount of difference of opinion between the public functionaries who have been investigating the subject. I would only say, in answer to the Question which my noble and learned Friend has asked, that the Report was made in February last, and has engaged, and will continue to engage, the most anxious attention of Her Majesty's Government. I trust it will not be in the category of those Reports which have gone before and have produced no result, and that the Government may be able, before long, to see their way to act upon some of the recommendations of the Commissioners' Report. I am not able to give my noble and learned Friend any further answer than that at the present moment.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, I rise to ask the Question which stands in my name, and to move for copies of certain documents, because I think it is a fitting time for your Lordships' House and the country to have some information concerning a subject which has exercised men's minds to a considerable extent for some time, and has excited a good deal of feeling throughout the country. It is exactly a month since my noble Friend on my right (Lord Truro) asked a Question in this House concerning the position of the late Prince Imperial, and made, at the same time, certain remarks about the conduct of affairs in South Africa. My noble Friend opposite the Under Secretary of State for War, in his reply, commented rather severely upon the tenour of the noble Lord's speech. He said he thought it was a pity that the noble Lord should take advantage of his privilege of free speech to throw broadcast, without proof, without waiting for reliable information, his censures as he had done, loud and long, and couched in almost violent language; and this, he said, the noble Lord had done on nothing better than the irresponsible statements of journalists. I hope I shall not be betrayed to use any language that might be described as almost violent; but if I am to wait to exercise my privilege of free speech until we have some information from Her Majesty's Government I might as well abandon my right of free speech altogether. We have had since then the newspapers full of these "irresponsible statements of journalists;" but not one word of responsible and reliable information from Her Majesty's Government. The position which the Prince Imperial occupied with our Forces has been, and is, involved in a good deal of obscurity. The noble Lord, on the occasion to which I have alluded, asked whether the Prince Imperial was in command on the 1st of June. In his reply to the noble Lord, the Under Secretary of State for War said that the Prince Imperial could not have been in command, because he could not bear any commission from Her Majesty; and he added, in the same speech, that he could not have been in command, because he was in the presence of an officer a great deal senior to him. Either one of these statements taken alone might be considered good, though not conclusive evidence, that the Prince Imperial was not in command. It would not be conclusive, because it is quite possible that an officer might be, under certain circumstances, put over the head of an officer senior to him, and it is conceivable that an individual not bearing the commission of Her Majesty might be in command of a party. Taken together, the two statements afford no proof whatever. If the Prince Imperial held no commission or appointment, he could not have been in the presence of an officer senior to him. He might not be the junior of that officer; but he might have held some appointment or commission. The noble and illustrious Duke (the Duke of Cambridge) read two letters in your Lordships' House—one from Lord Chelmsford, the other from Sir Bartle Frere. The letter from Lord Chelmsford is the only one that concerns me at present. It was to the effect that the Prince Imperial was anxious to serve with our troops in South Africa; that Her Majesty's Government would not sanction that; but that he had the sanction of the noble and illustrious Duke's writing to Lord Chelmsford to recommend the Prince Imperial to him. He was recommended to enable the Prince Imperial to see as much service as he could with our troops in the field. At the same time, he was told to take care of the Prince Imperial. It is obvious that the object of Her Majesty's Government, in not allowing the Prince to serve with our troops, was to guard against his running a certain risk; but, with all respect for the accumulated wisdom of Her Majesty's Government, certainly the means they took were not calculated to carry out the aim they had in view. They allow the Prince Imperial to go out as an irresponsible individual. It would have been wiser, I think, if they had attached him to Lord Chelmsford in some definite capacity. If they had allowed that, it would have been possible for the Commander-in-Chief in South Africa to have prevented him running any false risks which it is very natural and unavoidable that a young and brave man would run in his desire to see some active service, especially in such a campaign as was waged in South Africa. Lord Chelmsford was given a task which it was impossible for him to fulfil. As a matter of fact, we know Lord Chelmsford did attach the Prince Imperial to his personal Staff. The Secretary of State for War read extracts from two private letters, and from one official letter, from Lord Chelmsford stating that he had made the Prince Imperial an extra aide-de-camp, and the Secretary of State for War in "another place," and the Under Secretary of State for War in this House, stated that that was probably done to enable the Prince Imperial to draw forage and food. We do not know what that was probably done for. We want to know what it was done for. I think it would be interesting to your Lordships to see a copy of the orders by which the Prince Imperial was attached to the Staff of the General commanding in South Africa. I am quite aware that it is customary, when a non-combatant and civilian is allowed to accompany the Forces into the field, to give him certain facilities and a certain position. He is allowed to pass freely within the lines, and is usually offered the rank of lieutenant, or captain, or some rank suitable to him, to enable him to draw forage and rations; to be billeted if there are any quarters to be billeted for; to have facilities for transportation, and so on. But there the matter ceases. The individual so treated cannot be called upon to perform any kind of military duty. The authorities cannot demand his services in any way. The authorities are not responsible for his well-being or his life in the smallest degree. If that was the position occupied by the late Prince Imperial, it is well that your Lordships and the country should know it for certain, and at once; for, in that case, nobody is responsible for the Prince Imperial, and the country would learn with a sense of relief that no British soldier or officer was responsible for him; and that, consequently, there has been no neglect of duty. Unfortunately, it does not appear certain that the Prince was a mere spectator.

The Earl of Dunraven

It is quite possible for a civilian to be employed in a definite capacity. Your Lordships will excuse my being personal; but I would say that I know that from my own experience. I had the honour of accompanying an English expedition in the field. I had left the Service and was a civilian; but I was attached to the Quartermaster General in a definite capacity. My services were at the disposal of the Quartermaster General, and he was entitled to command them; and he was responsible for my life in the same way that any officer is responsible for the lives of those subordinate to him. It appears to me that that was the position occupied by the late Prince Imperial; and, if so, I want to know who was responsible for him? It has been rumoured that the late Prince Imperial was given some command in some Native or Colonial Force. I have no idea whether there is any truth in that report. If not, it would be well that it should be authoritatively denied by Her Majesty's Government. Well, then, we know that the Prince Imperial was transferred from the Staff of the General commanding in South Africa to the Quartermaster General's department. We have a telegram from Lord Chelmsford saying that the Prince was, on the 1st of June, acting under the orders of the Assistant Quartermaster General. It would be interesting to see a copy of the orders by which the Prince Imperial was transferred from Lord Chelmsford's Staff to the department of the Quartermaster General. It appears to me that the statement which has been made in both Houses, that the late Prince Imperial was a mere spectator, is quite incompatible with the fact that he was appointed an aide-de-camp of Lord Chelmsford's Staff, and that he was employed by the Assistant Quartermaster General to do a specific duty—namely, to fix a locality for a camp. Is it possible for a man to be an aide-de-camp without being liable to perform military duty? I would wish to consider principally the position occupied by the Prince on the 1st of June. We have had various statements, some made by Lieutenant Carey, by the troopers who formed part of the escort, and by Colonel Harrison. It has been said that the Prince gave the word of command which was obeyed by the troopers; that he disregarded the advice of Lieutenant Carey when he was urged to wait for the Basutos who were to have formed part of the escort, when he was recommended to alight and off-saddle on the ridge instead of in the exposed position where he did off-saddle, and when he was advised to leave; and we know that the Prince carried written instructions which were lost with him. In order to clear up the matter surrounding the Prince's position on the 1st of June, I moved for copies of the orders or instructions on which the Prince Imperial was acting on that day. The position of Lieutenant Carey was also very doubtful; and it is scandalous that there should be any uncertainty about a matter of such importance. It has been stated that he was in command of a reconnoitring party; that he was in command of an escort; and that he was present merely as a volunteer, because he knew the ground well, having been over it before. There is one very simple method of solving all these difficulties; that is for the Government themselves to lay upon the Table a copy of the orders which were given to Lieutenant Carey on the 1st of June. If Lieutenant Carey was not detailed for duty on orders, either the statement that he was present as a volunteer is correct, or the campaign in South Africa has been conducted in a manner very different from that in which warlike operations are invariably conducted by civilized nations. Further, I move for copies of the charges upon which Lieutenant Carey was arraigned. I presume that the proceedings of the court martial have been now for some time before the Judge Advocate General, and that there can be no difficulty in giving your Lordships information as to the charges. It is obvious that there are two charges upon which he may have been tried—neglect of taking proper precaution, and misbehaviour in face of the enemy. The whole thing depends, of course, upon the position which Lieutenant Carey held. If he was in command of a reconnoitring party, then he was to blame for not taking the ordinary precaution which a man would take if he was at all acquainted with savages and their mode of carrying on war. If he was in command of the escort merely, he cannot be held accountable, because he would be entirely under the orders of the Prince Imperial, and would no more have dis-

tated to the Prince than an officer of one of the Household Cavalry Regiments, commanding an escort accompanying Her Majesty to a levée at St. James's Palace, could dictate to Her Majesty as to when she was to go, or when she was to leave. If Lieutenant Carey was a mere volunteer, still less, in that case, could blame attach to him. From all that can be gathered, it is quite certain that no danger whatever was apprehended. Smaller bodies of men had traversed the country in security. Basutos were scouting on the other side; General Marshall's Cavalry were close at hand; Colonel Wood's camp was only one mile distant; General Newdigate was at a distance of only four miles. The smallness of the escort shows that no danger was apprehended. The party had unsaddled and tethered their horses; their carbines were not even loaded; and it appears that the expedition was looked upon more in the light of a military picnic than anything else. If, therefore, Lieutenant Carey is to blame for not having taken proper precautions, it appears to me that at least an equal amount of blame attaches to the officer, whoever he was, who allowed the Prince to go out under such mistaken notions, and with such an inadequate idea of the danger that he incurred. If Lieutenant Carey has been tried for misbehaviour, that is quite another matter. We know enough about the circumstances to be able to form some idea of the nature of the surprise. The horses, as I have said, were unsaddled and tethered; the men were cooking, and were scattered about the place, resting themselves. The alarm was given, and the command to mount was ordered with such precipitation that, according to the statements of the troopers, scarcely any one of them had time to get into his saddle properly. It appears as though each man threw himself on his horse, and made his escape as speedily as possible. Is it conceivable that any officer, under such circumstances, could have rallied his men in a few minutes, and could have been aware of what was going on about him, even if it had been his duty to rally and halt them. If Lieutenant Carey were in command of a reconnoitring party, it clearly was not his duty to offer any resistance. The duty of a party employed in feeling for the enemy is to carry information of their presence the moment that you feel them. It might be impossible to judge of the number of the Zulus. They might have been in force; and if they had been in force, and the little party had lost their lives, the result might have been a surprise, and, possibly, the destruction of the troops in the neighbourhood. I would ask your Lordships to pay special attention to the fact that it is not the duty of a reconnoitring party to stop and fight, but to get out of the affair as soon as possible, and convey the intelligence to the first body of troops. Besides, my Lords, we have been told that the Prince Imperial was merely a spectator. If that be the case, it would surely have been most culpable for Lieutenant Carey to have imperilled his life, and the lives of his men, and consequently to have endangered the safety of the camps and the troops in the vicinity, for the sake of endeavouring to save the life of a mere spectator, however exalted the rank of the spectator might be, and however peculiar the circumstances surrounding him. That is the real difficulty of this question. It is almost impossible to look at it with perfectly impartial eyes. The position of the individual who there lost his life is so peculiar that men's minds are indefinitely influenced by it. It is not easy to find a single life regarded with the utmost affection of which the human heart is capable, calling forth the deepest friendship of friends and comrades, around which, at the same time, cluster and cling all the hopes and aspirations of a great Party of a great nation; and it is not unreasonable to suppose that Lieutenant Carey's case has been somewhat prejudiced on that account. As a matter of fact, it appears to me to have been prejudiced in various ways. He was removed from his Staff employment. Previous to the Court of Inquiry and the court martial, statements, prejudicial to him, have appeared in the newspapers. The Times published a letter, some little time ago, signed, "One present," and written from the Army and Navy Club, comparing Lieutenant Carey's conduct with that of another officer, under what might be considered to be similar circumstances. The circumstances were not at all similar. The ignorance of the writer on military matters was only equalled by his want of decency in attempting to prejudice the public mind against a man awaiting his trial. The circumstances were not at all similar, and no comparison could be made. But, unfortunately, the general public are so ignorant of military affairs that they cannot fail to be prejudiced by such a letter. Moreover, the Prime Minister, speaking in this House, made use of an expression which I fear may have tended to prejudice Lieutenant Carey's case. The noble Earl at the head of Her Majesty's Government said that the life of the Prince Imperial had, in his opinion, been so "needlessly and cruelly sacrificed." I understood the noble Earl to mean by that word "needlessly," that so valuable a life, one which had such great possibilities before it, had been sacrificed for no great object, and with no adequate results; but it is obvious that another meaning could be attached to the word, and I fear that many of those who naturally weigh and ponder the words of a Prime Minister might think that the noble Earl considered that his life might and ought to have been saved by those who were present. Moreover, the newspapers, in speaking of the matter and writing of the Court of Inquiry and court martial, made constant allusion to the late Prince Imperial, to the inquiry into all the circumstances attending his death; but made scarcely any mention whatever of the two troopers who lost their lives on the same occasion. This cannot fail to make people think that if it had been merely a question of the lives of those two troopers, possibly the affair would have attracted no attention whatever, and Lieutenant Carey would not have been blamed to the extent that he has been. There is some danger that the public mind may be prejudiced against Lieutenant Carey. There is danger also that strong re-action may set in which might cause some miscarriage of justice. For, as your Lordships are well aware, the English people will not stand for a moment the notion that any responsibility should be cast upon the shoulders of a man who ought not properly to be made to bear it. They will not for a moment suffer Lieutenant Carey in any way to be made a scapegoat of in this matter, or to be treated differently on account of the illustrious rank of the individual who perished when with him, than he would have been treated had it been merely a question of the lives of the two troopers who also perished. This matter is one of such importance that I make no apology for bringing it before your Lordships, and I beg to ask, Whether the late Prince Imperial held any appointment in South Africa under Her Majesty's Government, either Home or Colonial? I beg also to move for Copies of the Orders or Instructions under which the late Prince Imperial was acting on the 1st of June; and for Copies of the Orders which detailed Lieutenant Carey for duty on the same day; and for Copies of the Charge or Charges upon which Lieutenant Carey was arraigned.

VISCOUNT BURY: I am afraid I must answer the speech of the noble Earl in a very few words. I must decline to follow him into any of the details which he has brought before the House—in my opinion, the time has not yet arrived when we can discuss this matter. The proceedings of the court martial which sat on Lieutenant Carey have reached this country; but they have not yet been confirmed, neither are they yet officially before the War Office. I have not myself seen them. Under these circumstances, it is impossible for me to follow my noble Friend into those details on which he has framed some ingenious hypotheses. I will, therefore, confine myself to answering the Questions in the fewest possible words, guarding myself, at the same time, against the supposition that there is any indisposition on my part to afford the information for which my noble Friend asks. My noble Friend asks whether the late Prince Imperial held any appointment in South Africa under Her Majesty's Government either Home or Colonial? My noble Friend suggested that the Prince was attached to some Colonial Forces, and had a commission in them. That is not the case; neither is it a fact that he held any commission or had any direct employment under Her Majesty. He was employed in the Quartermaster General's Department on the occasion in question, in the same way that any civilian may be employed without acting in any military capacity. The answer, therefore, I have to make to my noble Friend's first Question is that the Prince Imperial, though he was employed, had no appointment under Her Majesty. My noble Friend moves for Copies of the Orders or Instructions under which the late Prince Imperial was acting on the 1st of June. We have at the War Office no knowledge of any such Instructions. They have not come to us, and we do not know of their existence. My noble Friend asks for Copies of the Orders which detailed Lieutenant Carey for duty on the same day. I must give to that Question the same answer—that they are not in the possession of the War Office, and I am not aware of their existence. My noble Friend also asks for Copies of the Charge or Charges upon which Lieutenant Carey was arraigned. My Lords, as I have said, the Report of the finding of the court martial, and the proceedings of the court martial, are in this country; but until they have been confirmed it will not be possible to produce them. When, however, they can be produced without injury to the Public Service or to the interests of justice, those Charges will be laid upon the Table of your Lordships' House.

LORD TRURO said, the reply of the noble Viscount the Under Secretary of State for War was characterized by reticence and ambiguity; indeed, most of the noble Viscount's replies were capable of a double signification. ["Oh! oh!"] What could be the meaning of the Prince Imperial being employed and yet holding no appointment under Her Majesty? There was a double significance in the noble Viscount's answer. The answer was not intelligible. The evident intention of the Government was that this matter should not be discussed in Parliament during the present Session. He complained that they were keeping the public uninformed on a subject which excited so much interest throughout the country until Parliament should be prorogued.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: The speech of the noble Lord who has just sat down, I think, will lead all your Lordships thoroughly to understand the very great ignorance which he displays upon matters connected with the Military Service of this country; because it is scarcely credible that the noble Lord should have got up and found fault with my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War for the answer which he gave him, if he had any knowledge whatever of anything connected with the Army. The noble Lord laments the death of the Prince

Imperial, and complains that the subject is not likely to be discussed during the present Session of Parliament. But the subject-matter connected with the lamented death of Prince Louis Napoleon, and the subsequent transactions which took place in South Africa affecting the character of an officer of Her Majesty's Army, are questions not to be discussed in Parliament until Parliament has before it the whole of the circumstances of the case. It would be most unjust to Lieutenant Carey, and most unseemly and incorrect on our part, if we were to give any opinion upon this matter until the whole of the proceedings of the court martial can with propriety be made public, and they cannot be made public before they have been approved by the General Commanding-in-Chief. The noble Lord seems to think that the proceedings of a court martial can be treated like some trivial proceeding before a police magistrate. The noble Lord seems to imagine that those proceedings should be made the subject of discussion at once; but that was more surprising than the noble Lord's being surprised at what was said by the noble Viscount the Under Secretary of State for War. My noble Friend stated that the Prince Imperial did not hold any appointment in the British Army—and it was impossible that the Prince, situated as he was, could do so—but on this occasion he was employed; and that answer was substantially correct and true; and if the noble Lord brought forward the question over and over again he could not receive any other answer—namely, that the Prince was employed on the 1st of June, but held no appointment.

LORD WAVENEY thought that the subject had been very ingenuously brought before their Lordships by the noble Earl who raised the discussion, who, as he understood, had some apprehension and had stated that there were some fears in the country that this subject would not be discussed in that House this Session. The subject was one of the highest importance, and it should not be left to be considered simply upon any Report that might be presented which few people would read. He did not understand his noble Friend (Lord Truro) as wishing to discuss the proceedings of the court martial. He asked for information; and, no doubt, it was important that their Lordships should learn whether the discipline of the British Army was what it ought to be. The very fact that the Prince received employment showed that his life was under the protection of the British flag; and his life should, therefore, have been as strictly guarded as that of anyone engaged in the Queen's Service. As for the Instructions which had been moved for, he understood that the correspondence was so much in arrear that copies had not come home. The Adjutant General's Department in that case must be very ill-served. Of Lieutenant Carey he knew nothing; but he trusted an opportunity of discussing his case would be given before the end of the Session, notwithstanding the misgivings of his noble Friend. All these questions must be settled authoritatively, with as little delay as possible. He supported most cordially the Motion of his noble Friend for the Papers, with the exception of those relating to the court martial.

LORD HAMPTON agreed with his noble Friend (Lord Waveney) that no exception could be taken to the speech of the noble Earl who introduced this subject. The inquiries were very natural under the circumstances, and no complaint could be made of the tone in which he had spoken. But he could not speak in the same sense of the speech of the noble Lord who followed the Under Secretary (Lord Truro). He had listened to the remarks of his noble Friend the Under Secretary, and he had not heard a word which would justify the charge that his speech was distinguished by ambiguity and reticence. Equally without foundation was the statement that it was the evident intention of Her Majesty's Government that the subject should not be discussed this Session, and that the Papers were withheld on that account. He had never heard in that House a statement more destitute of foundation. His noble Friend had said all that he prudently could say under the circumstances. With respect to Lieutenant Carey, until the proceedings of the court martial had been confirmed they could not be made public, and, in the meanwhile, there would be necessarily great curiosity to know in what manner that officer would be treated. It was essential that justice should be done to Lieutenant Carey, and justice could not be done if the unusual course were taken of discussing his conduct before the House was in possession of the whole of the circumstances of the case.

LORD TRURO wished to say a word in explanation. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) had taken him to task with great severity, and had imputed to him the idea that the proceedings of the court martial ought at once to be laid before that House. He was perfectly ready to acknowledge his own little acquaintance with military affairs; but he did not for a moment suppose that the proceedings of the court martial would be laid before that House before they had been confirmed by the Commander-in-Chief.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it was quite clear it was not desirable that the House should discuss the case of Lieutenant Carey without full information; but the noble Earl who brought forward this Motion (the Earl of Dunraven) did not ask their Lordships to discuss the subject without information. The great object of his noble Friend was to get whatever information Her Majesty's Government could give on the question. The observations which his noble Friend had made contributed very useful information as to the case, and he was quite sure that information on the matter was required by the public, whose feelings were stirred in the most extraordinary degree. For his own part, he could give no opinion on such questions as these—whether Her Majesty's Government were right in permitting the Prince Imperial to go to South Africa at all—the question as to the position in which the Commander-in-Chief placed him—the question as to Lieutenant Carey's position with respect to the Prince—and, above all, the question of the unfortunate situation in which Lieutenant Carey was now placed, whether he was guilty of very grievous misconduct or not. Upon these questions he expressed no opinion whatever. But he thought it was obviously reasonable that Her Majesty's Government should decline to produce the Report of a court martial which the Under Secretary said had not yet reached the War Office, and had not been confirmed by the Commander-in-Chief. No doubt all the Instructions asked for by his noble Friend would be found in the Papers of the court martial; if not, important information would be wanting without which it would be impossible for Her Majesty's Government to act. What he wanted was that when complete information could be given on the subject it would not be withheld from Parliament.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, that as the noble Viscount the Under Secretary of State for War had stated that he had received no copies of the documents he would not press for them. In what he had said with regard to himself he meant that he was under orders and served in a special capacity. He held that appointment throughout the campaign, he received a medal for the campaign, and he was a civilian. He thought his position in that case was analogous to that of the Prince Imperial.

VISCOUNT BURY said, the Prince Imperial was attached to the Staff, but was not an aide-de-camp.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

MERCANTILE SHIPPING—EXPLOSIVES ACT, 1875.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD TRURO asked, Whether Her Majesty's Government have taken any steps since the last Session of Parliament to prevent the shipment in merchant vessels, carrying passengers, of gunpowder or other explosive substances in larger quantities than the law permits; and, also, whether any steps have been taken to compel the owners of merchant vessels carrying passengers to provide properly constructed magazines for the stowage of explosive substances? The noble Lord remarked that the trade in explosives from this country had increased so enormously during the last few years, that he thought the time had now come when it would be expedient for the Government to consider whether they ought not to enact that it should be carried on in vessels specially constructed and exclusively appropriated to the traffic?

LORD HENNIKER said, he fully acknowledged the importance of the subject, and thought the best way of answering the Question would be to explain the exact position of the Board of Trade in this matter. Under the Explosives Act of 1875, the harbour authorities were bound to make bye-laws; the bye-laws required the sanction of the Board of Trade; the Board of Trade had no power to compel the harbour authorities to make those bye-laws; but, soon after the passing of the Act of 1875, they issued a Circular to all the harbour authorities drawing their attention to the new Statute. That Circular was issued to all the harbour authorities catalogued by the Commissioners of Customs, and their names were to be found in the House of Commons Paper, No. 213, of 1874. To show that the matter had been in no way neglected, he might say that some of those authorities to which Circulars had been issued were now found to be no longer harbour authorities, or only so in name. Of these, 177, including the principal ports, such as the Thames, the Mersey, the Tyne, and the Tees, had made bye-laws, which had been sanctioned by the Board of Trade. Since the noble Lord brought that question before the House last year the Thames Conservancy had—as he then stated was probable—issued amended bye-laws, with the view of securing the hoisting and keeping the red flag flying on all ships which were about to receive or had on board explosives. In the case of ships carrying passengers, which came under the operation of the Passenger Acts, the carriage of explosives was entirely prohibited, and the officers of the Board of Trade had done their best to see the law properly carried out. In the case of ships which did not come under the Passenger Acts, the Board of Trade officers interfered when they had reason to believe the method in which the explosives were stowed rendered the ship unsafe. The Board of Trade had issued no instructions as to the construction of magazines on board ship. Those they had issued were as follows:—

“The principal officer of the Board of Trade need not detain any such ship, provided the explosives, being packed as required by the Explosive Substances Act and by order of the Secretary of State, are enclosed in a substantial compartment formed of double boards with an intermediate lining of felt, and free from all exposed iron in the interior thereof, and exclusively appropriated to the stowage of explosives. If such a compartment is not provided, the officer must satisfy himself that the explosives are ‘otherwise,’ and by careful stowage, secured from contact with or danger from any other article or substance carried as cargo on board the ship. If, for instance, the explosives are surrounded with goods carefully packed and have boards between them and the goods, so as to completely isolate them from all cargo, packing-cases, &c., likely to cause explosion by metal or other dangerous articles coming in contact with powder, and if they are placed on and surrounded by sailcloth or felt in such a way as to prevent effectually any of the powder getting adrift during the voyage and filtering into the general cargo, and if they are so placed and surrounded that the crew cannot get among them in their attempts to plunder cargo during the voyage, the officer need not interfere with their stowage. It is, of course, understood throughout that explosives are not to be placed in the same part of the ship as coals, combustibles, spirits, or other inflammable goods."

The noble Lord (Lord Truro) wished to know why ships could not be fitted specially to carry explosives only? There was no reason against ships being so fitted, as far as the Board of Trade were aware, except one—namely, that the cost of fitting ships and using them exclusively for that trade would be too great. As to the desirability of securing to passengers and crew a knowledge that explosives were to be carried by any ship, it was not legal to carry explosives on board passenger ships, as he had said, under the Passenger Acts. Therefore, in those ships there was nothing to warn passengers of. As to passenger ships not under the Passenger Acts, the Board of Trade had nothing to do with regulating the stowage, and were not in a position to give any warning. If a passenger wished to know whether explosives were to be carried, he could easily ascertain the fact by making an application to the Customs or to the harbour authority. With regard to the number of ships burnt, 26 ships had been burnt only, as far as could be known, in the two years ending in 1878. That, of course, was open to a qualification, as some ships—a large number—were reported as lost with the cause unknown. However, the number was not large, when the fact was considered that 316,887 British ships, and 29,881 foreign ships—a total of 346,768—had cleared from ports in the United Kingdom in 1878; 15,187 British, and 3,576 foreign ships from London alone.

PETROLEUM ACT (1871) AMENDMENT
BILL.—(No. 161.)
(The Lord Steward.)
COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD COLCHESTER urged the importance of proceeding with the greatest care in dealing with this subject. The public safety required that they should guard against undue laxity in any legislation of this kind.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, that in 1871 the Petroleum Act was passed, and it provided a certain test, which was known as the open test. In 1872, a Bill was introduced to substitute another test for that contained in the Act of 1871, and that Bill was referred to a Committee of their Lordships' House, which took a great amount of evidence on the question. The proposal in the present Bill was the outcome of experiments that had been made in order to test the character of the petroleum.

House in Committee accordingly.

Bill reported, without Amendment; and to be read 3^a on Tuesday next.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

SCOTLAND — THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH — THE PROFESSOR OF CHURCH HISTORY.—QUESTIONS.

MR. M'LAREN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Professor of Church History in the University of Edinburgh accepted his commission to that office on the condition that the charge held by him as a Minister of the Church of Scotland would be relinquished by him before Whitsunday 1879; and, if so, whether any sufficient reason has been assigned for his still holding the office and performing the duties of parish minister in a populous and important charge in the Church in contravention of the conditions referred to?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, the duties of the Professor of Church History, if rightly performed, are quite sufficient, in my opinion, to occupy the whole time of the Professor. Accordingly, when the present Professor was appointed, it was made an express condition that he should resign his Presbyterian charge before Whit Sunday, 1879. He has complied with that requirement by resigning the office which he holds as parish minister, and his resignation has been accepted by the Presbytery of Edinburgh. No successor has as yet been appointed to him; but that is due, not to any neglect on the part of the Professor of Church History, but to the fact of some of the parishioners having appealed to a higher court. All I can say is that of course the Professor must give up his charge if he intends to keep the Chair.

MR. M'LAREN: Might I ask, If the only person who has appealed is a solicitor, and whether he is not supposed to be acting in accordance with the wishes of the Professor?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I have only had a short conversation with my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate; but I understand that the Professor is quite willing to carry out the arrangement that was come to.

REPRODUCTIVE LOAN FUND (IRELAND)—LOANS TO CLARE FISHERMEN.—QUESTIONS.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true that Thomas Enright and Michael Scanlan, inhabitants of Clare, creditors of the Irish Board of Works for moneys advanced from the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund, were, after payment of part of their loans, sued for the entire original amounts and compelled to pay them in the month of February last; whether these poor men have since been repaid the sums thus overpaid, and, if so, when they were so repaid; whether one Stephen Collins, also of Clare, a creditor of the Board under similar circumstances, tendered the balance he actually owed with costs to the solicitor acting for the Board, and whether the solicitor refused to accept the sum, and proceeded to sue Collins; and, whether Thomas Banfill, an inhabitant of Clare, similarly circumstanced, having repaid part of his loan, was sued for the whole, tendered the balance in court, with costs, when his offer was refused by the solicitor?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, these parties obtained the money in the manner referred to for a specific purpose, and afterwards applied it to another. This, of course, was gross irregularity, and the sessional Crown Solicitor, with whom the duty rested of recovering this money, interfered, and applied for the whole sum due, notwithstanding that some payment had been made on account. His object in doing that was to read them a lesson against committing a breach of their engagements. The Board of Works, however, directed that the money should be restored which had been paid on account. The repayment to these two men was ordered on the 10th of June; but in consequence of the death of the clergyman who was referee they did not receive it until the 20th. The order was made in Collins' case, and there was no refusal to receive what he tendered.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY: Did Collins tender the money?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Neither Collins nor Banfill offered to pay the balance.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY: I beg to give Notice that I will, on an early day, call attention to the unjust and arbitrary conduct of the Crown Solicitor for County Clare in suing Enright and Scanlan for sums of money, a part of which had already been paid by them.

KINGDOM OF SIAM—ACTION OF MR. KNOX, BRITISH CONSUL GENERAL—THE GUNBOAT "FOX."

QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS said, after the explanation which had been given in regard to this matter the other night, he would not trouble the hon. Gentleman the

Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs with the Question on the subject which stood upon the Paper in his name as follows:—

"To ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether he will explain to the House the circumstances under which the British Consul General in Siam ordered up the gunboat "Fox" from Singapore to Bangkok, and for what purpose the vessel has been detained here until the present time; whether it is the fact that, under the orders of the Consul General, the Commander and Officers of the British gunboat have been prevented from paying visits to the Siamese, or giving them invitations to the vessel; and, whether these proceedings on the part of the Consul General have the sanction of Her Majesty's Government?"

but he should like to know, If, when the Consular Report was received, the Government would be prepared to come to any decision on the subject, and lay Papers on the Table?

Mr. BOURKE, in reply, said, he must express his obligations to the hon. Member for putting the Question in this form. An inquiry was still going on at Bangkok, and the Foreign Office would, no doubt, before long arrive at a conclusion upon it; but he was afraid he could not say that the Papers would be laid upon the Table of the House until that conclusion had been arrived at. However, the hon. Member would not be able to see the Papers until next Session, and therefore the Question had better be postponed until that time, seeing that he would be in no worse position by so doing.

LUNACY AND POOR LAW ADMINISTRATION (IRELAND)—THE COMMISSION OF INQUIRY.—QUESTION.

Mr. MACARTNEY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the case that a Memorandum was supplied to him by the Commission of Inquiry into Lunacy and Poor Law Administration appointed in 1877, in addition to the Report supplied to this House; and, if so, whether he has any objection to having it also printed and delivered to honourable Members?

Mr. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the Report referred to by the hon. Gentleman is a document of alarming length; but the Commissioners have furnished me with a Memorandum expressing their views in a more handy shape, and I have no objection to its being printed.

VACCINATION ACTS (IRELAND) AMENDMENT BILL.—QUESTION.

Mr. G. E. BROWNE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he intends to proceed further with the Vaccination Acts (Ireland) Amendment Bill?

Mr. J. LOWTHER: Yes, Sir, the Bill would have been brought forward, and passed long ago, but for some Amendments which have prevented it being heard. I hope, however, an opportunity will shortly occur to proceed with it; and meanwhile, if the hon. Gentleman can prevail upon his political Friends to withdraw their opposition, it will greatly facilitate matters.

NAVAL DISCIPLINE BILL—PUNISHMENT.—QUESTION.

Mr. MACDONALD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, When he will introduce the promised Naval Discipline Bill; and, whether, considering that, by the Army Discipline Act, which has now become Law, the punishment of solitary confinement to the soldier has been abolished as a part of the original sentence, he will stay the execution of all sentences that have solitary confinement as a part of the original conviction until the Naval Discipline Bill has been dealt with?

Mr. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, he was afraid it was now too late to introduce a Bill for the amendment of the Naval Discipline Act this Session, looking to the importance of the subject and to the lateness of the period which had been reached; but he had been for some days in communication with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with a view to securing that the punishment under the Naval Discipline Act—the special and particular punishment to which the hon. Gentleman referred—should be carried out in the same way as similar punishments under the Army Discipline Act. Under these circumstances, he hoped the object which the hon. Gentleman had in view would be practically accomplished.

ARMY—COMMISSARIAT OFFICERS—THE WARRANT.—QUESTION.

Colonel MURE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to fill up the vacancies in the several ranks of the officers of the Commissariat which have occurred, and may occur, owing to the late compulsory and voluntary retirements before the Warrant expected is published; whether it is intended to fill the said vacancies by placing military officers over the heads of officers at present serving in the Commissariat according to date of Commissions; whether a great number of the present officers will be compelled to retire; and, if so, what compensation will be granted to them; and, what will be the position and future prospects of those who will be retained?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL, in reply, said, that in view of the approaching publication of the Warrant there were many points that would have to be considered between the Treasury and the War Office, and it would be impossible at the present to answer the Question categorically. The vacancies which formed the subject of the Question would not be filled up until the number of officers to be retired had been settled.

EGYPT—THE PAPERS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. OTWAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Papers relating to Egyptian affairs will be delivered; and, why the Copies of the Firman promised at Whitsuntide have not yet been delivered? He should like also to take this opportunity of asking the hon. Gentleman, Whether the Government have yet received any intelligence as to the prohibition of Nubar Pasha's return to Egypt?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, he must ask the hon. Member to give Notice of the latter part of the Question, which he should be happy to answer on Monday. In reference to the Question on the Paper, on the 30th of June, in answer to a Question put by his hon. Friend, he said he thought it would be better to present the Firman as a separate Paper, and he requested his hon. Friend to confer privately with him on the subject; but he had not had the advantage of that conference.

MR. OTWAY: You told me not to come.

MR. BOURKE, continuing, said, he thought it would be better to publish the Correspondence with respect to the Firmans at the same time; but this had involved him in a search through 30 or 40 volumes of Correspondence relating to Firmans since 1841, and the task had occupied him longer than he had anticipated. They were, however, now ready, and would, he hoped, be in the hands of hon. Members by Tuesday or Wednesday next, and the other Papers in the course of next week.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID said, he wished to put two or three Questions to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to Egyptian affairs. He had put several Questions upon the same subject on a former occasion, when the right hon. Gentleman said he was unable to answer them, because England was acting in concert with France in the matter. He now desired to ask, Whether the statement made by M. Waddington in the French Legislative Assembly was made after consultation with the English Government, seeing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had declared some time ago that he was not in a position to make any statement himself until he had consulted with the French Government; and, whether the contradiction that was apparent between the statement of M. Waddington and what had been stated on the part of the British Government in the House of Commons could be explained? The statement of M. Waddington was that the French Government were obliged to insist on the abdication or deposition of the Khedive in the interests of the French creditors of the Khedive, whereas the statement on the part of the English Government was that action had not been taken in the interests of those creditors at all. Could he explain how those very different statements could be made to agree? He should also like to know, whether, considering the importance of the subject and the pledge of the Government with regard to it, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not disposed to afford some other opportunity for the discussion of these matters than that which had been suggested by the Secretary to the Treasury—namely, on the stages of the Appropriation Bill; whether the right hon. Gentleman did not think it right that under the circumstances which had occurred, and after the very full explanation which had been offered in the French Legislative Assembly, a more favourable and earlier opportunity than that should be given before the House dispersed for the Recess?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I think it would be more convenient if Notice were given of Questions like that relating to the speech of M. Waddington. I have only seen a short account of it in the newspapers, and my experience is that these accounts are not always reliable. With regard to the opportunity the hon. Gentleman desires to have, I should be very glad indeed if opportunity could be given for discussion of this or any other subject; but we are asked for so many opportunities that really it is difficult to fix them at all. But as we are now, I hope, coming within sight of the Appropriation Bill, I think that the stages of that measure would furnish convenient opportunities enough for such discussion.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID gave Notice that he would repeat his Question on Monday, with the addition of two or three others. As, from the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, there seemed to be a prospect of completing Supply in a few days, and as, therefore, the Appropriation Bill was not so far off as he had at first supposed, perhaps he had better bring forward the matter on that occasion; and, therefore, he would be glad to know when the Chancellor of the Exchequer expected to take the last Vote in Supply and to bring in the Appropriation Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that having been taunted on the point he had no desire to express so sanguine an opinion on the subject, and did not like to make rash speculations, but thought it was within the power of the House to close Supply next week. Whether the House would exercise that power or not he could not say.

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION BILL—IMPRISONMENT OF MILITARY OFFENDERS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL COLTHURST: I beg to ask a Question of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, of which I have given him private Notice, As to whether measures will be adopted to carry out the undertaking given by him, in connection with the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill, to provide that military offenders shall be kept in prisons separate from those occupied by ordinary criminals?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, my undertaking was to do so not as quickly, but as far as possible, and some steps have already been taken in that direction. I have appointed a small Committee to act in concert with a small Committee appointed by the War Office in considering the question. I hope they will be able to do that during the Recess, and let us know what can be done in the matter.

SHIPPING CASUALTIES INVESTIGATIONS RE-HEARING BILL—AMENDMENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. MAC IVER asked, Whether it is intended in Committee on the Shipping Casualties Investigations Re-hearing Bill to introduce Amendments in conformity with the views of the Mercantile Marine Association of Liverpool; and, whether the Board of Trade intend to introduce Amendments providing for appeals to the Court of Admiralty at Westminster?

MR. J. G. TALBOT, in reply, said, he had only received Notice of the Question since he came into the House. He would communicate with his noble Friend the President of the Board of Trade on the subject. Meantime, it would be open to the hon. Member to put down such Amendments as he might think proper, in which case he (Mr. Talbot) would assure him they would be duly considered by the Government.

MR. MAC IVER gave Notice that on the Motion for going into Committee on the Bill, he should move that the House go into Committee on it that day three months.

REGULATION OF RAILWAYS ACTS CONTINUANCE BILL—THE RAILWAY COMMISSION.—QUESTIONS.

MR. HERMON asked, Whether the Regulation of Railways Acts Continuance Bill, which had been introduced, was merely a Continuance Bill, or whether it contained any alteration whatever of the present Act, under which the Railway Commission existed, or sought to establish any Court of Appeal? He also wished to know, whether it would not be possible to continue the Commission for one year instead of three?

MR. J. G. TALBOT, in reply, said, the Bill was merely for the continuance of the Railway Commission for three years from the 1st of January next. It was not intended to make any alteration whatever in the present Act; but the Government desired to give plenty of opportunity for consideration of the whole question by giving what he might call temporary permanence to the Railway Commission.

MR. CALLAN asked, Whether the new Bill for the continuance of the powers of the Railway Commission would give the Commission power to sit in Ireland upon matters affecting Irish interests exclusively?

MR. J. G. TALBOT, in reply, said, he could not undertake to answer the Question without Notice; but the subject was one which would be carefully considered by the Government.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTIONS.

In reply to MR. MAC IVER and MR. BERESFORD HOPE,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Government were compelled to put down Supply as the first Order for the Evening Sitting that day, and the first Motion that night was one by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll), in reference to the condition of Malta. The Government proposed to take Supply, if the House went into Committee at a reasonable hour. He was sorry to have to ask the House to make an exception to the pleasant rule of a "Saturday half holiday" to-morrow. He proposed that the House should meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock, and it was not intended that the Sitting should be prolonged beyond 6 o'clock. The Bankruptcy Bill would not be taken to-morrow; but it was proposed to take Supply, which it was desirable at that period of the Session to advance as rapidly as possible. He would, therefore, appeal to hon. Members who had Notices on the Paper not to stand in the way. It might be possible, also, to take the second reading of the Regulation of Railways Acts (Continuance) Bill to-morrow.

MR. RYLANDS intimated that, after the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman, he would defer the Motion which stood in his name on the Paper.

MR. FAWCETT also consented to the postponement of his Motion.

Mr. J. G. Talbot

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

AUSTRALIAN DEFENCES—THE REPORTS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT moved an Address—

"For Copies of Official Reports on Australian Defences, by Sir W. F. D. Jervois and Colonel Scratchley, R.E.; and of Correspondence relating thereto between those Officials, the Governments of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, New Zealand, and the Colonial Office."

The Papers referred to had been laid before the Colonial Legislature, and had been published and commented on in the Colonial newspapers; and he protested against the principle that Papers connected with Imperial subjects presented to the Colonial Parliament should not be presented to the Imperial Parliament.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of Official Reports on Australian Defences, by Sir W. F. D. Jervois and Colonel Scratchley, R.E.; and of Correspondence relating thereto between those Officials, the Governments of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, New Zealand, and the Colonial Office,"—(Colonel Arbuthnot,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH hoped the hon. and gallant Member would not think him wanting in courtesy, or in interest in the subject of this request, if he said he could not assent to the Motion. Sir William Jervois and Colonel Scratchley had been sent out to Australia, at the request of the self-governing Colonies, to inquire into the state of their defences, and to report to the various Governments as to the measures that should be taken to put them in a proper condition. The Reports in question were made to the Colonial Governments, with a view to action and expenditure on their part, and not on the part of the Imperial Government. Some of them were, no doubt, presented to the Colonial Legislatures, because those Legislatures were asked to vote money in order to carry out the proposals which they contained. Having seen these Reports, he thought there were reasons for regretting that they had been published at all. They entered into particulars as to the deficiency in the present system of defences, and the means of remedying those deficiencies, which had better not have been made public in any way. Such Reports, so far as they had been presented to the Colonial Parliaments, were forwarded, in accordance with universal rule, to the Library of the House of Commons. He understood that the Reports in question had not yet all arrived, and he had given directions that any deficiencies should be supplied from the copies in his hands; but he did not think it was advisable that they should be collected together and published for the general information of the world. He also considered it would be detrimental to the Public Service to publish the Correspondence on the subject.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," again proposed.

SOUTH AFRICA—ADMINISTRATION OF NATIVE AFFAIRS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in rising to call attention to the administration of Native Affairs in South Africa, especially in connection with the origin and conduct of the late War with the Galekas and Gaikas; and to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire on the spot into the policy which has led to these and other wars in South Africa, and which has resulted in large annexations of territory and increase of responsibility, in spite of repeated protests from successive British Governments;"

said that, looking at the importance of the subject, he hoped the House would consider a few hours passed in the discussion of the question time not wasted, even at that late period of the Session.

At the outset, he might say that he was aware he could not put his Motion for a Royal Commission; but, even if he could, he had no intention to press it to a Division; so that if the Motion which had just been made by the hon. and gallant Member for Hereford (Colonel Arbuthnot) had been negatived with the object of preventing a vote from being taken those tactics had been quite unnecessary. He did not propose his Resolution as a Party one, or with a view of making it a vehicle for any attack upon the Government; neither did he intend to bring the Zulu War within the discussion, with the exception of saying that it did not stand alone, but was only an incident, an illustration of a whole course of policy—bad fruit from a bad tree, which, if not cut down at the root, would bear more bad fruit in future. The history of our rule in South Africa, and of the proceedings of the Colonial Government, was really the history of periodic Native Wars; originated, in many cases, in direct opposition to the instructions of the Government of the day, and ending in results which the Home Government and the British Parliament had over and over again deprecated. The present war, which all agreed in deploring, he hoped would soon be terminated. It was a war commenced in injustice, and prosecuted in disaster, and would have a termination only to be considered satisfactory, because it was the end of a war which should never have been begun; but it was a war that, unless we went deeper than there had hitherto been an inclination to go, would soon recur again. The history of these Native Wars was not unlike the course of zymotic disease. Medical scientists told of outbreaks of scarlet fever and small-pox as recurring at periodic intervals. They came in waves, they reached their maximum, and at last subsided—to be followed, after a term which could almost be exactly predicted, by fresh outbreaks. In regard to these outbreaks, we dealt with each as it occurred; but the present state of our knowledge did not permit us to discover the underlying causes, so that they might be dealt with in a way to insure their extirpation. So, also, with these South African Wars; we had dealt with each as it arose, not making a provision against the recurrence of future wars. A brief review of the history of the Colony would show similar causes continually producing the same results, and would show the Home Government, under different Administrations, powerless to prevent the execution of a policy which it constantly disapproved, against which it had repeatedly protested, and of which it foresaw the fatal consequences. In 1806 we took final possession of the Colony, a most unfortunate acquisition, as it turned out. Never had it become a Colony in the ordinary sense of the word—in the sense of such Colonies as those in America or Australia, where many millions of our own blood had founded homes and lived out prosperous and useful lives. At the present time, all the vast territory belonging to the Crown in South Africa was inhabited by a mere handful of men and women of English blood. The latest Return showed only 120,000 of English descent in the whole of the Colonies; while, on the other hand, the Dutch population was three to one of the English, and the Native population five times as numerous as the English and Dutch together. Therefore, all that had been done, and all the money spent in these Colonies by us, had not been so much for the benefit of our English fellow-subjects, but partly for the advantage of the Dutch, with whose views on Colonial policy in many respects we could have no real sympathy, and chiefly, we must suppose, for the good of the millions of Natives brought under our rule. The House would soon see how far this last presumption had been justified in the event. We had hardly taken possession of the Colony before we found ourselves in hot water, and squabbles broke out—the first of a series—with the Kaffirs in 1811. That war broke out, as most of them had, from the greed of the Colonists, leading to a land dispute; and it ended, as all these wars had, with a large annexation of territory, with increased responsibility, sowing the seeds of new and increasing troubles. In 1811 the Native Tribes were driven across the Great Fish River, and that river was established as our line of boundary; but in 1819, after a second Kaffir War of some importance, as he learned from subsequent debates in the House, the Great Fish River was considered an unscientific Frontier, and it was said that, owing to the banks being lined with thick bush, Native inroads were encouraged, and it was necessary to carry the Border line further North and East. Accordingly, that was done, with the promise, or the anticipation at least, that we had, with the new Frontier, come to an end of our troubles. But a third war, more serious than the two preceding it, broke out in 1834, and on that occasion Cape Colony was invaded by the Kaffirs, who committed great devastation and outrages. Well, the command of the troops was intrusted to Sir Harry Smith, and, after various vicissitudes, the Natives were defeated, and Sir Harry Smith, not satisfied with the scientific Frontier, annexed the country to the Kei River, and declared the Tribes subject to Great Britain. This was not done, however, with the approval of the Home Government, and Lord Glenelg, then Secretary for the Colonies, declared that the Kaffirs were amply justified in the rebellion into which they had been driven, and directed that the country which had been annexed should be evacuated, and the independence of the Tribes restored. And here he (Mr. Chamberlain) would just refer to an astounding statement attributed to Sir Bartle Frere, on the occasion when the Boers had met to hear the opinions of the High Commissioner. Sir Bartle Frere told them that never in the history of the country had any territory over which the British flag had ever waved been restored to independence. Now, here, he (Sir Bartle Frere) spoke in ignorance of, or in direct contradiction to facts, for not only was there the restoration of this territory on the side of the Kei; but, on another occasion, there was the Orange River Free Territory restored to independence. An hon. Friend near him mentioned the Ionian Islands; but he (Mr. Chamberlain) preferred to confine his observations to South Africa merely. The opinion of the Government and of Lord Glenelg was confirmed by that of the House; and a Committee, upon which sat many distinguished men, among others the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), reported that the war had arisen from “systematic forgetfulness of the principles of justice on the part of the Colonists.” The next step in this sad, eventful history was reached in 1846, when war again broke out—and here he would urge the House to observe how past experience showed all through the history the constantly fruitless efforts on the part of the British Government to control the action of their servants in the Colony, who were, as Sir William Molesworth said, "possessed with an insane desire for worthless empire." Lord Grey wrote to Sir Henry Pottinger, who was in command of our troops, that it was not desirable

"To extend the dominions of the Crown in South Africa, fresh acquisitions being not only worthless, but pernicious."

It was like the irony of fate that, 33 years later, we found similar instructions being sent out by the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and, it was to be feared, with as little good result. What happened in 1846? It was all very well for Lord Grey to send private instructions to Sir Henry Pottinger; but that war ended as all wars to come seemed likely to end, and as its predecessors had ended, in annexation. The scientific Frontier of 1819 was found to be unscientific, and the land which had been restored after the war of 1834 was once more taken possession of. The Colonial Administration forced the hand of the Government at home, and 200,000 square miles of additional territory were annexed—a country as large as the whole of Germany, the greater portion a mere desert, and thousands of miles without a White inhabitant. The natural result of what occurred in 1846 was a fifth war, which broke out in 1850, when Lord Grey, apparently still sanguine, again declared that Great Britain had no interest in further acquisitions. In spite of that declaration, however, the war ended in fresh annexations. One good result, at least, followed the outbreak of 1850. The nation was alarmed at the constant succession of petty wars involving a continuous drain on its resources, both in men and money. Public attention was directed to the subject, and there were frequent debates in Parliament, in the course of which our whole policy was reviewed and criticized. It was curious, in reading the debate of 1851—in which one found the names of so many well-known Members, most of whom had since passed away—to see how strictly it applied to the present circumstances. Mr. Adderley (now Lord Norton) said—on the frontier of the Colony, equally destructive to the lives, liberties, and prosperity of the Colonists themselves, keeping up a state of hostility with the Native Tribes, and ending neither in their civilization, nor subjugation, and causing enormous waste and extravagance to this country, and great perplexity to the Imperial Government."—[3 Hansard, cvi. 230.]

"The circumstances are these—An apparently needless and hopeless recurrence of Native wars

Still more strongly did Sir William Molesworth condemn the policy in South Africa which fomented little squabbles—mere matters of police interference—into wars; and he pointed out how the aggression of the Colonists provoked reprisals, until British troops had to be brought on the scene. These debates produced a great effect on public opinion, both at home and in the Colony; and the result was that, thanks to them, and, perhaps, also to the prudence and wisdom of successive Governors and Administrators, for some 20 years the Colony enjoyed comparative peace and tranquillity. But now all this had been reversed. Once again they were in the midst of a war cycle; once more the war wave had raised its crest; and, with the advent to office of Sir Bartle Frere, the old causes of war were brought into prominence, with the old unfortunate results. In fact, since that advent, there had been six or seven petty wars, to every one of which he might apply almost the same words as those used by Lord Glenelg, in regard to previous Kaffir wars, and say that the Natives were not without some justification in the quarrels in which they found themselves involved. Without referring to the Zulu War, as to which public opinion was sufficiently informed, he would call the attention of the House to others less known, because less disastrous in result and less expensive in prosecution, but not, on that account, less unjust in their inception. If the whole circumstances of any one of these wars could be stated fully in the House by one who had sufficient influence to secure, not only a patient, but a favourable hearing, then the simple narration of the horrors which had been committed in the British name would create such a feeling that, once for all, the recurrence of such things would be put a stop to. If English Gentlemen knew what was being done in South Africa under the British flag in the English name, by men protected by British soldiers and provided with British money, there would go forth such a cry as would be a warning to all Colonial Governors in the future, and would, once for all, bring the Colonial Administration to book. There had been two wars in Griqualand, East and West; but of those he would say nothing in detail, but would simply quote the words of a responsible official—namely, Mr. Southey, late Lieutenant Governor of Griqualand West, who, speaking in his place in the Cape Legislature on June 6, said—

“He could not undertake to say why the Griquas had rebelled; but he thought that if he had been treated as the Griquas of Griqualand West had been treated he would have rebelled himself, although he was a loyal man, and had a high respect for the British Government.”

He must not either say anything about the astounding aggression committed on the St. John's River Territory in Pondoland; but he would call attention to the Transkei War with the Galekas and the Gaikas. Although it was not the worst of these wars, it was important, having regard to the expenditure which it involved and the results which followed it. He would, first, state to the House the cost of this outbreak—both in money and in life. It was stated by Mr. Gordon Sprigg, the Prime Minister, to have cost the Colony the sum of £1,250,000 sterling; but he (Mr. Chamberlain) thought that in that amount was included the ordinary military expenditure which a State must expect to have to bear as a provision for defence and the preservation of internal order. There was, however, in addition to that sum, a charge of £611,000 paid by this country. Therefore, assuming the accuracy of Mr. Sprigg's estimate, the total cost of the war was close upon £2,000,000 sterling. But it would be a mistake to suppose that that sum represented the whole military expenditure in the South African Colonies, exclusive of the Zulu War. From 1871 to 1879 this country had paid £3,316,000 for wars in the Cape, Natal, and the Transvaal, and against that had only received back £163,000. The total expenditure by this country in South Africa was of such a character and of such a magnitude that he did not wonder in the least at a statement made by a Colonist to a special correspondent of a newspaper that, as far as the class to which he belonged was concerned, war beat sugar cultivation into fits, and that as long as war continued the Colony was sure to be prosperous. In 1851 the same idea was expressed in different language. It was then almost a proverb in the Colony that “war would never end till the price of wagons fell.” In our most recent experience the price of wagons had exceeded anything known before, and it was not surprising that the High Commissioner's policy was popular with those who found their profit in it. Looking, then, at these wars solely in reference to the amount of money which they cost, it was worth the while of Parliament seriously to consider the causes which had led to them. He should like to know how much of this expenditure the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to recover? The ordinary Revenue of the Cape Colony was only about £750,000 a-year, and that of Natal £250,000, and he did not see how the £3,000,000 now overdue, and the £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 for the Zulu War, was to be re-paid out of that. Coming next to the expenditure of human life, he found that 193 Europeans were said to have lost their lives in the Transkei, and, in addition, 3,680 Natives were known to have been killed, and there were others of whom no account could be gathered. That was the result of the philanthropic and beneficent rule of which we had heard so much. Now, let the House consider what was the origin of that war. A party of Galekas invited a party of Fingoes to a beer-drinking. One of the Galekas was killed in a dispute with a Fingo, and several petty frays ensued, in which two or three Natives on both sides lost their lives. The quarrel was one of no serious importance, and might have been put down by the police. But it was not to the interest of our Colonial Governors that causes of war should be dealt with in that summary way. One of the Galeka Chiefs, Kreli, was summoned to his presence by Sir Bartle Frere; but he declined to surrender, although he implored that a messenger might be sent to him, and promised that he would receive him and listen to anything he might say. Mr. Eustace, however, to whom the conduct of the matter was left by Sir Bartle Frere, again summoned Kreli, who again refused to surrender himself. Mr. Eustace complained that Kreli had not restrained

the Galekas, upon which Kreli retorted that the British Government found difficulty in restraining the Fingoes, and it was to be expected that Kreli would find it difficult to restrain the Galekas. That statement was not made without good foundation, for Mr. Eustace himself admitted that, on two occasions at least, the Fingoes had been the aggressors, and had made raids on Kreli's territory. The Government, however, deposed Kreli from his position as Chief, and confiscated the whole of his lands—a proceeding which seemed to him (Mr. Chamberlain) like that of selling the skin of the lion before the lion was himself taken. The proclamation to that effect was issued on October 5; and on November 13 it was followed by public advertisements, offering Kreli's land in allotments of 3,000 acres and less to intending settlers. It was impossible not to connect this eagerness to dispose of Kreli's land with the arbitrary haste by which Kreli had been almost driven into rebellion. In fact, all our dealings with the Native Tribes of late had been characterized by indifference to the necessary consequences of such proceedings. The idea of our true policy, expressed by Sir Bartle Frere in one of his despatches, was the idea which found favour with the Colonists. Sir Bartle Frere wrote, on December 14, 1878—

“Experience in every part of the world, but especially in India, proves that it is quite possible for a Native and comparatively uncivilized Power to co-exist alongside a European Power, and to be gradually raised by it to a higher stage of civilization, without losing either its individual existence, or such natural customs as are not inconsistent with civilization. But it is undoubtedly necessary that the two Powers should settle from the first which is to be the superior, and which is to be subordinate.”—[Parl. P. C. 2,222, p. 211.]

No doubt the Colonists were honestly persuaded of this necessity—they were anxious to settle this question of supremacy—and assuming, as they did, that war must come, they were altogether indifferent to the justice of the pretexts which led up to a foregone conclusion. Kreli having been driven into rebellion, the mischief did not end there. We soon found ourselves committed to a struggle with Sandilli also, who was the Chief of a still more powerful Tribe called Gaikas. What drew Sandilli into the contest was not quite clear; but it was stated that he was induced to join the rebellion by the representations of a Galeka Chief named Mopassa, who had come into British territory when the dispute with Kreli began, and had been immediately disarmed, with his Tribe, in pursuance of Sir Bartle Frere's policy in this matter. This question of disarmament was a very difficult and important one, and deserved more consideration than it had hitherto received. In the first place, it should be borne in mind that the Colonists themselves had connived at the arming of the Native population till very recent times. In six years the Cape Colony had received £750,000 of Revenue from the importation of arms and ammunition. In Griqualand West, under the administration of Mr. Southey, the Natives were tempted to work in the diamond mines by the expectation of obtaining guns and powder. At that time the idea was that it was good policy to put the Natives in a position to hold their own against the Dutch in the Transvaal; but when we annexed that Republic we found ourselves “hoist with our own petard.” After paying the Natives with arms, as a kind of truck, thinking they would be used against the Boers, the Colonial Government suddenly turned round and threatened openly to disarm all Natives, loyal or rebel alike, as soon as they found that these arms might be turned against the Colonists. The whole thing appeared to be illegal; but that did not much concern the authorities at the Cape. Arms were taken from the Natives in districts which were not disturbed or proclaimed in accordance with the provisions of the Colonial Act; and, although the rifles were taken, no compensation was given as the Act provided. No wonder there was a general feeling of discontent and disaffection among the Native Border Tribes. The Cape Argus said—

“In the wars which have hitherto taken place the disaffection may have been widespread; but the grievances of each Tribe were local. Disarmament affects all; the Government makes no distinction—every black man, Fingo or Galeka, loyal or rebel, must give up his arms.”

He hoped the attention of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State would be directed to these proceedings, and that he would take care that they were conducted with some reasonable show of discretion. It was this that led to the rebellion of Moirosi, the Chief whose submission it had since been attempted to compel, by the use of dynamite, to drive him from the caves, in which, with his women and children, he had taken refuge—a proceeding unknown in civilized warfare, and which brought lasting disgrace on the perpetrators. He had spoken of the policy of the Colonists as having been constantly directed to enforcing British supremacy on the Native Chiefs without much regard to the justice of the case. He would now take one illustration, out of several with which he had been furnished, of the method and spirit in which this policy was pursued. The instance which he desired to bring before the House was that of Tini Macomo, a Gaika Chief, whose forefathers had possessed a portion of the land on the south side of the Kei, which was now British territory. This man, some years ago, bought back from the Colonists a considerable portion of the land formerly owned by his Tribe, and settled upon it with many of his people. His presence in their midst was distasteful to the surrounding settlers, most of whom were of Dutch origin. There ensued a series of angry disputes; and it was alleged that Macomo's people stole the cattle of their neighbours, and this, added to their refusal to work for the farmers as day labourers, exasperated the Europeans, who established a post of Fingo police on Macomo's land. The Fingoes were the hereditary enemies of the Gaikas, and Macomo protested in strong language against the proceeding. Thereupon, he was immediately served with a warrant to appear at the Circuit Court, and to answer a charge of rebellion. To show what sort of danger was to be anticipated from this Chief, he (Mr. Chamberlain) might mention that the warrant was served personally by the Deputy Sheriff, who went down alone to Macomo's location for the purpose. Macomo, however, refused to obey the warrant, from a fear, which was not unnatural under the circumstances, that he would be detained as a prisoner. His own father had been imprisoned by the Colonial Government on a somewhat similar occasion, and had been killed in trying to make his escape from confinement in Robben Island, a punishment almost worse than death to a savage accustomed to a free life in the open air. No attempt was made by the Colonial authorities to re-assure the Chief or to settle the quarrel amicably; but a large armed force of 1,200 men, consisting of soldiers, free lances, Fingoes, and others, went at night, burnt all his huts, shot down his people right and left, and carried off women and children to gaol. They were not particular as to the ownership of the cattle they stole, nor as to the particular Tribe of the Black men they killed. In this expedition, not a single man on the Colonists' side was killed or wounded. He had seen a letter from a Colonist on the spot, in which, speaking of this affair, he said—

“Our proceedings in the Fort Beaufort district have been disgraceful in the extreme. True, there were cattle thieves there; but why go with soldiers and the riff-raff of the country, in the night, to make war on innocent and guilty alike, burn their houses, steal their cattle, and shoot them down like vermin?”

It was an act of bloody, brutal, barbarous murder, and it was time the right name should be applied to an action which almost made a man ashamed to be an Englishman. After this exploit of the Colonial Forces Macomo became a rebel, in fact, and joined Sandilli. He was taken prisoner, and sentenced to be hanged. The sentence had been since commuted to a long term of penal servitude. He might multiply instances of the kind, for he found them throughout the Papers which had been sent home, and considered that they were due solely to the fact that the Colonists knew they were protected from the consequences of their own acts by the presence of the British troops. Sir William Molesworth, in 1851, said—

“The presence of the troops encouraged, facilitated, and hastened the encroachments of the Europeans on the lands of the Caffres, and on various pleas we took possession of their territories and claimed authority over their chiefs. The Caffres resisted, stole the cattle of the Colonists, and committed numerous depredations. The Colonists retaliated; the troops were called out, and a Caffre war ensued. With the termination of each war we added to our territories, and thus sowed the seeds of more cattle stealing and more wars.”—[3 Hansard, cxv. 1856.]

He had something more to tell the House than these facts concerning the injustices connected with the commencement of the war. He had to speak now of the cruelties and excesses which had accompanied the prosecution of the war. He was glad, however, to believe, both from information he had received from individuals and from what he had read, that none of these excesses had been committed by British troops. They were due entirely to Colonial troops, and to a class of adventurers almost peculiar to unsettled Colonies, who always came to the front in connection with lawless deeds of the kind he had to narrate. It was one of the most distressing consequences of these wars with inferior races that they had a tendency to brutalize all who were concerned in them, and practices unheard of in civilized warfare were openly avowed and defended in the course of these miserable contests. A good number of Questions had already been put and answered in the House in reference to alleged outrages by British and Colonial troops. In some cases the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had been able to contradict the statements which had been made; and, no doubt, there were often great exaggerations. But having carefully looked through the Papers, and having conversed with several gentlemen who had lately returned from the Colony, he (Mr. Chamberlain) was afraid that where there was so much smoke there was some fire, and even if the worst stories were untrue, yet the state of feeling among many of the Colonists was such as at least to make these outrages possible. No doubt, there were some men of a curiously depraved imagination, who actually boasted of offences they had never committed, and took a strange pride in making themselves out to be worse than they really were; but, making all allowance for this perverseness, he did not see how the cases he was going to quote could be satisfactorily explained away. Thus, he found that Mr. Justice Dwyer, in his address to the jury, on opening the adjourned Circuit Court at King William's Town in April last, stated that—

"They all knew that the Kaffirs were often fired on in a most wanton manner. He mentioned as an instance that, as he was coming from Grahamstown, just after passing the Kieskama, he noticed an old Kaffir in a red blanket going along the side of the road quite harmlessly, and without any arms. Directly afterwards they heard firing, and, looking back, saw that one of the passengers in Thomas's cart, and one, if not more, of the police had fired at this old man without any provocation or reason."

In another case, a coloured corporal, named Jackson, went out with a detachment of men, and coming across a party of Kaffirs, a party much smaller than his own, shot one of them dead without more ado. Those Kaffirs turned out to be loyal men, and Jackson was sentenced to three years' hard labour. So far there was nothing very remarkable, save that the retribution for the offence was altogether insufficient. What, however, called for comment was the way in which the conviction was received in the Colony. Numerous meetings were held, attended by persons of alleged influence, and, in reference to the point, he would read the following extract from The Port Elizabeth Telegraph, dated July 23, 1878:—

"A public meeting was held with the view of obtaining a remission or commutation of the sentence passed on Charles Jackson for shooting a rebel. Commandant Sprigg (brother of the Colonial Secretary) said—'I might be brought up on a similar charge to-morrow. If I do not go out of the corps in which I have served, I could go and swear information against five officers who are as bad or worse than Jackson. The five officers would include Commandant Brabant and myself. If these prosecutions are to be, let us have some of the big ones in. Here are five men who are guilty of very similar crimes for which Jackson has been sentenced. I defy, I dare, the Government to prosecute all those five; and I am ready to supply all the information requisite.'"

If this was the spirit in which the Colonists treated such a question, was it not likely that many similar outrages were perpetrated of which no one in England ever heard? Here was a Commandant in the Colonial Forces, a brother of the Prime Minister, publicly accusing himself of crimes for which another man was justly undergoing a felon's punishment, and clamouring to stand beside him, and to be written down a scoundrel. He would next quote an extract from a Correspondent's letter, dated January 11, 1878, which appeared in one of the Colonial papers—

"If the men marching against Sandilli will take my advice, they will shoot every black face they come across; let the expression 'cold blood' be cast from your minds; shoot every Kaffir you see, whether he shows fight or not, always remembering the deaths of those three good and valued men who were so murdered and mutilated at the Kwelegha. Don't listen to the cry of 'We are "school" Kaffirs fighting for government;' depend upon it they are as bad as the rest, if not worse, as their education ought to teach them better, the uncivilized barbarians."

He did not desire to press too far the conclusions which might be drawn from such a letter as that, but it must be assumed that the writer knew something of the public he was addressing; and if a statement of that kind could appear in a newspaper without a universal cry of horror and indignation, did not the House think it was possible that men might be found bad and base enough to take the advice thus given? He would give two other instances, with the view of showing what value was attached in the Colony to a black man's life. A Swede, named Mark, was brought up at the King William's Town Circuit Court, presided over by the Chief Justice, and charged with shooting a Kaffir, who was out on an errand from an English magistrate. His defence was that he thought the man was a rebel. He was found guilty, recommended to mercy, and sentenced to one year's imprisonment. At the same Assizes a man of Dutch extraction, when passing some Kaffirs, who were going quietly along the road, turned round, and, without the slightest provocation, shot one of them. The Judge told him he had been guilty of an act of pure devilment, but only sentenced him to three years' hard labour. At the same time, a son of the Chief Sandilli was charged with rebellion, and sentenced to 20 years' penal servitude. He pleaded guilty, and said, in his defence, that he had only obeyed the commands of his Chief. He added that he had killed no one, neither man, woman, nor child. Therefore, for shooting a Kaffir without cause, a man was only sentenced to three years' imprisonment; whereas another man, for the simple act of rebellion, was sentenced to 20 years. These things, although, perhaps, not done by men of our blood, were done by people under our authority, and we were morally responsible for them, so long as English soldiers were employed, and English money expended in protecting the Colonists from the consequences of their injustice and wrong-doing. And our responsibility did not cease even with the termination of the war. At that moment the English flag was covering a system of openly taking men, women, and children belonging to the Native Tribes and placing them in what was called forced labour, but which, he ventured to say, the House would be unable to distinguish from Slavery in its worst form as it once existed in the Southern States of America. It was pretended that the object of these arrangements was to save the women and children of rebels who had been slain in the war from starvation; and the right hon. Baronet opposite the Secretary of State for the Colonies had, until recently, been under the impression that the system was purely philanthropic; but he thought that within the last few days the right hon. Gentleman had seen very good reason to doubt the accuracy of his opinion. It was undoubtedly the fact that while the men were in the Bush their wives and children were kept separated from them by the act of the Colonial Government, and others were kept in actual slavery—being allotted out to different districts. In the Papers just presented to the House there appeared a copy of a Proclamation, signed by the Secretary for Native Affairs, declaring that it was inexpedient to grant passes to Kaffirs for the purpose of fetching their wives and families who were indentured in the Western Province, and directing all commissioners and magistrates to refuse such passes accordingly. He (Mr. Chamberlain) had only recently had the pleasure of conversing with a gentleman, representing an American newspaper at the seat of war, and that journalist had told him that he had himself seen a cargo of women and children, many of the latter not more than two years old, brought down to be placed out in the East London district. Their husbands were fighting or fugitives in the Bush; the elder children had been stopped and placed out with the farmers on the Frontier, while they themselves were going to work many miles away. In 1878, thousands of Native men, women, and children, some of whom were the families of men in rebellion, and others were starving, consequent upon a severe drought and political disturbances, were sent by shiploads to Cape Town, and moved by other means to the Northern and Western districts of the Colony. Government called upon all persons who wanted servants to apply for them to the several magistrates or special officers, and this invitation was very freely accepted. Men, women, and children were allotted to applicants at a very low rate of wages, and in many cases for no wages at all, by the officers of Government, who always stipulated for clothing and rations—the clothing clause was a deadletter from the very first, excepting in a few rare instances; and the rations were so poor and insufficient that Government had to publish a notice on the subject, and to fix the amount of food the people ought to get. The compulsory indenture of these people was not provided for by law excepting in this way—there was an Act rendering it penal for them to be in the Colony without a pass, unless in service; so, after being conveyed into the Colony, they had to choose between going to gaol, or going into service on terms and for periods in which they had no voice whatever. Families were in this way divided, children torn from their parents, and husbands from their wives. The young were treated as destitute children, and indentured accordingly, as farm servants, for longer or shorter periods, according to ages in most cases, till they were grown up, in opposition very often to the letter and spirit of the law; and, in all cases, to the spirit of it. Even when the letter was observed the system was exactly the same as that which was prevalent in the Transvaal, before annexation, and with which we found so much fault. The Cape Dutch said, and their sentiments had been echoed by the majority of English Colonists—

“At last the English Government is adopting our plan; they see that schwart schapsals (the black creatures) were meant to be the white man's slaves, and they are acting accordingly.”

Was there anything to distinguish such a system from the worst form of South American slavery? When the Boers practised it we had no words strong enough to express our horror, and it was even made one of the grounds of our interference in the affairs of the Transvaal. But it was openly and undisguisedly carried on under English authority. He would admit that the right hon. Gentleman had called the attention of Sir Bartle Frere to the question; but he (Mr. Chamberlain) feared that was poor satisfaction. They would get replies which would probably tell them of the beneficence of the law which he had shown was constantly evaded. Unless there was somebody on the spot intrusted with the duty of putting things straight, in spite of all opposition, he was certain the present state of affairs would continue until such time as a reform would come too late for some of the poor creatures to profit by it. The Prime Minister of the Colony, the Hon. Mr. Sprigg, in a recent speech at Cape Town, remarked that no good impression could be made upon the old people, but that it must be made upon the young; and for this purpose he actually proposed to bring the children from their families, and to put them out to compulsory service. In a succeeding passage the hon. Gentleman said—

“I quite agree with Dr. Ross that it would be a good thing to bring down every year a certain number of young people from the locations and put them out to compulsory service. But if we do that, we must be prepared to meet with strong opposition from home. During the late war we brought down some 5,000 or 6,000 people from the Frontier, who were settled down here, and, in consequence of that, the attention of the House of Commons is to be called to the great cruelty we were guilty of in bringing them down here and sentencing them to compulsory service in Cape Town. I myself should be very glad to carry out the scheme suggested by Dr. Ross; but it would be said if we did so that we were endeavouring to set up slavery in the Colony. But that charge ought not to be a sufficient reason to prevent our doing so. We are not to be dismayed by public opinion in England, for we have the government of the Colony in our hands, and understand better how to manage Natives in this Colony, how to administer the government for their benefit, and how to lead them on step by step to civilization than any man in England.”

He asked the House whether it was tolerable that this thing should continue to go on, and be covered, as it were, by their English responsibility, and that millions of money should be taken from the British taxpayers for the benefit of gentlemen who publicly repudiated any deference to English opinion? Let him just recall the fate which had befallen these so-called rebels. Thousands of Natives in the Transkei War had been killed; thousands more had died of starvation; the survivors had had their lands taken from them, and had seen their huts burnt, and their women and children enslaved. Surely those wretched people had suffered more than sufficient retribution. But what had been the treatment of the loyal Natives? After submitting themselves to English authority, they were ruthlessly deported to a new location which was totally inadequate for their support. Government sent Mr. Brownlee to “make known its word” to the loyal Gaikas of Sandilli's Tribe, and this was what Mr. Brownlee was reported to have said—

"If you do not go willingly, you will get yourselves into trouble and force will be used. Government says go, and you must go. Place no difficulties in the way as to invalids or cattle. I say again, the sooner you go the better for you."

Fifteen thousand Natives, loyal and rebel alike, were driven into a territory 26 miles by 12, which, as he had said, was quite insufficient to support them. A correspondent of The Cape Argus, who said it was heartrending to know that half-starved people were driven like slaves from their homes, which were then committed to the flames, and that the sick were abandoned in the open air, asked whether these things were done by a Christian Government? The question for the House was, whether they were approved by a Christian Government? In the Resolution he had placed upon the Paper he invited the House to resolve that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that an impartial Commission should be sent out to investigate the allegations which had been made. Commissions had been appointed on previous occasions with a like object in view—notably, in the case of Jamaica—and it appeared to him that he had made out, at all events, a sufficient case for a careful, impartial, and an immediate inquiry. If they did not do that, what alternative was suggested? We could not leave things as they were, nor could we adopt Sir Bartle Frere's policy, which would involve us in war with the Native Tribes until we had reduced them to slavery to prevent them "fester in idleness." He said, on page 1,447 of the Papers, C 2374—

"It must be a fundamental principle that the supremacy of the British Crown as representing civilized government should be unquestionable in any Native State, surrounded as the Zulus are by British subjects and their Allies."

And, again—

"Large masses of uncivilized Natives must not be left within our own dominions to fester in idleness."

Sir Bartle Frere in his latest despatch still urged on Her Majesty's Government his old policy—still unchanged by what had happened, still unconverted by the unhappy results we had experienced; and he (Mr. Chamberlain) was of opinion that unless this headstrong Governor was either recalled or controlled by a most stringent instruction, sent to him by Her Majesty's Government, we should find that shortly we should be involved in further troubles. Her Majesty's Government appeared still to incline to the policy of Confederation; but a Confederation would lead to a policy in which Dutch influence would be predominant, and what that meant we knew from Sir Bartle Frere's earlier despatches, which stated that the Dutch Boers derived their notions of the rights of the Natives from accounts in the Old Testament of the dealings of the Hebrews with the Tribes whom they encountered. He admitted that the question was an extraordinarily difficult one, and that was why he did not desire that his Motion should be considered a Party Resolution. It seemed to him that the question was one upon which all Parties might fairly combine, in order to endeavour to prevent the recurrence of the evils which all persons alike deplored. One thing he, however, hoped the British Parliament would not do—namely, that it would not sit down in the spirit of Mahomedan fatalism and accept as the manifest destiny of this country that, in spite of repeated protests, headstrong officials at the Cape, or circumstances of any kind, should be too strong for us, and should prevent the execution of a policy upon which we had determined. The hon. Gentleman concluded by reading the Motion of which he had given Notice.

MR. SPEAKER pointed out that the hon. Member could not now move his Resolution as an Amendment.

MR. W. H. JAMES said, he would have seconded the Motion, if the Forms of the House had permitted his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) to move it. In the consideration of questions of Imperial interest, there was some danger of a subject of this kind being lost sight of; and, therefore, his hon. Friend had done well in calling attention to the matter. The condition of the Colony was very unsatisfactory when it was described by Mr. Froude, and he (Mr. W. H. James) believed that it had got much worse since. It would appear, from the statements of Judges made upon the Bench, that Natives were wantonly murdered; in consequence of which retaliatory proceedings were taken by the Natives, as appeared from an article in The Review

des Deux Mondes, the writer of which dwelt upon the dangerous condition resulting from the uncomfortable feeling that prevailed between the White and the Black races in South Africa. On the occasion of a disturbance in Griqualand East, which arose out of a squabble in a booth or tent, two Chiefs were arrested. One of them escaped into Pondoland, returning some time afterwards with a Pondo Chief and a number of Griquas. They were met near the capital by a force of Colonial police. The Pondo Chief hoisted a flag of truce, but it was disregarded. The police attacked, and a number of Griquas were killed. The prisoners taken were, it was said, to be tried as prisoners of war; but now it was understood they were to be treated as rebels, as others had been who were now working as Colonists, which was exceedingly unjust and unfair. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give the question some attention, and, if he found it possible, permit these poor people, after the war was over, to return to their homes. He threw out the suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman, if he were anxious to redress the wrongs and woes which had sunk deep into the minds of the Native population, whether it would not be advisable to take that course, and by an act of justice grant free pardon to all who had been implicated in the late rebellion. He did not wish to claim any monopoly for those who sat on that side of the House for humane sentiment, and he appealed to hon. Members opposite to aid them. There was no doubt that the Colonists were in favour of war. The speeches made by them at public meetings in aid of Sir Bartle Frere's policy proved that. He earnestly hoped that a new start would now be made, that a new policy would be adopted, and that all who were concerned in the late rebellions would be amnestied. He would be surprised if we ever got a penny from the Colony for the expenses of this war. The remedy which was required was very plain and practical, and, as a part of the new policy, he trusted that no assistance of a military kind would in future be given to the Colonists. A promise to that effect had been given by Lord John Russell, in reply to a Question put to him by Sir De Lacy Evans as far back as the year 1851, and it had frequently been mentioned since. In future, that policy ought to be strictly given effect to. They might take a useful lesson from what had happened in the case of New Zealand. If they were to deal with the Cape Colonies in the same way as they had dealt with New Zealand, the recurrence of those Native wars would be most improbable. In the old days of the Colonies of America, the Colonists used to drink to "The Memory of the Last War, and the Success of the Next War;" and he much feared that some such sentiment existed among the inhabitants of South Africa. He disapproved of the policy of Sir Bartle Frere, who had encouraged the sending of troops to the Colony, instead of discountenancing the practice; and he was satisfied that unless the Government should write in the very strongest terms to the effect that England would not be willing in the future to incur the expense involved by the employment of her soldiers in South Africa, there would be an indefinite prolongation of such wars as that which we were now waging. He contended that it was hard upon our soldiers that they should be engaged in filibustering wars, and would conclude by expressing a hope that the Government, in order to promote a policy of peace in South Africa, would remove, as soon as possible, all the Imperial Forces which had been sent out to our Colonies in that part of the world.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, that a more interesting and instructive speech than that delivered by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) had seldom been made in that House. The most noticeable point about the speech to which he referred was the significant manner in which the hon. Member was able to show that these South African wars had all begun, been carried on, and ended in the same way. The lesson which he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) desired should be drawn from the present state of affairs was that the Government should now open a new chapter in connection with our rule in Africa; that they should either form a policy of their own and adhere to it, insisting upon its being carried out; or they should allow the Colonists to form a policy of their own, and carry it out at their own responsibility and risk. So long as we sustained the Colonies in any policy in which they chose to indulge, so long should we find ourselves engaged in incessant and constantly recurring wars. The wars of South Africa always began in the eagerness of the Colonists to obtain the land of the Natives. It was time, he thought, that we should put an end to what was the most shocking chapter of our history; but the chapter would not be closed until a radical change of policy should have been effected in our African Colonies. He feared that no such change could be expected from Sir Bartle Frere, for what was there of an intention on his part to treat the Imperial Government as a master instead of a servant? There was a passage in Shakespeare which said—

— You know the man;
 Firm, unremovable, and fixed he is
 In his own course."

It is hoped that, however fixed the policy of Sir Bartle Frere might be in his own mind, the Government would be able to show that they were stronger than the High Commissioner, and that he was not unremovable. He confessed that there was nothing he dreaded more in connection with their Colonial affairs than a Clive in a wrong place, or a Warren Hastings out of time. He was not, however, without a certain admiration for that tenacity of purpose and will of his own which Sir Bartle Frere had shown. No one could read through his despatches without feeling a certain regard and admiration for that power of resolve; but he thought it would be a great mistake if the Government were to follow that kind of personal policy to the end, since it must lead to nothing but constantly recurring wars in South Africa. Now, it was time to put a stop to that, or if they would not put a stop to it, then to accept that as their national policy, and once for all drop their hypothesis of the score of Russia and other matters who believed in their manifest destiny to fulfil a certain civilizing mission. He hoped that, from that time at least, this country would start a better chapter of South African history; but that could only be done by the Government either maintaining a policy of their own, or leaving the Colonists to their own policy and to their own responsibility. He would earnestly appeal to Her Majesty's Government to be strong and just in their policy towards South Africa in the future.

Mr. Justin M.Carthy

MR. A. M'ARTHUR said, he thought it was clear from what had been said in the course of the debate that many things had been done in regard to the Native races, not only in South Africa, but also in other Colonies, of which this country had cause to be ashamed. He agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead (Mr. W. H. James), that the withdrawal of the Imperial troops from the Colonies had a good effect. He was certain, from his own observation, that it had caused the cessation of hostilities in New Zealand, and he believed the same result would follow their withdrawal from the Cape. It must, however, be borne in mind that in the former case the Maories, though brave and warlike, were comparatively few in number, and that the Colonists were able to defend themselves. It would, therefore, be unfair to compare South Africa with New Zealand owing to the overwhelming number of Kaffirs and other tribes to be dealt with in the former country. He considered that the present war should be brought to a speedy close at any sacrifice, and at any cost—he did so in the interest of humanity; and that the Government should then give the Colonist to understand that in future they must, under all circumstances, defend their own Frontiers and conduct their own wars; and if that were done he believed that we should have fewer wars on hand than we had at present.

MR. HERMON desired to say that the feelings which had been expressed on the other side were, to a certain extent, shared by hon. Members on that side. He had listened with pleasure to the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), who had placed the facts before them in such a forcible manner, and with such great moderation and ability. He must, however, admit the grave difficulties encountered by the Government in dealing with the question. He thought when they remembered that in the case of Colonies such as the Motion referred to they were dealing with a White population which numbered only some 20,000, while the Natives were, perhaps, a hundred times that number, they could but be right in taking some opportunity of impressing upon Her Majesty's Government the extreme caution which they ought to exercise in selecting the people to undertake the administrative duties. It was true they could not dispute the facts as brought forward by the hon. Member; and he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies to the desirability, not only of speedily terminating the present war, but also of taking steps to prevent the recurrence of a similar outbreak.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he was gratified at the pleasant character of the debate, and he believed that on both sides of the House there would be found a unanimous expression of opinion with regard to the case so ably put before them by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). He understood that the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Government were placed in a very difficult position with regard to the serious problem which existed as to our relations with the South African Colonies. He was sure that all of them had sympathized with the Government in the dilemma in which they were placed by recent events, and he hoped that in making any criticism upon the action of the Government he would not be supposed to entertain any Party feeling in the matter, for he honestly desired to make every allowance for the difficulties which the British Government had had to encounter. His hon. Friend had pointed out in his speech, which was not historically correct, but exhibited a perfect appreciation of the position, what was the nature of the policy which had been forced on Her Majesty's Government by the combined efforts of the local Legislatures and the Representative of the Government of England in the administration of the Colony. Well, they had a right to criticize the Government with regard to its policy, and the first question which arose was, how was it possible for such a state of things to come into existence, when they had the Colonial Office in constant communication with the Colonies, provided with constant information on every act which took place, and keeping a sharp lookout—for if they did not they would soon be reminded of their duty by outsiders on all that took place—how was it that in these circumstances these successive wars had been allowed to arise, and that a very strong amount of repression had not been placed upon them by the Government at once? He did not blame the Colonial Office for not being able to force their will on the authorities of the Colonies. The real difficulty was the inability of the Colonial Office to force their will on the local Legislatures, particularly when that influence was combined with the influence of a headstrong Representative of the Home Government. There was no doubt as to the facts, and the Government would have been almost free from blame if they had not accepted Sir Bartle Frere's policy, and backed him up and supported him with almost Party virulence. If it had not been for that, he (Mr. Jenkins) would not have attached any direct responsibility to the Government in the matter. In spite of the views held upon the subject by the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), he (Mr. Jenkins) was not one of those who believed that what had taken place was a necessary consequence of the annexation of the Transvaal. If a correct policy had been followed after that act, he did not think the facts which were now complained of would have happened. This, as the hon. Member for Birmingham had pointed out, was only the culmination of a principle which had inspired the policy of the various Governments of the Cape up to the present time. Well, now the House had not only to consider the frightful results of the events of the last few months, but something more. In spite of the remonstrances of the Government, they found there still remained at the Cape a High Commissioner, who referred in his last despatch to his views formerly expressed, and seemed to give an indication of his intention to carry out a policy which the majority were anxious to repudiate. His hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham had proposed to send out a Commission to take information on this subject, as they were thoroughly convinced that they could not rely on the official information with which they were supplied. As to the correctness of his view on the subject of the information furnished there could be no mistake. Anyone who examined their Blue Books, and compared them with the information they got outside, would at once see the truth of that view. Attention had again and again been called to the fact that if information was wanted it was not to be had from official sources, and ould we find ourselves engaged in incessant and constantly recurring wars. The wars of South Africa always began in the eagerness of the Colonists to obtain the land of the Natives. As to the correctness of his view on the subject of the information furnished there could be no mistake. Anyone who examined their Blue Books, and compared them with the information they got outside, would at once see the truth of that view. Attention had again and again been called to the fact that if information was wanted it was not to be had from official sources, and that they had to resort to extraordinary means in order to obtain it. But the question here was, what was the use of sending out a Commission, when they knew the exact nature of the problem they had to solve? What hope was there that it would show them any way out of their difficulties? It had been suggested that they should carry out the New Zealand policy with regard to the Cape Colonies; but he was sure the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Colonies would repudiate that idea. Was the right hon. Gentleman prepared to withdraw the troops from the Cape, and allow a war of extermination to go on between the Whites and the Native races? That must be the inevitable result of withdrawing the troops, and they could not do that. Every humanitarian sentiment in the country would revolt from such a course. We were responsible as a nation for the position of our fellow-countrymen there, and we could not allow them to commit any acts which would be discreditable to the nation. Then, what was the alternative? If the troops were withdrawn, and they threw the responsibility on the Cape Legislature, then they must give to that body the right to do as it pleased. If not, if we supplied them with troops, we must at the same time limit their right. We must do one thing or the other; that the House should distinctly understand. In this case, he thought they could not pursue the New Zealand policy; or, at all events, not for some years to come. It might be gradually introduced, but it was not practicable now. Well, that being impossible, the country ought to know that the responsibility rested on us, and would rest upon us. The only alternative was for a while, at least until we had succeeded in tiding over present difficulties, to increase the power of the High Commissioner—he hoped another one would be appointed—and to restrict to a certain extent the powers of the local Legislatures. We must not continue to be hurried into wars by petty Legislatures. The House quite appreciated the difficulty of the situation. He could not conceive of any one coming forward, whatever his influence or authority, and saying what should be the policy of the Government. Therefore, all they could do was what had been done by his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham that day. He had shown them the frightful results of the policy which had been pursued, and asked them, at all events, to give some sort of assurance that they felt the gravity of the circumstances, and that steps would be taken to tide over the period, which must be, for many years to come, one of difficulty and trouble.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he was sure he could not in the slightest degree complain on his own part, or on the part of the Government, of the course of the debate, or of the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). They all appreciated the fact that the problem before them was one of exceptional difficulty, a problem, perhaps, unique in the history of Colonial administration. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman had very properly treated this as by no means a Party question—a question with regard to which, though he felt it to be his duty to bring it before the House, he did not attempt to lay down any definite line of policy; but he was anxious to express, from his own point of view, his desire to support the Government in their attempts to deal with it. There were two points which he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) wished to dismiss with a few words. First of all, the suggestion that the Native question in South Africa was identical with the same question in New Zealand. All those who had looked at the matter would see that, owing to the respective numbers of the White and Native population in South Africa and in New Zealand, the circumstances were as distinct and as dissimilar as any two cases could be. The second point was the suggestion—for it was no more—of the hon. Member for Birmingham that a Commission should be appointed to go out to South Africa to deal with this question. The hon. Member did not press this himself, and the speakers who followed him had not treated it as a practical proposal. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) thought that it could not be so treated, because it must be remembered that they were dealing, not with a Crown Colony like those to which previous Commissions had been sent, but with a Colony to which responsible government had been given by Parliament; and whether he looked at the proposal as viewed from the effect which the appointment of such a Commission might have on the Black races of South Africa, and the excitement that it might cause in their minds, already sufficiently excited by what had passed; or whether he looked at it from the point of view which the Colonists, to whom had been intrusted the management of their own affairs, would be disposed to take, he thought that from neither point was the proposal one which could be considered as a satisfactory solution of the present difficulty. No doubt, in the view of some hon. Gentlemen, a Commission of Inquiry might be desirable merely to obtain information; but, speaking on behalf of the Government, he would venture to state that he had complete confidence in the information supplied by the High Commissioner—he might say the two High Commissioners—now in South Africa; and, so far as any inquiry was concerned, he was convinced that no inquiry would be conducted more effectively by any Commission than it would be by the High Commissioners. He must refer now to the main arguments of the able and eloquent speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, who said that the history of South Africa was a history of periodic Native wars. That, he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) feared, was too true. But as that had been the history of South Africa long before Sir Bartle Frere went there, it did not appear to him to be fair of the hon. Member at the same time to blame Sir Bartle Frere as the cause of it, and to accuse Sir Bartle Frere of having begun six or seven wars, as to every one of which the Natives had justice on their side. The hon. Member said that, in his opinion, all these wars to which he referred had arisen from the greed of the Colonists leading to land disputes with the Natives, and that the Colonial Administration had forced the hand of the Government at Home; but that our state of knowledge did not allow us to go to the underlying causes of these outbreaks. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had endeavoured to make himself acquainted with the origin of these incessantly recurring wars in South Africa, and he might put forward a view with regard to this point which was not merely his own, but the view of men to whose knowledge and authority everyone would defer. So far from agreeing with the

hon. Member, that those wars had been due to the greed of the Colonists for the land of the Natives, he believed they were due to two facts, in which the history of South Africa among our Colonial possessions was unique. The first was the movement of the Whites to the North, and the second was the movement of the Blacks to the South. There had been constantly, ever since the British annexation of the Cape Colony, a desire on the part of a certain number of White inhabitants of that Colony for political reasons to push forward into the wilderness to the North. What had that led to? It had led to contests between them and the Native Tribes in whose territory they found themselves—contests attended by circumstances which all regretted and deplored. He could not blame the emigrant settlers for the circumstances which occurred: they were few against many, and were fighting for their lives. But the contests arose, and then the attention of Parliament was from time to time called to the facts; the danger arising from them to our settled Colonies was urged, and a further extension of our Dominions was found to be necessary. But these wars had sometimes arisen without any action of this kind on the part of the Whites. Look at what occurred in the years between 1835 and 1846. In 1835 Lord Glenelg repudiated the action of Sir Benjamin D'Urban, who had annexed the territory between the Kei and the Keiskamma, and directed withdrawal within our former boundary, giving the land from which we withdrew over to the Native Tribes under their Chiefs. What was the result? The result was repeated acts of cattle stealing on the Border by those very Native Tribes, in spite of the Treaties with the Chiefs to whom the land had been restored. No redress could be obtained from those Chiefs. Treaties of a more stringent character were tried; but they were also broken. Prisoners were rescued and murdered within the Colony, and at length the necessity arose of taking measures for the restoration to the Colony of the authority over the land, and thus Lord Glenelg's policy was reversed. That was an instance of the working of the second cause to which he had referred. The extension in this case was not due to any greed on the part of the Colonists; it was due to the

from the North of the Black Tribes who pursuing pastoral rather than agricultural habits, increasing in numbers than the comparative peace which they enjoyed, owing to the non-interference of the Colony, and the non-interference on their part, an extension of their boundaries to the north, and would return to the other side of the Colony of the Colonists to the northward. There was a question of that in the case of the Dutch Colonists? Some consideration of Dutch Colonists migrating from the Cape to Natal, being so by the reversal of the policy of Sir Benjamin D'Urban, and the restrictions which had been placed upon their relations with their servants. Disputes arose between the Dutch and the Natives, and disturbances followed, there being trouble on both sides. Danger arose to the organized Colonies, and the Home Government had to interfere, and how was that interference brought about? After authentic information had been received of the massacre of some of the Dutch pioneers by the Natives, the position of those who remained was regarded as so dangerous, not only to themselves, but to the safety of the whole European element in South Africa, that the Government was obliged to extend its possessions by the military occupation and annexation of Natal. This extension was absolutely advocated at the time by the Aborigines Protection Society, in the interests of humanity, against the reluctance of the Imperial Government. Such instances as these which he had given showed the real motives which had been at work in our connection with South Africa, and that the cause of the various extensions of territory was not, as the hon. Member for Birmingham had stated, the greed of the Colonists for the land of the Natives. The hon. Gentleman went at great length into the circumstances which accompanied and followed the Transvaal War, and he referred to the policy of disarmament of the Natives, which had been adopted after the conclusion of that war. The hon. Member told the House that it brought about not only Sandilli's outbreak, but also Moiroei's in Basutoland. Judging so far as he could from the statements he had received and laid before the House, he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) did not believe the policy of disarmament had anything to do with either of these outbreaks. Then the hon. Member said that this policy was carried out illegally, and without any discrimination. On the contrary, it had been carried out, he believed, with the utmost care and caution by the Cape Government, and if there had been any breach of the law it would, no doubt, be questioned by the Opposition in the Assembly at Cape Town. He did not agree with the suggestion of the hon. Member, that the possession of arms generally by the Natives of South Africa was a desirable thing. He thought it was an extremely undesirable thing; and to the confidence in their own strength, which the Natives had derived from it, was, in his opinion, mainly due the late series of wars, at the conclusion of which, he hoped, the country had now arrived. Then the hon. Gentleman referred to the question of indenturing Natives; but he did not quote the despatch of July 3 to Sir Bartle Frere. In that despatch, which had been laid on the Table, he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had expressed the views of the Government on that subject; and they were, he thought, in accordance with those held by hon. Members on both sides of the House. If the notice issued by the Cape Government was accurately reported, it was a notice which was not justified by anything which had been reported to him, and he had taken such steps as were in his power to deal with the matter, remembering that although it appeared to be authentic its authenticity had not yet been ascertained, and it was, in any case, only right that an opportunity for explanation should be afforded. The hon. Member had also referred to the speech of Mr. Sprigg, the present Prime Minister of the Cape of Good Hope. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) should receive with reserve the reports of speeches made at dinners in the Colony, unless he knew from what source the speeches were quoted. The report which had been quoted might have been obtained from an Opposition newspaper, and he was afraid that Opposition newspapers in the Colonies were often not more scrupulous in their treatment of Members of the Government than Opposition newspapers in other countries. No doubt, if the report quoted were correct, the sentiments enunciated were entirely objectionable; and he did not doubt that in that event the influence of the Governor of the Cape Colony ought to be, and would be, exerted in the direction which they would all desire. Hon. Members opposite attributed to Sir Bartle Frere grave misconduct with reference to the Zulu War; and on this they seemed ready to heap any number of other charges. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), however, did not know any charge which could be made against Sir Bartle Frere with less justice than that of attributing to him, as the hon. Member for Birmingham had done, a desire to introduce forced labour into South Africa, or indifference to anything which could be characterized as similar to slavery. Any such conduct would be contrary to the whole history of Sir Bartle Frere's life and action. The hon. Member next dealt with the way in which the Gaikas had been removed to Galekaland, and he referred to the correspondence of an Opposition newspaper, The Cape Argus, containing certain opinions on that point. It was only right to hear also the story as told by the Ministry themselves; and he would read two paragraphs from the speech of Sir Bartle Frere at the opening of the Cape Parliament. Sir Bartle Frere said that he was glad to be able to state, on the testimony of the magistrates and of the Gaikas themselves, that their removal was carried out without hardship, and had been attended with the happiest results. The sale of intoxicating liquors was strictly prohibited, and, instead of indulging in idleness and dissipation, they had settled down to agricultural labour, and promised to be distinguished as a peaceable, orderly, and law-abiding people. As to the allegation that the number of the Galekas had been reduced from 80,000 to 15,000, it was to be remembered that the higher calculation of their number was anterior to what was known as the cattle-killing madness in South Africa, in which, by the mad action of the Kaffirs themselves, there was a large destruction of their supplies of food, and numbers of them perished. In addition to that, they had to bear great suffering from drought. Sir Bartle Frere stated that most of those who objected to the removal of the Gaikas at first now admitted that it was good for the Gaikas themselves, and they unanimously approved the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors, and of the system of giving individual titles to the land. The hon. Member related—and a painful relation it was—the stories which had reached him of the cruelties committed in these wars. He should be the last to defend any such actions as those which had been described; they were a disgrace to any who perpetrated them, and they reflected disgrace upon us in this country. But he must again remind the House that many of these stories, coming from the correspondence—often, of course, anonymous—of Opposition newspapers, were liable to, at any rate, the suspicion of exaggeration. When the hon. Member composed the sentences passed on White men for crimes committed against Natives and the sentences passed on Natives for crimes committed against White men, it was impossible to follow him in such a comparison without a knowledge of all the circumstances of each case; and, in fairness to the Colonists, statements of the kind ought not to be too readily believed. He was bound to say that some of them, into which it had been his duty to inquire, had been proved to be unfounded; and with regard to others, as the hon. Member admitted, the Colonial Government had discharged its duty by dealing with them promptly and satisfactorily. He feared it was but too possible that there had been actions in these wars which would be liable to the strongest epithets which had been used with regard to them by the hon. Member for Birmingham. But we must remember that this Parliament, some years ago, gave to the Cape Colony the benefit of responsible government; and it was the duty of the Government of the Cape Colony, with which alone it rested, to deal with these matters as they occurred and properly to punish the authors of these crimes. How was it that any circumstances of the sort could have occurred? We ought, he thought, to picture to ourselves precisely the position of affairs at the Cape. There was, unquestionably, a general rising among the Native races, or, if not a general rising, a general feeling of dissatisfaction against the White population of the Colony, who were comparatively small in number, and were often so scattered among almost innumerable Natives as to be comparatively powerless in the event of an outbreak. We were bound to make allowance for men placed in this position; and while we ought to expect from them that, as British subjects, they should be guided by feelings of humanity, he should be disposed to attribute any cruelties that might have occurred to the position in which they were placed, and not to blame the Colonists themselves so much as the system that had been pursued. We had given to South Africa responsible government, and when we gave it we did not accompany it with that which would have secured proper administration with regard to the Native races. We did not take measures to secure that, with the responsibility of administering their own affairs, the Cape Colonists should also undertake their own defence against Native aggression or insurrection. If he had time to go into the circumstances, he could prove that there were real outbreaks on the part of the Natives, not provoked by any action of the Colonists, and when these outbreaks had occurred the Colonists had found themselves without any organized force to deal with them. Volunteers were called for, temporary levies were raised; and he would venture to say, if any of these stories could be traced out, it would be found that they were true only of persons who had not been accustomed to discipline and had not been placed under proper regulation for the conduct of war. It seemed to him that the proper remedy for this was not that suggested by the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. W. H. James)—merely to tell the Cape Colonists that you would never send any more troops to South Africa, without taking any other action at the same time. He feared that that had been said by his Predecessors on more than one occasion. We ought to endeavour, if we could, to take such steps as would induce and enable the Colonists to make a permanent provision of organized force for their own defence. That was the way in which we might lighten the responsibilities which hitherto had pressed so heavily upon this country. That was the way by which we might secure the successful and humane conduct of future Native wars, should any unhappily arise. We must impress upon the Colonists that it rests with them to provide for the management of Native affairs, and to protect themselves against the consequences of mismanagement. In that way, we should give them the strongest possible inducement for the proper management of these Native questions. We must induce and enable the Colonists to provide a permanent force, properly disciplined, for their own protection—a force with which they could deal with any emergency that might arise, and deal with it humanely, and at the same time so promptly as to prevent the outbreak from spreading so as to endanger the Colony. The hon. Member for Birmingham had very rightly attributed to Her Majesty's Government a desire to press forward the Confederation of the South African Colonies. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) believed that such a policy would be the right solution of this great question. He believed that such a policy might be made to effect the results he had indicated; it would enable the Colonists themselves to deal with Native affairs, subject, of course, to that general control by the Imperial Parliament which was reserved by the provisions of the South African Act passed by this House two years ago; and it would give so much local self-government to those who were anxious for it as would enable them to obtain that real independence which they professed to desire. It would enable them to base their general policy with regard to Native questions on a uniform and coherent system; to encourage the civilization of the Natives not by forced labour for others, but by leading them from a pastoral and barbarous life to the cultivation of their own property as freeholders; and by the very means discouraging the barbarous customs inseparable from their former mode of life, which, in some cases, had been tolerated too long. In that way, the Natives would be trained by degrees to the restrictions, as they would at first appear to be, of our civilization. Such a policy, by bringing the Native population within the Colonies under what would be, to barbarous tribes, the irksome control of civilized law, would do not a little to discourage that great migration Southwards of the Native Tribes—one of the causes which had led to these constant and repeated wars. That was the policy Her Majesty's Government would wish to pursue, and which they had already impressed upon those who were intrusted with the administration of affairs in South Africa; and he thought he might venture to hope after the discussion of that day, and the desire shown by hon. Members of opposite political opinions to assist the Government as far as they could in the solution of this great problem, that it would command the support of the country.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was not easy to over-estimate either the ability of the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) or the obligation the House was under to him for having brought forward and initiated a debate which he trusted would be of real use. With regard to the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Colonies, he (Mr. W. E. Forster) very much agreed with the tone of it and the intentions which it discussed. It was only by such a policy as he had indicated, based on the principles of justice and humanity, that they could hope for any amelioration of the present state of things. Although that was the case, it was with great pain that he heard his hon. Friend's (Mr. Chamberlain's) remarks on the present condition of our South African Colony. Many years ago, it had fallen to his (Mr. W. E. Forster's) lot to study the state of the Cape Colony carefully, in order to become convinced of the extent to which the spirit of slavery and the spirit of oppression prevailed against the Coloured race by the White population. He had hoped for a great change for the better; but from much which his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham had stated, it would appear that he was too sanguine in that hope. Nevertheless, he could not but trust that, in spite of what they had heard, there were facts also on the other side. There was one hope for the future of the Cape Colony, especially in relation to the Coloured race, which contrasted most favourably with the condition of that race 20 or 30 years ago, and that was that there was now, as the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) said, a strong Opposition Party. It was a fact that such a Party now existed, comprised of men of great influence in the Colony, and not only men of philanthropy and benevolence, but also men of position and property who advocated a policy of justice and humanity towards the Black man as essential to the prosperity of the Colony. It was the existence of that Party more than anything else that made him more hopeful that the result of the Federation scheme would be accomplished. He was glad the right hon. Gentleman did not give up his hope of a Confederation. He agreed with him that it was only by a Confederation the Cape Colony could be made to feel its responsibility, and give men of justice and humanity in the Colony a chance of their views being carried out. Now they came to the question—What could be done for the future of the Colony? There had been a general feeling throughout the House of sympathy with the Government for having to deal with a very difficult question like this—one of the most difficult questions a Government could have to deal with. No one could rest contented with the present state of affairs, or bear with any kind of equanimity, or even forbearance, what had happened so often, and what would happen now in South Africa. Enormous sums of money and loss of life were being spent in wars which many in that House thought ought never to have been undertaken; while upon the policy which led to these wars, they had hitherto had but little control. How, then, were these things to be stopped? The hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. W. H. James) came forward with a very strong and a very drastic remedy. He said—"Withdraw all your troops." He (Mr. W. E. Forster) did not think we could do that. On the contrary, he thought that meant dissolving our union with the Cape. The time might possibly come—he trusted it would not—when they might be compelled to do that; but they ought to do all they could to prevent it. It had been said that that policy had been successful in the case of New Zealand; but the case of New Zealand was far different from that of the Cape, where the Native element was stronger. It was quite time we could leave the Colonists of New Zealand to deal with the Natives; but if we were to leave, entirely and absolutely, the Colonists in South Africa to deal with the Natives, one of two things must happen—very likely both. Either we should hear terrible stories of the mode in which the war was being carried on—stories that would make us feel we could hardly bear further connection with the Colonists, who would probably wage war after the manner of the Native population—or we should hear also that the White men and women were in danger of being utterly destroyed by the Natives. The country would resist an act like that. The hon. Member for Gateshead would not get the English people to approve of that policy. They would say—"After all, these are our fellow-countrymen, of our own race and religion, and we cannot absolutely leave them to themselves." In these circumstances, we should be obliged to come to their rescue; but even if the possibility of the dissolution of the union were admitted, he did not think it could be admitted this country was, after all, irresponsible for the present state of things in South Africa. His conviction was that we ought to have given up our control over the Boers and their incursions northward. Still, they could not do that as matters now stood. He was delighted to hear that the Government intended to insist on the Cape taking its share of its own defence; and he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that it was by the Colonists organizing themselves, and bearing their own part in the defence of the country, that we should be most likely able to prevent those acts of cruelty which they were so sorry to hear. They had now a responsible self-governing community to deal with at the Cape. Whether it was a mistake to give self-government to the Cape was a grave question. For his own part, he did not think it was a mistake; at all events, they could not now take that self-government away. The problem of the Government was a fresh departure. They must ask themselves—"What terms shall we make with the Governments of the South African communities generally for the future?" That was to say—on what terms should they consent, in any case in the future, to assist the South African Colonists with our own troops? He thought the time had come when the Government ought to say, with the greatest possible determination, that the terms must be different from what they had been. They must say—"They shall be definite terms. You shall not find the policy, and we find the money and men to carry it out. We must have our share in the policy. We shall have an alliance; but on such terms that we shall be able to hear our voice guiding you, asking you about your

frontier policy and your treatment of the Natives, and as to the mode in which you conduct your war. We also claim the right to demand from you, for our own and for your sake, that you shall take a share in your own defence." He was not at all surprised at the Government seeing very great difficulty in sending out a Commission; but he thought it was a suggestion that ought not to be dismissed as an impossible alternative. A very strong Commission, sent out not for the purpose of inquiring into the past, but for the simple purpose of reporting to the Government their views as to the terms of our future relations with the Colony, would, he thought, be attended with great advantage. At the same time, he thought there was something in the remark of his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), that a Governor was not the best mode of obtaining information. He did not wish to make any charge against individuals. Deeply as he (Mr. W. E. Forster) regretted the policy of Sir Bartle Frere, he did not wish to make a remark personally as regarded him. What he would say was, he thought they now saw that a Governor of a Colony—a Governor of even so strong a will as Sir Bartle Frere—was liable to be influenced by the Party in the Colony which held the reins of power; and he doubted if the Government would be able to make their terms, in the future, with the Colony through the High Commissioner, or through any Governor of Cape Colony. They might, however, be able to do so through Sir Garnet Wolseley. That was a responsibility which must be left with the Government. He was very hopeful when a man like Sir Bartle Frere went out that they were going to have a new era in the Cape Colony. He knew him personally, and knew also how anxious he was for a just and true consideration of the Natives. Well, the argument in favour of the annexation of the Transvaal was this—that the Boers were engaged in a policy which was unjust, and which brought them into quarrels with their neighbours, and that we could not let them take the consequences of that policy and be massacred, because there was reason to believe that before their destruction their policy would have brought on a general Native war. He did not blame Sir Bartle Frere; but what was done was, that the policy which the Boers were performing in the Transvaal was carried out by our Government, but with greater power and force, and therefore, in one respect, with more evil consequences. They now saw the result. He might make the same remark as to the Zulu War, as to which they would be obliged to admit that the Opposition Party in Cape Colony had almost as much ground to complain against the Representative of the British Government as against the Colonists themselves. However, he (Mr. W. E. Forster) believed there was really one feeling in the House of Commons and the country on the question, which was, that our relations with the Cape Colony must be put on a different footing; that we would not join in unjust wars; and that we would not be responsible for the ill-treatment of the Natives. It should also be made known that we did not think it right that the Colonists should not take their full share in their own defence, and, at the same time, that, if they were willing to agree with us as to equitable terms, and showed that they meant to conduct their policy upon principles of justice and humanity, we should not refuse to give them the assistance that they absolutely required.

MR. A. MILLS said, that the principle had been referred to that all Colonies should be protected to this extent by the Imperial Government—that that Government should be responsible for wars which were undertaken to carry out Imperial policy. It would, however, be difficult to apply that principle in all cases. That was not the case as to New Zealand. Our troops were withdrawn, and Maori wars ceased. The case of South Africa was, however, exceptional. There were something like 2,000,000 Natives in British South Africa, while the White population did not number more than one-seventh of that amount. Again, a very large proportion of the White population was of Dutch origin. Within the three-quarters of a century during which we had possession of the Cape Colony they had been engaged in six Cape wars, almost all of which were occasioned by the circumstance that the Dutch population had trekked from the old Colony and settled beyond its borders. The Transvaal was so settled; so, to a large extent, was Natal. The troubles to which he referred arose, to a great extent, from the quarrels of the Boers with the Native population, and England found herself engaged in wars occasioned by those who had trekked away from her rule. They had not been able to apply the principle to which he first referred to South Africa, for this reason—that we had been meddling and making in those wars from time to time, and the Colonists, therefore, fathered upon England the cost incurred. What he should like to see was encouragement given to the formation of Colonial levies. Such a policy would tend more to the creation of a spirit of self-defence than any other course which could be adopted. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), in his Motion, had suggested the appointment of a Royal Commission. He (Mr. A. Mills), however, hoped the suggestion would not be adopted; for he thought it would be a very great misfortune if another set of Commissioners were to be sent to South Africa to advise, and, perhaps, to contradict, Sir Bartle Frere and Sir Garnet Wolseley. He, therefore, hoped that course would not be followed; but that the principle suggested by the Committee of 1861 would be adopted, in accordance with which the Colonists should be told that they must fight their own battles and pay their own bills.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That a sum, not exceeding £140,530, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of various Miscellaneous Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

MR. A. MOORE said, he had on a previous Vote drawn the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty to the necessity of making provision for the appointment of Roman Catholic chaplains in connection with the Naval Service. He had been informed that the question would be more properly raised on the present Vote, and, therefore, he took that opportunity of asking the right hon. Gentleman what course he intended to take with regard to the subject? He did not ask for the appointment of Roman Catholic chaplains to each of the large iron-clads, but that Roman Catholic seamen might be supplied with chaplains at the chief naval centres at home and abroad, and at those parts which were not exactly naval centres, but at which, from time to time, a large number of ships called having on board Roman Catholics. As an instance of these, he would mention Lisbon as having, for many months standing off the port, a large squadron of ships. He would also draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the sick on board the invalid vessels, as he felt very strongly that something might be done to meet the grievance of those persons, who might never see their native land again, and who were anxious that they might have the ministrations of religion on their way home. He believed that chaplains were appointed at Portsmouth, Sheerness, and Plymouth; but, even in those cases, they were without the proper facilities for the discharge of their office. He believed that the commanding officers of ships liked to see the chaplain come on board, using his influence upon the men, simply because it reduced punishment, and tended to good order. But the chaplains in those cases had no locus standi; and, consequently, not so much real influence over the men as they would otherwise have. The Coastguards on the West Coast of Ireland, in cases where sometimes there was only one man with his wife and children, had the ministrations of the local Protestant clergyman, who received a certain sum per annum. Ample provision was made for them, and he thought that the Catholics had a right to the same advantages in respect to their religion. Again, it was only fair to appoint one Catholic teacher in training ships where there were a number of Catholic boys. The chaplains ought, in his opinion, to be commissioned officers. He had, he thought, placed these claims on a moderate and friendly footing, in the belief that the time had come for remedying the grievances which he had indicated. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £139,530, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of various Miscellaneous Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."—(Mr. Arthur Moore.)

MR. W. H. SMITH said, it was the wish of the Admiralty that every facility should be given to clergymen of all denominations in the discharge of their duties. There were Roman Catholic chaplains receiving salaries at Sheerness, Devonport, Haslar, Plymouth Hospital, and Portsmouth. There were also chaplains at nine other places abroad to whom capitation allowances were paid, and at every place where a Fleet might happen to be Roman Catholic sailors and Marines had the services of ministers of their religion, to whom allowances were paid. He assured the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) that the most anxious care was taken to see that the seamen and Marines had the ministrations of clergymen of the religion to which they belonged. It would not be possible to place Roman Catholic chaplains on board the troopships returning from India.

MR. M'LAREN rose, not to express any opinion upon the subject under notice, but to suggest that it was of far too great importance to be taken up at that period of the Session. Toss the matter about how you would, it came to this—It was a proposal for a new religious endowment; for chaplains to be established at a number of ports on the Continent visited by the ships of the Navy. He objected to any extended application of the principle of endowment, and thought that all sects of Christians might well spend their benevolence to provide for such casual visitors. If such a thing were to be seriously proposed, it ought to be done by dertake the administrative duties. It was true they could not dispute the facts as brought forward by the hon. Member; and he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies to the desirability, not only of speedily terminating the present war, but also of taking steps to prevent the recurrence of a similar outbreak.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he was gratified at the pleasant character of the debate, and he believed that on both sides of the House there would be found a unanimous expression of opinion with regard to the case so ably put before them by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). He understood that the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Government were placed in a very difficult position with regard to the serious problem which existed as to our relations with the South African Colonies. He was sure that all of them had sympathized with the Government in the dilemma in which they were placed by recent events, and he hoped that in making any criticism upon the action of the Government he would not be supposed to entertain any Party feeling in the matter, for he honestly desired to make every allowance for the difficulties which the British Government had had to encounter. His hon. Friend had pointed out in his speech, which was not historically correct, but exhibited a perfect appreciation of the position, what was the nature of the policy which had been forced on Her Majesty's Government by the combined efforts of the local Legislatures and the Representative of the Government of England in the administration of the Colony. Well, they had a right to criticize the Government with regard to its policy, and the first question which arose was, how was it possible for such a state of things to come into existence, when they had the Colonial Office in constant communication with the Colonies, provided with constant information on every act which took place, and keeping a sharp lookout—for if they did not they would soon be reminded of their duty by outsiders on all that took place—how was it that in these circumstances these successive wars had been allowed to arise, and that a very strong amount of repression had not been placed upon them by the Government at once? He did not blame the Colonial Office for not being able to force their will on the authorities of the Colonies. The real difficulty was the inability of the Colonial Office to force their will on the local Legislatures, particularly when that influence was combined with the influence of a headstrong Representative of the Home Government. There was no doubt as to the facts, and the Government would have been almost free from blame if they had not accepted Sir Bartle Frere's policy, and backed him up and supported him with almost Party virulence. If it had not been for that, he (Mr. Jenkins) would not have attached any direct responsibility to the Government in the matter. In spite of the views held upon the subject by the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), he (Mr. Jenkins) was not one of those who believed that what had taken place was a necessary consequence of the annexation of the Transvaal. If a correct policy had been followed after that act, he did not think the facts which were now complained of would have happened. This, as the hon. Member for Birmingham had pointed out, was only the culmination of a principle which had inspired the policy of the various Governments of the Cape up to the present time. Well, now the House had not only to consider the frightful results of the events of the last few months, but something more. In spite of the remonstrances of the Government, they found there still remained at the Cape a High Commissioner, who referred in his last despatch to his views formerly expressed, and seemed to give an indication of his intention to carry out a policy which the majority were anxious to repudiate. His hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham had proposed to send out a Commission to take information on this subject, as they were thoroughly convinced that they could not rely on the official information with which they were supplied. As to the correctness of his view on the subject of the information furnished there could be no mistake. Anyone who examined their Blue Books, and compared them with the information they got outside, would at once see the truth of that view. Attention had again and again been called to the fact that if information was wanted it was not to be had from official sources, and that they had to resort to extraordinary means in order to obtain it. But the question here was, what was the use of sending out a Commission, when they knew the exact nature of the problem they had to solve? What hope was there that it would show them any way out of their difficulties? It had been suggested that they should carry out the New Zealand policy with regard to the Cape Colonies; but he was sure the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Colonies would repudiate that idea. Was the right hon. Gentleman prepared to withdraw the troops from the Cape, and allow a war of extermination to go on between the Whites and the Native races? That must be the inevitable result of withdrawing the troops, and they could not do that. Every humanitarian sentiment in the country would revolt from such a course. We were responsible as a nation for the position of our fellow-countrymen there, and we could not allow them to commit any acts which would be discreditable to the nation. Then, what was the alternative? If the troops were withdrawn, and they threw the responsibility on the Cape Legislature, then they must give to that body the right to do as it pleased. If not, if we supplied them with troops, we must at the same time limit their right. We must do one thing or the other; that the House should distinctly understand. In this case, he thought they could not pursue the New Zealand policy; or, at all events, not for some years to come. It might be gradually introduced, but it was not practicable now. Well, that being impossible, the country ought to know that the responsibility rested on us, and would rest upon us. The only alternative was for a while, at least until we had succeeded in tiding over present difficulties, to increase the power of the High Commissioner—he hoped another one would be appointed—and to restrict to a certain extent the powers of the local Legislatures. We must not continue to be hurried into wars by petty Legislatures. The House quite appreciated the difficulty of the situation. He could not conceive of anyone coming forward, whatever his influence or authority, and saying what should be the policy of the Government. Therefore, all they could do was what had been done by his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham that day. He had shown them the frightful results of the policy which had been pursued, and asked them, at all events, to give some sort of assurance that they felt the gravity of the circumstances, and that steps would be taken to tide over the period, which must be, for many years to come, one of difficulty and trouble.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he was sure he could not in the slightest degree complain on his own part, or on the part of the Government, of the course of the debate, or of the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). They all appreciated the fact that the problem before them was one of exceptional difficulty, a problem, perhaps, unique in the history of Colonial administration. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman had very properly treated this as by no means a Party question—a question with regard to which, though he felt it to be his duty to bring it before the House, he did not attempt to lay down any definite line of policy; but he was anxious to express, from his own point of view, his desire to support the Government in their attempts to deal with it. There were two points which he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) wished to dismiss with a few words. First of all, the suggestion that the Native question in South Africa was identical with the same question in New Zealand. All those who had looked at the matter would see that, owing to the respective numbers of the White and Native population in South Africa and in New Zealand, the circumstances were as distinct and as dissimilar as any two cases could be. The second point was the suggestion—for it was no more—of the hon. Member for Birmingham that a Commission should be appointed to go out to South Africa to deal with this question. The hon. Member did not press this himself, and the speakers who followed him had not treated it as a practical proposal. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) thought that it could not be so treated, because it must be remembered that they were dealing, not with a Crown Colony like those to which previous Commissions had been sent, but with a Colony to which responsible government had been given by Parliament; and whether he looked at the proposal as viewed from the effect which the appointment of such a Commission might have on the Black races of South Africa, and the excitement that it might cause in their minds, already sufficiently excited by what had passed; or whether he looked at it from the point of view which the Colonists, to whom had been intrusted the management of their own affairs, would be disposed to take, he thought that from neither point was the proposal one which could be considered as a satisfactory solution of the present difficulty. No doubt, in the view of some hon. Gentlemen, a Commission of Inquiry might be desirable merely to obtain information; but, speaking on behalf of the Government, he would venture to state that he had complete confidence in the information supplied by the High Commissioner—he might say the two High Commissioners—now in South Africa; and, so far as any inquiry was concerned, he was convinced that no inquiry would be conducted more effectively by any Commission than it would be by the High Commissioners. He must refer now to the main arguments of the able and eloquent speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, who said that the history of South Africa was a history of periodic Native wars. That, he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) feared, was too true. But as that had been the history of South Africa long before Sir Bartle Frere went there, it did not appear to him to be fair of the hon. Member at the same time to blame Sir Bartle Frere as the cause of it, and to accuse Sir Bartle Frere of having begun six or seven wars, as to every one of which the Natives had justice on their side. The hon. Member said that, in his opinion, all these wars to which he referred had arisen from the greed of the Colonists leading to land disputes with the Natives, and that the Colonial Administration had forced the hand of the Government at Home; but that our state of knowledge did not allow us to go to the underlying causes of these outbreaks. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had endeavoured to make himself acquainted with the origin of these incessantly recurring wars in South Africa, and he might put forward a view with regard to this point which was not merely his own, but the view of men to whose knowledge and authority everyone would defer. So far from agreeing with the

hon. Member, that those wars had been due to the greed of the Colonists for the land of the Natives, he believed they were due to two facts, in which the history of South Africa among our Colonial possessions was unique. The first was the movement of the Whites to the North, and the second was the movement of the Blacks to the South. There had been constantly, ever since the British annexation of the Cape Colony, a desire on the part of a certain number of White inhabitants of that Colony for political reasons to push forward into the wilderness to the North. What had that led to? It had led to contests between them and the Native Tribes in whose territory they found themselves—contests attended by circumstances which all regretted and deplored. He could not blame the emigrant settlers for the circumstances which occurred: they were few against many, and were fighting for their lives. But the contests arose, and then the attention of Parliament was from time to time called to the facts; the danger arising from them to our settled Colonies was urged, and a further extension of our Dominions was found to be necessary. But these wars had sometimes arisen without any action of this kind on the part of the Whites. Look at what occurred in the years between 1835 and 1846. In 1835 Lord Glenelg repudiated the action of Sir Benjamin D'Urban, who had annexed the territory between the Kei and the Keiskamma, and directed withdrawal within our former boundary, giving the land from which we withdrew over to the Native Tribes under their Chiefs. What was the result? The result was repeated acts of cattle stealing on the Border by those very Native Tribes, in spite of the Treaties with the Chiefs to whom the land had been restored. No redress could be obtained from those Chiefs. Treaties of a more stringent character were tried; but they were also broken. Prisoners were rescued and murdered within the Colony, and at length the necessity arose of taking measures for the restoration to the Colony of the authority over the land, and thus Lord Glenelg's policy was reversed. That was an instance of the working of the second cause to which he had referred. The extension in this case was not due to any greed on the part of the Colonists; it was due to the pressure from the North of the Black Tribes, who, pursuing pastoral rather than agricultural habits, increasing largely in numbers from the comparative peace which they enjoyed, owing to the neighbourhood of the Colony, and pressed on the other side by Tribes from the North, desired, on their part, an extension of their boundaries to the South. He would return to the other point—the desire of the Colonists to press to the Northward. There was a strong instance of that in the case of Natal. What occurred? Some considerable bands of Dutch Colonists migrated from the Cape to Natal, being mainly led to do so by the reversal of the policy of Sir Benjamin D'Urban, and certain restrictions which had been placed upon their relations with their Native servants. Disputes arose between the Dutch and the Natives, and disturbances followed, there being cruelty on both sides. Danger arose to our organized Colonies, and the Home Government had to interfere, and how was that interference brought about? In 1840, after authentic information had been received of the massacre of some of the Dutch pioneers by the Zulus, the position of those who remained was regarded as so dangerous, not only to themselves, but to the safety of the whole European element in South Africa, that the Government was obliged to extend its possessions by the military occupation and annexation of Natal. That extension was absolutely advocated at the time by the Aborigines Protection Society, in the interests of humanity, against the reluctance of the Imperial Government. Such instances as these which he had given showed the real causes which had been at work in our connection with South Africa, and that the cause of the various extensions of territory was not, as the hon. Member for Birmingham had stated, the greed of the Colonists for the land of the Natives. The hon. Gentleman went at great length into the circumstances which accompanied and followed the Transkei War, and he referred to the policy of disarmament of the Natives, which had been adopted after the conclusion of that war. The hon. Member told the House that it brought about not only Sandilli's outbreak, but also Moirosi's in Basutoland. Judging so far as he could from the statements he had received and laid before the House, he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) did not believe the policy of disarmament had anything to do with either of these outbreaks. Then the hon. Member said that this policy was carried out illegally, and without any discrimination. On the contrary, it had been carried out, he believed, with the utmost care and caution by the Cape Government, and if there had been any breach of the law it would, no doubt, be questioned by the Opposition in the Assembly at Cape Town. He did not agree with the suggestion of the hon. Member, that the possession of arms generally by the Natives of South Africa was a desirable thing. He thought it was an extremely undesirable thing; and to the confidence in their own strength, which the Natives had derived from it, was, in his opinion, mainly due the late series of wars, at the conclusion of which, he hoped, the country had now arrived. Then the hon. Gentleman referred to the question of indenturing Natives; but he did not quote the despatch of July 3 to Sir Bartle Frere. In that despatch, which had been laid on the Table, he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had expressed the views of the Government on that subject; and they were, he thought, in accordance with those held by hon. Members on both sides of the House. If the notice issued by the Cape Government was accurately reported, it was a notice which was not justified by anything which had been reported to him, and he had taken such steps as were in his power to deal with the matter, remembering that although it appeared to be authentic its authenticity had not yet been ascertained, and it was, in any case, only right that an opportunity for explanation should be afforded. The hon. Member had also referred to the speech of Mr. Sprigg, the present Prime Minister of the Cape of Good Hope. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) should receive with reserve the reports of speeches made at dinners in the Colony, unless he knew from what source the speeches were quoted. The report which had been quoted might have been obtained from an Opposition newspaper, and he was afraid that Opposition newspapers in the Colonies were often not more scrupulous in their treatment of Members of the Government than Opposition newspapers in other countries. No doubt, if the report quoted were correct, the sentiments enunciated were entirely objectionable; and he did not doubt that in that event the influence of the Governor of the Cape Colony ought to be, and would be, exerted in the direction which they would all desire. Hon. Members opposite attributed to Sir Bartle Frere grave misconduct with reference to the Zulu War; and on this they seemed ready to heap any number of other charges. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), however, did not know any charge which could be made against Sir Bartle Frere with less justice than that of attributing to him, as the hon. Member for Birmingham had done, a desire to introduce forced labour into South Africa, or indifference to anything which could be characterized as similar to slavery. Any such conduct would be contrary to the whole history of Sir Bartle Frere's life and action. The hon. Member next dealt with the way in which the Gaikas had been removed to Galekaland, and he referred to the correspondence of an Opposition newspaper, The Cape Argus, containing certain opinions on that point. It was only right to hear also the story as told by the Ministry themselves; and he would read two paragraphs from the speech of Sir Bartle Frere at the opening of the Cape Parliament. Sir Bartle Frere said that he was glad to be able to state, on the testimony of the magistrates and of the Gaikas themselves, that their removal was carried out without hardship, and had been attended with the happiest results. The sale of intoxicating liquors was strictly prohibited, and, instead of indulging in idleness and dissipation, they had settled down to agricultural labour, and promised to be distinguished as a peaceable, orderly, and law-abiding people. As to the allegation that the number of the Galekas had been reduced from 80,000 to 15,000, it was to be remembered that the higher calculation of their number was anterior to what was known as the cattle-killing madness in South Africa, in which, by the mad action of the Kaffirs themselves, there was a large destruction of their supplies of food, and numbers of them perished. In addition to that, they had to bear great suffering from drought. Sir Bartle Frere stated that most of those who objected to the removal of the Gaikas at first now admitted that it was good for the Gaikas themselves, and they unanimously approved the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors, and of the system of giving individual titles to the land. The hon. Member related—and a painful relation it was—the stories which had reached him of the cruelties committed in these wars. He should be the last to defend any such actions as those which had been described; they were a disgrace to any who perpetrated them, and they reflected disgrace upon us in this country. But he must again remind the House that many of these stories, coming from the correspondence—often, of course, anonymous—of Opposition newspapers, were liable to, at any rate, the suspicion of exaggeration. When the hon. Member composed the sentences passed on White men for crimes committed against Natives and the sentences passed on Natives for crimes committed against White men, it was impossible to follow him in such a comparison without a knowledge of all the circumstances of each case; and, in fairness to the Colonists, statements of the kind ought not to be too readily believed. He was bound to say that some of them, into which it had been his duty to inquire, had been proved to be unfounded; and with regard to others, as the hon. Member admitted, the Colonial Government had discharged its duty by dealing with them promptly and satisfactorily. He feared it was but too possible that there had been actions in these wars which would be liable to the strongest epithets which had been used with regard to them by the hon. Member for Birmingham. But we must remember that this Parliament, some years ago, gave to the Cape Colony the benefit of responsible government; and it was the duty of the Government of the Cape Colony, with which alone it rested, to deal with these matters as they occurred and properly to punish the authors of these crimes. How was it that any circumstances of the sort could have occurred? We ought, he thought, to picture to ourselves precisely the position of affairs at the Cape. There was, unquestionably, a general rising among the Native races, or, if not a general rising, a general feeling of dissatisfaction against the White population of the Colony, who were comparatively small in number, and were often so scattered among almost innumerable Natives as to be comparatively powerless in the event of an outbreak. We were bound to make allowance for men placed in this position; and while we ought to expect from them that, as British subjects, they should be guided by feelings of humanity, he should be disposed to attribute any cruelties that might have occurred to the position in which they were placed, and not to blame the Colonists themselves so much as the system that had been pursued. We had given to South Africa responsible government, and when we gave it we did not accompany it with that which would have secured proper administration with regard to the Native races. We did not take measures to secure that, with the responsibility of administering their own affairs, the Cape Colonists should also undertake their own defence against Native aggression or insurrection. If he had time to go into the circumstances, he could prove that there were real outbreaks on the part of the Natives, not provoked by any action of the Colonists, and when these outbreaks had occurred the Colonists had found themselves without any organized force to deal with them. Volunteers were called for, temporary levies were raised; and he would venture to say, if any of these stories could be traced out, it would be found that they were true only of persons who had not been accustomed to discipline and had not been placed under proper regulation for the conduct of war. It seemed to him that the proper remedy for this was not that suggested by the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. W. H. James)—merely to tell the Cape Colonists that you would never send any more troops to South Africa, without taking any other action at the same time. He feared that that had been said by his Predecessors on more than one occasion. We ought to endeavour, if we could, to take such steps as would induce and enable the Colonists to make a permanent provision of organized force for their own defence. That was the way in which we might lighten the responsibilities which hitherto had pressed so heavily upon this country. That was the way by which we might secure the successful and humane conduct of future Native wars, should any unhappily arise. We must impress upon the Colonists that it rests with them to provide for the management of Native affairs, and to protect themselves against the consequences of mismanagement. In that way, we should give them the strongest possible inducement for the proper management of these Native questions. We must induce and enable the Colonists to provide a permanent force, properly disciplined, for their own protection—a force with which they could deal with any emergency that might arise, and deal with it humanely, and at the same time so promptly as to prevent the outbreak from spreading so as to endanger the Colony. The hon. Member for Birmingham had very rightly attributed to Her Majesty's Government a desire to press forward the Confederation of the South African Colonies. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) believed that such a policy would be the right solution of this great question. He believed that such a policy might be made to effect the results he had indicated; it would enable the Colonists themselves to deal with Native affairs, subject, of course, to that general control by the Imperial Parliament which was reserved by the provisions of the South African Act passed by this House two years ago; and it would give so much local self-government to those who were anxious for it as would enable them to obtain that real independence which they professed to desire. It would enable them to base their general policy with regard to Native questions on a uniform and coherent system; to encourage the civilization of the Natives not by forced labour for others, but by leading them from a pastoral and barbarous life to the cultivation of their own property as freeholders; and by the very means discouraging the barbarous customs inseparable from their former mode of life, which, in some cases, had been tolerated too long. In that way, the Natives would be trained by degrees to the restrictions, as they would at first appear to be, of our civilization. Such a policy, by bringing the Native population within the Colonies under what would be, to barbarous tribes, the irksome control of civilized law, would do not a little to discourage that great migration Southwards of the Native Tribes—one of the causes which had led to these constant and repeated wars. That was the policy Her Majesty's Government would wish to pursue, and which they had already impressed upon those who were intrusted with the administration of affairs in South Africa; and he thought he might venture to hope after the discussion of that day, and the desire shown by hon. Members of opposite political opinions to assist the Government as far as they could in the solution of this great problem, that it would command the support of the country.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was not easy to over-estimate either the ability of the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) or the obligation the House was under to him for having brought forward and initiated a debate which he trusted would be of real use. With regard to the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Colonies, he (Mr. W. E. Forster) very much agreed with the tone of it and the intentions which it discussed. It was only by such a policy as he had indicated, based on the principles of justice and humanity, that they could hope for any amelioration of the present state of things. Although that was the case, it was with great pain that he heard his hon. Friend's (Mr. Chamberlain's) remarks on the present condition of our South African Colony. Many years ago, it had fallen to his (Mr. W. E. Forster's) lot to study the state of the Cape Colony carefully, in order to become convinced of the extent to which the spirit of slavery and the spirit of oppression prevailed against the Coloured race by the White population. He had hoped for a great change for the better; but from much which his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham had stated, it would appear that he was too sanguine in that hope. Nevertheless, he could not but trust that, in spite of what they had heard, there were facts also on the other side. There was one hope for the future of the Cape Colony, especially in relation to the Coloured race, which contrasted most favourably with the condition of that race 20 or 30 years ago, and that was that there was now, as the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) said, a strong Opposition Party. It was a fact that such a Party now existed, comprised of men of great influence in the Colony, and not only men of philanthropy and benevolence, but also men of position and property who advocated a policy of justice and humanity towards the Black man as essential to the prosperity of the Colony. It was the existence of that Party more than anything else that made him more hopeful that the result of the Federation scheme would be accomplished. He was glad the right hon. Gentleman did not give up his hope of a Confederation. He agreed with him that it was only by a Confederation the Cape Colony could be made to feel its responsibility, and give men of justice and humanity in the Colony a chance of their views being carried out. Now they came to the question—What could be done for the future of the Colony? There had been a general feeling throughout the House of sympathy with the Government for having to deal with a very difficult question like this—one of the most difficult questions a Government could have to deal with. No one could rest contented with the present state of affairs, or bear with any kind of equanimity, or even forbearance, what had happened so often, and what would happen now in South Africa. Enormous sums of money and loss of life were being spent in wars which many in that House thought ought never to have been undertaken; while upon the policy which led to these wars, they had hitherto had but little control. How, then, were these things to be stopped? The hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. W. H. James) came forward with a very strong and a very drastic remedy. He said—"Withdraw all your troops." He (Mr. W. E. Forster) did not think we could do that. On the contrary, he thought that meant dissolving our union with the Cape. The time might possibly come—he trusted it would not—when they might be compelled to do that; but they ought to do all they could to prevent it. It had been said that that policy had been successful in the case of New Zealand; but the case of New Zealand was far different from that of the Cape, where the Native element was stronger. It was quite time we could leave the Colonists of New Zealand to deal with the Natives; but if we were to leave, entirely and absolutely, the Colonists in South Africa to deal with the Natives, one of two things must happen—very likely both. Either we should hear terrible stories of the mode in which the war was being carried on—stories that would make us feel we could hardly bear further connection with the Colonists, who would probably wage war after the manner of the Native population—or we should hear also that the White men and women were in danger of being utterly destroyed by the Natives. The country would resist an act like that. The hon. Member for Gateshead would not get the English people to approve of that policy. They would say—"After all, these are our fellow-countrymen, of our own race and religion, and we cannot absolutely leave them to themselves." In these circumstances, we should be obliged to come to their rescue; but even if the possibility of the dissolution of the union were admitted, he did not think it could be admitted this country was, after all, irresponsible for the present state of things in South Africa. His conviction was that we ought to have given up our control over the Boers and their incursions northward. Still, they could not do that as matters now stood. He was delighted to hear that the Government intended to insist on the Cape taking its share of its own defence; and he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that it was by the Colonists organizing themselves, and bearing their own part in the defence of the country, that we should be most likely able to prevent those acts of cruelty which they were so sorry to hear. They had now a responsible self-governing community to deal with at the Cape. Whether it was a mistake to give self-government to the Cape was a grave question. For his own part, he did not think it was a mistake; at all events, they could not now take that self-government away. The problem of the Government was a fresh departure. They must ask themselves—"What terms shall we make with the Governments of the South African communities generally for the future?" That was to say—on what terms should they consent, in any case in the future, to assist the South African Colonists with our own troops? He thought the time had come when the Government ought to say, with the greatest possible determination, that the terms must be different from what they had been. They must say—"They shall be definite terms. You shall not find the policy, and we find the money and men to carry it out. We must have our share in the policy. We shall have an alliance; but on such terms that we shall be able to hear our voice guiding you, asking you about your

frontier policy and your treatment of the Natives, and as to the mode in which you conduct your war. We also claim the right to demand from you, for our own and for your sake, that you shall take a share in your own defence." He was not at all surprised at the Government seeing very great difficulty in sending out a Commission; but he thought it was a suggestion that ought not to be dismissed as an impossible alternative. A very strong Commission, sent out not for the purpose of inquiring into the past, but for the simple purpose of reporting to the Government their views as to the terms of our future relations with the Colony, would, he thought, be attended with great advantage. At the same time, he thought there was something in the remark of his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), that a Governor was not the best mode of obtaining information. He did not wish to make any charge against individuals. Deeply as he (Mr. W. E. Forster) regretted the policy of Sir Bartle Frere, he did not wish to make a remark personally as regarded him. What he would say was, he thought they now saw that a Governor of a Colony—a Governor of even so strong a will as Sir Bartle Frere—was liable to be influenced by the Party in the Colony which held the reins of power; and he doubted if the Government would be able to make their terms, in the future, with the Colony through the High Commissioner, or through any Governor of Cape Colony. They might, however, be able to do so through Sir Garnet Wolseley. That was a responsibility which must be left with the Government. He was very hopeful when a man like Sir Bartle Frere went out that they were going to have a new era in the Cape Colony. He knew him personally, and knew also how anxious he was for a just and true consideration of the Natives. Well, the argument in favour of the annexation of the Transvaal was this—that the Boers were engaged in a policy which was unjust, and which brought them into quarrels with their neighbours, and that we could not let them take the consequences of that policy and be massacred, because there was reason to believe that before their destruction their policy would have brought on a general Native war. He did not blame Sir Bartle Frere; but what was done was, that the policy which the Boers were performing in the Transvaal was carried out by our Government, but with greater power and force, and therefore, in one respect, with more evil consequences. They now saw the result. He might make the same remark as to the Zulu War, as to which they would be obliged to admit that the Opposition Party in Cape Colony had almost as much ground to complain against the Representative of the British Government as against the Colonists themselves. However, he (Mr. W. E. Forster) believed there was really one feeling in the House of Commons and the country on the question, which was, that our relations with the Cape Colony must be put on a different footing; that we would not join in unjust wars; and that we would not be responsible for the ill-treatment of the Natives. It should also be made known that we did not think it right that the Colonists should not take their full share in their own defence, and, at the same time, that, if they were willing to agree with us as to equitable terms, and showed that they meant to conduct their policy upon principles of justice and humanity, we should not refuse to give them the assistance that they absolutely required.

MR. A. MILLS said, that the principle had been referred to that all Colonies should be protected to this extent by the Imperial Government—that that Government should be responsible for wars which were undertaken to carry out Imperial policy. It would, however, be difficult to apply that principle in all cases. That was not the case as to New Zealand. Our troops were withdrawn, and Maori wars ceased. The case of South Africa was, however, exceptional. There were something like 2,000,000 Natives in British South Africa, while the White population did not number more than one-seventh of that amount. Again, a very large proportion of the White population was of Dutch origin. Within the three-quarters of a century during which we had possession of the Cape Colony they had been engaged in six Cape wars, almost all of which were occasioned by the circumstance that the Dutch population had trekked from the old Colony and settled beyond its borders. The Transvaal was so settled; so, to a large extent, was Natal. The troubles to which he referred arose, to a great extent, from the quarrels of the Boers with the Native population, and England found herself engaged in wars occasioned by those who had trekked away from her rule. They had not been able to apply the principle to which he first referred to South Africa, for this reason—that we had been meddling and making in those wars from time to time, and the Colonists, therefore, fathered upon England the cost incurred. What he should like to see was encouragement given to the formation of Colonial levies. Such a policy would tend more to the creation of a spirit of self-defence than any other course which could be adopted. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), in his Motion, had suggested the appointment of a Royal Commission. He (Mr. A. Mills), however, hoped the suggestion would not be adopted; for he thought it would be a very great misfortune if another set of Commissioners were to be sent to South Africa to advise, and, perhaps, to contradict, Sir Bartle Frere and Sir Garnet Wolseley. He, therefore, hoped that course would not be followed; but that the principle suggested by the Committee of 1861 would be adopted, in accordance with which the Colonists should be told that they must fight their own battles and pay their own bills.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £140,530, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of various Miscellaneous Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

MR. A. MOORE said, he had on a previous Vote drawn the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty to the necessity of making provision for the appointment of Roman Catholic chaplains in connection with the Naval Service. He had been informed that the question would be more properly raised on the present Vote, and, therefore, he took that opportunity of asking the right hon. Gentleman what course he intended to take with regard to the subject? He did not ask for the appointment of Roman Catholic chaplains to each of the large iron-clads, but that Roman Catholic seamen might be supplied with chaplains at the chief naval centres at home and abroad, and at those parts which were not exactly naval centres, but at which, from time to time, a large number of ships called having on board Roman Catholics. As an instance of these, he would mention Lisbon as having, for many months standing off the port, a large squadron of ships. He would also draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the sick on board the invalid vessels, as he felt very strongly that something might be done to meet the grievance of those persons, who might never see their native land again, and who were anxious that they might have the ministrations of religion on their way home. He believed that chaplains were appointed at Portsmouth, Sheerness, and Plymouth; but, even in those cases, they were without the proper facilities for the discharge of their office. He believed that the commanding officers of ships liked to see the chaplain come on board, using his influence upon the men, simply because it reduced punishment, and tended to good order. But the chaplains in those cases had no locus standi; and, consequently, not so much real influence over the men as they would otherwise have. The Coastguards on the West Coast of Ireland, in cases where sometimes there was only one man with his wife and children, had the ministrations of the local Protestant clergyman, who received a certain sum per annum. Ample provision was made for them, and he thought that the Catholics had a right to the same advantages in respect to their religion. Again, it was only fair to appoint one Catholic teacher in training ships where there were a number of Catholic boys. The chaplains ought, in his opinion, to be commissioned officers. He had, he thought, placed these claims on a moderate and friendly footing, in the belief that the time had come for remedying the grievances which he had indicated. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £139,530, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of various Miscellaneous Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."—(Mr. Arthur Moore.)

MR. W. H. SMITH said, it was the wish of the Admiralty that every facility should be given to clergymen of all denominations in the discharge of their duties. There were Roman Catholic chaplains receiving salaries at Sheerness, Devonport, Haslar, Plymouth Hospital, and Portsmouth. There were also chaplains at nine other places abroad to whom capitation allowances were paid, and at every place where a Fleet might happen to be Roman Catholic sailors and Marines had the services of ministers of their religion, to whom allowances were paid. He assured the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) that the most anxious care was taken to see that the seamen and Marines had the ministrations of clergymen of the religion to which they belonged. It would not be possible to place Roman Catholic chaplains on board the troopships returning from India.

MR. M'LAREN rose, not to express any opinion upon the subject under notice, but to suggest that it was of far too great importance to be taken up at that period of the Session. Toss the matter about how you would, it came to this—It was a proposal for a new religious endowment; for chaplains to be established at a number of ports on the Continent visited by the ships of the Navy. He objected to any extended application of the principle of endowment, and thought that all sects of Christians might well spend their benevolence to provide for such casual visitors. If such a thing were to be seriously proposed, it ought to be done by a Vote subsequently brought forward, at a time when everyone had an opportunity of fully considering the principle which it involved.

MR. PARNELL was sorry to interrupt the Vote, in order, on a Motion to report Progress, to refer to a matter of importance. He did so, not with any intention of impeding the Vote, but because it was important to have an understanding with the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty as to whether he was going to introduce the same modifications in the naval law as had been made in the military law?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) would not be justified in entering into the question of martial law. The proper time for that would be on the Report of the Vote.

MR. PARNELL proposed to refer to the administration of the Navy as regarded punishment and discipline, and wished to secure that the discipline in the Navy should be the same as in the Army, and that those modifications introduced into the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill for the alleviation of punishment should also be introduced into the discipline of the Navy. He did not know whether this could be done by Parliament or by directions or orders issued by the First Lord of the Admiralty.

It being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till the Evening Sitting.

MALTA (COST OF POLICE, &c.)

RESOLUTION.

MR. PLIMSOLL, in rising to call the attention of the House to the condition of Malta; and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the cost of maintaining the Police, and of draining, repairing, lighting, cleaning, and watering the streets, &c. in Malta, should be paid out of a rate upon house and other property (upon which, at present, no rates or taxes of any kind whatever are levied), and not, inter alia, out of a tax upon wheat and other grain for food, and upon potatoes and other vegetables, which, as a matter of fact, actually takes more per head from the very poor who live in cellars than it takes per head from those who live in the best houses in the streets and squares; and the House is therefore further of opinion that it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to take such steps as may be necessary to secure the abolition of the taxes on food in Malta on and from the 1st day of January 1881;"

said, that the Resolution embodied his whole case, and was in strict accordance with the facts, the statements it contained being rather under than over the real facts. They referred to a case of injustice and hardship, which was so gross in its circumstances, so cruel in its incidence, and yet so easily capable of remedy, that he had great hope it would not survive its exposure to the House. The Maltese people, although oppressively, were very lightly taxed. The whole of their external defence was paid for by a contribution of £5,000 to the Imperial Exchequer, or about 8d. per head of the population; whereas we paid £1 per head for the maintenance of our Army and Navy. The total taxation per head of the population for all purposes was only 13s. 7d., as against at least four times that sum in this country. And yet, from the mode in which the taxes were levied, they were paid with far less ease than the heavier taxes in this country; and as to three-fourths of the people, they were crushing in their effects. No rates or taxes of any kind were levied directly, except about £3,000 raised by licences to wine and spirit dealers. Much the larger portion of the taxation of the country — £62,827 — was derived from the taxes upon wheat and solid food; £41,624 from beer, wines, and spirits; £1,773 from oil and vinegar; for the rest, the income consisted of rents and harbour dues. An examination of the tariff showed that the term "solid food" was very wide, and included wheat, barley, and corn of all kinds, besides lentils, peas, and beans; and, lest the poor should take to vegetables in their inability to afford even the inferior kinds of corn, there was also a tax on potatoes and other vegetables. No more astonishing way of raising an income had ever been discovered, though the case of Malta was somewhat analogous to that of the Ionian Islands, where advantage having been taken of our English ignorance of the language, it had now and then happened that extreme severity had marked the proceedings of the authorities. In a Parliamentary Paper of the year 1878, Mr. Rowsell had said that the Maltese upper and middle classes paid 10s. 10d. per head per annum in taxes, while the working classes contributed as much as 15s. 7d. The incidence of the wheat tax was such, that the richer classes paid 5s. and the poorer 10s. per head per annum. The beggars paid more per head than those who rode in carriages. People who swept the streets, and went without shoes and stockings, paid more per head for the making of those streets and the sweeping and cleaning than the noblemen and gentlemen who swept past them in their carriages. An Englishman might imagine, judging from the absolute amount of taxation per head, that it was so trifling that it could not possibly have the crushing effect complained of by the Natives; but it was to be remembered that wages were very low in Malta, the daily average being, perhaps, not much more than 1s. Mr. Rowsell's schedule of wages showed that to be the case; and the American Consul, who had long personal experience of the Island, had mentioned that the great number of the poor was the effect of the high price of bread. Consequently, the amount of mendicity in Malta was something appalling. The poor seldom had more than the bare means of relieving their hunger, and they had the additional misery of living in dwellings that were utterly unfit for habitation. He could speak on that point from his own personal observation, as, in his curiosity to know how men could possibly live on the current small wages, he had visited the houses of the poorer classes. The whole city was built upon white freestone, making what miners called "good roof," and advantage had been taken of the material to sink deep cellars under the houses, so that one might see palatial piles of buildings with cavernous cellars, tier upon tier underneath, the lowest of which might be fully 40 feet below the level of the street. These places were damp, unventilated, foul—dreadfully foul—and the stench appalling. He spoke only of what he had seen, and he believed that at least a quarter of the city was underground. It would easily be supposed that such damp, ill-ventilated, and foul lodgings had their effect on the death-rate. That it had a deleterious effect was proved by the fact that the Governor had appointed a Commission of six medical men to inquire into the subject, the death-rate being 45 per 1,000, although Malta, per se, was naturally a healthy place. Dr. Giulio, in his Report, had said that those who had seen only the best parts of Malta could form no adequate notion of the bad hygienic state of the other parts. In particular, the drainage was exceedingly defective, and so highly charged was the atmosphere of many of the houses, that the inmates ran the risk of being poisoned by hydro-sulphide of ammonia. If any other evidence was needed as to the deplorable condition to which the poorer Maltese had been reduced by excessive taxation, it would be found in a Petition that had been presented to the House, and which recited "the heart-rending misery which prevails already among the poor." Now, he wished to know why that misery had been inflicted, incurred as it was for the purpose of paving and lighting the streets, draining the town, and doing many other things, simply, as he believed, for the benefit of the upper classes? In very many cases the proceeds of the taxation seemed to be misapplied—as, for instance, in the maintenance of a University, where the sons of the rich received a semi-gratuitous education, paying only in fees, at the rate of 2s. 6d. monthly per family, the sum of £248 a-year, whilst £4,397 came from the people's food; and the building, at a very considerable cost, of an opera-house. He might mention that the opera-house had been built on land belonging to the community, and that £48,000 had been spent on its erection. On a careful examination of the expenditure upon the Island, he found that a sum of £71,000 was spent which in

Mr. Plimsoll

England, or elsewhere, would be paid out of local taxation. Why, he desired to know, should there be no rates or taxes in Malta? There were no better cared-for or more copiously watered streets than those in Valetta—equal in all respects to the best looked after streets in the West End of London or the fashionable districts of Brighton; and all this was done without any householders' tax; but it should be clearly understood, out of the taxes on solid food. He should like to know why the people who lived in good houses in the town should not pay for that which cost money, and which they enjoyed? In no other place in the world with which he was acquainted were these things, as well as gas, police, sewage, obtained without the payment of a single sixpence by those whom they chiefly benefited—the householders; and he might add that it seemed also that these existing evils were only coincident with our occupation of the Island; for previously to that the owners of property had to pay their share of the general taxation. Now, a rate of 2s. 6d. on the house property would, according to Mr. Rowsell, give £40,000 a-year, and if the rate were made general it would realize £70,000 a-year, which would enable the Government of the Island to abolish the taxes on food and the harbour dues, so as to make Valetta a free port. Mr. Rowsell said that the upper classes in Malta had an "hysterical objection to pay money;" but if they had money's worth, why should they have it paid for out of the most miserable class of the population? It was no doubt said that if the taxation were altered it would affect the selling value of property; but even if this were so, it only showed that the owners of property had hitherto derived more than they ought to do from it, because they were allowed by our neglect to rob the poor. If the value of property were diminished by a rate, Malta by being better governed would enjoy greater prosperity than it had ever enjoyed. It was said that nine-tenths of the people were perfectly content with things as they were; but it was impossible to suppose that people would be content to be robbed in this way. It was said that no public meetings had been held to complain of bad administration; but the people were threatened, and warned not to hold public meetings.

It appeared to him that the upper classes were robbers of helpless infancy and stealers from street beggars. Malta had two cardinal wants—the first was indicated in the terms of his Motion, and the second was that of a Governor whose sole business should be the good government of the population of the Island. If Malta were made an absolutely free port, the number of ships that would call there would be very considerably increased, and there would be an increase of work for the population of the Island. Malta, alone of all the Colonies that he knew, owed absolutely nothing. It had £80,000 in the Funds, and the estates of the Knights of Malta, which successive English Governors had recognized as State property, were worth not less than £1,300,000. If there were a Governor who would put the saddle on the right horse, he might, by seeing that the population of the Island was fairly and justly dealt with and that the latent industries of the country were developed, initiate a period of prosperity the like of which had never been known before in the Island. He (Mr. Plimsoll) thought he had proved the existence of a grievous wrong and a terrible injustice, that the remedy was easy, and that the objections were selfish and frivolous. But with energy and determination they could easily be overcome. The injustice was so terrible that he hoped the House would lift the burden off the shoulders of those unfortunate people. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution which stood in his name.

Mr. ISAAC, in seconding the Resolution, said, he would not offer any apology rising to support the hon. Member for Derby, nor would he follow him through all his remarks. He (Mr. Plimsoll) had, no doubt, been carried away by his excessive kind-heartedness and sympathetic feelings; and although he (Mr. Isaac) could not go to the same extent, he considered the Resolution was one which not only deserved, but demanded the consideration of Parliament. His hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had referred, in the course of his speech, in terms of condemnation to the action of a gentleman with whom he (Mr. Isaac) had been acquainted for many years, General Straubenzee. He would tell his hon. Friend that a better man did not exist in the British Army than the gentleman whom he had charged, he had almost said, with crime. He would ask his hon. Friend whether the fault did not rest with the laws the Governor had to put into force, rather than with any action of the man himself? The points which ought to be considered were the appointment of a civil, in addition to a military Governor, the re-adjustment of taxation, the sanitary condition of the whole Island, and the education of its people. The re-adjustment of taxation was imperative, because the present system pressed unequally on the people. The poor and working classes were heavily taxed—the idle, the rich, and the noble paid, comparatively, no taxes—the duties levied upon grain, food, and alcoholic liquors were, indeed, a serious hardship upon those who were compelled to pay them. With regard to the first point, it might be said that no change could be made which would be satisfactory to the people. We had heard that said of other places greater and smaller than Malta; but had always found, when the changes had been made, that they proved to be beneficial, not only to those who had at one time been oppressed, but equally so to those who had been considered oppressors. Considerable changes had been made in the government of the Island, both before it was ceded to this country and since the cession. In 1800, when the Island was taken by this country, we had to inaugurate some system of government. After 1814 we made great changes. In 1816 a change was made; in 1834 another change; in 1838 another; and in 1849 the Constitution of the Island was entirely altered. Not taking his information from what had been said in the House by the hon. Member for Derby, or from the letters he had written, but from persons who had been employed in the government of the Island, or had resided there for many years, he believed that though his hon. Friend had put his case very strongly, he had not exceeded the bounds of reasonable complaint as to the way in which Malta had been governed, and the unfortunate poor of the Island had been treated. During the last half-century we had made great strides in carrying Free Trade principles into operation in this country; we had removed from the edibles used by the poor all taxation; and he saw no reason why, according to justice and common sense, we should not do the same for the poor of the Island of Malta. As to the necessity for the re-adjustment of taxation, it could be proved that the lower classes in Malta were much more heavily taxed than the nobles and other classes. The principal kinds of food which the people had to subsist upon were bread, macaroni, with occasionally a few olives, a fish sandwich, and a little garlic. He had been told by a gentleman who had lived four years in the place that in the old capital of the Island, with over 3,000 inhabitants, they killed butcher's meat only one day in the week, and the demand for it was so small that they had to send the greater part to Valetta to be disposed of. The people were, therefore, obliged to use grain and those things which were taxed by the laws of the Island. That was a system of taxation which ought not to exist in any Dependency or Colony of the Crown. The question had also been mooted with regard to a land tax. What country in the Empire did not pay a land-tax, or a house tax, and a large number of other taxes? Why should Malta be the only place in Her Majesty's dominions which did not pay the land tax? He thought there would be no difficulty in raising a fair and reasonable rate of taxation for Imperial purposes from all the property in the Island, and that these changes, if carried, would be for the benefit of all parties, and were not without precedent. He believed that if Her Majesty's Ministers were to take this matter into consideration, so that some great reform was made, they would do that which would redound to their credit as much as anything they had done in the course of their Administration. In the first place, then, he would abolish the tax upon food, and supply the deficiency by a tax upon the property of the Church, and all other property, which at present enjoyed an immunity from taxation. He would, too, have the sanitary condition of the dwellings of the poor better ventilated and drained. The necessity for this was more than proved by the statement made by his hon. Friend (Mr. Plimsoll), from the experience he had gained on the spot; but if those statements needed additional arguments to impress them on the House, he (Mr. Isaac) could state, from the best possible authority, that during the general drainage repairs in Valetta the stench from the open roads was fearful—the soil, super-saturated with sewage and gas leakage, caused an epidemic of the measles type amongst adults, as well as children, along the whole route of the excavations, and caused the loss of many lives. Another instance of the serious effects of want of proper sanitary reforms was in 1865-6, when upwards of 200 deaths occurred amongst the inhabitants of ground Mezzanine and underground floors before any case occurred to the occupants of the proper houses. Lord Clarence Paget, when at the opening of the new Hydraulic Dock, in January, 1873, said, that according to the last Census, the population of Malta was 124,000, being about 1,200 to the square mile, and, therefore, denser than any other part of the globe; and, that what was still more striking and appalling was its rapid increase, being something like 1,000 in every year. He suggested the Maltese should colonize the shores of the Mediterranean, and particularly pointed out Cyrenica, formerly one of the principal granaries of ancient Rome. That surely and clearly proved that emigration was the only way of providing for the population; and if they had to emigrate, it must be to a place where they could speak the language of the people. He thought, then, that they might establish elementary schools in the Island, in which the people might be taught English; it was highly desirable that they should learn to speak some other language than the mixture of Italian and Arabic which was their vernacular. He should rejoice if the glory and honour of improving the condition of the Island of Malta belonged to a Conservative Government. If, instead of holding Malta for the Maltese, they regarded it as an English Colony, the effect would be to make the nobles feel they were Englishmen, and thus would be infused into the society of the Island a more truly English feeling, and a belief that it had been left, amongst other important duties, to a Conservative Government to reform the laws and the government of the important Island of Malta, that had been so long neglected by the masterly inactivity of their Liberal predecessors.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the cost of maintaining the Police, and of draining, repairing, lighting, cleaning, and watering the streets, &c. in Malta, should be paid out of a rate upon house and other property (upon which, at present, no rates or taxes of any kind whatever are levied), and not, inter alia, out of a tax upon wheat and other grain for food, and upon potatoes and other vegetables, which, as a matter of fact, actually takes more per head from the very poor who live in cellars than it takes per head from those who live in the best houses in the streets and squares; and the House is therefore further of opinion that it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to take such steps as may be necessary to secure the abolition of the taxes on food in Malta on and from the 1st day of January 1881,—(Mr. Plimsoll,)

—instead thereof.

MR. MAC IVER, who had the following Notice upon the Paper:—

"To call the attention of the House to the condition of Malta; and to move, That, with respect to local administration, no outlay of public money should take place, no taxes should be imposed, nor any law be passed, except with the consent of a majority of the elected Members of the Council of Government;"

said, he should not have thought that the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) ever had been in Malta, had he not seen the hon. Gentleman there. It certainly did not appear, either from his speech or from the speech of his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Isaac), that they knew anything about the Island. Let him (Mr. Mac Iver) remind the House how Malta became a part of the Empire. In 1798 the Maltese bravely withstood the French and maintained their independence, and afterwards they willingly placed themselves under British rule. Therefore, they owed something to the Maltese. The Maltese were a deeply religious Roman Catholic people, and he (Mr. Mac Iver) had a letter from their Archbishop, who was certainly not in favour of the views of the Mover and Seconder of this Resolution. For himself, having spent years of his life in Malta, and still maintaining his associations with the place, he now spoke on behalf of the Maltese; and he was supported by a Memorial from the elected Members of the Council in the views he ventured to urge. There was not the smallest pretence for saying that the elected Members of the Council did not represent the feelings of 999 out of every 1,000 of the inhabitants. Acknowledging the perfect sincerity of the hon.

Member for Derby, he yet thought that hon. Gentleman was apt at times to take an exaggerated and distorted view of facts. The undisputed facts in this matter were, that the entire revenue of Malta derived from any kind of taxation was about £100,000, and that of this amount some £50,000 was raised by those taxes to which the hon. Member for Derby was opposed. The hon. Gentleman evidently thought that the whole of the deficiency in regard to that £50,000 might reasonably be recouped from a charge of some kind or other on house property. Now, the population was about 150,000, and the number of houses perhaps something like 30,000. Nine out of ten of the houses in which the people lived were rented at £2 or £3 a-year; and if they put a tax of 20s. or 30s. on each of those houses, that would be very like adding 40 or 50 per cent to the house rent which the people had hitherto paid. That was, practically, what the hon. Member's proposal came to. There were in Malta no rich persons, or not more than about half-a-dozen, and the great bulk of the revenue required to meet local needs must be obtained from the great mass of the population. The real question, therefore, was, how could that be done with the least inconvenience and distress to the Maltese people? Surely, the wishes of the people themselves ought to have some weight, and they were averse from any material change of their system of taxation. Although a few agitators had done their best to stir up discontent, the inhabitants of the Island were not dissatisfied; they were a law-abiding, well-conducted community, who desired ever to remain a portion of the British Empire; but they did feel that sometimes the House of Commons forgot the circumstances in which the Island became a part of our Empire and did not sufficiently regard the wishes of the Maltese people. Malta enjoyed the reality of an unrestricted commerce with all parts of the Mediterranean, and was, practically, almost a free port, Customs duties being levied on only one or two articles. The general prosperity of Malta depended upon its continuing to be the cheapest port of that part of the Mediterranean; but the Free Traders had proposed changes in the finances of the Island which threatened to destroy its trade altogether, and that had been the occasion of the riots which had occurred there. The hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) complained that the taxation of the Island was in favour of the rich, as against the poor; but this statement was based upon imaginary data. Much stress had been laid upon the fact that extensive drainage works had been undertaken by the Government in Malta; but the truth was, that those drainage works had been executed, not for the advantage of the Maltese, but of the British Fleet and of the troops who were quartered there. The demand of the Maltese people was that, with respect to local administration, no expenditure should be incurred, that no taxes should be imposed, and that no law should be passed, except with the consent of a majority of the elected Members of the Council of Government; and, in his opinion, that was a most reasonable proposal. Malta and Cyprus were both on the high road to India—the former was over-populated, the latter was thinly-populated—and, therefore, the best thing we could do was to induce the surplus population of Malta to emigrate to Cyprus.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER rose to second the Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER pointed out that it had already been seconded.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had expected, after listening to the first portion of the speech of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver), that it would be shown that his (Mr. Anderson's) hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had no case, for he set out by promising to demolish it entirely; but after hearing the remainder of the speech, and particularly the remarkable conclusion at which the hon. Member for Birkenhead had arrived, he thought that the arguments of the hon. Member for Derby were unassailable. What was it that the hon. Member for Birkenhead proposed to do for the people of Malta? Why, his proposal would be to send them from the frying-pan into the fire. The only thing he had to offer for their good was to deport them to Cyprus. Malta, he (Mr. Anderson) believed, was hot; but no one would venture to compare it to Cyprus. The hon. Member wished to induce the people of Malta to consent to be deported from an uncomfortable Island into a still more disagreeable place. He did not suppose the hon.

Member's Maltese friends would be very grateful to him for that proposal. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mac Iver) compared the proposal to impose a house tax on Malta to the Chancellor of the Exchequer adding 30 per cent to our own house tax; but the analogy was quite in another way, the present system at Malta was just as if the right hon. Gentleman had undertaken the paving and cleansing and lighting of the Metropolis, all of which were to be paid for out of the general taxation of the country. In Malta the Customs dues were used for those purposes; and, not only that, but in Valetta a University was kept up and an opera-house had also been erected, at great cost, by the same means, and it was not right that the lower classes of the Islands generally should have to provide for the maintenance of the buildings there. Malta, in fact, was made pleasant and gay, at the expense of the people, for the officials sent from England. It was complained that the poor people of Malta were taxed on food for the sake of keeping the upper classes free from taxation, and making the place in every way pleasant to them. In all the taxes which affected the poor people, they were made to pay much more heavily than the upper classes. The hon. Member for Birkenhead had questioned the figures of Mr. Rowsell, who said that, while the working class were taxed at the rate of 15s. 7d. per head, the officials and wealthier classes who had £500 or £1,000 a-year or more paid only 10s. 10d.; and he had asserted there were no figures in the Report to sustain that argument. But Mr. Rowsell had figures, and these showed that there were 27,000 of the official and wealthier classes in Malta, and 112,000 poor persons whose average wages were 1s. a-day. He showed how the amount was made up, and his figures were incontestable. [Mr. Mac Iver denied there was any calculation of the kind.] He would refer the hon. Gentleman to page 15, where the calculation was clearly set out. Mr. Rowsell showed that in the matter of bread duty alone the rich class contributed 5s. and the poor class 10s. per head. The hon. Member for Birkenhead also went on to show that a tax on house property would prove inoperative, and that it would not be possible to raise the required amount in that way. But Mr. Rowsell proved to the contrary.

He proved that 6d. in the pound of rental would yield £8,000 a-year; but in this country 2s. 6d. was a low rate for local purposes, and that rate in Malta would yield £40,000 a-year. He (Mr. Anderson) felt that the House would accept the statements of Mr. Rowsell in preference to the opinions of the hon. Member for Birkenhead; for they showed, to the satisfaction of most hon. Members of that House, that Malta, after being for nearly a century in our possession, was about the worst-governed spot in Her Majesty's Dominions. We governed the Island not for the good of the people there, but entirely with a view to the fortress. He suggested that a civil Governor, to be paid by Malta, should be appointed, as well as the military Governor, whose salary, reduced from £5,000 to £3,000 a-year, ought to be paid by us. For the last 25 years the Government of Malta had been a dictatorship, for the military Governors had been very much under the influence of the permanent officials, and Sir Adrian Dingli was the real Dictator at Malta. Some of the Governors we sent out were very weak, and entirely in his hands. The late Governor, Sir C. Straubenzees, had been of this class, an amiable well meaning man, but as weak as water, as was proved by his conduct in the riots of last year, when he had been censured by the Colonial Secretary for allowing the mob to enter the corridors of the Palace. There was another difficulty in connection with Malta, and that was the state of the franchise. The hon. Member for Birkenhead had a Resolution on the Paper, recommending that there should be no outlay of public money, except with the consent of the majority of the elected Members of the Council—a rule that had been enforced for some time by Lord Cardwell, but had been abandoned of late years, with the result that the votes of the eight elected Members were usually swamped by those of the nine official Councillors. So flagrant was this system that in one case the casting vote of an official had made an addition to his own salary. That swamping of the elected Members' votes, however, would be a greater grievance, if the elected Members represented a larger constituency than the 2,000 persons who composed the electorate. At first sight the franchise seemed liberal enough, being based on the principle of a £4 occupancy; but it was too severely restricted by the absurd stipulation that no one should vote who did not understand English or Italian, both of which were foreign languages in Malta. In this country we sanctioned even the illiterate voter; but on the Maltese system we would not only abolish him, but require every voter to understand Welsh or Gaelic. That was a point on which reforms were urgently needed and might be very usefully introduced in Malta; as if that restriction were removed, the constituencies would be largely increased, and the Members of the Council would be more truly representative. The widening of the franchise, and the appointment of a civil Governor to attend to the civil business of the Island, were the two subjects with respect to which the Secretary of State for the Colonies would, he hoped, take immediate action. In conclusion, he would say that the lower classes, he thought, had been compelled to pay taxes which should have been put on the wealthier classes through property taxation; and he urged, in the strongest manner, that the Resolution should be adopted, and the taxes on food in Malta should cease from the 1st of January, 1881.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that the speech of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) had been so comprehensive and had gone into so much useful detail that his own observations need not be long. He fully admitted the good intentions and benevolent objects of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll), a well-known instance of which, in the case of our merchant seamen, would be familiar to the House. It had struck him, however, that the part played by the hon. Member in the present case was a little Quixotic. The circumstances of the hon. Member's Motion reminded him of the celebrated reply given by the Needy Knifegrinder in The Anti-Jacobin—

"Story, God bless you! I have none to tell, Sir," for, in fact, though they had heard how the Maltese were starved and ill-treated, that unhappy people had not told their own story or pleaded their own wrongs. Had the hon. Member come to the House with any Petition from them, and could he mention any public meeting that had been held in support of his views? He (Sir George Bowyer) had in his hand a pamphlet written by the hon. Member, and would ask the attention of the House to two extracts from it, which would show the exaggeration and absence of exact thought and argument that had characterized his statement. In one of those passages, he had attributed the insanitary condition of the place to the import duties on corn; in the other, he had hotly attacked the Government of the Island, of course, including in his denunciations the Secretary of State. In that second passage he had written that he had seen in London portraits of the great brigands of Palermo, and among them those of Leoni and his gang, with whom, he said, he had rather stand at the Judgment Day than with the men who had inflicted on Malta the terrible evils of which he complained. He (Sir George Bowyer) did not mean to assert that the condition of things was perfect in Malta; but he did say that, if modifications in the taxation were to be made, they ought to spring from the wishes of the people themselves, and not to be imposed on the people by the Free-traders of this country. The Maltese said they were used to the fiscal system they possessed, and that any substitutes that might be proposed for the existing taxes would be far more grievous than those in force at present. They thought their system was not one to be complained of, and they asked to be let alone. This was a very reasonable view for them to take, and he hoped the House would be disposed to accept it. Without Protection, the cultivation of cereals, which, from a military point of view, was of great importance, would probably cease altogether in the Island. He had had Maltese affairs passing through his hands for a number of years; and he believed the Government would do wisely in refusing to adopt any large scheme of alteration in the financial system of the Island, and confining themselves to the consideration of political details. He strongly deprecated the slighting manner in which the hon. Member for Derby and others had referred to the Maltese nobility. They were an ancient and honourable class, possessed of education and high attainments, and holding a distinguished position in the Island. The hon. Member for Birkenhead had pointed out what was the real defect in the mode of government in Malta—namely, the constitution of the Legislative Council. Hon. Gentlemen who wished to benefit the inhabitants would be taking a much more useful course if they applied themselves to the remedy of this political grievance. The opinions of the Representatives of the people ought to have the greatest possible weight; but their voice was stifled. The people of Malta were loyal—in fact, there were no more loyal subjects of the British Crown and they deserved great consideration. He maintained that Gibraltar, Malta, and Cyprus were most important to this country for military and political purposes, and it was important that we should cultivate the goodwill of the inhabitants of those places. If they were friendly to us, half the battle was gained. Although Malta was a small place, we were bound to hear its case. There was a military Governor. He was a most gallant officer, and deserved the greatest respect in a military and in every other point of view; but his chief work was the care of the garrison. A civil Governor would be employed in other ways. In Ireland we had a Lord Lieutenant and a Commander-in-Chief. Why should there not be the same arrangement in Malta? The people of Malta paid £5,000 a-year out of their pockets for this Governor, who was chiefly employed as commander of the English troops. They said—"We do not think it is fair that we should have to pay the salary of a Commander-in-Chief for Imperial purposes and not for the purposes of the Island." That point deserved consideration, with a view to its being remedied.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, that it was possible to live in a place, and to come out of it, without any very accurate perception of the condition of its inner life. Now, although he had never been in the Island of Malta, he knew something of the state of things which existed there, and had no difficulty, basing his opinion even on the speeches of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver)—and he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) was not sure that he would take the views of that hon. Member on any social or political question—and the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Wexford (Sir George Bowyer), both of whom had lived at Malta, in coming to the conclusion that the system of taxation which prevailed in the Island was not entitled to the approval of the House. In his opinion, neither speech had touched the fringe of the question before the House. There was on the one side a great degree of penury and squalor; while upon the other there was a class who, though perhaps not rich in the sense in which people were said to be rich in this country, were well off; and yet the greater portion of the taxes of the Island were raised on the food on which the poor for the most part lived. Surely, that could not be an equitable state of things; and it was, under those circumstances, absurd, he thought, to speak of the people of Malta as being contented, with their squalor and underground cellars, in the way the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Wexford had done, considering the abject condition in which they were placed; and he was glad his hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) had paid the Island a visit and was able to tell the House—what the official Reports did not do—the real facts of the case. He should like, he might add, to see some system of real representation established in Malta, so that reforms might be instituted from within; but by whatever means the end was effected, the present unjust—he had almost said ridiculous—system of taxation, which operated so unjustly, ought to be abolished. In conclusion, he thought they owed a deep debt of gratitude to the hon. Member for Derby for bringing this subject under public attention.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he was in the unfortunate position of not being able to agree either with the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) or his hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver). Though sympathizing with much in the speech of the hon. Member for Derby, he could not but think it somewhat exaggerated, and that the hon. Member made rather too much of the bread tax in attributing to it all that was wrong in the condition of the Island. The bread tax was not even the main source of taxation, for only one-half of the taxes raised came from that source. He acknowledged that was a large amount; but it was less than would be inferred from the speech of the hon. Member for Derby. The hon.

Member represented the tax as a burden imposed by the richer classes in Malta upon the poorer. That was hardly correct, for the hon. Member was unable to bring forward any instance to show that the poorer classes were themselves opposed to the tax. And, surely, the mendicancy of the Island was to be attributed to the poorness of the soil and the scarcity of employment rather than to that cause. The hon. Member also thought that the insanitary condition of the Island was due to the tax; and he instanced houses he had himself seen in some of the worst quarters of the city. There was, he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) would admit, a block of buildings, containing about 1,600 persons, which ought certainly to be swept away in any sanitary improvement which might be made; but that particular place was no more a fair sample of the whole of Malta, than a slice from the Seven Dials would be of the state of London. We had, in this country, for many years freedom from taxation on bread; but in spite of that we had found it necessary to pass Artizans' Dwellings Acts, and we had to meet no slight opposition to the taxation required for sanitary purposes. He understood that even in the town which the hon. Member represented, though there was no bread tax, there was a certain amount of disinclination, on the part of the Corporation, to adopt the provisions of the Artizans' Dwellings Act, though it was very necessary that it should be done. He quite admitted that this tax on food was objectionable for many reasons; and he had stated those reasons in the despatch he addressed last year to the Governor of Malta. He quite admitted, also, that the sanitary condition of the Island was capable of improvement, and he had done a good deal since he came into his present Office to promote that improvement. The drainage of what was called the "Three Cities" had been under consideration in Malta; and, finding that by the existing system, which was described as "a system of elongated cesspools," the sewage of a city with 50,000 persons was discharged into the harbour, and remembering that this country, on account of our Naval and Military Departments, was prepared to contribute liberally to the expenses, he felt himself justified in directing that the proposed scheme should be passed through the Council, in spite of the opposition of the elected Members. That step had occasioned much complaint on the part of the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Wexford and others, who said that Malta had been taxed for the benefit of this country. But Malta would pay only four-sevenths of the cost of a work which was very much for her benefit. The passing of a measure similar in its provisions to our Public Health Acts, which might enable the Government to deal with the insanitary condition of some of the worst places in the Island, had been pressed for some years past upon the Council of Malta, but had been stopped by the opposition of the elected Members. There, again, the question arose whether it would not be in the interest of the Island that the opposition of the elected Members should no longer be allowed to prevent the necessary reforms? When he came into Office, he found that his Predecessor had directed an Inquiry into the system of taxation, and a Report had shortly before been received at the Colonial Office. The subject was new to him; but he had considered it as far as he could; and last summer he addressed a despatch to the Governor of Malta, proposing that one-half of the bread tax should be taken off. It appeared to him that was as far as it was possible to go, considering that there was a heavy burden on the Revenues of Malta for drainage and other matters, and it would be necessary to provide from other sources what was lost by taking off that portion of the tax. The question was necessarily postponed to the present year, and the matter was then brought forward by the Members of the Government in Council, and debated. He was now waiting for the Report of the debates in the Council; because, before proceeding any further, he wished to have before him the views, not only of the official, but of the elected Members of the Council, on this important subject. Some years ago, one of his Predecessors in the Colonial Office — Lord Cardwell — addressed a very well-known despatch to the Governor of Malta, wherein he stated his views as to the weight which should be attached to the opinions of the elected Members of the Council in these and similar questions. Lord Cardwell stated that great consideration should be shown to the opinions of the elected Members of the Council in matters of local interest, and that no vote of local taxation or expenditure should be passed against a majority of the elected Members, unless in very exceptional circumstances, when the public credit was immediately at stake, and never without an immediate Report to the Secretary of State. Having regard to that view, which had been expressed so solemnly by one of his Predecessors at the Colonial Office, he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had thought it was only fair and right that he should pay every consideration to the opinions of the elected Members of the Council on such a subject. He should have failed to pay that consideration if he had, without even hearing the opinions of the elected Members, pressed on the Council of Malta so great a change in their system of taxation as would be involved in the abolition of half this bread tax. As soon as he received those opinions, he should give them the consideration to which they would be entitled; and it would then be his duty to take such action in the matter as the circumstances seemed to him to demand. He trusted, however, that the House would not, that evening, fetter his action upon this question by adopting the Motion of the hon. Member for Derby. That Motion amounted to an expression of opinion that, whatever might be the views of the Maltese, who were the people concerned, at a certain date—namely, in the year 1881—the whole of this bread tax should be repealed, and the whole fiscal system of the Island changed; and that, with regard to certain items of expenditure—such as drainage, lighting, paving, and so on—they should be paid for by the imposition of a rate. But he was assured that the imposition of a rate would be, of all things, the most distasteful to the Maltese: and not merely to the wealthier classes, but to all the householders of Malta. Was that House not merely to alter the whole system of Maltese taxation, but to insist on the householders of Malta declaring a rate for certain purposes, whether they liked it or not? Moreover, would such a proceeding really carry out the views of the hon. Member for Derby? The most telling part of the hon. Member's speech was his account of the wretched habitations in which some of the poorer classes of Malta had to live. Did the hon. Member suppose that if the taxation were divided into two portions, as he would recommend, sanitary reform would become more popular in Malta, if it were to be effected by the levying of a rate, instead of being paid for by the present system of indirect taxation? He was afraid that the adoption of the hon. Member for Derby's proposal would defeat the hon. Gentleman's own object. There was force in the remark of the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), that reform should come from within rather than from without. Surely, even the hon. Member for Derby would wish that there should be a proof given of the desire of the people, or some portion of it, for a change before it was made. At present, the mass of the people were not represented by the small electorate of Malta; and he thought it a matter which was deserving of consideration whether, in this and similar questions affecting the Island, the first and wisest step would not be to increase in some way the electorate? For these reasons, he would ask the House not to pass the Motion of the hon. Member for Derby; but to leave the matter in his hands, and allow him to try to deal with it on the principles which he had indicated.

MR. PLIMSOLL rose to reply, but—

MR. SPEAKER informed him that he was not entitled, by the Rules of the House, to make a second speech.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £140,530, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of various Miscellaneous Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

were indicated in the Circular. In reply, the Admiral had said that—

"The Minute of the 17th June, 1878, had been carried out, but that the squadron had never been absent from a port where the services of a Roman Catholic priest were available except for a very short time, and it had not been necessary to embark the Roman Catholic chaplain."

He (Mr. W. H. Smith) had distinctly said in that House that he would provide Roman Catholic chaplains for the Fleet when they were away from places where the services of Roman Catholic priests were available. An Order to that effect had been carried out, but the circumstances had not arisen in which the squadron were away from the port for any considerable period; and it had not, therefore, been necessary to embark a Roman Catholic chaplain. If the circumstances had arisen in which it had been directed that a chaplain should be embarked, then the Admiral would have been liable to severe censure for not carrying out the Order; but that had not been the case.

MR. SULLIVAN could understand that the circumstances exactly contemplated in the Admiralty Minute had not arisen; but he should like to know what arrangements were made by the Admiral for the spiritual needs of the Roman Catholic seamen when the Fleet was in the Black Sea? Did he arrange for the services of the chaplain, and was the payment of that gentleman included in the Vote for the services of those gentlemen who performed chaplains' duty on board ship? He was unable to understand the Vote. They found a Vote for chaplains' services rendered by Catholic clergymen somewhere in the East. With respect to the point raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), he (Mr. Sullivan) might observe that he had received letters from persons who had gone out to India by the transport ships, which letters spoke very strongly of the necessity of having some such provision on board large transports as the hon. and gallant Gentleman recommended. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty would, perhaps, do him the justice to say that he had abstained from appearing unreasonably to press him about the matter ever since he had given the House the undertaking, on which, personally speaking, he had the most implicit reliance—that accommodation should be provided for the Roman Catholics in certain cases. That implicit reliance in the right hon. Gentleman he still had; but he would suggest to him that it might be necessary to see that the Orders which he had issued were carried out.

MR. O'DONNELL was willing to give the right hon. Gentleman every credit for his good intentions; but, so far as the facts went, they found that there had been no Roman Catholic chaplain appointed to the British Fleet during the recent emergency in the East, although there would have been a war if certain contingencies had arisen. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty did not propose to place Roman Catholic chaplains on board transport ships going out to India, although there might be 500 to 600 or more Catholic soldiers on board. So far as results went, it must be admitted that, up to the present, the promises made had not come to anything. He thought it very desirable, both in the interests of discipline and for the good of the men, that Catholic priests should be placed on board transports when many Catholic soldiers were carried. It was a total misconception of the Catholic religion to suppose that the whole matter ended with going to church on an occasional Sunday. When there was such extensive accommodation for officers on board the transports, he could not see a shadow of reason for refusing the services of a Catholic priest to 400 or 500 Catholic soldiers when going to and from India. The fact was that there was something like prejudice to the presence of Roman Catholic chaplains on board these ships on the part of those who were responsible for the management of the vessels. For his part, he could not see why the services of Catholic chaplains should be refused. The services of a Catholic priest might often be required by the Catholic soldiers on board the ships, and he did not see why they should not be at their disposal. Between the two cases of religion and of the cat, it seemed to him that the influence of religion would be a better deterrent from misconduct, and that it ought to be preferred. He entered into the spirit of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), and he was prepared to give the Government credit for wishing to deal fairly with the

away from port. The Admiral said that he would “Carry out the directions of the Admiralty; but that necessity had not arisen for providing special services for the Roman Catholics on board the squadron.”

No doubt, it was exceedingly rare for a vessel to be long away from a port where the services of a Roman Catholic priest were not available; but the orders which had been issued by the Admiralty would, no doubt, be faithfully carried out. The hon. Gentleman would see that the undertaking that had been given on the part of the Government had been fulfilled. Of course, it was impossible to place a second chaplain on board the same ship. With regard to the troopships, the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) must remember that the accommodation for officers on board them was limited. The troopships running between England and India, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman knew, called at Gibraltar, Malta, and at Suez, where the Roman Catholic soldiers could be landed, if they expressed a desire to do so, and could receive the ministrations of their religion. Whether soldiers or sailors it was the duty of the Admiralty to afford them every proper facility for attending the ministrations of their religion. But he could not undertake to provide a Roman Catholic chaplain for every ship and for every troopship that sailed. Everything that he could do to meet the wishes of hon. Gentlemen to provide for the faith of their fellow-countrymen he would do; but he did not wish to create false impressions, and he did not think it possible to carry Roman Catholic chaplains on board troopships.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that on some troopships there might be 400 or 500 Catholics on board, and he thought that they were entitled to a chaplain. He did not propose putting a chaplain on board a troopship as a permanency; but it would be possible to send them on board whenever required. Many chaplains would be quite willing to go for nothing, if they were given the passage. The Government had only to hold up its finger, and plenty would offer themselves. With regard to accommodation, there was no difficulty, because every troopship accommodated from 120 to 150 officers. If the right hon. Gentleman was anxious to meet the wishes of hon. Members, he (Major Nolan) thought that it would be easy for him to provide services for troops on board ship, where 400 or 500 of them were Roman Catholics. Probably, where there were less than that number on board, it would not be possible to provide the chaplains. With regard to what had been said about troops obtaining the ministrations of Catholic priests at places where the vessel called, it would be impossible for a large number of troops to be landed, or, if landed, it would be impossible to get them back again. They must either have services on board, or they must do without them altogether.

MR. PARNELL wished to know whether any chaplains had been appointed under the Order issued by the Admiralty? The right hon. Gentleman informed them that the Order directed a chaplain should be provided in certain circumstances; but he did not say whether any chaplains had been provided under those circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had also said that he could not undertake to provide chaplains for troopships in any case; but would he say that it was his intention to provide chaplains for troopships in certain cases?

MR. GRAY said, that the meaning of the despatch of the Admiral was, that he would be ready to obey the directions, but there was no necessity for them. On a previous occasion the right hon. Gentleman had said that owing to the want of accommodation—a very extraordinary reason, considering the size of the ships—he could not undertake to provide chaplains for every ship; but he used the expression that he would provide chaplains for every squadron. He (Mr. Gray) was anxious to ascertain what chaplains had been provided, under the Order which had been issued; or, if any had been provided at all? It was all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to give them an assurance that something should be done; but they would like something a little more definite. It was a very simple matter to give them the information which they required.

MR. W. H. SMITH observed, that the Commander-in-Chief had orders to embark a Roman Catholic chaplain with the squadron, under circumstances which of the case which had been put forward from time to time. But he thought that they were entitled to something more than mere general promises from the right hon. Gentleman. It was obvious that the plan he proposed had been a failure, and did not meet the requirements of the case, and he thought they might fairly ask the right hon. Gentleman to propose some new scheme. They urged that there ought to be Roman Catholic chaplains on board the large troopships going out to India, on which great numbers of Roman Catholics were carried. In Ireland the services of the priest were much valued, and it was usual, if a man were ill or met with an accident, for the priest to see him before the doctor. They knew what extreme importance many of the humbler classes of Irish attached to the ministrations of a clergyman of the Roman Catholic Church; yet they sent these men out long voyages, and many of them must die without the benefits of the last consolations of their religion. It was much harder for Roman Catholics to die without the consolations of their religion than it was for members of other Churches. In these circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty would see that the mere stoppage of a vessel at such a place as Aden did not give sufficient opportunity for the men to obtain the ministrations of their religion, which they ought to have as the voyage proceeded. Perhaps, at the very time that the services of the priest were available, they were not required, and vice versa. He did not think that the right hon. Gentleman perfectly understood the position, otherwise he would secure the ministrations of their religion to Roman Catholics on board troopships. He begged to move that Progress be reported, and that the Chairman ask leave to sit again. It was manifest that they could not proceed until they had given the Government an opportunity of considering the matter. By the time that the Committee sat again, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty would have had time to investigate the question.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Mr. Parnell

MR. SULLIVAN begged to repeat exactly what it was that they did require, and what it was they thought should be carried out. They asked that whenever there were 300 men, or thereabouts, in the squadron belonging to the Catholic religion, the men in the different ships should have the advantage of the services of a Catholic chaplain so long as the squadron remained together. He might point out that he and some of his hon. Friends were not quite clear about the statement from the Admiral. His statement was, that they were never away from a port where the services of a local Catholic clergyman were available. If he was to understand by that, that immediately on the arrival of the squadron at any port a clergyman on shore was communicated with, and put at once into the position of chaplain to the squadron, they would be quite satisfied, and thought that was a reasonable carrying out of the promise given to them. But if, on the other hand, it only meant that the Admiral, or one of his captains, was in a position to send on shore for a priest, if his services were required, that was very different. He did not quarrel at all with the Instruction; all he wished to know was as to the way in which it was carried out. They did not merely want that if a man fell from the mast-head, for instance, and injured himself, that a priest should be sent for for him; but that these 300 or 400 Catholic seamen should have a clergyman attending them in the position of chaplain, ready to attend men, even in health, if they required it. They all knew, whatever their religious views, that the visits of their ministers, even if they were not in any immediate danger of death, was something to which they, as Christian men, attached extreme importance. If the chaplain did thus attend the men, he thought, as far as he was concerned, that the Instruction of the First Lord had been very fairly carried out. But if, on the other hand, there was merely the power, or the intention, to send for a priest from the shore, when he was required, that was a totally different thing. He hoped, however, that, in any case, they might not need to report Progress; but that the Vote would be finished at once. This religious question, he might say, was a very sore question with the men actually on service. He had no desire to en-

Catholic soldiers; but, beyond all question, they would not deal fairly with them with respect to the services of a Roman Catholic chaplain if they refused the services of a Roman Catholic priest to 500 soldiers going out to India.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY thought that they required some system by which the ministrations of Catholic clergymen to Catholic sailors should be better secured than at present. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty to appoint five or six Catholic chaplains to the Navy, and to send them out when necessity arose. If he did that, he would give the Roman Catholics a much greater confidence than they at present possessed in the impartiality of the system. He did not think that such a provision would involve great expense. If the right hon. Gentleman communicated with the Roman Catholic Bishops of this country, they would place at his disposal, at short notice, four or five gentlemen who could perform the duties, and who he might be able to dispense with when not required. They should draw some pay when not on active service, and be placed on full pay when on active service. That system would give the Roman Catholic clergyman some status. If their services were recognized as a part of the religious service of the Navy, it would go far to meet the desires of all concerned.

MR. A. MOORE said, that the information which he had received led him to a different conclusion to that which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) had put before the House. Apart from the question of troopships was the question of appointing Roman Catholic chaplains on invalid ships. Ships were sent home to England laden with sick men, and it was a hardship to them not to have the services of a chaplain of their religion in their last hours. It was not a question of appointing new chaplains, it was only a matter with regard to the existing Roman Catholic chaplains, who had at present no means of exercising their functions. On Sunday men were sent to church; but no facilities were afforded to the priest to visit and attend to their flocks. In other religions, the Queen's Regulations gave facilities and prescribed the duties of the chaplain. The chaplains of the Royal Navy of the Established Church were distinctly recognized, and given facilities for exercising their functions; but no corresponding facilities were given to Roman Catholics. He thought that the Roman Catholics were treated in a very high-handed manner. He knew that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty was very anxious to take Supply; but he thought that, before the Vote was taken, they ought to have an assurance that further facilities should be given and further means taken to remedy the grievance of which they complained. He was as anxious as the right hon. Gentleman to facilitate the progress of Public Business, and so were his other hon. Friends; but unless the right hon. Gentleman would give an assurance, or appoint a Committee to consider the matter, he must move to report Progress.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that if something were not done in the direction of removing their grievance they would have an opportunity of discussing the question again. He could see no difficulty in appointing Roman Catholic chaplains to large vessels carrying 800 or 900 troops, of whom some 500, as in the case of the 88th and 83rd Regiments, were Catholics. If a vessel were going a long distance, men were not allowed to land for the reason mentioned by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), and he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) did not see what possible objection there could be to allowing them to receive religious ministrations on board. He thought it was a matter of right on the part of soldiers in large troopships to have the services of a priest of their religion. They knew that there was ample accommodation on board these vessels, and that question did not need, therefore, to be considered in the matter. He could see no reason why the Admiralty should not accede to the suggestion which had been made.

MR. PARNELL said, that it was clear that Roman Catholic soldiers going out to India, or sailors serving on board ship, had had no additional facilities for obtaining the services of ministers of their own religion. Under these circumstances, they could only say that the Order issued by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty was entirely illusory, and that it was not calculated to meet the exigencies Department only, and he is unable or unauthorized to speak for other Departments. But I can say for myself and my Colleagues in the Government that we regard the proposal which has been made by the hon. and gallant Member (Major Nolan), and the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), as framed in a spirit decidedly fair and reasonable, and we shall do our best to get it carried out.

Mr. A. MOORE did not wish to press his Motion unduly. He was certainly received with a certain amount of indifference and hauteur the other night; but after the candid manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had met him, with that courtesy, also, which he always showed, he should not wish to press the matter further.

Mr. PARNELL also felt very much obliged to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the very candid statement he had just made, and thought the Motion should be withdrawn.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £139,530, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of various Miscellaneous Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE pointed out that there was a considerable increase in the loss by exchange. It had increased from £300 last year to £2,000 this, and next year it was £1,700. Had any change been made in this matter? He should be glad, also, if the First Lord of the Admiralty would explain the increase in the passage monies?

Mr. W. H. SMITH replied, that no change whatever had been made in the mode of paying the men; and, in this matter, his hon. Friend was aware they followed the directions of the Treasury. He believed that the fall in the price of silver had considerably affected the payments in China and Japan. The increase in the passage money was due to the fact that ships had been re-commissioned abroad rather more than was usual. As the hon. Gentleman was aware, there was a considerable saving in re-commissioning ships abroad, especially when they were at distant stations like Hong Kong. That was the reason for the increase in the passage monies.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE observed, that he had no objection whatever to this re-commissioning of ships abroad, and thought, on the contrary, it was a very good system. He understood, however, that it had been given up in consequence of objections which, in his opinion, were very improperly raised to it.

Mr. WHITWELL asked, if the First Lord of the Admiralty would explain the amount granted for Portsea Pier? Was that the first of a series of charges, or was it one amount?

Mr. W. H. SMITH replied, that this amount was asked for in pursuance of a very old arrangement.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £210,250, for Freight, &c. on account of the Army Department.

(3.) £145,836, Greenwich Hospital and School.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. ERRINGTON said, he had given Notice to reduce this Vote by the sum of £500, which he understood to be the salary of the Professor of Chemistry in the College of Science and Art, Dublin. This matter arose from a very painful circumstance which had occurred in that College, which had resulted in the dismissal of the Professor of Chemistry. The College of Science in Dublin was one of two or three institutions which was connected with the Science and Art Department in London; and, certainly, they could not complain that any faults in the management were due to want of complete and full inquiries. There was a departmental inquiry in 1862; and the remarkable thing was, that that inquiry resulted in a recommendation that cumber the Votes with Motions; but he might mention that he had had letter upon letter from men who complained of the absence of a chaplain on board the large transports, for instance, which were constantly going to and from India. There were very often 600 or 700 Catholics on board, and then the absence of a chaplain was most sorely felt. He could not forget, however, the manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had met him when he last brought the question before the House. He could not forget that he was met most readily, and in the fairest possible way; and, therefore, he hoped that this question of the transports would be satisfactorily considered.

MR. W. H. SMITH acknowledged the extreme fairness of the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), and said that, to the best of his belief, the arrangement made last year had been carried out in the sense and in the manner he had suggested. He would, however, make further inquiry, in order to test the fact; because it was the desire of the Admiralty, and of every officer in the Navy, that the consolations of their religion should be afforded to men of the Roman Catholic faith just as they were afforded to men of any other religious faith, whenever they desired to have them. He might just say for himself that, some time ago, a case came to his knowledge in which an officer was severely censured for not having sent for a Roman Catholic priest when a man who was ill desired it. The vessel arrived in port, and circumstances rendered it probable that the man would not recover, and it came to the knowledge of the Admiralty that a Roman Catholic priest was not sent for. The Admiralty, therefore, severely censured that officer. As to the transports, he had said over and over again that he desired to afford facilities to these men for the performance of their religious duties; but he must point out that this was the first time the question had been definitely brought before him with regard to the transports, and that he had not absolute control over them. The ships themselves belonged to the India Office. The men, or rather the soldiers on board, were under the control of the War Department, and the men who worked the ships were, of course, sailors under the Admiralty. He did not know whether it would be possible to put a chaplain on board any of those ships; but he would only repeat that he would do everything in his power to meet any necessities which existed, honestly believing that the men had a right to demand that these desires of theirs should be complied with, and that their religious aspirations should be met. He could not, as the hon. and learned Member would see, give an absolute engagement, which he might not be able afterwards to perform; but he would do all that was in his power, and he would consider, with his Colleagues, how what was desired could be done.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that, for his part, he would be quite content if the right hon. Gentleman would say that where there was a certain number of Catholics on board a ship—say 250, or some such number—an endeavour would be made to procure chaplains. He would not suggest any number; but he would say about 300. Whenever, however, there was a sort of approach to a definite number, an effort should be made to send a chaplain on board. The difficulties raised by the First Lord of the Admiralty really did not exist, because, as a fact, the whole of the management of these transports was exclusively in the hands of the Admiralty. The only difficulty would be to get a return of the number of Catholics going in a particular ship, and he could get that with the greatest ease from the War Office. He knew, of course, that a chaplain could not always be sent, because a draft might be ordered at the last moment, or a larger number of men than was expected might arrive; but they would all be satisfied if he would do his best for sending a Roman Catholic chaplain with a certain number. There were often very much smaller congregations than 250 persons in England very fully provided with religion. These five regular transports, too, were very well known, just as well known as any five parishes in London, and quite as much before the country. He therefore hoped something definite would be done in the matter.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The difficulty of my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty I take to be this—that this Question which is put to him he is unable to answer, because he speaks for his own local committee assisting in the direction of this College in Dublin. An experiment had been recently tried which, he ventured to think, would be successful. The Museum of Science, in which his hon. Friend the Member for Dublin had taken very great interest, had a system which he hoped might be made available to the College of Science and Art; and, at any rate, he did hope that some assurance would be given that this matter should be carefully considered.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR believed there was an anxiety for inquiry in regard to this institution, because it was a very unfortunate thing that a distinguished Professor of Science, who had succeeded in establishing a system of laboratory instruction such as no other Professor had, as yet, succeeded in establishing in Dublin—a man whose work was of great importance to the progress of chemistry and the industrial arts—should, after 23 years' of service, be suddenly dismissed, although he was, at that very time, enjoying the confidence of the people of Ireland, and was teaching, and had previously taught, a great many important pupils. It was clear to him, therefore, that there must be something wrong in the discipline of this institution, and he hoped the noble Lord would not only look into that, but would consider whether Professor Galloway had not been very hardly treated.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, that there was much in the speech of the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Errington) with which he could agree. Originally, as he had shortly and clearly pointed out, the Commission appointed to inquire into the matter made certain specific recommendations, among which was one that it would not be desirable to set up in Ireland a Science and Art Department distinctly separate from South Kensington, as, if that were done, Irish students would be shut out from the larger competitions and the prizes now open to them. His noble Friend who preceded him in Office, the present First Lord of the Admiralty, and the Secretary of State for the Colonies, met in Dublin on this matter, and held a consultation with the Royal Dublin Society, in order to see how the recommendations of that Commission could best be carried out. At the present time, there were a very considerable number of institutions connected with the Science and Art Department in Ireland. He did not think it was a very good arrangement that the Department in London should have the regulating of every minute detail of all these institutions; but, at the same time, it was not easy to suggest the sort of local authority which should be set up. He quite agreed that the case of Professor Galloway was a very sad one, and it was with very great reluctance that he came to the conclusion that it was necessary to dispense with his services. If that step had not been taken, he believed the efficiency, if not the very existence, of the College would have been imperilled. He proposed, presently, to go personally to Ireland to see the various Educational Bodies and Colleges there, and, in consultation with his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, to endeavour to see if some local authority could not be set up which would deal with these administrative details. The chief control must, of course, remain at South Kensington, in order to prevent a separate system being set up; but these and other points he would undertake to look into during the Recess, in order to see what could be done in the matter.

MR. BIGGAR thought this question would require very considerable discussion, and as it was a very late hour he would move to report Progress. He heard the speech of the noble Lord opposite (Lord George Hamilton), and he would undertake to say not a single Member on that side of the House had any idea of what it was all about. There were several points he wished to raise on this Vote, especially in regard to the new system of management of the Dublin Society, which had never yet been explained. They also wished to know something about the management of the Royal College, and as it was then half-past 1 it was unreasonable to ask them to sit any longer, more especially as they had to meet at 12 the next day. They had, therefore, only 10 hours in which to get whatever sleep they were to have, and it was very unreasonable to ask them to go on.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Biggar.)

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON hoped the Motion would not be pressed. As to the Royal Dublin Society, the arrangements made were set forth in detail some years ago, when a Bill on the subject passed through Parliament, and he should be very happy to lay before the House any Papers giving any further information as to the other points. With regard to the College of Science and Art, as he had already stated, between now and next year he would undertake there should be a full inquiry into the matter, with a view of trying to settle the whole question.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY regretted they had not had a fuller statement as to the relations between South Kensington and Dublin. The Science and Art Department had done good work in this country, and, perhaps, if it were represented in Ireland by local institutions, it would succeed there; but, certainly, up to the present time, it had not succeeded. Yet there was a vast amount of public money expended through that Department in Ireland, and, for the sake of the taxpayers, he thought it would be desirable to discuss the matter. As to the promises to do something in the course of 12 months, he did not look forward to that with much hope. They had had three or four Commissions dealing with this question; and now the noble Lord opposite (Lord George Hamilton), after being at the head of the Department for some time, was unable to tell them what plans had been settled. The Royal College had been going back for eight or ten years, and they could not allow another year to go by without something being done. They were expending £7,000 a-year upon it, and they could not permit it to dwindle to nothing without some protest. In England, there were Schools of Art all over the country, under the control of South Kensington, and they were doing a very great work; but in Ireland they had not felt the benefit which had resulted from them in this country. He thought they would not be justified, without further discussion, in passing the Vote. An immensity of public money was being spent in Ireland for nothing—"Oh, oh!"—and it would take more than the inarticulate sounds from the hon. and gallant Admiral opposite (Sir William Edmonstone) to make him forego his right to see that public money was properly spent, and that great institutions were properly managed. He thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Biggar) was quite right in insisting upon his Motion, for at that hour there were no reporters present to tell the people of Ireland what was being done in this matter. He believed they took the very greatest interest in it. There was no subject upon which he received more communications than upon the gross mis-management of all the institutions which existed in Ireland under the patronage of South Kensington.

MR. GRAY sincerely trusted that the Motion to report Progress would be persevered in, for this matter ought to be fully discussed at a time when the Irish people would be likely to know something of the result, especially as the greatest discontent existed all throughout Ireland with the management of South Kensington. Art work in Ireland had been strangled by South Kensington. The noble Lord had said that propositions for improvement had been shadowed forth two years ago. He could only reply that those propositions were just as shadowy to-day. The original Commission suggested that there should be in Ireland a Science and Art Department, sister to, but not subordinate to, South Kensington. That which was a really proper foundation for the scheme was overridden, and it was determined in London that the Irish Department should be a merely subordinate institution to South Kensington. The Royal Dublin Society allowed themselves to be entangled in that scheme, and ever since they had deeply regretted that they had ever become connected with South Kensington at all. So much alarm had been excited by the way in which they had been treated, that the Royal Agricultural Society had come to the conclusion to have nothing to do with a scheme of amalgamation at all. Another plan was to disturb one of the prettiest spots in Dublin by the erection of some buildings in connection with this proposed new institution. But though South Kensington was determined to have this ground, the people of Ireland were determined they should not, and, as far as he could ascertain, there was a great deal of well-founded discontent as to the management of their affairs by South Kensington. He knew, at any rate, there was much discontent at the treatment of Professor Galloway. There was nothing unreasonable in asking that the Vote should be postponed, especially as the people of Dublin were determined to secure that this matter should be dealt with in a satisfactory way.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, hon. Gentlemen were under some misconception as to this Vote; but if there were a wish that the discussion should be more full than was possible at that hour, of course, he would postpone it. There were several Votes, however, now before the Committee, and he hoped hon. Members would consent to take them.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY hoped, when they came down next day, the noble Lord would be able to tell them something about the constitution of the Royal Dublin College. It was not enough to put down a Motion on the Paper on the subject, for that gave no opportunity for discussing all the pros and cons of the affair, while a word from him would enable them to see exactly how the matter stood.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the Motion to report Progress would be withdrawn. He did not know whether there would be any opposition to taking the Vote for the British Museum, especially as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Spencer Walpole) had been waiting there all the evening for it.

MR. WHITWELL thought they might take that Vote, but he hoped no others would be asked for.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he wished to make a statement in reference to the British Museum, and he had a Notice on the Paper on the subject; but he should have no objection to make that statement on the Report, if the Government would undertake to take it at a time which would make it possible for him to do so.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would ask leave to withdraw his Motion, on the understanding that the Vote was postponed, and that only the British Museum Vote was taken.

MR. PARNELL asked, if the Government would say if they would not take another Vote? If he (Mr. Parnell) and his hon. Friends understood that they were only going to take the British Museum Vote they would like to go home.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Yes.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Whereupon Motion made and Question proposed,

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House will resolve itself into the said Committee upon Tuesday next, at Two of the clock."

MR. COURTNEY said, he wished very much to oppose this 2 o'clock Sitting. It was quite true that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made a suggestion on the previous day, that it might be convenient to have an Afternoon Sitting and to resume at 9 o'clock; but no other announcement was made, and he was not aware anything had been done since, in pursuance of that hint till this Motion, although, he believed, something had been said to several hon. Members privately. On the subject of the convenience of a day debate, he was very much in favour of a continuous Sitting; and he begged to propose as an Amendment, that the words "at 2 o'clock" be omitted.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "at Two of the clock."—(Mr. Courtney.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'at Two of the clock' stand part of the Question."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied, that a suggestion was made that it was thought they would gain time in that way; and he believed, from what he had heard, that a great many hon. Members interested in the Bill would find it convenient to take a discussion on the Bill and the first series of Amendments moved on the Motion that the Chairman do leave the Chair in the Morning Sitting, and then they might be able to make progress in the Committee in the evening. He did not himself see any disadvantage in the arrangement. He thought it would be convenient to many hon. Members.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN suggested that as there was no opposition to the Bill it should be taken on the present occasion, as it could be run through in a few minutes, and he did not know when the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate expected a proper time for it to be reached, if it was not taken when an opportunity occurred like the present.

QUESTIONS.

MOROCCO.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If his attention has been called to a paragraph in the letter of the Paris Correspondent of the "Times," dated the 31st ult. which appeared in that paper of yesterday, which states "that the British Government has for a year been helping the Sultan of Morocco to prepare for a conflict with Spain;" and, whether there is any truth in such a statement?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: My attention has not been called to this cock-and-bull story, and I do not know to what it refers.

IRELAND—THE PHOENIX PARK. QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the evidence given, and the verdict returned, at the inquest held on the remains of a man who was burnt to death on the night of Saturday, the 19th of July, at Black Horse Lane, Phoenix Park, to the effect, that though the police on duty in the park noticed the flames, and were within a few yards of the place, yet they could not render any assistance, for the simple reason that the turnstiles leading from the park to Black Horse Lane were locked, and the police had to go round a long distance, which caused them to be too late to save either life or property; and, whether these turnstiles, two in number, have been recently locked at nightfall by order of the Board of Works, Ireland, though a public passage has existed there for the last fifty years, and though there are three other turnstiles in the park boundary which are never locked; and, if so, under what representations and by what authority the Board of Works, Ireland, have taken upon themselves, under the circumstances, to lock out the people of Black Horse Lane from assistance in such an emergency?

MR. J. LOWTHER: It appears that in the case referred to by the hon. Member, supposing some assistance could have been obtained it would have been useless, as the unfortunate man was in a state of intoxication, and must have been suffocated immediately. With regard to the locking of the turnstiles, that practice was adopted in 1876 in consequence of representations to the Board with regard to scenes of disorder in that portion of the Park. It is believed that no substantial inconvenience arose from the arrangement, as all the other turnstiles remained open. The legality of the action of the Board is beyond question, and the general opinion seems to be in favour of it. With regard to persons being prevented from rendering assistance in an emergency, I may state that the police had no difficulty in scaling the wall, and no inconvenience in that respect can be occasioned to the public.

MR. CALLAN: I beg to give Notice that on Monday I shall move for a Return of the convictions for disorderly conduct in the district on the complaint of the police during the three years before and after 1876.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I have not spoken of convictions, but of scenes of indecency and disorder in that portion of the Park.

MR. CALLAN: Then I shall move for a Return of the Reports made by the police as to those alleged scenes of an indecent and disorderly character; because if such scenes are allowed to pass without conviction it reflects on the conduct of the Metropolitan Police.

IRELAND—CHARGE AGAINST AN OFFICER OF THE ROYAL IRISH CON- STABULARY.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN: I wish to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is a fact that the County Inspector of Constabulary, County Tyrone, has had lodged with him a complaint against a sub-inspector in his county, who, it is alleged, on the night of the 11th July, while under the influence of intoxicating liquor, broke into the house of a peaceful inhabitant, and, with revolver in hand, created terror and alarm to the inmates, whereupon he had to be removed by force; if it is a fact that the County Inspector has neglected and refused to hold any inquiry into this grave charge; and if he will promise an investigation into the conduct of the sub-inspector in question?

MR. J. LOWTHER: I must say I concur in the view of the Inspector General that a strong case has been made out for an investigation of what appears to be, not merely a serious breach of discipline, but something more. I am not aware that any proceedings are now pending before the Law Courts; but until it is clear whether such proceedings will or will not be taken it is undesirable that the matter should be discussed, or that it should be prejudged by any inquiry of the Constabulary authorities. I hope the subject will be inquired into in the manner that will best conduce to eliciting the truth. It is right I should add that the officer in question distinctly denies the charge made against him.

EXPIRING LAWS CONTINUANCE BILL. QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN: Will the Secretary to the Treasury be good enough to produce the list of the expiring laws which he proposes to renew in the usual Expiring Laws Continuance Bill? Heretofore it has been the practice to keep the House in ignorance of the names of these Bills until the measure comes on for second reading, and that has been found to be a most objectionable course.

MR. CALLAN: It will also be desirable to state if there is to be included in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill any Irish Coercion Acts, or Peace Preservation Acts, or any measure having reference to corrupt practices at elections.

MR. J. LOWTHER: There will not be in the Bill which the Secretary to the Treasury proposes to move any reference to Bills of the nature described by the hon. Member for Dundalk.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: I have sent over to the Office for a list of the Acts which it is proposed to renew, and later in the present Sitting I will show the hon. and gallant Member what that list includes. With respect to corrupt practices at elections, I shall not propose to renew any statutes bearing on that subject, the Government considering it to be more desirable to introduce a separate measure dealing with it.

SUPPLY — THE SCOTCH AND IRISH UNIVERSITIES VOTE.—QUESTION.

MR. A. MOORE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he would postpone Vote 10 of the Civil Service Estimates, which was the Vote for the Scotch Universities, and was likely to give rise to a good deal of discussion? If the right hon. Gentleman would agree that it should not be taken this afternoon, but postponed to a later day, he thought it would suit the convenience of the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I believe it is proposed to proceed with the Vote to-day. It is too late in the Session now to consent to the postponement of Votes, and I think it is quite reasonable that we should take it.

MR. A. MOORE moved the adjournment of the House in order to protest against taking the Vote this afternoon. He said the House was quite aware that it was the attitude of the Scotch Members which had almost entirely deferred the settlement of University Education in Ireland for another year, and he certainly could not allow them at this time of the Session to throw out a Bill which was brought in for the benefit of the Irish people, and, at the same time, to obtain for themselves all that they desired for the advantage of their own system of education. It was most unjust, he thought, that the Scotch Members, whilst they were obtaining for themselves all they desired, should persistently oppose the extension of similar advantages to Ireland. Under those circumstances, he could be no party to any Supply being voted for University purposes in Scotland. He hoped the Government would not force the Irish Members to take the course of opposing the Vote that day. It would be better that they should undertake the consideration of those Votes upon which there was not such a strong feeling, and that they should postpone this Vote until a future day. If the Government were obstructed in obtaining Supply through persisting in taking this Vote, the fault would rest with the Scotch Members, who were hampering the Government by their opposition to the Irish Bill.

MR. BIGGAR seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. A. Moore.)

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR pointed out that the object of the hon. Member was not against the Estimates being taken that day, but against Supply being taken at all for the Scotch Universities. If anything was to be said against Scotch Universities, Scotch Members would be glad to hear it, and to discuss the objection. If the hon. Member said that all Scotch Members opposed the solution of the Irish University Question—"Not all."—he would at least give him (Mr. Lyon Playfair) credit, as a Member for a Scotch University, for avoiding opposition to increased facilities being granted to higher education in Ireland. He believed that increased facilities were required; and when the matter came to be discussed he would be willing to consider what means could be taken for that purpose. Although there were many persons who held strong feelings against secular education being given in Colleges under a religious superintendence, these were not shared by the Scotch Universities. He hoped hon. Members would think it desirable to give these Votes to Scotland, and he would be glad to answer any legitimate objection that might be brought forward.

MR. PARNELL said, the Irish Members did not desire to make this a contest between the Irish Universities and the Scotch Universities, unless they were forced to do so. What they complained of was, that the Government had put down a Vote for the Scotch Universities in reference to which Notice had been given by the Irish Members that it might be made a matter for serious opposition. Yet they proposed to take it now, only a day before the University Education (Ireland) Bill of the Government was to be brought forward for discussion. He thought the action of the Government in putting this Vote down was calculated to complicate matters very much indeed; because, if this Vote came on, the Irish Members would be bound to oppose it, and they would then incur the imputation—to use the words of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lyon Playfair)—of making it a question between Scotch education and Irish education. Now, they did not desire to do that, if they could possibly avoid it. The Irish people asked for nothing in the matter of education beyond equality; of course, they knew perfectly well that this Parliament would not consent to give the Irish Roman Catholic absolute equality in the matter of education, but he thought some attempt ought to be made to approach it. They could bring about equality in two ways, either by levelling up or by levelling down.

MR. SPEAKER pointed out that any discussion on the matter of University Education in Ireland, until they went into Committee on the Bill that was already before the House, would be irregular.

MR. PARNELL said, of course, he did not wish to discuss that question, as it was to come forward on another day; but he merely pointed out the course of action which must necessarily be taken by the Irish Members. If the Government persisted in their attempt to bring on the Scotch University Vote to-day, it must result in very great complication; and he should have thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself would not wish to bring on a matter at a Saturday Sitting which would involve unnecessary delay. In all probability, there would be no trouble whatever if the right hon. Gentleman waited a few days before bringing on the Vote.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the object of meeting to-day, which, of course, was inconvenient to many Members, was really to make progress with Supply, and among these there was a good supply of Business of a non-contentious character. The Government had no desire to impart into the proceedings of a Saturday any of those great controversies that had been shadowed forth; and if they were allowed to proceed with the Votes to which there was not much opposition, they would be prepared to take the Scotch University Vote at a later day. At the same time, he apprehended there would be no objection to take the Scotch Education Vote. The Universities Vote might be taken when they came to the Queen's Colleges Vote.

MR. A. MOORE said, under the circumstances, he had great pleasure in withdrawing the Motion.

MR. RAMSAY said, before the Motion was withdrawn, he wished to corroborate what had been said by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) as to the opinion of the Scotch Universities. At the same time, if there was any item in the Estimate for Scotch University Education which was considered objectionable, the majority of the Scotch Members would be willing to have the Vote reduced, and especially by the amount proposed to be voted for Theological Chairs. It was not desirable that they should come to a decision upon this question on a false issue; and he wished Irish Members to understand that there was by no means a unanimous opposition on the part of Scotch Members.

MAJOR NOLAN said, the Irish Members had no objection to the endowment of Theological Chairs in the Scotch Universities. Everyone knew that the

Mr. Lyon Playfair

Scotch people were well acquainted with theology, and that their Theological Chairs were of the greatest value. All the Irish people wanted was that similar benefits should be extended to Ireland. It was not likely that any war would be waged between Ireland and Scotland on that account.

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, Progress was moved on this Vote the previous evening, in order that he might make some statement as to the exact position of the arrangements contemplated under the Act passed two years ago in reference to the proposed Art and Science Museum in Dublin. In a very few words he would give the Committee a statement, which, he thought, would be of a satisfactory kind, of the progress made during the past year. All who took an interest in the matter were aware that the proposition made by Government in 1876 referred to two distinct and separate objects. First, there was a transfer to the Government of the teaching functions of the Royal Dublin Society in order that greater opportunity might be given to Irish students and teachers to acquire a knowledge of science and art, subsequently to be imparted in the various schools of Science and Art in which they might be engaged; and the second was to concentrate all the Science and Art Institutions established in Dublin in one building, and to create a Science and Art Museum worthy of Dublin on the site occupied by the Royal Dublin Society in Kildare

Street. Last year he submitted an increased Estimate of £4,000 for the purpose of giving increased instruction to the Art School, which had then been transferred from the Royal Dublin Society. That Vote passed. He wished to enlarge that Art School, and that was a part of the question which brought him directly to the other point—the erection of the Science and Art Museum upon the ground occupied by the premises of the Royal Dublin Society in Kildare Street at Leicester House. There was but one site upon which it was possible to build a Science and Art Museum, and that was at Kildare Street. A strong objection was raised to the erection of a Museum on part of that site, and the proprietor, by his lease, had a certain power of preventing anything of that kind, if he objected to it. The only other spot on which it was possible for the Government to build was on certain land in the occupation of the Royal Dublin Society, utilized by them for the purpose of holding agricultural shows. By an agreement which the Government made with them the year previous, the Government undertook to allow either the Royal Dublin Society to hold their agricultural shows in those premises, or to provide them a place with equal facilities for holding shows; and also to take into account any loss the Society might sustain in consequence of such removal. The whole matter hinged on that proposal. Until they had the space upon which to build it was not possible for the Government to bring in an Estimate, or to concentrate the various institutions in Leinster House, Kildare Street. They were anxious to come to an arrangement with the Royal Dublin Society for the transfer of the ground upon which the Agricultural Show was held, and they offered £20,000 for compensation; and they also understood that arrangements were being made with Lord Pembroke by which the Society would secure some 16 acres in another part of Dublin for the purposes of their show. Well, the Royal Dublin Society were not quite satisfied with that offer, although he was bound to say he thought it a very fair one. They wanted a larger sum; and as he was most desirous to bring this matter to a successful conclusion he consulted his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, and agreed to give them £25,000.

Mr. PARNELL asked the noble Lord to say what it was to be given for? Was it merely for the site of the proposed Science and Art Museum, or was it in compensation for all the property of the Royal Dublin Society to be taken by the Government?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that £10,000 had been paid to the Royal Dublin Society for their proprietary rights; but the £25,000 he was speaking of was compensation for the transfer of their agricultural section to some place other than Leinster House; and this £25,000 was divided into two portions. The first portion was calculated to be sufficient to enable them to erect the necessary buildings elsewhere; and the other part was to compensate them for holding their meetings in a place where, perhaps, the receipts would not be so large. The sum was quite distinct from the compensation offered for the proprietary rights of the Royal Dublin Society, for that was contained in the Act of Parliament, and was paid as soon as the Act was passed. The Royal Dublin Society assented to this offer of £25,000, with the exception that they said that they must continue their offices on that site. He pointed out to them that it could not be; that if they got the compensation they could not stop in their offices. After very considerable difficulty he got the Treasury to assent to another concession, which was, that arrangements should be made, costing £300, by which temporary accommodation should be given to the Royal Dublin Society for their agricultural section until the offices were ready. There was a considerable correspondence between his Office and the Royal Dublin Society on this subject; and a good many matters not germane to the subject were introduced, and the proceedings were very protracted and slow. A Vote of £10,000 was moved last year for the Royal Dublin Society; but as he could not get them to come to any satisfactory conclusion before the commencement of the present financial year, therefore it was not possible to introduce the Vote before. He thought, however, it was of so much importance that some conclusion should be arrived at, because everything at present was hung up, that at last he was obliged to hint to the Royal Dublin Society that the Government had power, under the Act, if they could not agree with them, to take the site, on the condition that they provided accommodation for them equal to that which had been taken. By that course the Government would take the matter entirely into their own hands. He suggested to them, at the same time, that it would be most desirable, if possible, that they should come to some amicable arrangement, and that he would be only too glad if they would appoint a deputation to come over to London and see the Lord President and himself, with a view to an amicable arrangement. As he had said, £25,000 was to be given to them, in order to enable them to hold their shows elsewhere, and the Government to obtain possession of the land they wanted. It was now necessary to come to some definite arrangement, for if they had not, they might have spent a large sum in erecting a Government building on the land, the title to which was questionable; and after the Government had spent it the Royal Dublin Society might have claimed compensation for the buildings. He did not say it would have happened; but, of course, they were bound to contemplate any possible contingency. Therefore, having arrived at this settlement, they hastened to put it into a legal agreement, and that document was now before the Royal Dublin Society for their signature. When it was signed, that, and all the correspondence, would be presented to the House in a Parliamentary Return. He had been obliged to state these matters at length, and he hoped he had made the matter clear, and the result would be considered satisfactory. They could now proceed with the building, and when completed they could transfer the various art and science collections to the new site. They could enlarge the Art School, and, in fact, by developing the whole scheme, make it worthy of the City of Dublin. The question of site, of course, was one to which they must, to a great extent, be guided by local considerations.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY: Before the noble Lord enters upon the question of site, will he say, in reference to the transfer of collections, that the Royal Irish Academy collection will be brought in with the others?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON replied, that the arrangements were stated in the Report of last year issued to Parliament, and there was a long correspondence between his noble Friend and the Royal Irish Academy. The proposition was that the collection should be ultimately transferred to Kildare Street. That was at present in perspective, because it would not be possible to transfer the Royal Academy until they had obtained the necessary buildings for its accommodation. As regarded the question of site, as he said before, that was a matter upon which they had, to a very considerable extent, to be guided by local considerations. Under the Act, a certain number of Visitors were to be nominated, and they were to annually report to the Science and Art Department on the condition of the management, and of the requirements of the Museum, and to advise on points of administration. Their functions were mainly in relation to the Science and Art Museum; but that Museum could not be commenced until the site had been selected. At present, those gentlemen who had been nominated had little or nothing to do; but the Department thought their opinion would be very valuable as to the site; therefore, it proposed that the first question referred to their consideration, in order that the Science and Art Department might have the benefit of their advice, should be the site on which to erect this Museum. If they could, as he hoped they would, in the course of next year, greatly develop the scheme laid before Parliament, and, at the same time, could also increase the accommodation and more thoroughly utilize the College of Science, he thought a great deal would have been done towards improving science and art instruction in Ireland. Not much had been done at present; but, still, the Report which had just reached him in regard to certain institutions in Ireland was not unsatisfactory. There had been a considerable increase to the books in the National Library, and there had also been considerable additions made to the Natural History Museum, which was part of the collection already at Leinster House. He was glad to find, also, the number of visitors during the past year was 20,000 more than the last year. He hoped he had given the Committee satisfactory evidence of the wish and the intention of the Department to push on as fast as it could the scheme which for some time past had been under consideration, and which had been embodied in an Act of Parliament. If hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in this matter would only co-operate, he hoped, in a very short time, they would have made such substantial progress as to show that they were in earnest in beginning to make the Science and Art Department worthy of Ireland.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that he looked forward with great pleasure to the advantage which would accrue to Dublin from the establishment of the new Museum and School of Science and Art. But in England and Scotland there were various Schools of Science and Art in different large towns, as well as at South Kensington. There was nothing of the sort in Ireland. He believed that a central School—such as that projected by the noble Lord—would be calculated not only to promote art education in Dublin, but in the whole country. The noble Lord had informed him that it was proposed to appoint Visitors to perform certain rather indefinite duties in connection with the Museum. He would suggest that to make the Institution really useful, and a real College of Science and Art in Dublin, he should take care to avoid the causes of the decadence of the present Royal College of Science. The Visitors should have definite duties to perform which should be pointed out to them. They should not be left to discharge mere indefinite duties; but should have certain allotted disciplinary functions. He was not one who wished the School of Science and Art at Dublin to be distinct from South Kensington. It was highly desirable that Ireland should enter into competition with Great Britain; and, of course, if the national taste were cultivated, there could be a common competition between the three countries among the students of the different nationalities. But in order to obtain that they must put a soul into the Irish Institutions. They must have the government in Dublin which could deal with difficulties as they arose; they must not be dependent upon communications between the Secretary at Dublin and the officials at South Kensington. The noble Lord would not secure a proper and adequate system of art education in Ireland, and would not enable the new Institution in Dublin to work harmoniously with South Kensington, unless he gave a proper and due responsibility to the Visitors of the College at Dublin. With respect to the Royal College of Science at Dublin, it was admitted that it was not at present in a satisfactory condition. The case put forward by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Errington) had not been attempted to be controverted. Twenty years ago, when that Institution was under local control, it flourished; but when it ceased to be under local control, and fell under the dominion of South Kensington, and South Kensington refused to constitute there any delegated or deputed body with local control to carry out the arrangements of the Institution, it steadily deteriorated. South Kensington appointed a Secretary and a Council, composed of Professors, who were only given indefinite functions and a most unsatisfactory power for the management of details. No rules were set forth by South Kensington by which that extraordinary local Council of Professors were to act, and they were completely at sea. The result was that those gentlemen fought amongst themselves with regard to their duties and the arrangement of the Institution. One Professor, a gentleman of very great merit, was sacrificed to the Institution in those squabbles. His services might have been saved to the Royal College if the maintenance of discipline had been intrusted to a local body. He should like to know what amount of local government the noble Lord proposed to grant to the new Institution? He did trust that the noble Lord would take an early opportunity of interesting himself personally in the management of the new Institution, and would give adequate and mature consideration to its future arrangements. It had lately been announced that a Commission would sit to inquire into the Endowed Schools in Dublin. He would direct the attention of the noble Lord to the very excellent work done, and the admirable discipline maintained, by the unpaid Trustees now appointed to manage the educational and charitable Institutions of Dublin. It might be necessary to have an official to maintain discipline; but he thought that the arrangements should be under the direction of unpaid Trustees. A Secretary was at present employed in the management of those Institutions, but his duties were limited, and he was subordinate to the Trustees. If the noble Lord would make inquiries, he would be able to find many professional and private gentlemen in Dublin from whom he would be able to select a body who would be well able to manage the new School of Science and Art. But whatever body the noble Lord might select, he would urge upon him the necessity of giving them definite administrative duties. Those duties should be clearly fixed, for unless that were done no real substantial control would be possible. Although subordinate to South Kensington, the Trustees should have local authority. By those means they would avoid the causes which led to the failure of the Royal College of Science. He thought that hon. Members for Ireland would agree with him that the Government deserved their thanks for having given them a central and local School of Science and Art in Dublin. He hoped that it would be made a worthy successor of the Royal College of Science, which in past times had done good service to Ireland.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, that before the Vote passed he should like to say a word or two in regard to this College of Science. Unfortunately, from some cause or other, its discipline had been exceedingly unsatisfactory. One reason of that, he thought, was that they had a Secretary who was made the medium of communication between the College and the Department in London, whose interest was between the two bodies, and who was not in a well-defined position of responsibility. Sometimes he acted as a superior, at other times he denied possession of powers, and referred everything to London. He only ventured to throw out to the noble Lord that an Institution of this kind scarcely justified a Directorate having nothing to do. But he would suggest the example of Owen's College, Manchester, where a Professor was also the responsible principal. The combination of offices might improve discipline. He wished to add, repeating what he had formerly said, that a great misfortune had been sustained by the dismissal of a Professor who certainly had been of great benefit to Ireland in establishing a practical School of Chemistry in the country.

Mr. O'Shaughnessy

MR. GRAY said, he did not understand the noble Lord to inform the Committee as to what the nature or the amount of local control was that was to be given to the Science and Art Department, Dublin. Some further control was to be given to the Museum, and he thought the Irish Members would be pleased to know what amount of local control it was contemplated to give. A large number of gentlemen of high position and of great intelligence devoted themselves, without any pecuniary reward, to the promotion of the interests of the educational and charitable Institutions in Dublin, and contributed to give them a healthy local life. They did not want to have a similar experience with regard to the new College as they had already had in the case of the Royal College of Science. If the same plan were followed as in that College the same result would ensue. He did not understand the noble Lord to sketch out what was the amount or the nature of the control he was willing to give, and he thought it would be satisfactory if the noble Lord would give them some idea of the arrangement that was made with the Royal Dublin Society. The offer of £25,000 was not accepted; but when he announced that the compulsory powers under the Act would be put into operation then the terms were, of necessity, accepted. He thought they had not been treated in a way in which they had a right to expect, and he thought the evidence that had been given was scarcely satisfactory; and he might mention that a private meeting was held with respect to the operation of the original scheme with the new Society, and the new arrangement in contemplation, for which the £25,000 was given, and they came to the conclusion, it would be better to have as little to do with South Kensington as possible. What he was anxious for was to elicit some assurance that the noble Lord would endeavour to give as much local control as might be compatible with the working of the Institution. He wished to ask one question with reference to the Vote. The late Irish sculptor—Mr. Foley—bequeathed all his models to the Royal Dublin Society, and he was anxious to ascertain where those models now were, and what their ultimate destination might be? It had been suggested that a large quantity of the collection would be kept at South Kensington. Now, the importance and value of a collection of that kind was to have it in its entirety; and he thought it would be a very serious loss to Dublin and Ireland generally if Mr. Foley's bequest were not carried out in its entirety.

MR. SULLIVAN hoped the Government would carry out the promise made by Mr. Ward Hunt in 1868. That right hon. Gentleman, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, said that the Government was most anxious to give Ireland national institutions of that character, on a basis which he stated at the time. Unfortunately, the Government went back, and re-considered their determination, and nothing was done, though a Commission was appointed to inquire into the matter, and see what could be done. He must confess, with very great regret, that the Report of the Commission of Inquiry had had the result of changing the promise which the Government had made, and had entirely destroyed their hope of getting those Institutions. Under those circumstances, he had been requested, by many gentlemen who had taken an interest in the matter in Dublin, to bring it before Parliament four years ago. He did so, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that the subject would be taken up very much in the spirit of Mr. Ward Hunt's promise to the Irish people. The right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) was then the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and he took the matter in hand, and after a great deal of time a scheme was proposed. Without being unduly impressed with the importance of his own views, he would urge upon the noble Lord who had charge of the Department the three points which he had previously urged upon the Irish Chief Secretary as being essential to the success of the scheme. The first point was that the control of the Irish Institution should be vested in a Board or Committee of Irish noblemen and gentlemen in Dublin, and that it should be in harmony with the national sympathies of the population, which no subordinate section of the South Kensington system could well be. The second point was, that the system should be in co-operation and in connection with South Kensington, in order to secure uniformity between the Irish Institutions and South Kensington, and to give the students of science and art as great opportunities as possible for study and competition. Therefore, he was strongly of opinion that a Departmental Institution should be in connection and in co-operation with the South Kensington Museum, without any subordination or subjection to it as a mere branch of that Institution. The third point which he would suggest was, that the noble Lord should endeavour not to amalgamate, but to confederate, the three or four kindred Institutions—the Royal Dublin Society, the Royal Irish Academy, and the Royal Hibernian Academy. He protested against any attempt forcibly to amalgamate those Institutions; but he hoped that they would be brought into a sort of confederate action. He was sure that any attempt to force amalgamation upon those Institutions would be resisted by them, and that the attempt would fail. An attempt had been made, despite his remonstrances, to amalgamate some of those Institutions; and he believed that the noble Lord would admit that the failure which he had predicted had resulted. Those Societies resisted being put into a mortar and made into one amalgam at once. If different methods had been adopted, voluntary fusion, no doubt, would in time have followed. He was sorry that the Government had decided not to make the Irish National Museum of Science and Industry self-governing, but that it was to be placed entirely under South Kensington. There was a strong feeling amongst officials at South Kensington that the new Museum at Dublin should be subordinate to them; and their views seemed to have more weight with the Government than those of hon. Members from Ireland. He did not think that the views of those officials were always broad and national, and calculated to forward the interests of science and art, but partook very largely of number one. Officialism seemed to have very great weight with the Government. If they were only to have Visitors in Dublin to look in occasionally at the Science and Art Museum, and were to have no control, gentlemen in Dublin would soon cease to take an interest in the Institution. He might remind the noble Lord that 10 or 20 of the nobility and gentry in Ireland had certainly done very much to forward the interests of art matters in that country for the last 20 years. None of those gentlemen would continue the work they had undertaken if made entirely subordinate to South Kensington—it would be derogatory to their position. If the noble Lord did succeed in getting a Board at first, yet, under such a system, it would break down in a year or two. They would find that, like another great Institution in Dublin, the new College would become a mere corpse. On St. Stephen's Green they had a Museum of Irish industry which cost that country a large sum of money; it was excellent in its way, but they had large collections unvisited, and a Professor lecturing to empty benches. They would do no good with any National Institution in Dublin for the purpose of bringing home technical education in science and art to the people, unless local influence was to have some weight there. He would strongly urge upon the noble Lord, if he desired to give Ireland an Institution which would be thoroughly successful, he should put it under the control of a local board of Irish noblemen and gentlemen with real power to govern it. They had the Marquess of Kildare, Lord Powerscourt, the Duke of Leinster, and other noblemen and gentlemen who, at the cost of their own fortunes, for 20 years past had brought home technical science and art education to the Irish people. He would appeal to the Government to place the new Institution under the care of such noblemen and gentlemen as those, and it would then become a living reality; whereas, if they attempted to work it as a mere branch of South Kensington, it would never be a National Institution, and would fail entirely to produce any satisfactory results.

Mr. PARNELL hoped that the noble Lord would take to heart the speech which had just been delivered by the hon. and learned Member for Louth, and would endeavour to make the management of the proposed Museum of Science and Art as local as he possibly could. He observed that the scheme of the Government proposed that there should be local Visitors; but they knew that local Visitors were only sent there in order to strengthen the central authority, and to give an idea of responsibility where none such existed. They would be local Visitors without duties and without powers. If they merely appointed Visitors without responsible duties and powers, they would have an empty Board of Visitors, who would be entirely inefficient. Upon the other hand, if they gave the Visitors power and responsibility, they would make them take real interest in the life and interests of the Institution, and would encourage them to carry out efficiently whatever functions the Government might be disposed to give them. He regretted that the Government had not been able to place before them in better detail the scheme for the future management of the Museum. But, perhaps, what they said to-day might have some weight, and be of some little use as regarded the shape the scheme was to take. If the whole arrangements had not yet been matured, there was still time for the Government to re-consider their decision, and to see whether they could not establish some local body in place of the Royal Dublin Society. They still felt the greatest respect and reverence for that Institution, in remembrance of its connection in times past with their history; but that Society had deteriorated, and had not, in late years, held the proud position it once occupied; but, still, they looked up to the Royal Dublin Society as having been the pioneer of instruction in agriculture in Ireland. That Society was the first that taught the Irish farmers how to cultivate their farms to the best advantage, and it had done very much in encouraging them to thrift and industry. In the new Museum of Science and Art which they were about to establish, they should make a worthy successor of the old Dublin Society; but it would never be so unless it was to become a self-supporting and self-governing Institution. If it were to be a mere branch of South Kensington, the usefulness of that Institution would be cramped and confined; and it would never attain the great future which it would have before it under another and different system of management. He hoped that the noble Lord would give heed to the warnings that had been addressed to the Government, and that he would give as much local responsibility and power as he possibly could to those new Institutions.

MR. E. JENKINS had frequently asked that the Estimates should be presented to the House in such a form that they might be able properly to criticize the items. He wished hon. Members would take the trouble to contrast the Vote of £322,000 that was asked for, in respect of South Kensington, with the Vote that was made in respect of the British Museum. In the British Museum account the particulars of the grant were given in detail; but in the South Kensington account the details were very imperfect. They were not told the number of police employed, or how many Inspectors there were, or how much they were paid; they simply had in the Estimate for South Kensington the general statement that £9,150 was expended on the police. Such information as that did not enable the House to judge whether the employment of the police at South Kensington was judicious or not. He was sure that the noble Lord would feel that it was desirable that South Kensington should be brought within some rule. They had all heard of the celebrated Mr. Cole—he and his friends had been ordering about South Kensington for some years, and scattering the public money in all directions. He was sure that if a Committee of Inquiry of that House were to be appointed to inquire into the history of the expenditure of money at South Kensington, there would be disclosed a system, of which—not to use a harsh name—he could say that it was an expenditure such as had never been exhibited by any other Institution under Government in modern times. He wished to point out why he should move the reduction in the Vote. In the first place, it would be found that, under head D 5, the sum of £8,700 was voted on account of artizans, cleaners, labourers, &c.; on turning to the details of D 5, it would be seen that the amount was said to be for the “Wages for works executed in the interior of the Museum, in connection with the exhibition of objects, and repairs connected with the glass roofs, heating and ventilation, also maintenance of the grounds.”

He would venture to say that the same items were charged for under the head D 6, which was expressed to be for “heating, lighting, and precautions against fire.” The Estimates seemed to be prepared in a very careless manner, for, otherwise, it would seem that D 5 ought to be included in D 6. If the heating arrangements ought to be included in D 6, why did they find them in D 5? That was a conundrum which he would propose to the noble Lord. Then, an item of £7,000 was charged in respect of workmen, artisans, and engineers employed at South Kensington. That was a large sum of money for those persons, and he should like to know how many of each class were employed? Then they came to an item headed "Services common to the general divisions." It could not be for the Science and Art Department, for there was a certain staff for that; and for the South Kensington Department there was also a staff. But, in order to throw them off their guard still further—whether intended to do so or not he did not know, but that was the result—they found sprung upon them the head "Services common to the several divisions." Under that head the sum of £12,920 was expended, which was a large increase on the previous year. They had no information to enable them to judge whether that was a proper expenditure or not, or whether the number of persons employed was justifiable. He supposed that the money would be spent for the objects for which it was voted, or otherwise the Comptroller and Auditor General would notice the matter. What they wanted was to get something like the same careful return of expenditure as was given in the case of the British Museum, so that they might know why the enormous increase in the expenditure at South Kensington took place. He would draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that the expenditure for the police at the British Museum was only £1,960; whereas the expenditure for that item alone at South Kensington was £9,150. The British Museum was a pretty large building, and it had the peculiarity that it was not built with long corridors. It was nearly as large as the South Kensington Museum, and he believed there were many articles of value there. How was it, then, that the police alone in one place cost £1,960, and at the other £9,150? He should like to know whether that additional expense in the case of the South Kensington Museum arose from the India Museum? The more they looked at these Estimates the more they would find that a very large increase in the expenditure at South Kensington had been caused by the India Museum. He thought that it was quite right to draw attention to these Estimates, in order that they might receive satisfactory explanations with regard to them. He wanted to know why the police at South Kensington were increased? There was also one other little matter which had been mentioned to him, and which, he thought, ought to be explained from the Front Treasury Bench. He was told that the Curator or Chief Director of the South Kensington Museum had moved away from the Museum, and that police constables were kept for the purpose of going between South Kensington and his house in order to keep him in constant communication with the Museum, when he ought to be living close to or upon the premises. As the matter had been mentioned in the Press, he thought that some explanation of it was due to the Committee. In the first instance, he should like some explanation as to why the accounts were not presented in a clearer manner; and, secondly, he should like to know why the cost of the police had increased? He begged to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £20,608.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that with reference to the questions which had been put to him by various hon. Members from Ireland in reference to the new College of Science and Art in Dublin, he thought that hon. Gentlemen who were there on the previous night could bear testimony to the fact that, so far from expressing a wish to centralize the administration, he said that he was prepared to go over to Dublin that year in order to place himself in communication with the authorities, for the purpose of trying to constitute some authority which would relieve South Kensington from a constant interference in minute details of administration. For his part, he really thought that these matters would be better settled locally. But it was obvious that whatever Department was responsible to Parliament must have an officer representing it in that House. Some remarks had been made by hon. Members with respect to the Foley Collection. Almost all those works were plaster casts, and an enormous quantity of them were duplicates. The question was, what was to be done with those things? They were very anxious to keep the collection in its entirety; but it would have cost £3,000 or £4,000 to have removed the entire collection to Ireland, and to have placed it in a proper state of repair. Under these circumstances, it caused some little embarrassment to the Executors to know what to do with them, and the Government had consented to give £500 in order to make the necessary repairs, and to take over to Ireland the most essential and important parts of the collection. A committee of three gentlemen, one of whom was an Irishman, was appointed to superintend the work, and to select those casts which were most valuable. Those had been taken to Ireland. They would be glad if any local authority in Ireland, or any municipal authority, would make some offer to take a certain amount of the casts that remained, as they did not know what to do with them. There could be but one opinion that it was most advisable, on the part of the State, to encourage bequests of a really valuable character; but it would not be wise to lay down a rule that they would spend any sum of money in taking care of and repairing those bequests. They had accepted the bequest in the present instance in consequence of the eminence of Mr. Foley, and of the value that his studies would be to the students. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins), he was not aware that he had made out any case for a comparison between the British Museum and South Kensington. [MR. E. JENKINS: Between the accounts.] One Institution presented its accounts in one manner and the other in a different manner. It should be remembered that the British Museum, although a most important Institution, was not of an educational character. On the other hand, South Kensington was not only an educational but a teaching and examining Institution; and all its collections and treasures of works and arts were for the express purpose of teaching and encouraging science and art throughout the country. It was not possible even for the best accountant to place the accounts of South Kensington before the House in the same form as those relating to the British Museum. Anyone with experience of the work at South Kensington would corroborate him in the statement that the complicated nature and the variety of the work done would prevent the accounts being put before the House in the same form as those of the British Museum. The hon. Member requested some information concerning certain expenditure. The hon. Member would find that D 5 related to repairs connected with heating and ventilation, while D 6 was an Estimate of the actual cost of lighting, heating, &c. It was not an encouragement for them to give the additional information which the hon. Member desired, when he criticized the details they had given. As regarded the other point made by him as to the difference of the Vote for the police that year and the last year, that was, no doubt, a proper object of criticism. The increase in the Estimate arose from the fact that some of the police had had to be paid for extra time, owing to the late hours at which the Museum was kept open—that was also the reason for an increase in other branches of the Institution. The hon. Member had called attention to the difference in the Vote for the police at the British Museum and at South Kensington. The reason for that was very simple. At the British Museum all the watching was done by attendants; whereas, at South Kensington, they found it more economical to keep policemen on duty both inside and outside the building. Then the arrangements at the South Kensington building rendered the employment of a larger number of policemen necessary. Then, again, the inflammable nature of a large portion of the collection at South Kensington rendered it necessary to have it very well watched. Taking all those matters into consideration he did not think the Vote for the police at South Kensington was at all excessive. He would be glad to meet the views of the hon. Gentleman with regard to putting the accounts into a shape that everyone could understand them; and he thought that that could be best done in the direction of making them more compact. Some services were put generally in the Votes common to the divisions, because they could not be accurately assigned to either of the divisions of the Science and Art Department exclusively. He could assure the hon. Gentleman that he had personally gone over the Estimates both with regard to the amounts and objects of the Vote; and if the hon. Gentleman would only look at the enormous amount of work done by the Science and Art Department throughout England, Ireland, and Scotland, he did not think that he would consider that the expenditure had been great.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that with regard to the police at South Kensington, a portion of the expense was in respect of the buildings given up to the India Museum. It did seem to him that the charge for the police at South Kensington was very large. He would wish to suggest that there might be a more economical mode of watching the Institution than having regular police, who were enormously expensive. For every man who might be employed to watch the building they were obliged to employ three policemen at enormous expense. He hoped the noble Lord would devote his attention to the possibility of cutting that item of expense down. With regard to the general charges for the Museum, it seemed to him that those were not fixed regular charges that could be checked, but were in the nature of discretionary charges. He should like to know in whose discretion those charges were, and by whom they were checked? The noble Lord had said that he had personally checked them. He had no doubt whatever that the noble Lord brought his great financial abilities to bear on the subject; but the noble Lord had great public duties of various kinds to perform, and it was impossible for him to check the whole details of that great discretionary expenditure. He wished to know who was the person responsible for the checking of those details? Perhaps the head of the Department of the Museum was responsible for the expenditure. He did not think, if that were so, that it was a right system; because every man, however honest, was desirous of increasing the expenses of his own Department. If the expenditure could be put into the shape of fixed salaries, there ought to be some limit to the discretion used. It seemed to him that until the responsibility was put into the hands of professional men to deal with, it was not likely that any limit would be assigned to it, or that it would be properly checked.

MR. RYLANDS complained of the inconvenient form in which the accounts were arranged. If one wished to look at the estimated total expenditure, or the estimate of extra receipts, he would have to search through half-a-dozen pages, where would be found a number of little notes, in which certain information was given as to the amounts received for different purposes by the Department. For instance, on page 302, under the head of "Heating, lighting, and precautions against fire"—a most unlikely place to find anything about the Museum fees—it would be found that the fees for admission to lectures in September, 1878, amounted to £2,201 7s. 2d. Again, it would be observed that in several pages there were notes giving information as to the amount of money received in fees by the different lecturers and teachers. He thought it desirable that they should have an account showing at once the Estimate for expenditure and the Estimate of receipts from all sources, giving the fees for admission, fees for lectures, and for all other branches for which they were received. His reason for directing attention to this was the fact that some years ago there had been a great scandal in connection with the South Kensington Museum, owing to the laxity with which the accounts were kept. He would, therefore, wish it to be made perfectly clear that all the fees received for all purposes had been paid in and accounted for; and that where the officials had claims to these they should receive them by direct payment, and not by adding them to their accounts. Upon the occasion to which he had alluded, fees were paid to parties who did not give an accurate account of them. A fraud of considerable magnitude was committed, and the public lost a large sum of money entirely in consequence of the laxity in keeping the accounts of receipts for various purposes connected with the Department. He trusted, therefore, that he should receive a promise from the Government that, in future, the accounts for the South Kensington Museum would be brought before Parliament in the manner in which he asked that they should be presented.

MR. LOWTHIAN BELL said, the amount of wages paid to some individuals appeared rather high. But there was one item, in particular, about which he desired information. The gas foreman, whose salary was 50s. a-week, was charged, in page 302, at the sum of £143. That was clearly wrong; and he suggested that, at all events, those persons who had the framing of the Estimates ought to be correct in their arithmetic.

MR. E. JENKINS considered that the statement which had been made by the noble Lord was more satisfactory than any he had yet heard from the Front Bench opposite, and that, to a certain extent, it answered the strictures made with reference to the British Museum and South Kensington Museum. If the noble Lord would give his attention to the subject of the accounts, and endeavour to arrange them in future in such a manner that they might be criticized with more intelligence, he should be willing to withdraw his Motion for the reduction of the Vote.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that everything possible should be done to render the accounts clear in future.

MR. WHITWELL said, it would be found, by reference to E 1, page 302, that the persons who had prepared the Estimates gave the Committee little information. They were told, with reference to the School of Science and Art, that eight technical and special assistants formed an ingredient in this item of £7,400; but the charge for these eight individuals would not come to much more than £300, the balance, apparently, being made up by temporary clerks and copyists, at 10d. an hour, their number or salaries unspecified. The next page showed a sum of no less than £12,000 for wages classified under attendants from 2d. an hour and upwards. It appeared to him that, in ordinary Institutions, wages' accounts would not be presented in this miscellaneous form. Further, this indiscriminate mode of statement did not give the number of persons employed, as generally given in these Votes. He thought that more precise information should be given in future.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON suggested that the Committee should pass from the 2nd to the 9th Vote of the Class, the two subjects being more connected than the intervening Votes.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. RAMSAY said, he should not occupy much time; but felt that the arrangement, by which the Government had rendered it necessary that they should assemble in the House that day, at the end of the Session, to discuss a Vote of so much importance as that of Public Education in Scotland, was not creditable to their management of Public Business. He felt that no Vote passed in the House had greater importance than that which related to Education; and it, therefore, appeared to him that instead of going on, as the House had done, discussing Business of trifling importance for weeks during the earlier part of the Session, it would have been better to present the Estimates earlier, and not allow hon. Members to spend their time as if they were brought there without any adequate cause. Had the House assembled in March instead of February, he could have understood that there was some excuse for asking hon. Members at that period of the Session to discuss the Education Vote for Scotland; but, as it was, they had, without excuse, been thrown into a position in which they could not criticize it, and anything more discreditable than this he could not conceive. He hoped that this expression of opinion would not be lost upon the Leader of the House, and that he would take care next year that justice should be done to the Estimates, and that the Scotch Members should have the same amount of time for copious criticism as had been so successfully employed by the Irish Representatives. Those hon. Members had succeeded in obtaining from the Government complete control over the Business of the House as regarded the Irish Votes. To-day, the Scotch Representatives who had come down to the House found the Vote left over until the hon. Gentlemen who represented Irish constituencies would graciously permit them to have this Vote considered. He thought that if this was the way in which right hon. Gentlemen opposite were going to manage the Business of the House, although the Scotch Members were not gifted with the eloquence of the Irish Representatives, they might certainly claim to practice the same persistent efforts as the Irish Members had done so successfully.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that the topic on which he is now entering has nothing to do with the Vote for Scotch Education.

MR. RAMSAY had himself felt that he was rather travelling beyond the Scotch Vote, and was, therefore, not surprised that the Chairman had interrupted him. He had merely endeavoured to give expression to some of the indignation felt by Scotch Members at that time, by being made subject to the will of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. Perhaps the Committee would permit him to say that this view of the question would be considered in a future Parliament, and that the time of the House might be saved by the Government having the Estimates in such form that the whole of them might be considered in an earlier period of the Session, and that the House might not be left until the end of the Session to deal with the Votes in Supply. He wished to point out to the noble Lord, with regard to the Vote before them, the necessity of providing that the Code which regulated the operations of the school boards in Scotland should be presented henceforward at an earlier period of the Session than it had been for some years past. He had already taken the opportunity of mentioning to the noble Lord the great inconvenience which Scotch Members were subjected to, from the fact that the Code, which ought to be placed on the Table 40 days before the time when it was adopted, was very often presented in form only to the House, for, in substance, they did not get it before these 40 days had expired. He did not think that there could be anything more unsatisfactory than that. He remembered that, some years ago, a complaint was made upon the same topic by a Scotch Member who failed to get any opportunity of stating his objections to the Code, or his Amendments to it, before the House, in consequence of its only being circulated to Members one or two days before the 40 days had expired. Before that hon. Member had an opportunity of bringing his views forward the 40 days had expired, and he found that he had no right to occupy time in discussing the question. The Code this year was not circulated amongst hon. Members until after the expiry of the 40 days, although, as everyone knew, it was laid upon the Table in dummy. The particular point to which he referred was the change made in the Code of the present year, as compared with the Code in the past, and of this, no doubt, the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) would give a satisfactory explanation. This change enabled the Department in Scotland to deal with the schools in a way that they had not been able to deal with them previously. The noble Lord would be aware that under one sub-section of the Code (17 C) the premises of a school were required to be "healthy, well lighted, clean, warm, properly furnished, &c," and containing "sufficient accommodation for children attending the school." This was a very important alteration of the provisions of last year, which laid down that in the principal school rooms and class rooms there should be 80 cubic feet of internal space, and eight square feet of area for each child. The effect of that was to take away from the Department the power of giving the grant in any school where there was no such provision for each child. But the Code of 1879 said—

"In administering this Article of the Code the Department will endeavour to secure 80 feet of internal space."

That was to say, they would only endeavour to secure what was previously compulsory. Formerly, there was no option in the case of board schools in Scotland, and all of them had to be constructed with reference to the requirements of the law. But it was now left optional to the Department to insist upon it with reference to the schools which had not previously received the grant. They were now going to give the less efficient schools a grant, thus aiding in establishing denominational schools, which could be set up by anyone merely for the purpose of injuring the board schools.

Mr. Ramsay

He believed he was not in error in saying that, practically, the operation of such schools was that, with less perfect machinery, they were enabled to injure the board schools, and he, therefore, deprecated any such change in that respect; and he thought it would not be contended by the greater number of those persons in Scotland who supported denominational schools that any such change in the law should be made. The noble Lord would be able to explain whether this was the practical object which the Government had in view in making the change. He trusted that the noble Lord would attend to his suggestion as to the way that the Code should be presented in subsequent Sessions, and that it should not be regarded as circulated in form until it was in the hands of Members of Parliament, in order that any suggestion for amendment might be discussed and considered by the Department before the 40 days expired.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, that as the hon. Member behind him (Mr. Ramsay) had been ruled out of Order in some general remarks upon the course of Business and the conduct which the Government had thought fit to pursue with regard to Scotch Business, he would put himself in Order by moving that the Chairman do leave the Chair. He wished right hon. Gentlemen opposite to understand that the Scotch Members did not think it fair or just to their constituents that Scotch Business should be postponed in deference to the wishes and, he might say, the whims of Members representing another part of the United Kingdom. It had never been the custom of Scotch Members to trouble the House at great length upon Scotch or other affairs. They had had for many years, on the contrary, the reputation of being amongst the least talkative Members of the House of Commons. But he would warn right hon. Gentlemen opposite to understand that if Scotch Members thought fit to adopt another line of tactics there was nothing simpler to accomplish. Nothing would be easier than to take objection to every clause of a long Bill. They also could put down 20 Amendments to a single Vote in Committee of Supply; and although they would be extremely unwilling to do so, being desirous rather of adhering to the ancient and usual method of carrying on Business in the House, yet it might be that they would be obliged to do so. There was no Scotch Member who would go down to his constituents during the Recess who would not have thrown in his face the example of the manner in which the Irish Members got their own way with regard to their Business; and it would be very difficult to resist the pressure that would be brought to bear upon Scotch Members to induce them to adopt a similar course. He hoped they would be able to avoid doing so; but the Government had put them in a position of extreme difficulty.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Grant Duff.)

MR. LEVESON-GOWER desired to make some observations with reference to the subject of cookery as a branch of Education.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, Order! The Vote before the Committee is the Vote for Scotch Education, on which a Motion has been made that I do leave the Chair. The observations of the hon. Gentleman would, I presume, have been germane to the last Vote passed—that for South Kensington—and, therefore, these observations would come more fitly upon the Report of that Vote than upon the Vote for Scotch Education.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER: But I want to speak of the Education Code.

THE CHAIRMAN: Of course, if the hon. Gentleman's remarks refer in any way to the Scotch Vote he will be quite in Order; but, otherwise, I think it would be more convenient to postpone them until the Report.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, that he was not surprised that his hon. Friend (Mr. Grant Duff) should have made the protest he did after coming in the expectation of discussing the Scotch Votes, and then finding that suddenly, not in deference to the wish of Scotch Members, but entirely against their wish, and in submission to Irish Members, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had postponed the Scotch University Vote. It was much to the inconvenience of Scotch Members, and it would be very much to the dissatisfaction of the Scotch people, who had no desire to see the Scotch University Vote mixed up with the Votes for the Queen's Colleges. They were postponing these Votes, in order to bring them into the vexed question of Irish University Education. He did not know whether a feeble yielding to dictation was government; but, at all events, it was a government of a kind which they had not been accustomed to. It was yielding everything to those—he would not say who obstructed Business—but to those who were very copious captious critics of the Business of the House. The result would certainly show that they might convert Scotch Members into copious captious critics also. At all events, he wished to point out that the course the Government were taking on that day would certainly cause the greatest dissatisfaction amongst the Scotch people. It was so obstructive to Scotch Members that he was surprised that the hon. and gallant Admiral opposite (Sir William Edmonstone) did not rise in his place and protest against the way in which Scotch Business was being treated, merely because certain Irish Members said it would suit their purposes that the Scotch Votes should be mixed up with the Irish University Question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have really very great difficulty in understanding what can be the nature of this copious criticism to which we are to be exposed on all occasions in the future. My only object is to get on with the work of the House, especially, if possible, at a meeting like this, which is of a rather exceptional character, and which could only be attended with some inconvenience to hon. Gentlemen. But, having so attended, it was our object to try to take such Business as could be conducted and discussed upon its merits. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lyon Playfair) said we have imported into this question another question with which it has nothing to do. But I must point out to him that we have done nothing of the sort. We cannot help it; nobody can help it if the Members for Ireland think it right to take the opportunity on a Vote for Scotch Universities to introduce questions which, as the right hon. Gentleman opposite says, ought to be kept distinct. But it is not a question of whether they ought to be kept distinct. We cannot help the questions being mixed together. I am perfectly satisfied that if we had gone on with the Votes we should have had a long and, perhaps, animated discussion ranging over several hours, and that no progress would have been made. Therefore, I thought it better to put aside all those subjects which might give rise to discussion and animated controversy, and devote the day to the humble and useful part of discussing those questions which did not import, and cannot be held by anybody to import, merits other than their own. The Primary Education of Scotland, which, I believe, is the Vote now before the Committee, is one which, in our opinion, may be fairly discussed apart from any other consideration. We do not want to import other considerations into the Vote for the Scotch Universities; but we know perfectly well that that Vote would not be discussed irrespective of such considerations. I think we acted, upon the whole, a wiser and better part in proposing to let the question stand over to a later day, when it could be taken simply upon its own merits. I cannot help thinking that the course now taken by the right hon. Gentleman opposite is unintelligible, and one which, if I may venture to say so, is altogether absurd; and I think that my right hon. Friend will see that it is hardly reasonable that we should be made to stop the Vote upon the Scotch Primary Education, because we have not thought it advisable to take the Vote for the Scotch University.

MAJOR NOLAN thought that the Scotch Members had not got up early enough that day. For the information of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff), he would state that, when the House assembled, there were only 37 Members present, including eight Irish Members, and one or two Scotch Members only. Therefore, had the Irish Members wished, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had held out, they could have put an end to the Business by simply moving that the House be counted before the Scotch Members came down. If the Scotch Members thought that their Votes were so important, they should have come down to support them; but, instead of that, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Grant Duff) himself was not present for a considerable period, and when he did come down he found that a very satisfactory arrangement had been come to with the other Members at an earlier period of the Sitting. It was not the Irish Members, he might point out, who had mixed up the Irish University Question with anything else; it was the Scotch Members who, when the hon. Gentleman's (the O'Connor Don's) Irish University Bill was introduced, took a very demonstrative part in objecting to it; and that had been the reason for the action of the Irish Members. He was sorry that the interests of the two countries should be run in opposition to each other in this House; but there was no doubt of the very prominent way in which the Scotch Members had interfered with the Irish University Question. The Scotch Members had all they wanted—they had five University Votes in the way they liked best; but when the Irish Members tried to get something of the same sort for their country, they took a very prominent part in attempting to thwart them; and the result was, that the Irish Members were anxious, whenever the Scotch University Question did arise, to contrast the position of the two countries. They did not wish to take away from others what they wanted for themselves; but if the Scotch University Votes were to be debated on one day, and the Irish University Votes on another, the result would be that there would be two debates instead of one—a waste of power and time which very naturally appealed to the Government.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he confessed he was not in the House at 12 o'clock, because he did not think it necessary to be there at the very commencement of Business. He knew that there were other Votes to be taken before the Scotch Votes; but he came down at 1 o'clock, and then he found that the Scotch University Votes had been put off. For his own part, he should be delighted to contrast the sum which was given to Scotland for University purposes with the sum hon. Members proposed to give to the Irish Universities. It seemed to him, having watched the recent proceedings in Supply, that the Government were now setting a most dangerous example in yielding to the coercion of hon. Members below the Gangway, who generally succeeded in getting their own way by a Motion to report Progress. That morning there had been a Vote before the Committee with regard to the Navy, upon which a question had been raised with respect to the appointment of Roman Catholic chaplains to Indian transports. In that case the Government yielded, although the First Lord of the Admiralty had given very good reasons why he should not yield to the representations of Irish Members.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to point out to the hon. Member that he was not in Order in referring to the details of the debate which had taken place upon another Vote.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL was merely saying that, very excellent reasons having been given why the Government should not yield to the Irish Members, he had retired into the Lobby. But he afterwards found that, as a matter of fact, they had had their own way. The Irish Members had moved to report Progress, and the Government had given way, after showing reasons why they should not do so.

MR. SULLIVAN mentioned that the Irish Members were often informed in the Lobbies, by other Members of the House, that the Government were very unreasonable in resisting the demands of Irish Members.

MR. GRANT DUFF did not wish the right hon. Gentleman opposite to misunderstand the views of himself and Friends. The Scotch Members had no quarrels with hon. Members from Ireland, who, no doubt, considered what was the best way of managing their own Business, against which the Scotch Members had nothing to say. They complained that the course pursued by the Government would oblige hon. Members from Scotland to adopt the same tactics as were employed by the Irish Members. As to the taunt that the Scotch Members were not in the House at 12 o'clock, he could only say, for his own part, that he had no reason to suppose the Scotch Votes would be on at 12 o'clock, and he had no interest in any others. He had no wish further to interrupt the Business of the Committee; but he must again point out that the Scotch Members had constantly dangled before them the concessions which were made to other persons who could make themselves intolerable to the Government. ["Oh, oh!" "Order!"] He repeated, persons who could make themselves intolerable to the Government, for he did not think there was anything un-Parliamentary in that expression. He would remind the Government that the Scotch Members only wanted the will to make themselves intolerable also.

MR. PARNELL said, the hon. Gentleman had threatened, on behalf of the Scotch Members, to "adopt the tactics of the Irish Members"—whatever those tactics might be; for his own part, he did not know what they were. The hon. Gentleman uttered this threat because the Irish Members "had been successful in obtaining concessions from the Government." He (Mr. Parnell) wished the hon. Gentleman would point out what those concessions had been, for he was sure the Irish Members themselves knew nothing of them. As to the success of the Irish Members, it should be remembered that the Scotch Members required nothing—they had all their wants satisfied, and had absolutely no demands to make upon the Government. Indeed, the Scotch Members were now in the position of the proverbial dog-in-the-manger, which, having got all it wanted, lay there, in this case, to spoil what it could not utilize for itself, rather than allow the Irish horse to have its proper feed. That was really the position the Scotch Members had taken up in reference to this whole matter. If Scotland had not always been the spoilt child of England; if she had not always had every legislative facility; if she had not always had everything she required; and if, when she wanted anything, she had to do more than ask for it, there might have been some excuse for the very remarkable attack of the hon. Member who sat upon the Front Opposition Bench. But the Irish Members had gained nothing. It was absurd to say that any concession had been made to them. He contended that the Scotch Members had nothing to ask, while the Irish Members had a great deal to ask for; and if that were not their position there might have been some reason for the course which had been taken by the hon. Member in this matter. It was very ill-natured on the part of the Scotch Members to come down to the House to blame Irish Members for doing their duty. They had always assisted Scotch Members in getting their Votes, and that was far more than the latter had done for them. He thought they were entitled to the assistance of hon. Members from Scotland in asking for what was justly their own.

Mr. Grant Duff

MR. RAMSAY said, as he was the cause of the conversation which had taken place, he thought it due to the Committee to state that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had entirely misapprehended what had been said, when he spoke of the Scotch Members denouncing the Irish Members. He (Mr. Ramsay) certainly had not denounced the Irish Members. On the contrary, he sympathized with them in their endeavours to obtain what they required. But it was a very different thing if the whole government of the country was to be placed in their hands, instead of in the hands of the Executive, who were the only persons responsible to Parliament. Whenever the Irish Members had had any important end to obtain, that end had been obtained by persistent efforts. At all events, that was the impression left on his mind; and he did not think the right hon. Gentleman opposite could be surprised if, without indulging in any denunciation, the Scotch Members were to declare that they would imitate the course pursued by the Irish Members, and would follow in the same track which had been so well and so successfully trodden. The Government certainly ought not to be surprised if the Scotch Members made that declaration. When he commenced his remarks he had intended to make some complaints as to the course pursued by Government; and he would take advantage of the right hon. Gentleman being in his place for making a formal complaint as to the way in which Supply had been dealt with during the present Session. He pressed upon the Leader of the House, who had been most willing, as all acknowledged, to meet the requests of hon. Members, and who had the management of Business, the necessity for bringing forward Supply at an early period of the Session, in order that it might be fairly attended to, and meet with the copious criticism which it was the province of the House of Commons to bestow upon the Estimates. Instead of that, however, the Government had introduced a number of Bills, of which they did not even themselves approve; and they had brought forward and occupied much time in discussing Bills which they were prepared at once to abandon. He wished to point out to the Government the necessity of having their arrangements in such a form that the Estimates could be laid before the House immediately at the beginning of the Session—a course that would promote Public Business. As the matter had stood this year, for six weeks after hon. Members came to London, it seemed as if Parliament had been summoned by some mistake. He trusted that his suggestion, which was not made in any spirit of hostility to Her Majesty's Ministers, would not be lost sight of.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER wished to call the attention of the Committee, for two or three minutes, to the highly important question of cookery.

MR. PARNELL rose to Order. He wished to know whether the hon. Member was in Order in introducing the subject of cookery on a Vote dealing with Scotch Education?

THE CHAIRMAN understood that the question of cookery entered into the Vote now before the Committee with respect to some alteration in the Education Code.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER suggested that the noble Lord should make some alteration in the Syllabus, so far as the subject of cookery was concerned. Two things were necessary with reference to this grant on the part of the children. First, a knowledge of the composition of food; and, secondly, a knowledge of its preparation. He quite agreed that the instructors of the children should have this knowledge, and care should be taken that they had it; but he could not understand that it was equally necessary to children of 12 or 13 years of age. Their object was to get the children to understand the necessity of providing, in future, cheap, economical, and good food for their families. He was quite certain that there was no step which could be taken that would make education more popular than that of requiring a knowledge of cookery. It had been said that it would be hard upon the instructors to require that they should be examined in cookery. But he (Mr. Leveson-Gower) would suggest that a perfectly sufficient test of the practical knowledge of children might be obtained by asking questions. He thought the English people, when the excellent food at their disposal was considered, might become one of the best fed, instead of the worst fed, people in the world.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON recognized the importance of affording instruction in every branch of domestic economy. In framing the Syllabus, reference had been made to various modes of cooking food, and that which had appeared the simplest had been selected. He should be glad to take advantage of the practical knowledge of the hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Leveson-Gower), in order to arrive at the best way of making children acquainted with a knowledge of cookery. The hon. Member for Falkirk (Mr. Ramsay) made a just complaint about the delay in the publication of the Code, which was due to the consideration of the very point he had alluded to, for there were some rather startling Returns as to the effect of enforcing the provisions as to space in all cases, and all that was asked was that there should be a discretionary power of relaxation under exceptional circumstances. He was under the impression that the Code was liable to objection for 40 days after it had been issued.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that he was well aware that the noble Lord had many public duties, which he performed with very great devotion and ability, and he should be sorry to lay any additional burden upon him; but, really, now the Scotch Education Board had been abolished, he was quite sure that the noble Lord would recognize that Scotch education was fully as important, and required as much attention, as English education. In introducing the Education Estimates, the noble Lord had expatiated at some length on education in England; but he said not a word about the condition of Scotch education. He was a little jealous that the Scotch Education Vote should be passed over without an expression of the sympathy which he was sure that the noble Lord felt for it. He would call his attention to one important part of the matter. He had told them—and it was a piece of information exceedingly agreeable to the House—that education in England was so rapidly progressing that he had proposed the Estimates upon the calculation that the number of elementary schools would be increased 9 per cent. He (Sir George Campbell) was somewhat surprised that the number of scholars in Scotland had not only not increased, but had somewhat diminished. The total number of scholars in Scotland had decreased from 396,000 to 394,000; there being a decrease of 4,000 in the number of scholars attending the evening schools, but an increase of 2,000 in the day schools—he was referring to the figures at the bottom of page 227. He should like the noble Lord to inform them the reason for this, as it seemed to suggest that education in Scotland had reached its maximum, and was not now increasing. He was aware that it might be said that there was less room for improvement in Scotland than in England; but he knew by experience that the population in important places in Scotland was increasing. His own borough of Kirkcaldy was a model borough, and the number of scholars in the elementary schools was increasing there. They were now building two schools, and the Provost of Kirkcaldy, who was then in London, thought they would then obtain additional accommodation for 200 scholars. There had, however, been a falling off in the Highlands and the Isles which counteracted the advance in larger places. He hoped that the noble Lord would give them some information as to the small increase in the number of day scholars, as there was a very considerable decrease in the number of the night scholars.

MR. RAMSAY rose for the purpose of saying that the noble Lord was somewhat mistaken as to the effect of laying accounts upon the Table in dummy. His impression was, that so soon as accounts were entered upon the Votes as having been laid upon the Table of the House time would begin to run. If he were correct in his opinion, therefore, he thought the noble Lord would find that after the expiry of 40 days—and 40 days had expired after the account was laid on the Table before the Vote was circulated—no Representative would have an opportunity of making any suggestion or amendment on the account. He hoped, therefore, if he were correct as to the legal effect of the account being entered in the Votes, and if, after having been laid upon the Table of the House for 40 days, no Amendment could be proposed, that, in future, that course would not be adopted.

MR. MACDONALD expressed the astonishment with which he had heard the hon. Gentleman's (Sir George Campbell's) statement of what was going on in his own burgh. If there had been a great increase in the number of scholars this year, either at Kirkcaldy or anywhere else, it could only arise from the fact that the school board had neglected its duty before. He (Mr. Macdonald) was himself a member of one of the first school boards in Scotland, so far as efficiency was concerned. According to the Report of Mr. Smith, the Inspector, the school board for the parish of Cambusnethan, in the County of Lanark, the moment that school board came into existence a census of the parish was taken, and a list of all the uneducated children obtained, and schools were provided for them as soon as possible. The parish had now a set of schools which, he believed, were the best in Scotland; and if a child were absent for two days the school board officer went to his house to learn the cause of absence. There was no possibility of a sudden increase in the number of the children; and if there had been any diminution in the attendance it was simply owing to the number of people in the parish having decreased. He regretted to hear any hon. Member rise in his place and tell them that there ought to be an increase in the number of children at school, for, if that were the case, the school boards in Scotland had not done their duty.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON remarked, that the very slight increase in the number of children attending the day schools in Scotland was owing to the reason given by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald)—namely, that most of the children were at present attending school. The proportion of uneducated children in Scotland was very much smaller than in England. There was a diminution in the attendance at night schools in Scotland, and his attention had been called to the fact before. He was informed that it was, in a great measure, owing to the severity of the weather, and also to the fact that a considerable number of people were out of employment. Strange as it might seem, the like fact accounted for the attendance at the day schools being somewhat increased.

MR. BRISTOWE wished to have some explanation with regard to an item in that account, for the travelling expenses of certain foreigners to England. He did not understand why the expenses of foreign naturalists, wishing to visit their English collections, should be paid by this country. It was a curious thing that they should be asked to vote money for certain foreigners coming to visit their collections. Of course, there might be a reason for it, and it might be that their own naturalists were unable to do without them.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that the savants were scattered in all parts of the world, and it was thought desirable to obtain as much information as possible from naturalists who had special knowledge on any particular subject of real interest. The difficulty was how to get those persons together; and it was thought that the quickest and least expensive way would be to pay the travelling expenses of the foreign naturalists to England. If the hon. and learned Gentleman wished, he would give him some further account of the matter.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR remarked, that the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury had given the correct explanation of the matter. Some naturalists had special knowledge on one subject, and some on another; and it was found that the cheapest way to get them into consultation was to pay their travelling expenses.

MR. BRISTOWE expressed himself satisfied with the information that had been given.

MR. GRAY complained that the salaries of the national teachers were not paid until they were long overdue. There was no reason why they should not be paid immediately they fell due. It would be perfectly easy to get the money ready before the salaries were due, and let the teachers have it directly the money was due. It was of very serious importance indeed to the teachers, who very often had to borrow money through not receiving their salaries at the proper time.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON promised that the matter should receive the attention of the Treasury. No doubt, when the salaries were not paid at the time they were due it caused great hardship to persons whose resources were not very ample. The subject should be taken notice of, and he would endeavour to rectify it.

MR. GRAY was exceedingly obliged to the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury for the assurance he had given. There was another matter upon the Vote to which he wished to draw attention. In the English Vote considerable sums were paid on account of denominational training schools for teachers. The hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) brought the question forward as to making the like allowance in Ireland, and the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary did not strike him as being sufficient. He simply said that the Government was going to do something for the national school teachers; were going to improve their position—as it afterwards appeared—by providing pensions for them; but it did not seem to strike him that that had nothing to do with providing a suitable training for the teachers. In England aid was granted for training denominational school teachers, and those who desired it could avail themselves of other means. In Dublin there was a denominational training school for Catholics, and a grant might be made to that Institution. Of course, he could not expect that the subject should be dealt with at once; but he thought that, in all fairness, it ought to be considered by the Government on a future occasion.

tary had made a distinct promise to improve the position of the national school teachers, and also that a change should be made in their salaries. He had announced an improvement in the salaries of the teachers; and he thought an assurance should be given that grants should be made in the direction asked by the hon. Member for Tipperary.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that with regard to the question raised by the hon. Member for Tipperary, it might be within his recollection that a considerable discussion took place upon the matter upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Roscommon. On that occasion he stated that the subject was one which required to be dealt with, but that he considered it would be impossible to deal with it during the present Session. He might observe that by the School Teachers Education Bill an addition to the fixed salaries of the teachers was being made. It had been pointed out, however, that the teachers in all their memorials and resolutions had requested that an addition to their remuneration should take the form of fixed salaries, and not in the shape of result fees. He thought that it would be found that the system of result fees would press unfairly on teachers in sparsely-populated districts. The proposal of the Government, accordingly, was that an addition should be made to the fixed salaries. The Estimate, on account of the additional salaries, would not appear in the ordinary Estimates, but would be dealt with by a Supplementary Estimate, to be moved next February. The alteration would take effect from the 1st of January, from which date the teachers would receive the increased salary. It was proposed that on the 1st of January the new system should come into force, and that an addition should be made at the rate of 16 per cent on the salaries of the third class of teachers, at 15 per cent on the second class, and 20 per cent on the salaries of the first class teachers. He thought that was a liberal addition to make to the amount now paid to the teachers, and it would constitute something like £40,000 addition to the Estimates. The principal object which the Government had in view, and which he hoped would be obtained by the school teachers, was to grant the request of the teachers by making a substantial addition to their salaries, and thus doing away with the agitation. The agitation had caused very serious injury to education, and it was an unmixed evil in other respects; and he hoped they would now see an end to it.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY wished to call attention to the system of agricultural teaching in the schools in Ireland. Formerly, fixed salaries were given to the school teachers in respect of the instruction they gave in this matter, in addition to their remuneration for their other duties. Sometimes they received from £5 to £10 per year on that account, and, small as those salaries were, they were all-important to men whose remuneration was not great. Moreover, the salaries were of importance to these poor men in calculating their pensions when they wished to retire. In 1876 a change was made, and, instead of giving fixed salaries in respect of that teaching, the teachers were paid by result fees; the consequence was that some men profited largely; whereas other men, who had held office since 1847 or 1848, lost a good deal of money. These men had served faithfully, and discharged their duties well; and it was not fair that the fixed salaries which they had been accustomed to receive for the work done should be changed into result fees. In 1871, the total amount paid in respect of result fees was £457. If a man had continued to be paid a fixed salary, the cost to the country would only have been £680 in the year. He did not think it was fair thus suddenly to change the fixed salaries paid into result fees; and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would look into the matter, and place the men in the position that they held before. There was another topic which he thought required to be treated with a strong hand, and that was the question of the supply of books and apparatus to the national schools in Ireland. In England the books and apparatus were supplied to the schools by the trade, and was open to public competition. There was such freedom in the matter in England that there was not even a recommendation of books by the Department. But in Ireland the Department printed, published, and sold books that were to be used in schools, and permitted no others to be used. That was a very evil system, both commercially and in its effects upon education. The result of the system was to cost the country a sum of £4,500 a-year dead loss. Many of the books which were issued for the use of the schools were very unsuitable and uninteresting, and it would be much better if the same system were adopted as in England. They complained that the present system prevented free competition by the trade in Ireland, and prevented the teachers from using their judgment as to the books to be used. It was particularly hard on the trade in Ireland that the State should undertake the duty of supplying those books. The system was not, as far as he knew, pursued in any other country. When the national system was first introduced it was surrounded with difficulties, and it was necessary to produce a set of books perfectly colourless, which would be alike suitable to Protestant, Catholic, and Presbyterian. But that state of things had changed, and, to a large extent, passed away; and he did not think that there was any pretence for saying that if a free choice were allowed of any books they would be of a sectarian character; they would be perfectly satisfied to allow the National Board to have a right of veto upon the books to be used. Subject to that restriction, he thought that the teachers should have the same freedom of choice in regard to books as was enjoyed in England. He did not press for immediate action on the matter; but he did trust that the Government would remedy the evil at the earliest opportunity. With regard to the agricultural teachers, who were a most deserving body of men, he would strongly urge their claims upon the Government.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS did not think he would be justified in allowing the discussion to pass without acknowledging, on the part of those in whom he felt so strong an interest—the national school teachers of Ireland—the benefits which the Government had conferred upon them. He had not hesitated, in previous Sessions, to express his opinion upon the manner in which those deserving officers of the State had been treated by both sides of the House in former times. He had invariably maintained that it was the duty of the State, in respect of national education in Ireland, to provide such salaries for the teachers as would enable them to pay their way, and to hold themselves up as respectable members of society. He had always been of opinion that the system of payment by result fees was not so good as payment of a standing salary, adequate to the duties which the teachers had to perform. Therefore, he thought that the proposal which had now been made was only just and proper; and that it was a due recognition of what had been done by the national school teachers, whom he thought were deserving of the support of both sides of the House. In his opinion, it was a very much needed reform. The announcement which had been made that day, of the improvement to be made in the standing salaries of the national school teachers of Ireland, would be welcomed as a long delayed but much needed act of justice. On behalf of hon. Members on that side of the House, who had urged the case of the national school teachers, he begged to acknowledge the concession which the Government had made.

MR. C. S. PARKER wished to know whether it was intended to make the proposed addition to the salaries of the national school teachers by Supplementary Estimates that year? The right hon. Gentleman had made an important announcement unexpectedly, and to a thin House, although he had intimated some time ago the intention of the Government to do something in the matter. He thought that the proposal would require some discussion before the extra sums required could be voted. Several important questions would have to be met. For instance, they would have to consider whether a higher standard of attainment should not now be exacted from the teachers of the national schools? Then, as regarded the question of local contribution. He did not wish, as a Scotch Member, to insist upon that point; but he did think that it was a matter which would require some investigation. He did not understand, however, that the proposal would be made in any Estimates in that Session, but that the increased grant would be proposed next year.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that what was proposed to be done was to introduce a Supplementary Estimate, in accordance with the usual practice, next Session. The increase in the salaries for school teachers would take effect from the 1st of January next; and would not be in accordance with the usual practice to introduce a Supplementary Estimate before the quarter of the year that had to be provided for. In respect of the suddenness of the announcement, he might say that he had very clearly stated, on a previous occasion, that the Government had decided to propose some addition to the salaries of the school teachers by Supplementary Estimate. As regarded the agricultural Inspectors, he confessed that he did not think any injustice had been done them. If they had been deprived of any sum of money which they might have expected to receive, they would come within the category of vested interests, and their case would then deserve to be inquired into. He did not think, however, that any injury had been done them. With regard to the other subjects that had been mentioned, he might say that they were receiving the careful attention of the Government.

MR. RAMSAY did not think that some of the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy), with reference to the Irish school books, were altogether correct. From his own experience, he must say that he knew many cases in which Irish school books had been selected by Scotch school boards as the best school books to use. He thought that it was some justification of the mode in which those books had been selected that they should be so satisfactory to the people of Scotland. He wished to draw attention to the necessity of making the localities in Ireland contribute to the expenses of education. In Scotland they had to contribute for their schools; and it should be remembered that the expenditure was forced upon the people of Scotland by the Education Acts. They were compelled in Scotland to provide school accommodation to a greater extent than they had been accustomed to. He thought it would be found, if the amounts granted to the three Kingdoms were compared, that Scotland obtained very much less from the Imperial Treasury than any part of the United Kingdom.

MAJOR NOLAN thought that the present Government had treated Scotland very well. He had not gone into the figures, so as to make a calculation as to how much was contributed per head of the population; but he thought that it would be found that Scotland got very much more per head than Ireland. Roughly speaking, he thought it would be found that the people of Scotland received 2s. 10d. per head; whereas in Ireland only 2s. 5½d. was contributed from the Imperial Exchequer, and thus Scotland was much better treated than Ireland. The amount contributed to Scotland had increased very much since the present Government came into power. He thought that both Scotland and Ireland ought to get more per head of the population than England. It should be remembered that in England it was very much easier to educate the children, where there were vast centres of population; while in Scotland and Ireland, owing to its being less thickly populated, a greater expense per head was caused. With respect to the announcement which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, he considered that the salaries of the national school teachers required increasing, for at present Irish teachers were only paid about £55 a-year; whereas teachers in England and Scotland obtained about £100 a-year. The increase, therefore, had been very much wanted. He should like to know what the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary intended to do in the cases of those schools where the teachers were not paid salaries? There was a class of schools in Ireland where the teachers were paid only by result fees—the scale, he believed, being £20 per 100 pupils. The result of that was to give much about the same remuneration as was paid to the salaried teachers. The increase which had been made to the salaries of the teachers was very proper; and he really thought that it reflected credit upon those who had induced the Government to grant it. He could have wished, however, that one or two other things had been done by the Government. In those schools where the teachers were now paid entirely by result fees the increase might be given them, either by paying them at a higher rate—for instance, increasing the result fees by 50 per cent—or by making the teachers some fixed allowance. He thought that if the increase were made in the shape of salary there would be some little jealousy; for some effort was made to keep up the relative proportion between the salaried schools and the unsalaried schools. He thought that the best plan would be to raise the result fees in the case of the schools he had mentioned. In his opinion, the education given in the schools in which result fees were paid was as good, and, in many cases, was much better, than was given in the salaried schools. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would take the case of these schools into his consideration, and so be able, either to raise the result fees, or to grant a fixed allowance. He thought their congratulations were due to the Government for the proposal they had made.

COLONEL COLTHURST supported the appeal of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, as to the necessity of giving a fixed allowance to the schools in Ireland in which result fees were paid to the teachers. In his opinion, they were some of the best schools in Ireland. There was much more freedom in those schools than there was in other schools. He thought the attention of the Government should be directed to seeing that justice was done in the case of those schools where fixed salaries could not be given. Either the result fees might be raised, or a fixed allowance might be paid. With respect to school books, he saw no reason why the English system should not be introduced into Ireland. In England, subject to the veto of the Education Department, school managers made use of any books they pleased. In Ireland they could only use those which were issued by the Department; and he considered that was a most objectionable system. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take it into his consideration, with a view to its alteration.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL wished to make a remark or two with reference to the announcement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. As he understood it, the new arrangement would come into effect on the 1st of January next, before the House had had any opportunity of discussing the subject, or giving any opinion with regard to it. He understood that in February the Government would then ask the House to sanction the system which they had brought into operation. They would thus be giving additional assistance to national education in Ireland, without first obtaining the sanction of the House. The total expenditure upon education in Ireland was very large at present. He should like to know if the Government, in deciding to grant that additional amount from the National Exchequer, had in any way made it conditional on the contributions from the localities being raised? In his view, it would not be right for the House to vote for the purpose of increasing the grant for elementary education in Ireland, unless that Vote were supplemented by local contributions. It was a most dangerous course to increase the grant from the central Treasury without requiring some local contribution; and it seemed to him that it was a most dangerous course, and a reversal of the policy that had hitherto been pursued by the House and by successive Governments. Some time ago, an Act was passed to remedy an acknowledged defect in Ireland, and to enable the different localities to supplement the salaries of their national school teachers. He should be extremely glad if they had been told that the localities were going to take advantage of that provision; and it was thought well that Parliament should meet them in a liberal spirit by increasing the grant. He had hoped the policy hitherto pursued would not be departed from in the present instance, and that the Government would not make the grant without the addition he had mentioned. It was apparent that there was becoming, more and more, a rapprochement between the Government and hon. Members below the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House; and that concession had been made to their demands which had not hitherto been granted by any previous Government. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to state distinctly whether it was intended that the additional grant should be given on condition of the contributions from the localities being raised?

MR. J. LOWTHER said, these international disputes did not conduce to the despatch of Business; and, without entering into the wants and peculiarities of Ireland and Scotland, he thought it would be better to leave such a discussion to be treated next Session during the dinner hour. But the hon. Gentleman (Sir George Campbell) had made rather an extraordinary statement. He said—"The announcement with respect to teachers' salaries was altogether unexpected;" but hon. Members would recollect it had been shadowed forth in reply to Questions; and, further, the statement had been made the other day on introducing the School Teachers' Bill. But the hon. Baronet went on to accuse the Government of a departure from recognized principles, and he spoke of it as being prompted by a desire for a rapprochement between the Irish Members and the Government. Well, he was glad to find that there was an agreement between Her Majesty's Government and hon. Members in other parts of the House; and being charged with the duty of representing the Government of Ireland, he was especially glad that the policy of the Government with respect to Ireland met with the approval of the Irish Members. But the hon. Member said the Government were going back from the invariable policy which had been observed in regard to education, and a Bill had been referred to which, a few Sessions ago, imposed a charge on the Unions. That was a new departure—not this they were now making. It was the invariable policy with regard to Irish education to separate it from the national funds. The hon. Member might disagree with that policy or not; but he could not charge Her Majesty's Government with inaugurating a policy designed to catch support from a particular portion of the House. They had simply adhered to the practice which, with the slight exception he had alluded to, had always governed these matters. With regard to schools supported by capitation grants, this addition to the school teachers' salaries was founded on demands put forward by the teachers and those who represented them in the House and elsewhere; it had nothing to do with an increase of grants. The proposal was intended to meet a distinctly expressed want on the part of the teachers; and if the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major Nolan) had any other claims to urge they would be made the subject of inquiry.

MR. GRAY said, the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) had mentioned, in connection with the Vote for Public Education in Scotland, that steps had been taken to provide for instruction in cookery. He did not know what steps had been taken in that direction with respect to Ireland; but there was no other country which needed instruction in that branch more. He, therefore, asked if the Chief Secretary for Ireland would state what steps had been taken to further that instruction in Ireland, which would render the schools both popular and useful?

MR. J. LOWTHER promised that the subject should be considered in connection with the system of national education in Ireland. He recognized the importance of the instruction, as a means of enabling females in Ireland to discharge their domestic duties.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) £2,806,825, to complete the sum for the Post Office.

MR. GRAY rose to call attention to a subject in connection with the Post Office Savings' Banks to which he had alluded on a former occasion. Under the Post Office Savings' Bank Act of 1863, Clause 38, a provision existed by which the entire deposits of any depositor were absolutely forfeited for the reduction of the National Debt if he opened more than one account. A person named Kelly opened two accounts, and deposited a sum of about £100; he died, and application was made by his executors for the money; they were informed that it was confiscated; they then appealed to the Treasury, and were again informed that the money was confiscated. It must be remembered that those who used these Post Office Savings' Banks were the poorest and, presumably, the most ignorant of the people. No doubt, in the case referred to, the provision of the Act had been violated, and that the deposits were liable to forfeiture. No doubt, also, notice was given to depositors, and he was aware that they had also to sign a declaration, although that form of declaration was very vague. But when it was considered from what class of people these Post Office Savings Banks' deposits were chiefly drawn, it did not come to be a matter of very great wonder that an occasional endeavour should be made to get the benefit of opening a second account. That offence, he thought, was not a very heinous one; and although it might be characterized as a fraud, it was fraud of a legal, and not of a moral kind. It did not defraud the Department of the Post Office, and it did not certainly defraud the public, or any individual. No doubt, it was an offence, and it ought to be punished with a small penalty; but to confiscate the entire of a man's savings for that reason was, he thought, straining the punishment, and making it quite disproportioned to the offence. He did not want to go into the case of this man Kelly again; but he appealed to the noble Lord at the head of the Department, and to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, to consider whether this regulation was not a little too hard, and did not fall too heavily upon the poorer classes? He trusted that they would take the matter into their favourable consideration, with a view to effecting some modification of this rule, which he considered to work a very considerable injustice. He also asked the noble Lord whether he would object to grant a Return of the amounts of money which had been confiscated since the Post Office Savings Bank Act came in force? He could not but think, if it once became public that a large amount of money was confiscated by the Department owing to the breach of some technical rule, that the poorer and most ignorant, and, therefore, the most defenceless class, would be frightened away from the Banks, and would put their money in some more secure investment. He thought the Government would see that the punishment was quite disproportioned to the offence. There was another matter to which he wished to refer. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), he believed, had, on a former occasion, mentioned that there was too much red tape and officialism about the Department in connection with the rules relating to life assurance. The hon. Member stated that every transaction with the Post Office Savings Bank involved an expenditure of 8*d*. There was no conceivable reason why this should be the case; and he concluded either that the accounts must be weighted with an undue proportion of charge, or else there must be something wrong in the system. Every Assurance Company in the United Kingdom issued to the assured notice of when the premium became due, which involved the cost of stamp and stationery. But it appeared that the Department made no use of stamps, and gave no notice to the poor and ignorant people who insured their lives as to when the payment became due. He knew, from his own experience, how necessary it was to get this notice. The result of the system of the Department must be that a large number of assurers would forget when the date of payment came round. He did not know whether the Post Office had the system which prevailed amongst other offices of levying a small fine, or submitting the assurer to a second medical examination in the case of a lapsed premium; but, surely, it would cost nothing to the Department, beyond the cost of the paper of a post card, to issue notices to the assurers, because although the Department might be debited with stamps they would go into another branch of the Revenue. The matter was certainly one for the consideration of the Department, for they were bound to remember that they were dealing with a poor and ignorant class of people, and that, therefore, they ought to give them every facility for understanding the conditions upon which their lives were assured.

MR. O'CLERY was also acquainted with the case of a very poor man in the County of Wexford who had about £180, the savings of his whole life, and who, through sheer ignorance, had allowed his money to be placed in the same bank in different names. In this case the man went straight to the postmaster of the place and acquainted him with the fact. No relief could be obtained in this case on the ground that, 18 months having elapsed, the money had been transferred. He believed that there were only two means by which it could be refunded, either by the Treasury placing the sum upon the Estimates of next year, or by the introduction of a Private Bill. The latter course it was almost impossible to adopt; and he, therefore, thought it better to leave the matter to the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury. He trusted the hon. Gentleman would consider the case of this poor man, with a view to its mitigation. No injury had been done to the Department, and the irregularity might, in his opinion, be met by a small fine. The poor man who had been kept so long out of his money could neither read or write.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he would have great pleasure in granting the Return asked for by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray), for he believed it would be of benefit. With respect to the cases mentioned, he need only point out that the regulation referred to was one established by law.

over which the Department had no manner of control. Of course, it might be a question as to whether the law, as it stood, was not too stringent, and it might very fairly be considered during the Recess whether the law should not be looked into and the matter referred to next Session. It was not only the Post Office Savings Banks to which this provision applied; the original Trustees Savings Banks were regulated in the same way, with the only difference that, in the latter case, a barrister was appointed to decide whether the multiform deposit was made with a fraudulent intention. In the case of the Post Office Savings Banks the Treasury had to decide upon the point; but, in both cases, the words in the clause were "fraudulent intention." He trusted that hon. Members would see that the Government had only acted in accordance with the law under which the Post Office Savings Banks were carried on. With respect to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Tipperary concerning the notices in the case of life assurances, he would take care that this subject should receive due consideration during the Recess.

Vote agreed to.

ARMY ESTIMATES.

(11.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £203,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay, Allowances, &c. of a number of Army Reserve First Class, not exceeding 22,000, and of the Army Reserve Second Class, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

MAJOR O'BEIRNE thought hon. Members present were scarcely prepared to enter into the consideration of the Army Estimates. He had some remarks to make upon the subject of the Military Schools, and had got up some information with reference thereto which he doubted not would be very much to the point; but he objected to the Vote being taken at that hour, when the several points of importance which arose upon it could not be adequately discussed. He, therefore, moved that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Major O'Beirne.)

Lord John Manners

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY hoped that the Government would be allowed to proceed with this Vote. The Army Votes to be considered were upon the Paper, and he did not think any hon. Member could complain that this proposal had taken them unawares.

MR. PARNELL thought that the Government should not take the Army Estimates at that time. Practically speaking, there was only time for the Committee to wind up its Business. There were three important questions upon Report which would take all the time up to 6 o'clock to discuss. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that he would not sit later than 6 o'clock; and if the Army Estimates were proceeded with it would be, practically, impossible to make any progress. He and his hon. Friends had all come down there for the purpose of discussing certain questions on Report, to which he thought they ought now to proceed.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT said, that the hour was not one at which he liked the Army Votes to be brought forward; but he would remind hon. Members opposite that they were, perhaps, as responsible as any other Members for their being brought forward at that time. The Business had been inconveniently delayed, and the result was that the Votes had been brought on at an inconvenient time. However, he did not think it mattered much whether they were taken then or some days hence. He hoped the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) would withdraw his Motion.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE regretted his inability to withdraw his Motion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped the hon. and gallant Member would allow the Committee to proceed with the Army Votes.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 8; Noes 85: Majority 77.—(Div. List, No. 203.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. PARNELL begged to move that the Chairman do now leave the Chair. He did not think the Government were treating them fairly in this matter. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had told the House on the previous day that he did not want to sit longer than 6 o'clock.

There were two Reports of Supply down on the Paper, and there were two or three very important questions involved in those Reports, and it would take until 6 o'clock to finish the discussion which would arise upon them. If they continued the discussion on the Estimates, they could not possibly take Report that evening without exceeding the time named by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was very unfair that Members should be invited to come down to the House, in order to discuss the Report of Supply, and that they should be kept until after the time arranged. He hoped Government would agree to report Progress, and he would then withdraw his Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Parnell.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was sorry it was impossible to oblige everybody. The Government were extremely anxious to get on with Supply, and he thought the hon. Member for Meath must see that they had been anxious that day to make an arrangement, as far as possible, to meet the convenience of hon. Members. He could not undertake, at the present time, to stop Supply, and he was afraid it might be difficult to reach the Report of Supply before 6 o'clock. But they were, of course, not bound to that time to a minute, and it was only arranged that they should not sit for more than a short time after it.

MR. PARNELL wished to remind the Committee how matters stood. He had had a Notice on the Paper which he was anxious to move; but which, being connected with the same question of Report of Supply, he had not moved, upon the understanding that he was to have an opportunity of discussion on Report of Supply. He and his hon. Friends had been waiting all day long, only to find that they could not discuss it that evening. The promise given by the Secretary to the Treasury, that he would endeavour to put Report on the Paper at such an hour that it could be discussed, was, as all hon. Members must be aware, a very vague kind of promise, considering the period of the Session, and would, in all probability, come to nothing. He admitted that the hon. Baronet had done everything possible to enable them to discuss the question; but if Supply came on that day they would have no opportunity of making their Motions, and would, therefore, be left to an undefined probability of discussion. The Government, in all probability, would be compelled to take the Report of Supply at an hour when it would be impossible to discuss it; and he thought it would have been much better that morning not to have given way to the Government, in which case they would have got no Supply at all.

MR. RYLANDS wished to make a remark as an English Member. While he was always ready to assist his Irish Friends in their legitimate demands, he was bound to say that the exactions which they were then making upon the time of the House could not be granted without interfering very much with other hon. Members. The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) complained that he had been in his place expecting the opportunity of making some remarks upon the Report of Supply. His hon. Friend was, of course, entitled to make those remarks, and he was sure that the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury would give him sufficient opportunity for discussing this deferred Vote of Supply. But he wished to remind the House that the English Members had also come down, at great inconvenience, to discuss a number of Estimates which appeared on the Paper that morning, and to assist the Government in getting through their Business. He did not, personally, make any profession of having a great disposition to assist the Government at any time. But, in the present case, by assisting the Government to get through their Business, they were actually promoting their own convenience, for if they did not do so they would necessarily be kept there some considerable time longer. Of course, he regretted that the House were driven into a corner by Supply. It was most unfortunate that on that particular Saturday they should be dealing with Votes of Supply; but the fact was due to the continual desire, on the part of the Government, to oblige Gentlemen from Ireland, and in consequence the Public Business had been thrown into absolute confusion. He felt almost certain that, at that moment, neither the hon. Baronet nor the hon. Member for Meath could tell which Votes had been carried, and which had been postponed. The South Kensington Vote was postponed at the instance of the Irish Members; and the consequence was that another very important Vote was taken, upon which he (Mr. Rylands) wished to make some observations. The same thing had happened with the Scotch Votes. Hon. Members from Scotland came down in order to take part in the discussion of the Scotch University Vote, and they found that was postponed also, on what he must call the unreasonable application of his hon. Friends from Ireland. He appealed to them to say whether it was reasonable that the convenience of Englishmen and Scotchmen should be entirely sacrificed to that of half-a-dozen Irishmen? He trusted the hon. Member for Meath would not press his Motion.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

LORD ELCHO felt bound to say a few words upon the question of Army Reserve. The War Office Committee, which had been appointed to deal with the whole subject, was, in his opinion, unnecessary, as he believed that the Secretary of State for War, with the information at his disposal at the War Office, had ample opportunity of coming to a decision himself upon the questions involved. The effect of the appointment of the Committee would be to postpone to future years, in the case of the Army Reserve, a decision which might, in his opinion, be come to at once. The questions to be decided were simple, and it required no Committee to tell them that no English youth should be reckoned on the Establishment who had not attained the age of 20 years; or that, in order to obtain good non-commissioned officers, there should be offered the inducements of a pension and higher pay. The Militia was never full, and the Committee, of which the Secretary of State for War had been Chairman, strangely came to the conclusion that because the Militia could not be kept up to the proper strength therefore the strength of the Militia must be reduced. But that was not the way in which the question should be dealt with. The Militia had always been the backbone of our military system, and it ought not to be left in this invertebrate state. It was to the Militia that they must look for an efficient Reserve; and it was for past and present Secretaries of State for War to put their heads together and to see if they could not patriotically come to some decision as to how the Militia could best be filled.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Vote referred to the Army Reserve, and not to the Militia.

LORD ELCHO said, of course, if he was ruled out of Order he should not press the point. He believed it was from the Militia that the Army should derive its Reserve; and, therefore, he thought that his observations upon the Militia were strictly germane to the question before the Committee. Therefore, unless he was again told by the Chairman that he was in error, he would simply add that there was only one way to fill up the Militia—namely, to put in force the ancient Constitutional practice of the country, that every Englishman should be bound, if need be, to give compulsory service at home in the Militia. He wished the Committee not to run away with the idea that he was advocating this for the Army; it was intended for the Militia alone. They must come to this, sooner or later; and any other way of dealing with the matter was but “leather and prunella.” His firm conviction was that, appoint a Committee this year or appoint a Committee next year, any other plan was simply beating about the bush.

COLONEL MURE wished to say one word only upon the point of the power of the Committee now sitting. It had been said that the Committee were restricted in their power, and the recommendations they were to make were to be limited to such proposals as would not require the interference of Parliament. He believed his statement would be confirmed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Loyd Lindsay), that the powers of that Committee were entirely unrestricted. Their instructions were to take evidence from all parts of the Empire on everything connected with the Militia and the Army, and their powers of Report were entirely and completely unlimited. Having already seen a good deal of that Committee—having been himself before it—his own impression certainly was that it was exceedingly earnest in the work which it had to do. He knew pretty well that a good deal of the evidence given before it had been—he did not wish to use too strong a word—or he would say, of the most distressing nature in regard to the general condition of the Army, and especially of the Infantry of the Line. Next year, when they met again to discuss the Report of that Committee, it would be very curious and instructive to obtain an explanation from the Secretary of State for War, and from the Secretary of State for War who preceded him, also, if possible, from the Inspector Generals of recruiting as to the invariably favourable accounts they had given the country of the Army. ["Order, order!"] He did not mean to say that any one single Gentleman had deceived the House wittingly; but he did say that the assurances of Secretary's of State in the House and Reports from the recruiting officers and other officials had been most misleading, and had led hon. Gentlemen and the public to form an opinion on the state of the Army which was utterly and completely mistaken. Although he deeply regretted the state of things which had been shown to exist by this Zulu War, he would say that those disclosures had one satisfactory side—they had opened the eyes of the country to the condition of the Army.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK pointed out that there was great inconvenience in discussing a question of this sort when the Secretary of State for War was absent. He did not say that precedents could not be quoted in favour of it; but when a question embracing generally the whole scope of Army matters was under discussion, the presence of the Departmental Minister was almost necessary, in order to explain the position of affairs at the present time. The hon. and gallant Gentleman behind him (Colonel Mure) had said—and he entirely agreed with him—that as the Committee were now engaged in sifting all these questions, it was undesirable that a discussion on the matter should be raised in that House. It would have been more desirable if the hon. and gallant Gentleman, after expressing that opinion, had not taken the opportunity of producing a very strong impression on one side. If it were desirable not to discuss the question at all, it was still more undesirable that the question should be, to a certain extent, forestalled in public opinion by the one-sided arguments used by the hon. and gallant Gentleman and the noble Lord opposite (Lord Elcho). He had also had the honour of being examined as a witness before that Committee. He thought that its general composition was one to give great satisfaction to the country. It was composed, in some respects, of officers who had not had recent experience; but officers of that sort were represented on the Committee, both by officers of the rank of General, who had had great experience, and by two officers now holding commands of battalions, who were, perhaps, as well capable of giving opinion on all that took place as any two men in the Army. He thought the Committee and the public were to be congratulated on having these two officers on the Committee. He did not in the least agree with the noble Lord opposite, or the hon. and gallant Gentleman, as to the result of the deliberations of the Committee as far as they had gone. If the question were raised in that House in another shape, and at another time, he should be prepared to show in detail, and in the presence of the Secretary of State for War, that of all the allegations made as to the causes supposed to operate on the five battalions which left England, in what they might deem to be, in certain respects, an unsatisfactory condition, there was not one which had any bearing, even incidentally, on the system of short service. That service, no doubt, was co-incident in point of time with these defects; but they were not caused by short service. They could not be traced to short service, and short service was not in any way responsible for them. He would undertake to say that when that Committee had closed its proceedings there would not be made, in any one material respect, any considerable change in the lines on which the Secretary of State for War had been working for the last six years, following in the steps of his Predecessors. Neither as regarded the main features and principles of short service, nor as regarded the main features and principles of localization, would there be any essential change, when this question—the most important of any that could be referred to a Committee—had been roughly sifted and examined.

object in stating this was to correct an impression which might result, if what had been said by the hon. and gallant Gentleman should be allowed to go forth to the country as to what was the tendency of the Committee, or what had been their proceedings up to the present time. He believed the special Vote at present before the Committee was the Reserve Vote; and, if he had had time, he should have liked to have said a few words to the Committee in regard to the Reserve. It would, however, be in the recollection of those who had paid attention to the matter in the last six years that one of the points brought before that House in 1865, 1866, and 1867, had been the unnecessary, and, as it appeared to him, the unwise, limitation of the Militia Reserve. It had been shown repeatedly, and expressly in the mobilization of last year, to be a most effective Reserve, both in point of numbers and in individual composition. He did trust, then, that one of the results of the Committee now sitting would be that the Militia Reserve would be appreciated on its right merits; that it would be extended in the way its friends would have desired; and that they would have its value as a Reserve, on all occasions when a sudden expansion of the Army became necessary, fully recognized. He did not see why, if considerable inducements were offered to the men — of which they had already shown themselves most anxious to avail themselves — the Militia Reserve should not soon be put in a position into which he and others had long tried to bring it, by which it would draw to the ranks of the Regular Army, in time of emergency, almost two-thirds of the effective force of the Militia. He believed that was a modification of the present system which might be very well carried out. The practical steps by which it might be obtained had been repeatedly explained, and it only remained for this Committee to give their practical effect and force. His real object in rising was to correct the impression which, he feared, was prevalent—that the short-service system had proved a complete failure, and that it had left them, practically, without an Army. The hon. and gallant Gentleman behind him (Colonel Mure) was a great enunciator of that idea; and he could not permit it to gain ground, at the eve of the Recess, without stating that not one of the defects pointed out in the battalions sent to the Cape was traceable in any way to the system of short service; but that every one of them—individually, severally, and collectively—was to be traced, and he had traced them, to practical defects in the administration of the system by those who, at present, sat on the Government Benches. In charging the officials, however, with such administration, he did not intend to allege anything more than that they had made mistakes. He believed the Secretary of State for War was most loyally anxious to carry out the system introduced by those who preceded him. There was no doubt, however, that an opinion prevailed among certain persons, in certain circles which had superficially examined the question, that the system had failed at a most serious juncture. Those who alleged that should recollect, to begin with, that during the last 12 months they had succeeded in carrying on two great wars on an entirely peace establishment. When it was alleged that battalions were sent out with from 360 to 370 men, it ought to be remembered that that was due not at all to the system, but to the acts of Her Majesty's Government. If they thought fit to send out 15 battalions of 800 men each, and, therefore, to reduce the Army by 12,000 men, they ought, then, to have come to the House and asked for additional men to keep up the Force. These faults, then, which were charged to the system, were really due to the act of the Government, and that was the whole foundation on which this alarming superstructure had been built, a superstructure for which there was no reason at all. On the other hand, there certainly were radical defects in our system which had been successfully pointed out every year; but they might have equally occurred with a system of long service, and he believed that our military system had never been in a more vigorous state than it was now. It must be remembered, however, that in order to make it successful they must carry it out thoroughly; and, for his part, he believed that it was absolutely necessary to begin with a large proportion of all the recruits of the age of 20 or 21. His contention was, they could not work a system of that kind without doing that.

LORD ELCHO begged to explain that his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Henry Havelock) entirely misunderstood him if he supposed that it was his intention to say anything against short service. He never had said a word against it. All that he had mentioned was, that by some means or another, by higher pay, or by pensions, or something of the same kind, they should induce men to remain longer in the Army than was possible under the short service system, in order to keep those men as non-commissioned officers.

COLONEL MURE said, with regard to the remarks made by the hon. and gallant Gentleman near him (Sir Henry Havelock), he believed it was possible to have a system of short service and a Reserve; but his contention was that it was not possible, with the class from which they recruited, to have efficient regiments on the six years' system. When Lord Cardwell's system was introduced it seemed to have been entirely forgotten that even Colonial wars required men of mature age and who were thoroughly disciplined, and that, to have these ready under a six years' system, the total strength must be increased. They were told that, under this short service system, they would offer such inducements to the public that they would get thoroughly efficient recruits; but this prophecy had not been fulfilled. Just before the Zulu War they had 51,000 men in the Infantry at home, and out of that number there were 20,000 men who were under one year's service, and there were 10,000 men over 35 years of age, a large proportion of whom were too old for active service, or claiming their discharge; so that, as a result, they only had the remainder with which to furnish the garrisons of the country, to send re-inforcements to India, and carry on Colonial wars; hence the extreme defection of the regiments at this moment. He was not against the system of service with the Colours, and subsequently going to the Reserve. What he complained of—and he thought it was by far the greatest evil which existed in the Army at the present time—was a gradual slackening of discipline all through it, and a feeling of discontent pervading every branch of the Service. It was not that they did not get good recruits, considering their youth, nor that the number was insufficient—they got 30,000 last year, and of that number 4,600 disappeared, either by purchase or discharge, and they lost 1,700 by desertion. It was this enormous annual disappearance which exhausted the strength and efficiency, in itself a proof of discontent in the ranks. They could not stand such a drain as that with their present number. The discontent showed itself also in the difficulty to persuade the best privates to take the stripes, so that they had inferior men commanding men known to be superior to them. The same feeling pervaded every rank amongst the officers, and it was a corroding evil. Our system was purely a voluntary one, and the officers came from so high a class that they were, of course, loyal, and performed their duties well. Still, if this system went on, discontent would increase and time would show that it was possible to put too great a strain upon the loyalty of our officers, and the result would be either a gradual slackening of the whole conception and standard of discipline and efficiency, or else a disinclination among the superior ranks of society to accept commissions.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY hoped he would not be thought wanting in any respect, if he replied very shortly to the interesting speech made by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, for he was bound to say they had diverged somewhat from the subject before the Committee. The hour was late, and the period of the Session was late; and he had, besides, another reason for shortness, that a very influential Committee of General Officers were now engaged in considering these very points. If hon. Members of knowledge and weight on the subject had any desire to place their views before the Committee, either in writing or verbally, he was quite certain they would be most readily listened to, and their views accepted with the greatest deference. That, he thought, would be a sufficient reason for not continuing the discussion any longer. Still, he must notice one or two remarks that had been made by the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Mure). He had not gone so far as to say that there was a want of discipline or a feeling of discontent pervading the Army—he was sure that was not the meaning he intended to convey.

COLONEL MURE: If the hon. and gallant Gentleman will pardon me, that is absolutely within my meaning.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY replied, that he could only say, then, that he entirely differed from the hon. and gallant Member. He did not think there was any such feeling in the Army, or that there was any want of discipline shown. The fact that the privates would not take the stripes was not any argument at all. A man was perfectly entitled to remain a private soldier if he chose, and was within his right in doing so.

COLONEL MURE said, he had not been understood. He did not complain that any want of discipline was shown in a man refusing the stripes. Nothing so absurd ever entered his mind. What he said was, when especially eligible privates refused the stripes and inferior ones were promoted, the result was that good men were commanded by inferior men, and that could not conduce to discipline.

MR. RYLANDS rose to Order. It appeared to him that the points raised were not exactly within the Vote for the Reserve, which they were then supposed to be discussing.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he had more than once reminded hon. Members of the point before the Committee, and had endeavoured, ineffectually, to stop a discussion, the whole of which appeared to him considerably out of Order.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, after such a statement from the Chairman he would not follow the point further, and he thought it was only right that the hon. and gallant Member should have an opportunity of disclaiming his words if he thought it necessary. The Reserve had been found fault with by some Members, who seemed to have forgotten that last year, when the Government called upon them, they came up to a man. That was a great surprise to some hon. Members, though it was not a surprise to him, for he always believed they would come. Still, however, they did join in the most extraordinary way. There was scarcely a man who did not answer to his name, and all of them were admirable soldiers, who, if they had gone abroad, would certainly have done good service. He might state, also, another fact. He knew, from his own knowledge, that a short time ago there was a proposition that members of the Reserve should be allowed to volunteer for active service abroad. The Secretary of State for War determined to call upon them; but he limited the number to 1,000, and he was certain that hon. Members would be surprised to hear that 940 men immediately presented themselves of their own accord. What more could they have done? He really thought this proved they might congratulate themselves on having in the Reserve a nucleus of an admirable system of Army organization.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN thought he was not out of Order in asking attention to one question raised by the hon. and gallant Gentleman. He stated that some battalions had become so attenuated that they, at present, only numbered some 300 or 360 men on parade. He should like to know what course the Government had taken to fill up those battalions, and to keep them at their proper efficiency? If they had only 300 or 360 men in the battalion, the number of Reserve men they would be likely to get would become somewhat limited.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked to be allowed to say one word strictly in explanation. When the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill was before them, he asked whether the Secretary of State for War was precluded from taking the services of Reserve men who were ready to come forward to serve, and what portion of the Reserve Acts had been incorporated with the Army Discipline and Regulation Bill? The Secretary of State for War replied that the Reserve Acts had only been incidentally incorporated in the Act. He pointed out this blot in the month of February. He distinctly charged it against the Government, as one of their acts of omission, that in consequence of their not having remedied it, Reserve men, who were willing and anxious to come, were prevented from doing so. This blot still remained; and they were now, as in the month of February, absolutely without the means of taking any of these Reserve men. He should like to know what steps the Government proposed to take to remedy this? for he alleged, without the slightest fear of contradiction, that if they had taken steps that were in their power to fill up their battalions with men who were willing to volunteer there would never have been these attenuated battalions, which had been made a peg on which to hang this state of alarm in which the country had been ever since.

COLONEL MURE wanted to know if these 940 men had been taken for this year, or had been taken for the rest of their period of Reserve?

MAJOR O'BEIRNE begged to move to report Progress. It was useless to take these Votes while the Secretary of State for War was absent.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again," — (Major O'Beirne,)—put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY replied, that the Reserve men were taken for the remainder of their 12 years' service. With regard to the question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir Henry Havelock), the Government, if necessary, could ask for Reserves again in the same way as they had done recently.

MR. RYLANDS wished to point out to the hon. and gallant Gentleman that this charge entirely disturbed the calculations on which this Vote was asked for. If 1,000 men were to be drafted from the Reserve into the Army, it altered the number on which the Estimates were based; and, therefore, the hon. and gallant Gentleman ought to alter his Estimates. He objected, altogether, to give Government more money than they were entitled to; and, therefore, he would suggest that the Vote, in its present shape, should be withdrawn, for the purpose of being brought in again at a lower amount. He could not go into the technical question which had been raised by hon. and gallant Gentlemen, whose experience gave them a right to speak on the subject; but he thought they might wait for the Report of the Committee which was now inquiring into the whole matter. He presumed it was utterly impossible they should have that Report this Session. He was very much inclined to agree with the noble Lord opposite (Lord Elcho) that the Committee was merely a hanging up of the whole question. During his own experience of the House they had always been having Committees on the Army, and there had always been a great impression that the state of the Army was unsatisfactory. There were always prophets of evil; and now they were told that the Army, which ought to be in the most vigorous condition, was to undergo a searching analysis to see where the disease was from which it suffered. To him, who was not a member of the Service, it was extremely unsatisfactory to hear such complaints, from year to year, of the state of the Army, and yet to be called upon every year to join in voting an enormous sum for its maintenance. They voted something like £16,000,000 annually for the Army, and yet they were told it was in such a state that it was positively almost crumbling from weakness. When the Army Reserve was first established he was under the impression it was to be used in a time of great national emergency, and that by these means they would be able to fall back upon a large number of trained men. Yet now, under the pressure of a single paltry war, they were positively interfering with this Reserve; and if they proposed to enlist them the Reserve would not be found when they were wanted. They had already taken advantage of not less than 1,000 of them, and he protested altogether against a state of things under which it was necessary, in a small war like this in Africa, to draw on the Reserves.

COLONEL MURE said, they ought to add to the Army Votes a sum for these men, and to deduct £6,000 from the Reserve Vote. These men, whether they were sent to the Cape or served at home, were no longer in the Reserve. He should be glad if his hon. and gallant Friend could give him any information as to the state of the Reserves. Here it was reduced at a blow by 900 odd men, and yet they were voting for the number proposed when the Estimates were reduced, without knowing anything about the present condition of the Force.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, they were being asked for the Vote for men who did not belong to the Reserves, and, for his part, he did not think they ought to pay money unless it was actually expended. In order to bring the whole question before the Committee he would move to reduce the Vote by £6,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £197,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay, Allowances, &c. of a number of Army Reserve First Class, not exceeding 22,000, and of the Army Reserve Second Class, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."—(Sir Patrick O'Brien.)

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley was so enamoured of the Reserve that he wished it should not be used. His objection to the Reserve was that when they required it they should have men upon whom they could call, and he was at a loss to understand the argument of the hon. Member. These men were there, and when they wanted them on an emergency, such as that which had taken place, they took the course pointed out by reasonable men, and asked for their services. Of course, if they had men in one place they could not have them in another. With regard to this question of pay, it was only a matter of Estimates. The Estimates were merely a calculation of the pay which would fall due; and if they did not pay these men on one Vote they would pay them on another. The matter was so simple, he did not think it worth making any alteration about, or to shift these men from the Reserve to the Army. Of course, it could be done if necessary; but it was not a matter which reasonable men would desire or wish to see carried out. As to the number of the Reserve, the process was more simple. They had only to deduct 940 from the Reserve Force. The figures were—111 Artillery, 642 Guards, 1,244 Rifles, 13,719 Infantry, and 2,400 Cavalry.

COLONEL MURE remarked, that these were the figures for four months ago, and he wanted to know what the Forces consisted of now? Surely, when Estimates were brought up for discussion, hon. Members should be informed of the condition of the Army. He wanted to know what had been added to the Reserve during these four months?

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN observed, that under this Vote they took a charge for each of these 940 men at 4*d.* a-day; but if they went out to serve like ordinary soldiers the 4*d.* a-day would not be paid. But they would have to be paid at the ordinary valuation rate, and, consequently, he should think there would be a very considerable mixture of accounts. It seemed to him a most extraordinary course of procedure, and it would certainly be a more regular course of proceeding to have a Supplementary Vote in the ordinary way. If he could get no more satisfactory answer than that given to him he should certainly take a Division.

MR. RYLANDS said, according to the statement of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, if they took 1,000 men from the Reserve and added them to the Army it would be necessary, if they reduced the Reserve Vote, to add it to the Army Vote. In that he was altogether wrong, for in the Army Vote they had a Vote for the total number of men, and could not increase that. The 1,000 men from the Reserve simply filled up vacancies in the ranks of the Regular Forces, as he took it for granted that the Secretary of State for War had not attempted to employ more men than were voted. Further, he might explain that he wished the Reserve men to be used in a proper emergency; but the emergency contemplated was a great national one, and not the state of things recently existing. The Army ought to be in such a state that they ought not to go to the Reserves at all, except for an emergency which was worthy of being called really national. They never ought to resort to the Reserves on a little pressure, which ought not to have arisen if the Army had been efficient.

MR. WHITWELL pointed out that there must be some misunderstanding as to this Vote. They voted a certain number of men for the Reserves; but did not say the men were always to be the same. That number was suddenly changed; because Reserve men volunteered into the regiments; consequently, when the 1,000 men were taken off for this purpose there was an influx of others coming in after five years' service.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE pointed out that it was quite useless to have Cavalry Reserves when they really had Reserves in each regiment. In most Cavalry regiments they had about 500 men, with only 300 horses, and, therefore, there was no need for any Reserves.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK trusted they might be allowed to proceed with this Vote, thinking the discussion on it had taken quite long enough. The number of Reserves he found, in July, was 16,959;

but that number varied from day to day. Secondly, what had been pointed out as inaccurate was not so, for the Vote taken at the beginning of the year would cover the actual number who joined. He thought the Government had done very wisely and properly in taking these men from the Reserves; and he apprehended they were intended to reinforce the Army in Zululand, if necessity arose. He was surprised, however, at one remark of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, for he took credit to the Department for taking these men in the month of June, when he had urged upon the Government that they should take them ever since the month of February. In that month they would have been of some use, and it was then they ought to have taken them.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked leave to withdraw his Amendment, as he was satisfied with the explanation of the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell).

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

COLONEL MURE said, it was most important they should know the exact number of the Reserves. They were stated at 16,000, and now they had deducted 1,000 men; so that in 1878-9 they were stated to be 19,000 men, and previously they were put at 22,000. But if there were 19,000 last year, even allowing for the 1,000 taken away, what had become of the 2,000 difference between those figures and the 16,000 estimated for?

MR. PARNELL moved to reduce the Vote of £165,000, the payment of the Army Reserve, Class 1, by £25,000. He said, that the Vote had always been loosely drawn, and exemplified the practice of the War Office, which always estimated for a larger sum of money than it was likely to spend. The consequence was that the War Office had always a good deal of money in hand wherewith to embark, without the consent of Parliament, in little wars. He had no doubt that a great deal of the cost of the Zulu War had been paid for, not out of the Vote of Credit passed at the commencement of the Session—for that must have been spent long since—but out of the balances which the War Office had at its disposal as the result of these excess Votes. In 1877-8, 15,000 of the First Class Army Reserve were estimated for, and in January, 1878, only 11,258 were actually in existence. In 1878-9 19,000 men were estimated for, and in 1879 there were only 15,000 in existence. In 1879, 22,000 were estimated for. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War knew he would never get that number, and it was perfectly certain that it was impossible for him to obtain it. He, therefore, proposed to cut down the Estimates to the proportion of men the Government were likely to have. He found, from the Auditor General's Report, pages 38 and 39, that in 1876-7 only £47,000 was spent out of £87,000 voted in that year. It followed, therefore, that if they cut down the Vote by £25,000 the War Office would still have another £25,000 which it could not use; £140,000 would be left, which would be £10,000 more than the War Office could possibly spend.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Sub-head B, £165,000, Pay of Army Reserve, be reduced by £25,000." — (Mr. Parnell.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 4; Noes 64: Majority 60.—(Div. List, No. 204.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(12.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £392,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Commissariat, Transport, and Ordnance Store Establishments, Wages, &c., that will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1880."

MAJOR NOLAN said, he wished to draw attention to this Vote, which dealt largely with the salaries of two Departments—the Commissariat and Ordnance Stores.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY begged to move to report Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member for Galway is in possession of the House.

MAJOR NOLAN said, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to report Progress he would not oppose; but he wished to speak on this Vote.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, if there was any probability of getting the Vote he would be very glad to take it; but he was under an honourable engagement not to sit much after 6 o'clock. If, therefore, they were likely to take this Vote without much discussion he would go on; but if it would take any great amount of time it would be better to report Progress. He would, however, leave the matter in the hands of the House.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he would make his remarks very brief, and as he was likely to be called away next week he should be glad if the Vote could be taken then. The Ordnance Store Department was a very important one, for it had to supply the Army with ammunition, guns, and, in fact, everything except food, yet they had been very badly treated for a very long time. The majors averaged from 28 to 32 years' service, while officers of the rank of captain averaged from 12 to 28 years. Their appeals had been repeatedly allowed to be fair, and some time ago the corps was amalgamated with the Control. Their grievances, however, were not fully considered. The Control was afterwards broken up; and now, although they stood alone, all the promises given them of improving their prospects had not been carried out. A Committee was appointed to consider the matter, and, very strangely, the only result of their action was to nominate two of their members to very good appointments. One was appointed as the Director of Transports and Supplies, and the other as Secretary of the Service. The Committee, however, reported that these officers were really very badly treated, and that promotion was unduly delayed. As a rule, 20 years' service was enough for promotion; while nearly all the majors in this corps had served for 28 years. They had been promised that a Warrant should be brought out and promulgated; but the promise did not state that they should be put on a perfect parity with the Commissariat. These officers thought that they ought to be placed exactly in the same position as the Commissariat. They had not to deal much with money; on the other hand, the Store Department, as was well understood by those who knew anything of the Army, had to keep stores which were quite as valuable as the money intrusted to the Commissariat. The officers objected also to being called store-keepers, which gave them a bad position. On the creation of this important Department, many Artillery officers joined it in the expectation that it would be a military body, with very high positions attached. But there was still this real and tangible grievance in regard to promotion, and he had hoped something at least would have been done.

LOAN EUSTACE OECIL admitted that there were reasons for the complaints with regard to this Department, and he could only say that his noble and gallant Friends, the former Secretary of State for War, and the present Secretary of State for War, as well as himself, were always anxious to remove these grievances which, in fairness to himself and his Friends, he must say they found existing when they came into Office. He knew that the position this corps occupied raised a feeling of soreness in many respects which it was very right to remove. It was quite correct to say there were several Committees who had endeavoured to come to some arrangement with a view to facilitate promotion. He did not propose to go through all their recommendations; but it would be sufficient to say that, at least, they had decided that the Commissariat should be put on a military basis, and eventually, if that proved successful, and if they got officers and non-commissioned officers such as they expected, the Ordnance Store would follow. It would be a question of time, of course, for they must see how this plan worked. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had mentioned a list of complaints and grievances of some officers, and certainly some of them had existed for a very long time. But he believed that they arose very much from the abolition of the connection with the Control in 1875. Before that time, the two Services being together in one body, the promotion of the officers was, no doubt, facilitated, and they had a greater chance of promotion. Since the separation was made, the Secretary of State for War had appointed two Committees to see how far these grievances could be removed, and their recommendations were still under consideration. If the hon. and gallant Gentleman referred to the answers he had given on this subject, he would find he had said that the officers of the Ordnance Store would be very nearly—he had used those words, but they gave a very wrong impression—he should have said, on all fours, with the officers of the Commissariat. The words he used, and which he very much regretted, he saw had produced an impression that the officers of the Ordnance Store would be in some material or slight degree different from Commissariat officers; whereas they would not, in any degree, or in the slightest degree, be different, either as regarded pay, pension, or promotion. Considering the way in which the officers were brought into the Ordnance Store Department, however, it would be impossible, in individual instances, to make the promotion of all individuals exactly the same. It was the desire, however, of the Government to make them, as nearly as possible, the same, and that was why he used the words, "very nearly." If he had said "on all fours," he would have been, practically, more correct and accurate. As to the officers being called store-keepers, the term was a very ancient one, and it was only within the last 20 years that any fault had been found with it. That might arise from the fact that stores, generally, had spread all over the world; but, still, he did not think the word "store-keeper" was associated in any way with the idea of co-operation. This term had always been used; but he knew that the feeling was as represented, and he had always felt there was ground for complaint. If, therefore, anyone would suggest to him an equally good or better term, which would not interfere with the Commissariat Department, he would use his interest to get it adopted. He did not hold to the use of the word as strictly necessary; and if anyone could discover some other term which would not produce confusion he should be very glad to adopt it.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT thought it would be scarcely fair for him to move a reduction of the Vote at that time; and, therefore, he would defer the observations he wished to make to another stage.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had listened with great care to the speech just made on this subject, and was very much interested in it. If anyone wished to quote an admirable example of the obstruction of Public Business, he could not give a better one than the system of the Ordnance Department. It was only a little better now than the condition in which it was discovered to be immediately after the Crimean War. There were "young" officers in it whose average was 30 years' service. No attention whatever had been paid to their grievances. It was always the same story—"At an early date," "Very soon," "The utmost possible consideration." These phrases had been going on for a quarter of a century. He thought the subject very important. A little more time ought to be given to it, especially as his hon. and gallant Friend (Major Nolan) had shortened his remarks very much. On the efficiency of the Ordnance Department depended the efficiency of the Service; and, therefore, he thought they had better move to report Progress. These officers had been treated in a very bad way. He did not blame the present Government especially for it, for all the Secretaries of State for War for the last 12 years had gone on in pretty much the same way, and had made the same declaration which they had just heard from the Government Bench. He wanted to see the subject treated a little more fully and fairly, and he begged to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. O'Donnell,)—put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK did not wish to keep the Committee, but he did hope this matter might be brought to a decision very speedily. He was not speaking without some right, because it had been his unhappy lot to bring this subject five or six times before his noble Friend; and, as yet, not much progress had been made. The scientific inquiries in connection with the Army became more technical every year. There was no branch of the Service in which special technical education of very broad scope was more important, and there was nobody better aware of these facts than his noble Friend. During this Session he had repeatedly heard that this matter was receiving the utmost consideration; and now, when they were going to separate for several months, the matter did not seem to have progressed one inch. The noble Lord admitted that many of the officers were of very long service, and yet the only expression he gathered from his speech was not encouraging, but rather the reverse; for he understood him to purposely qualify the hopes he had given rise to before. The general impression left upon his mind was that, instead of the hopes of these officers having advanced nearer consummation, they were further off than before. He trusted, before the Session closed, the Government would have offered to bring up this Report, which had been wandering between the War Office and the Treasury; and that it would not be allowed finally to take up its bed in some pigeon-hole, but that it would be acted upon. Not only were these officers nearly on all-fours, but they were, in all respects, the same as the Commissariat Service; and, therefore, he hoped these officers, whose promotion had been so long delayed, would at last find some progress made towards the fulfilment of their desires.

MR. CALLAN appealed to hon. Members to take the discussion of this Vote on the Report, as it was now past the time when they ought to report Progress. He moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Callan.)

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY observed, that it only remained to impress on the Government what had been put forward by his hon. and gallant Friend (Major Nolan). It was perfectly astonishing to him to see the anxiety displayed by these officers for military titles. He did not appreciate their anxiety; but it certainly was very strong, and as they gave good reasons for their demands he felt bound to support it. He did not see why they should not have them, as other non-combatant branches possessed them. The officers of this Department would be largely chosen from the combatant officers; for an officer, after five years in the Artillery, would have power to go to the Ordnance Store Department, and then to go back to the Artillery if he chose. If the two Services of Ordnance and Commissariat were to be so mixed up, there was a very good reason for giving them the same title.

MAJOR NOLAN thought one or two points in the speech of the Surveyor General of the Ordnance (Lord Eustace Cecil) were unsatisfactory. The proposal was to try this experiment, first with the Commissariat, and, if it succeeded, to extend it to the Ordnance Stores. The result would be that many Commissariat officers would be put above Ordnance Store officers of the same date. He was afraid the officers of the Commissariat were more organized, and belonged to better rank; and, in consequence, the Ordnance Store Department had been put back. He could not see why the Commissariat and the Ordnance Store Departments were at first put together, and then broken up. Surely, the Ordnance Stores should have first place, for they had charge of the gunpowder and the ammunition, while the Commissariat were merely civil officers. For his part, he would make both combatant branches. In his opinion, by giving this preference to the Commissariat, they did not benefit that Department so much, while they seriously injured the Ordnance Store Department by making them the only Civil Department of the Army. The grievances of these officers had always been acknowledged, ever since 1855; but because many of them were not men of position, or high rank, their case had been put off, and they had not been promoted. Though he believed there was not much alacrity shown in redressing these grievances, he did not see, also, why, instead of being called "store-keepers," they could not be called "Officers of the Ordnance Corps." Certainly, the objection to calling them "store-keepers" was very strong. No doubt, they had a great deal to do with stores; but, still, the title was very objectionable, and the desire for a change was very desirable. Justice would be done very easily to these gentlemen, and at no cost to the Treasury, by putting them on a military footing.

MR. CALLAN said, he had not intended to move to report Progress. He had only intended to suggest that this discussion could not finish then.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. O'DONNELL pointed out that the object desired could very easily be obtained. All that was asked was that these gentlemen should not be called by a name which, practically, identified them with general shopkeepers in the Colonies. It was a point of grievance with these officers that the Government seemed actually rather to enjoy the plight in which these officers were, and to laugh at the idea that they were likely to be mistaken for shopkeepers. He did not think that was the position which the Government ought to take up. It would be exceedingly easy to amend this, and the title was certainly an incorrect one; because it seemed as if these officers were mixed up with tinned meats, and biscuits, and vegetables, with which they had nothing to do at all.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL hoped the discussion would not go further, and that when hon. and gallant Gentlemen saw the Warrant, both they and the Ordnance Store and the Commissariat Department would be satisfied. It had not been published, in consequence of what had happened at the Cape, and elsewhere; but he might explain that there was no intention to give titles to the civilian officers of the Commissariat, or to put them on a different footing whatever to the Ordnance Stores. He could assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman that it had been his strong desire to keep a strict impartiality between the two branches, in order that neither one nor the other should enjoy advantages in pay, pension, or promotion.

MR. O'DONNELL asked whether they could know when the Warrant would be issued? It was complained that they brought on the discussion before the Warrant was issued; but as they did not know when it was coming out the discussion was certainly necessary.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL replied, that it would be published as soon as some trifling matters between the War Office and the Treasury were settled. It would be published almost immediately.

Malta (Cost of Police, &c.)

Amendt. on Committee of Supply August 1, To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, the cost of maintaining the Police, and of draining, repairing, lighting, cleaning, and watering the streets, &c. in Malta, should be paid out of a rate upon house and other property (upon which, at present, no rates or taxes of any kind whatever are levied), and not, inter alia, out of a tax upon wheat and other grain for food, and upon potatoes and other vegetables, which, as a matter of fact, actually takes more per head from the very poor who live in cellars than it takes per head from those who live in the best houses in the streets and squares; and the House is therefore further of opinion that it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to take such steps as may be necessary to secure the abolition of the taxes on food in Malta on and from the 1st day of January 1881" (Mr. Plimsoll) v., 1898; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Question put; A. 120, N. 62; M. 58 (D.
